face,
To oblivion be obloquy hurl'd;
By the best you're belov'd, thou fair figure of Grace,
So laugh at the rest of the world.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXIV.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

The following letter has remained some time on my files, and I owe an apology to the militia hero for an apparent neglect of his elegant reproof of the undress of the ladies. My admiration of the beauty of his diction and the correctness of his orthography has been excessive; and, in the course of a long acquaintance with the militia style, so justly in vogue in this happy country, I do not remember to have seen any specimen, superior to that, which I now have the honour to exhibit to every admiring American.

Around the character of this valiant epistolizer, there seems, to my dazzled eyes, a vivid glory. As his sword is doubtless as sharp as his pen, his protected country has a sure defence in his valour and veteran experience, and from the inroads of fantastic fashion, we have nothing to fear, while this militia inspector casts his keen glances around.

HONOURD SQUIRE,

IN the first plase, squire, I hope you wont think from my bad speling that I ant a gentleman. To convince you, I gess I am as rich as any boddy in in these here parts. I lately cumd here to Philedelfa from Payankeytank up to the eastwurd, to larn a bit of the fasherns, and to see folk, and so on....You must kno, squire, I made a fortin by tradin in indiger; that is, I was an indiger marchant, sich as they sa here, a flower marchant, a te marchant, and the like of that; and going young into trade, I didnt think much about larnin; but bein obliged by my business, to travil about a good deal, I got to larn considerable about the noshuns of folks, and so they told me I ort to come to a big sity, and that I might larn more, and may bee settil among the great ones, and that I shud find a heap of paple of my tast, and perhap git marryid. I find it is kinder trew; sum of the wimin du seem to like me; if they do not for sarten I gess my yaller panterlunes and kurrickle will make sum of um long.

But what I rite to you about, squire, is the fasherns of the fair seck; was ever any thing so prettee. Now what I wants is, that youl stop them there riters in the Port Folio, who are tryin to run down the wimin, caus they dress naked and show their skins; they want them to lieve off sich fasherns, but do rite a peece that will put um in a noshun of leaving off more clothes. Them fellers must be jokeing, and let what they will sa, I gess the wimin will have more sense to think us men havent feelin and seein and tastin enuff to like it. Ive been most afraid of the late cold and rainy wether least they shud pin up and cumber themselves with the same bunch of petty cotes they wair in our parts; but I am plagee glad to find they have too much spunk for that. I hope next summer they will be nakeder yet; only try um once now, squire, the first time you can work round them, so as to git them between you and the sun: you wont see any pockits I am sartin.

I have been to several frolicks since Ive bin here. Tother nite I was at one, where we had the dance called the waltz, I think....O mighty squire! if you had bin there, the very hares of your wig would stood on eand. I felt kinder shamed: but for all, I was full of noshuns, and couldnt help praizing it; which while I was duing, a gentleman told me it was tolerable clever, but that it was expected a new one would soon be brout up, called the Irish fandango, or sum such old country name. This, he said, would tutch me to the quick. Why says I to a lady, this beats bundling; pray maam, says I, do you understand that play; she turned to the next lady, and whispered sumthing about Dubster or dabster....yes maam, says I, I am a dabster at that; and they gave full credit to what I say, for I go by the very name.

Do, squire, your a skoller, rite a logium on the buty of naked skins, or say sumthing to cumfort the ladies, whilst they are shivering in the cold to sho um to us. Its a shame every boddy should be runin their rigs on the pure wimin.

I am, honurd sir, hoping better acquaintance,
in trew frindship,
your worship's
most humbil sarvant,
ICHABOD FLASH,
a captain in the milishee, when I'm at home.

Continuation....The prosperous state of Commerce, not the consequence of wisdom in the Government: it....Nor the increasing population....Praiseworthy side of the American Constitution....Principal cause of the increasing population.

In my opinion, all these are sins of omission on the part of congress, and their number might, I believe, be augmented ad infinitum. It may, however, be objected, that a government, under whose protection the national prosperity has attained such a splendid elevation, and the numbers of the people have so considerably increased, as in the United States, since the adoption of the federal constitution, cannot possibly, while such admirable effects are produced, be reckoned among the bad governments. To this I answer, that I have already detailed the accidental external circumstances, altogether independent of any internal wisdom in the government, which have enriched America, and extended her trade. But have agriculture and internal industry risen in the same proportion as commerce? With respect to the population, I have to remark, that they are indebted, partly to the emigration of Europeans, computed at about ten thousand individuals yearly, for its increase. And these emigrations prove rather the fault of the European, than the wisdom of the American governments. An increasing population would, if altogether independent of emigration, prove the excellence of an administration.

Nor is every thing to be censured; we must be impartial, and confess that in America there is much to praise. The extensive civil liberty (political liberty there is none), which they enjoy, produces the best effects upon the population. The absence of all feudal oppression; the unbounded religious liberty; the liberty of publishing all opinions; especially the liberty, to every one, of following unimpeded, whatever occupation he best understands, advantages, which hitherto are not in any one European state enjoyed to the same degree as in the United States, are all encouragements to the increase of the human species. But the Americans enjoy altogether, independently of their social establishments, certain advantages still more effectual to the same end. Among them is, not so much the great tract of fruitful western lands, yet uncultivated, (for the speculators have made it every where dear,) as the novelty of the ground, which, even if the soil were bad, would at any rate, give some good harvests. For every countryman can annually clear a few acres from wood, which no ploughshare ever touched before, and which, although covered with a very thin layer of soil, would reward his industry so liberally as to occasion the raising yearly of more grain for every individual in America, than in any other country, even though the produce upon an equal surface in Europe should be incomparably more abundant. This is the principal cause of the increasing population; the others are subordinate to it. The emigration to the westward, however, from the eastern states, attractive as the banks of the Ohio may be, and however fruitful and proportionably cheap the lands there may prove, shews that mal-administration in the eastern parts occasions these removals. Mankind, in general, love, above all things, their home, and the great proportion of them are no more subjected to the eccentric fascinations of an heated fancy, than inclined to the wandering life of an adventurer.

CHAP. XXII.

Continuation of the historical sketch....Federalists and anti-federalists....Aristocrats....Democrats....English and French parties....Genet....Brandy revolution.

I now return to the events which have happened since the introduction of the federal constitution. I shall notice only the most important; and the first thing to be remarked is the rise of two parties. The opposers of this constitution were called anti-federalists, although they were properly federalists, inasmuch as they wished to adhere to the former confederacy, which, by the new constitution was changed, on the contrary, into a single government. Both parties, however, assumed upon the French revolution a new shape. The anti-federalists were changed into democrats, the federalists into aristocrats; which, however, they disavow, and adhere to the other, as a more popular name. The democrats are of course French-minded, while the others incline sympathetically to the side of England. In the southern states, that is, in Georgia, the two Carolinas, Tennessee, Kentucky, and especially in Virginia, the majority is democratic French, South-Carolina perhaps excepted, where as the democrats say, there is much aristocratic leaven prevailing: but north of the river Potomack the English and aristocratic party has the upperhand. In general, the democratic party consists of people overloaded rather with debts, than with the good things of this world, to the sweets of which they are at the same time very far from indifferent, and who in the ruins of a revolution, hope to snatch up their share of the possessions of the wealthy, and then to turn aristocrats themselves. The drunkards, gamblers, unsuccessful speculators, bankrupts, and those who have ruined themselves by debauchery, belong, with few exceptions, to this party. This is what makes it so strong to the southward, where an extravagant way of living generally involves people in debt. Those who have applied to the government for offices, but have not obtained them, are of course democrats. Thus one Bache, a grandson of Franklin, published a violent democratic news-paper at Philadelphia, because he would fain have been post-master-general, but was disappointed in his expectation. Before that time he published, it is said, an aristocratic paper. He calls his gazette the Aurora, to signify the dawn of freedom, according to his taste. There appears, in New-York, another democratic paper called the Argus. These are the two most important vehicles of democratic bitterness in America. The Aurora, however, has no small merit, both in point of matter and of style; the transactions of the war in Europe are discussed in it with much penetration. But the best part of the American people belong likewise to the democratic party, namely, those who are opposed to the bank and trading interest, who wish to see agriculture and industry more encouraged, and who think a closer connection with England would be dangerous, and would mark an ingratitude to France disgraceful to the national honour: in a word, the good patriots, who perceive in the constitution and in the measures of government many defects, and would wish to have them removed. These, however, are the moderate democrats, for the most part, independent people, who, in case of a revolution, would certainly be the victims of the raging democrats above described.

The party of the aristocrats consists of those who have possessions and wish to see them secured against the French stormers of property. They carry on a defensive, the democrats an offensive war. They have found against the latter a faithful ally in the English government, which probably helps them underhand with subsidies, and thus enables them to strengthen their party. Besides this, the commercial existence of so many merchants is so thoroughly dependent upon England, whence they receive goods upon credit, that they are obliged to join the party which favours England. In New-England, perhaps the expiring light of a flaming religious zeal may increase the aversion of the presbyterians against the French, on account of their atheism, this, however, is uncertain. On the other hand, the methodists and other fanatical sects are known as severe republicans. It is well known that the quakers were always devoted to England. The Americans, however, are accustomed to separate politics and religion; so that the political parties among them, are not, as in England under Charles the first, at the same time, religious factions. It may be observed, however, that the deists and atheists are almost universally devoted to democracy. When I speak of American deists and atheists, I mean thereby people who give themselves out for such, and who, without concerning themselves much about the theories of these doctrines, live conformably to their practice....They may be called empiric deists and atheists.

But nothing contributed to render the federal party anti-Gallican aristocrats, so much as the conduct of the French minister Genet. He landed at Charleston, because he well knew that in the southern states, the French cause had the most partisans. He there caused privateers to be fitted out; issued proclamations; attempted even to levy troops, without condescending to pay the smallest attention to the government of the United States. What government would patiently suffer itself to be treated with so much contempt? He travelled very slowly from Charleston to Philadelphia; this had a suspicious appearance; and seemed to indicate a design to make himself a party in the southern states. In Philadelphia he was always surrounded by ill-bred young men, and gave offence, by breaking through all public decency. He declared in public, that France did not wish America to engage in the war, and secretly caballed to produce a rupture with England. The Americans cannot be blamed for not having been willing to sacrifice the great advantages of neutrality, merely for the honour of fighting for the French. There was, in this point of view extreme injustice on the part of the French.

The mountain party recalled Genet, whom the Girondists had sent, and in his stead sent a young man by the name of Fauchet, who conducted himself more prudently.

About this time broke out, in 1794, the brandy-revolution in the western part of Pennsylvania, not far from Pittsburg. Deep-laid causes of this event have been pretended to be discovered, and a great show of penetration has been made about it. At one time England is held forth as fomenting these disturbances, in order to produce, in America, another Vendee; at another, France, in order to produce a democratic revolution. There is, however, nothing mysterious in this event, and it was very natural that brandy drinkers, without money, called upon to pay an excise upon their favourite liquor, should make a noise. The thing was in itself very insignificant too; but the federal or government party, led by Mr. Hamilton, then minister of finance, took advantage of the circumstance with great address, and succeeded, by magnifying the danger of the insurrection, to collect together fifteen thousand men in arms, in a country, where the people march into the field, not when they are ordered, but when they please. The government thus frightened the French party by shewing them how numerous its supporters were. At the same time it exhibited to foreign nations a consolidated power, with a considerable armed force at the first wink at its command. Thirdly, it cast an odious light upon the democrats devoted to France, and upon the French government itself, by representing these disturbances as connected with the machinations of Genet. The insurrection did in fact break out at a time when the diplomatic incivilities of Genet were fresh in the memory; and of course could not but strengthen the bad effects of this offence against the American people, in the person of the rulers whom it had chosen. Genet must necessarily have acted according to his instructions, which would doubtless exhibit a new proof of the contempt which the French entertain towards all nations, except the English, who alone enjoy the honour of their hatred.

The lawyers, who are chiefly inclined to aristocracy, composed the cavalry in this expedition against the brandy-drinkers. It was, however, seen that the American militia had not, since their war for independence, in the smallest degree laid aside their bad habits. The colonels, the captains, &c. hired others to take their places; and the latter slipped away from the army, as soon as they were to fall upon the insurgents, from whom resistance was expected. The army once flew to arms, to fight against one another, while the generals were drunk, and fell to quarrelling....The expedition likewise cost large sums, and was accomplished without bloodshed.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

THE lover of Dr. PERCY's Reliques of Ancient Poetry will relish every thing that savours of the simplicity of the old English ballad. A translation of a Spanish ballad, which begins, "Rio verde, rio verde" or "Glassy water, glassy water," has given a hint to the ingenious author of "Tales of Terror," who appears to be equally happy in the pathetic or ludicrous style. We will venture to predict, that the sentimental misses will sit up to weep over this mournful ballad, at least as long as we did to transcribe it.

GONZALVO,

A SPANISH BALLAD.

.....Infelix indelibata reliquit,
Oscula et abrupto flendus amore cadit.....MILTON.

See! yon knight of Calatrava,
All his vesture stain'd with gore,
Faintly beat the curling waters,
Now he breathless gains the shore!

'Twas the haughty renegado,
Met the chief in yonder wood;
'Twas his coward rival's poignant
Drank the unarm'd hero's blood.

Long had love enslaved Bujaya,
Long had vengeance fired his heart,
Long he lurk'd amid the thicket,
Sudden on his foe to dart.

Here the moor had forced Gonzalvo
Gasping to resign his breath;
But the pitying Guadalquivir
Bore him from the stroke of death.

On the wave-wash'd bank reclining,
See him cast his eyes around;
Now he drops his head despairing,
Now he gazes on the wound.

In his breast with restless fury,
Agony's dark surges roll;
What are wounds that pierce the body,
To the pangs that rend the soul?

When he thinks of fierce Bujaya,
Kindling wrath his bosom warms;
When he thinks on Antonina,
Memory saddens on her charms.

Long the flame of pure affection
In his generous breast has burn'd;
True he lov'd the beauteous maiden,
True his love the maid return'd.

A short gleam of transient pleasure
Faint illumines his languid eyes,
As, from yonder shade advancing,
Almond and the knight espies.

"Oh! what means this sight, my master?"
Cries the page, distress'd with fears,
"Al! your tear-drops speak your sorrow,
And your cheeks are wet with tears!"

"See! the streams of gore descending
All around your garments stain;
Who could wound so brave a warrior,
Who could kill the pride of Spain?"

"'Tis the moor!" exclaim'd Gonzalvo,
'Tis through him these pangs I prove;
He has stabb'd my aching bosom,
He has torn me from my love.

"From my love! oh! think what anguish
Now my heart-strings ruthless tears;
Yet, when life has left my body,
Bear these accents to her ears.

"Quick I'll haste to speak my wishes,
While kind heaven my life prolongs;
Tell her all the hapless story,
Tell her all my cruel wrongs.

"Bid her curse the moorish city,
Which has rear'd my dastard foe;
Bid her curse the moorish chieftain,
Who has laid her lover low.

"Let her frowns dismay his bosom,
Let her all his vows despise;
Let her blast his hopes forever
With the lightning of her eyes.

"Beg, oh beg her not to blot me
From the tablet of her brain;
Let the name of dead Gonzalvo
In her memory still remain.

"And if e'er by chance she wanders,
Near this winding river's side;
If these last sad words she values,
Bid her thank the plying tide.

"To some nobler worthier suitor,
Let her heart its vows transfer;
Heavens! what years of rapturous pleasure
Did I think to spend with her.

"What gay scenes did Hope depicture!
What bright joys did Fancy shew!
Joys now sunk and lost forever,
In the dark abyss of woe.

"I shall ne'er more taste her kisses,
Ne'er more taste her balmy breath;
I must leave her warm embraces,
For the cold embrace of death.

"Yes! I feel his icy touches,
Nature fades upon my sight;
Thick before my aching vision
Floats the mist of endless night.

"A chill numbness lulls my tortures;
All my pangs at once subside!"
Instant sunk the bleeding hero,
Gasp'd his mistress' name, and died.

I shall not very soon tire of copying ballads from the "Tales of Terror." They are the legitimate offspring of genius. We are conducted by a versatile guide, sometimes into the vale of tears, and sometimes into the hall of mirth. But let him lead us where he will, we cheerfully follow, and always find ourselves with a sensible and tuneful companion. I am half inclined to suspect that Mr. Lewis himself is the concealed author. We know that he brilliantly travestied his own ballad, Alonso, the Brave, and it is probable that in this collection he is alter et idem.

HRIM THOR,

OR, THE WINTER KING.

A LAPLAND BALLAD.

Here Winter holds his unrejoicing court,
Here the dread tyrant, meditates his wrath,
Throned in his palace of cerulean ice... THOMSON.

The moon shone bright on Lapland snows,
When grim the Winter King arose;
His icy cave he left with speed,
And summoned straight his fiend-born steed:

.... "Oh! haste, my steed, o'er marsh and plain!
I burn yon beauteous maid to gain;
Oh! haste, my steed, to Sargen's gate,
Where Tura weeps her lover's fate."....

Full swift he donn'd his armour bright,
And mounts, a young and comely knight.
The steed sped on, o'er marsh and plain,
The beauteous damsel to obtain.

He quickly sped, and reach'd the gate,
Where Tura wept her lover's fate.
She curs'd her charms, which caused the fight,
That tore her Asgar from her sight.

.... "Oh! list thee, lady, list to me!
Full many a day I've sought for thee;
Oh! listen, lady, banish fear,
Thy lover's trusty friend is here."

Then sigh'd the damsel fair and bright,
.... "I have no lover, courteous knight,
My Asgar lies on yonder plain,
By Hacho fierce in combat slain."

"Oh! no, fair lady, haste with me!
I soon will show thy love to thee!
In Larno's caves he wounded lies,
Oh! haste e'er life his bosom flies."

Then sigh'd the lady fair and bright,
"My mind misgives me, courteous knight,
For Asgar lies on yonder plain,
By Hacho fierce in combat slain."

"Oh! list thee, lady, list to me,
These tokens sends thy love to thee;
These bells so fair, these rings so bright,
Which erst you gave with fond delight."

He shew'd her tokens one and two,
"Lovely maid, he waits for you!"
He shew'd her tokens two and three,
"Lovely maiden, go with me."

Then spake the lady fair and bright,
"Forgive my doubtings, courteous knight,
Let weal or woe this breast betide,
O'er hill and dale with thee I'll ride."

Full sure the demon spreads his snare,
The eager maid descends the stair,
Anon they mount the panting steed,
And swift o'er hill and valley speed.

As through the forest quick they dart,
With joy bounds high the fiend's proud heart;
Ah! little thought the lady bright,
She clasp'd the cruel Winter sprite.

Now cried the maiden with dismay,
As swift the steed pursued his way,
"And must we up yon mountain go,
Whose sides are heap'd with drifted snow?"

"There lies our road," the sprite replied,
"The way is drear, but I'm your guide;
Then hush your throbbing heart's alarms,
I'll give you to your lover's arms!"

The desert wild the moonbeams show,
White glares around the glist'ning snow,
The fiend spurs on his steed amain,
Whose hoofs ring on the frozen plain.

Now swifter, swifter on they ride.
And reach the mountain's snow clad side;
The plunging steed, without delay,
Through drifted heaps pursues his way.

"Oh! stop your horse, my feet are chill,
The snow is deep, and high the hill."
"Now hush your throbbing heart's alarms,
I'll give you to your lover's arms."

"Oh stop, thou eager guide, for see
The rising coldness numbs my knee."
"Now hush your throbbing heart's alarms,
I'll give thee to thy lover's arms."

"Stop! stop! for God's sake, stop, for oh!
My breast is chill'd with circling snow."
"Now vain your fears and wild alarms,
You feel your lover's icy arms!"

Now shrieks the maid with wild affright,
While loud exults the Winter sprite;

The moon grows dark, the night grows foul,
Thick snows descend, and tempests howl.

Afar the fiends hoarse yells resound,
As round the maid his arms he wound;
Afar are borne the maiden's cries.
By warring blasts that rend the skies.

But ere she sunk beneath the snows,
Her Asgar's ghastly shade arose;
He bared his bosom, streak'd with gore,
And sigh'd, "sweet love, we meet no more!"

Now loud are heard the maiden's cries,
But louder blasts and tempests rise;
And when the tempests ceas'd to roar,
The maiden's cries were heard no more.

Take warning hence, ye damsels fair,
Of men's insidious arts beware,
Believe not every courteous knight,
Lest he should prove a Winter Sprite.

Nothing in lyric poetry is read, among the upper class of American scholars, with more enthusiasm, or quoted with more praise, than Dryden's Ode. It is periodically recited in our theatres, it is perpetually quoted in conversation. Its energy, harmony, sublimity, are never questioned. Men view it as possessing such a prescriptive title to veneration, that it would be considered arrogant to hint a fault, or hesitate dislike. For myself, I should not presume to blame any part of an elegant whole, which, from its grandeur and magnificence, has so often in the literary hour produced the most pleasurable emotions. But all are not so easily pleased, and a rigid critic has lately thus stated his objections in the court of criticism.

If a foreigner were to ask an Englishman for the best specimen of lyric poetry in the English language, I have no doubt but that he would be presented with Dryden's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day. This celebrated piece is supposed to have reached the pinnacle of excellence, to have surpassed Horace, and rivalled Pindar.

An ode could never have been so universally renowned, without intrinsic and extraordinary merit. Its beauties have been felt, as well as understood. The heart and the ear have decided in its favour, previously to the determination of the judgment. I acknowledge and admire its excellence; but I must be so far guilty of poetical deduction as to say, that its merit appears to me to have been over-rated, and that, in my opinion, it is not the best ode in the language.

There are blemishes in it, which sully the lustre of its beauties; there are lownesses in it, which degrade its sublimity; there are vulgarities of expression, which at once destroy its elegance, and debilitate its pathos.

The plan is excellent, the spirit noble, and my chief objection is to the choice of words, which, according to all the rules of criticism, and the dictates of natural taste, should be peculiarly delicate in the ode.

The word "belyed," in the line

"A dragon's fiery form belyed the God," is beneath the dignity of the serious lyric, and inconsistent with the sublime idea of the God of heaven and earth metamorphosed to the fiery form of a dragon.

His "stamping an image of himself," as he was then in the image of a dragon, conveys to a careless reader the idea of his having stamped a dragon.

Bacchus is represented, at least to the mind of a mere English reader, in a manner unknown to classical antiquity:

Flush'd with a purple grace,
He shews his honest face.

These lines exhibit the picture of a drunken sot, with bloated cheeks and a red nose; though the poet himself has just described the god as "Ever fair and ever young." The line, "He shews his honest face," is in a style so familiar and colloquial, as to militate against the dignity and matron-like decorum of the lyric muse. Honest, indeed, in its truly classical signification, is a very elegant expression, synonymous with beautiful; but not one English reader in a hundred understands the epithet any otherwise than as it is often applied to a drunkard, or bon vivant, when he is called an honest fellow, that is, a jolly bacchanalian. It was a reason against Dryden's using this epithet, even if he intended it in its classical sense, that it was sure to be misunderstood by the majority of his readers. Virgil, speaking of Bacchus, says

"Quocunque Deus caput egit honestum,"

And Dryden probably had this very line in his view; but "honest," in this classical sense, is not yet naturalized in England, and therefore it was injudicious in Dryden to use it. "Honest" conveys the idea of a mere good-humoured plumpness of face, a broad grinning mirth; whereas the old classics speak of Bacchus, as remarkable for the delicacy of his countenance. They attribute to him the virginea forma et virgineum caput: not the immutable rubicundity, and stupid fatness of a brandy-faced landlady.

Dryden was a remarkably good classic, and could not but know the mode, in which Bacchus is delineated by the poets; therefore there is every reason to think, that he chose the epithet "honest," intending to display his classical knowledge and taste; and had he written to none but classical scholars, his epithet would have been applauded, without one dissentient voice; but to the common reader it gives an image very different, from that which existed in the poet's mind. It exhibits such a Bacchus, as we see dangling from a country sign-post, astride on a tun. It disgraces the ode, and renders it little better than a song, roared by a club of sots in an alehouse.

The other lines

*Drinking joys did first ordain,
Drinking is the soldier's pleasure;*

are coarsely expressed, and more characteristic of Tom D'Urfey, than of Pindar.

The greater part of the subsequent ode is either truly pathetic, or sublime. Yet I cannot admire in an ode, said to equal or surpass every thing in lyric sublimity and grace, such lines as

*Thus long ago,
Ere heaving bellows learn'd to blow,*

the bellows being a culinary machine, strikes the ear with a vulgar sound, and the mind with a vulgar idea. The poet should have spoken of the bellows by an elegant periphrasis, or some name removed from plebeian use. The bellows, in this place, if I may be allowed a frigid joke, blows out much of the poetic fire.

The creeping Alexandrine

"With Nature's mother-wit, and arts unknown before." is flat and prosaic. "Mother-wit" is a term, which the sublime muse of the lyre, in her better judgment, would not have adopted.

But I recollect the censure that has justly fallen on Zoilus, and on all the race of hypercritics: I recollect also the trite idea of finding spots in the sun. I must therefore apologize to the reader for the liberty I have taken with this celebrated ode, by declaring that I do not mean to deny that it possesses a very high rank; but only to controvert its claim to the highest rank among the lyric poems of England.

GRAY, as a poet of the lyre, appears to me to be more uniformly grand and majestic. The mind is elevated by him to ethereal regions, and soars with eagle flight, without being obliged to fall from its eminence, like the son of Dædalus. GRAY wins his way on high, like a glorious luminary, all steady, all regularly magnificent; Dryden rises like an air balloon, which now and then breaks, and tumbles precipitately down, contrary to the intention of the conductor of it, and to the great mortification of the gaping spectator.

The above strictures may expose me to the anger of the irritable sons of Aristarchus. I shall only observe, that on literary subjects, like these, though there may be reason for dissent, I cannot see any occasion for the bitterness of malice.

It is well known that W. GIFFORD, Esq. is a fond admirer of the writings of Pope. But it is not so generally known, that Mr. Pope's poetical reputation has of late been more violently assailed by an acrimonious carper, than it was by all the personal prejudices of the scribblers, lashed in the Dunciad. One WESTON, a writer in the Gentleman's Magazine, took it into his head to disturb the ashes of Pope, and absurdly to condemn, what all had agreed to praise.

Indignant at this unmerited calumny, Mr. Gifford, an undaunted and accomplished defender, has undertaken to overthrow a miserable scribbler, and to vindicate a brilliant genius, in the following animated lines, which are as caustic as the satire of CHURCHILL.

Weston, who slunk from Truth's imperious light,
Swell'd, like a filthy toad, with secret spite,
And envying the fair fame he cannot hope,
Spits his black venom at the dust of Pope.
Reptile accurs'd!.....O memorable long,
If there be force in virtue, or in song,
O injur'd bard! accept the grateful strain,
That I, the humblest of the tuneful train,
With glowing heart, yet trembling hand repay,
For many a pensive, many a sprightly lay:
So may thy varied verse, from age to age,
Inform the simple, and delight the sage!
While canker'd Weston, and his loathsome rhymes,
Stink in the nose of all succeeding times.

One of the most literary of my friends, who has a relish for wit and humour, as well as an Oxonian's skill in the classics, bade me last evening look among the minor poems of WARTON, and take care to preserve in my motley miscellany, a

ON THE OLD WINCHESTER PLAY-HOUSE, OVER THE BUTCHER'S SHAMBLES.

Whoe'er our stage examines, must excuse
The wond'rous shifts of the dramatic muse;
Then kindly listen, while the prologue rambles,
From wit to beef, from Shakspeare to the shambles.
Divided only by one flight of stairs,
The monarch swaggers, and the butcher swears.
Quick the transition, when the curtain drops,
From mock Mominia's moans to mutton chops.
While for Lothario's loss Calista cries,
Old women scold, and dealers d—n your eyes.
Here Juliet listens to the gentle lark,
There in harsh chorus hungry bull dogs bark.
Cleavers and scimitars give blow for blow,
And heroes bleed above, and sheep below.
While tragic thunders shake the pit and box,
Rebells to the roar the staggering ox.
Cow horns and trumpets mix their martial tones,
Kidneys and kings, moulting and marrow bones.
Suet and sighs, blank verse and blood abound,
And form a tragi-comedy around.
With weeping lovers dying calves complain,
Confusion reigns. . . . Abbas is come again.
Hither your statelyards, butchers, bring to weigh
The pound of flesh Antonio's bond must pay.
Hither your knives, ye Christians, clad in blue,
Bring to be whetted by the ruthless Jew.
Hard is our lot, who, seldom doomed to eat,
Cast a sheep's eye on this forbidden meat.
Gaze on sirloins, which, ah! we cannot carve,
And in the midst of legs of mutton, starve.
But would you to our house in crowds repair,
Ye generous patrons and ye blooming fair,
The fate of Tantalus we should not fear,
Nor pine for a repast that is so near.
Monarchs no more would supperless remain,
Nor pregnant queens for culetts long in vain.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO

AN ESSAY

ON THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF BOILLEAU DESPREAUX.

NICHOLAS BOILLEAU DESPREAUX, was born at Paris, on the first of November, 1636, fifteen years after Molière, fourteen after La Fontaine, and three years before Racine. Thus these four great men, who have rendered French literature so illustrious, and have secured to it that high degree of estimation and glory which it has attained in all polished nations, published nearly at the same time those master-pieces, which stand unrivalled among the Moderns. He was the eleventh child of Giles Boileau, clerk of the high court of Parliament, a man whose rare probity, and consummate experience in business, procured him universal esteem. His childhood gave no indications of that pre-eminence which he afterwards attained. Extreme mildness, candour, and amiable simplicity, were the most prominent traits in his character; and his father was wont to say of him, that "he was a good lad, who would never speak ill of any body."

Born in the metropolis, and possessing a father, who was sensible of the necessity of a good education, and justly appreciated its advantages; he had the good fortune, from his infancy, to receive the instructions of the best masters. Consequently, his progress was as rapid as it was brilliant. He soon distinguished himself at the college de Harcourt, where he commenced his studies, and hardly had he entered the fourth class, when a grievous malady threatened his life. He was attacked by the stone; it was necessary to make an incision, and this operation, although performed with skill, was followed by a painful indisposition which terminated but with his life.

As soon as the state of his health permitted him to resume his studies, he was placed at the college of Beauvais. He was there confided to the care of M. Sevin, a man of rare merit, who very successfully instructed the third class, during a period of fifty years; and, possessed in the highest degree, the talent of judging of the capacity of his pupils; and of giving that direction to their genius, which nature had indicated. This Professor, whose memory we revere, soon discovered in his pupil extraordinary talents; and predicted his future pre-eminence among poets.

After Despréaux had finished his course of belles-lettres and philosophy, he studied the civil law, and was admitted to the bar. A profession, in the exercise of which, it is necessary to draw forth all the resources of the mind, either for the purpose of decking falsehood with the colours of truth, or of gaining for truth a triumph over the illusions of falsehood; could not be compatible with his natural candour, and still less with his taste for peace and retirement. He therefore renounced a profession repugnant to his principles and inclination. The study of theology seemed to present fewer inconveniences, and to promise him more satisfaction and repose. He commenced it with ardour; but soon did he experience similar disgust. How could a mind so enlightened, a judgment so profound, relish a science enveloped in words, the abuse of which was an inexhaustible source of controversy;—a science buried in the subtleties and obscurity of barbarous pedantry! for theology at that period was not what it now is; the science of morality and of the christian dogmas. Disgusted also with this study, he renounced the project of embracing a profession; and thus restored to himself, he resolved to follow the impulse of his genius.

Although at this period the celebrated provincial letters, had established the language, and brought prose to perfection; although the masterpieces of Corneille, had rendered the French theatre the rival of that of Athens; and Malherbe, Roucou and other poets, had subjected poetry to the laws of rhyme, of cadence and of harmony; although true eloquence had displayed itself with splendour in the pulpit and at the bar, and the limits prescribed to each of its species began to be known and respected; still was France far from that elevated point of literary glory, at which she was destined to arrive. A crowd of authors, of whom but few rose above mediocrity, and many grovelled below it; still infected literature, and opposed the progress of taste, and of learning. The false taste, which had prevailed during the regency of Mary de Medicis, and was for a long time predominant, admired and sanctioned at the hotels of Rambouillet and Longueville; was still the reigning taste at the court, in the city, and in the provinces. Those simple graces of style, which never fail to charm and to delight, were little known, or at least but little felt: nothing was praised but the extravagant, the glittering and the false.

Born with a penetrating mind, possessing a delicate and refined taste, and actuated by a fervid love of truth; Despréaux no sooner discovered those corruptions of true taste, than he resolved to attack them with the weapons of reason and of ridicule. This he so successfully performed in his first satires, that all his shafts pierced, and from that moment it was easy to foresee, the prompt and brilliant revolution which was soon to be exhibited in the regions of literature.

He at first contented himself with the recital of his satires, in the presence of a small circle of chosen friends; they made too vivid and deep an impression on the minds of the auditory to be forgotten; and some spurious copies were circulated in the capital, and thence passed in a mutilated state into the collections of that period. Despréaux, incensed at the injustice he experienced from the malice of his enemies, or from the ignorance or the stupidity of the booksellers, at length determined to publish them. The first edition, which appeared in 1666, contained the first seven satires and the address to the king. This small collection was received with the applause which it so highly merited. "It is," as Mr. De la Harpe so justly observes, "the first poetical work, in which we find a perfect knowledge of the mechanism of French versification, a diction uniformly elegant and pure; and in which the ear and the language have been constantly respected."

So long as the circulation of these satires was confined to a few select societies, the authors whom they attacked, and their declared patrons were silent. Vainly did they hope, that their silence would blunt the shafts of ridicule, and even bury the satires in oblivion. But as soon as they appeared in print, those men attacked the author with all the violence of fury, and all the malignity of hatred. They loaded him with calumny, and circulated the most atrocious libels against him. Such have always been the resources of base envy, and of humiliated vanity. To them truth is as odious, as is the light of the sun to the bird of night; they leave no effort untried to veil it in obscurity. Despréaux, calm amidst all those attacks, still felt an obligation to defend himself. He did so, but with the moderation which formed so prominent a trait in his character. In his defence he alledged the example of Lucilius, of Horace, Persius, Juvenal, and even that of the discreet Virgil. At length his ninth satire appeared, in which ingeniously feigning to apply severe censure to himself, he satisfactorily proves that without committing a crime either against the state or against conscience, we may declare that bad verses are bad; be wearied with the perusal of certain books, and even divulge the reasons of our disgust.

This satire, which in the opinion of Mr. Dela Harpe, is a master-piece of satirical gaiety, and a model of ingenious raillery; increased the reputation of Despréaux, and secured to him the esteem and friendship of the most respectable persons in Paris: and of all those who had acquired celebrity in the departments of literature; Cossart, Rapin, Courmire, Bourdaloue, Flechier, were ardently attached to him; Arnauld and Nicole, those illustrious men, whose very names proclaim their eloquence, prized his friendship and esteemed it as reflecting honour on themselves; the great Condé, the celebrated cardinal de Retz, and the duke de la Rochefoucault, distinguished him by the most flattering attentions, and honoured him with their patronage. Moliere, la Fontaine and Racine formed in conjunction with him a society cemented by the most sincere and ardent friendship, and the most perfect esteem and confidence. Equally flattering to Despréaux was the approbation of the first president Lamoignon. That wise and learned magistrate, whose friendship was a protecting shield; honoured him with peculiar esteem. Far from being alarmed at the title of satire, which the works of Despréaux bore, he was delighted to find in them that precious taste for ancient authors; and particularly to perceive that he had subjected to the laws of the most scrupulous chastity, a species of poetry, the licentiousness of which had, till then, formed its most prominent characteristic. Those great men ceased not to admire the uniformly pure taste, the prompt and delicate discernment, the justness and accuracy of expression, the piquant simplicity, the unaffected graces, the admirable dexterity with which he wielded the arms of raillery and of ridicule; and especially, the perfection to which he had so suddenly brought poetry; perfection, of which some verses of Malherbe, Roucou and the great Corneille, had afforded a faint image; but whose complete attainment was reserved to Despréaux. For according to the sentiment of Mr. De la Harpe, "Despréaux first taught us to select the appropriate expression, to place it with propriety in verse, by a judicious arrangement, to give to words their full force and value, to elevate and dignify the most minute details, to avoid redundancy, irregular construction, a vulgar style, to reject all ambiguous and prosaic expressions, to give cadence to the poetical period and to suspend and vary it, to derive advantage from cæsura, and finally to employ figures with prudence, and select them with delicate discrimination. Corneille and Moliere had composed works of genius, for genius is always the harbinger of truth; but Despréaux who was incapable of producing such works as the Cid and the Misanthrope, was peculiarly qualified to give to the French language what it still wanted, a perfect system of versification."

This Despréaux accomplished in his art of poetry, which was composed immediately after his ninth satire, but he deferred the publication with a view of obtaining and deriving advantage from the advice and observations of his friends. This master-piece of versification and of taste, in which our poet has risen superior to Horace, Aristotle and Vida, was received with transport, and universally admired. The admiration of men of taste, was not less excited by the beauty of the thoughts and of the style, than by the art with which the precepts are connected, and presented to the reader, in a form which attaches, and captivates him. "This excellent composition," says Mr. De la Harpe, "one of the most splendid monuments of our language, proves that sound criticism is the appendage of genuine talents; and that those alone who are capable of furnishing models, are qualified to give instruction. Let the votaries of Parnassus, study the art of poetry of the French Horace; there will they find, delineated by a masterly hand, the elements of all the beauties worthy of imitation, and those of the imperfections which they ought to avoid: it is a perfect system of legislation, whose operation is uniformly just; an inexpressible code, whose decisions will always serve as unerring guides to our censure and to our applause. In no instance has the author better displayed the exquisite judgment with which nature had endowed him. Those persons who have studied the art of composition, can attest the forcible impressions, they have received from the superior talent which shines throughout this production; the verses of which are as happily conceived, as they are elegantly written; and have long since become the axioms of good taste. Such was the success of this admirable treatise, that its precepts were received as law, not only in France, but in many foreign countries." By it was modern Italy instructed how to check her extravagant flights of imagination; and perhaps to it does England owe the correct and pure taste which characterised the authors who flourished during the reign of queen Anne. This brilliant production, first appeared in the edition of his works, which Despréaux published in 1673.

POLITICS.

Review of the Speech of the Right Honourable William Windham, delivered in the House of Commons, November 4, 1801, on the Report of an Address to the Throne, approving of the Preliminaries of Peace with the Republic of France.

[CONCLUDED.]

TO return from this digression:....Mr. Windham observes that "we are become of a sudden great hoppers. We hope the French will have no inclination to hurt us;—we hope, now peace is come, and the pressure of war, as it is called, taken off, that the French empire will fall a prey to dissensions, and finally fall to pieces, &c."

Alas, our fears are greater than our hopes; we fear, that on the temple of Peace which we have entered the same inscription might with propriety be put as Dante put on the gate of a very different place;

Lasciate ogni speranza voi, ch'entrate.

"But," says Mr. W. "we have another hope, founded on rather a contrary supposition, namely, that Buonaparte, now that he is a king himself,.... and a king he is so far as power can make one,.... will no longer be an encourager of those absurd and mischievous doctrines, which, however, they may have helped him to the throne, will be as little pleasing to him, now that he is fairly seated there, as to any the most legitimate monarch. Sir, I agree, that Buonaparte, like other demagogues and friends of the people, having deluded and gulled the people sufficiently to make them answer his purpose, will be ready enough to teach them a different lesson, and to forbid the use of that language towards himself, which he had before instructed them in, as perfectly proper towards others. Never was there any one, to be sure, who used less management in that respect; or who left all the admirers of the French revolution, within and without,—all the admirers of it, I mean, as a system of liberty,—in a more whimsical and laughable situation. Every opinion for which they have been contending, is now completely trodden down, and trampled under foot, and held out in France to the greatest possible contempt and derision. The honourable gentlemen on the opposition benches have really great reason to complain of having been so completely left in the lurch. There is not even a decent retreat provided for them."

"But though such is the treatment, which the principles of "the Rights of Man," and of the "Holy Duty of Insurrection," meet with in France, and on the part of him who should be their natural protector, it is by no means the same, with respect to the encouragement which he may choose to give them in other countries. Though they use none of these goods in France for home consumption, they have always a large assortment by them ready for foreign markets. Their Jacobin orators are not to be looked for in the clubs at Paris, but in the clubs of London. There, they may talk of cashiering kings, with other language of that sort: but should any orator more flippant than the rest choose to hold forth in that strain, in the city where the Great Consul resides, in the metropolis of liberty, he would soon put him to silence, in the way that we see adopted in the sign of the Silent Woman. Buonaparte, being vested, in virtue of the Rights of Man, with despotic power, can afford to sanction the preaching of those doctrines in other countries, of which he will not suffer the least whisper in his own. While he is at the head of an absolute monarchy in France, he may be the promoter and champion of jacobin insurrections every where else. The abject as well as wicked nature of jacobinism in this country, which, while it would rebel against the lawful authority of its own government, is willing to enslave itself to France, finds no difficulty of allowing to him these two opposite characters: and I know no reason why we should suppose him disinclined to accept them.

"I must confess, therefore, that I see as little hope for us on this side, as I do on the other. In fact, if I could believe, in spite of all probability, that there was any remission of that purpose, which has never yet ceased for an instant,—the purpose of destroying this country,—such belief, however produced, must be instantly done away by a view of the conduct of France, in the settlement of this very treaty. There is not a line of it, that does not either directly point to the destruction of this country, or, by a course a little circuitous, but not less certain, equally tend to the same object."

Mr. W. proceeds to prove that the cessions which were so peremptorily insisted upon by Buonaparte could not have been demanded from any other motive than a desire to ruin this country.—He underates, however, the extent of that encouragement which the first Consul is desirous to give "to those absurd and mischievous doctrines" which have the destruction of royalty for their object. For even in Paris these doctrines are tolerated: as will appear from the following passage extracted from a book published at Paris, during the negotiations between Lord Hawkesbury and Citizen Otto;—"telle a toujours été l'extravagance et l'injustice des SOUVERAINS, de voir les peuples confiés à leur gouvernement, comme un bien propre dont ils pouvoient disposer"....Such have ever been the extravagance and injustice of Sovereigns, that they have regarded the people entrusted to their government, as their absolute property, of which they could dispose at their pleasure."....Such is the language encouraged by the Anti-Jacobin Buonaparte, who has the effrontery to complain of the freedom of the British press, and, if we mistake not, to have instructed his citizen-minister in this country, to remonstrate against all reflections on his immaculate person, and perfect government!....Englishmen, Heaven knows! are degraded enough, but still not so degraded as to submit to the tyrannical mandate of a foreign usurper, who has no title to power but possession; and no claim to respect but such as the prince of darkness might enforce from his attendant demons!

The orator, in comparing the conduct and designs of the French in respect of this country, with those of the Romans in respect of Carthage....a comparison he it remembered first made by the revolutionary hero Barrere....pays a just compliment to these turbulent republicans.

"This was at least the conduct of a great people (the Romans): a people not to be put aside from their purposes by every transient blast of fortune. They had vowed the destruction of Carthage; and they never rested from their design, till they had seen it finally accomplished. The emulators of their fortune in the present day, are, in no less a degree, the emulators of their virtues; at least of those qualities, whatever they may be, that give to man a command over his fellows. When I look at the conduct of the French Revolutionary rulers, as compared with that of their opponents; when I see the grandeur of their designs; the wisdom of their plans; the steadiness of their execution; their boldness in acting; their constancy in enduring; their contempt of small obstacles and temporary embarrassments; their inflexible determination to perform such and such things; and the powers which they have displayed, in acting up to that determination! when I contrast these with the narrow views, the paltry interests, the occasional expedients, the desultory and wavering conduct, the want of all right feeling and just conception, that characterize so generally the governments and nations opposed to them, I confess I sink down in despondency, and am fain to admit, that if they shall have conquered the world, it will be by qualities by which they deserve to conquer it. Never were there persons who could shew a fairer title to the inheritance which they claim. The great division of mankind made by a celebrated philosopher of old, into those who were formed to govern, and those who were born only to obey, was never more strongly exemplified than by the French nation, and those who have sunk, or are sinking, under their yoke. Let us not suppose, therefore, that while these qualities combined with these purposes shall continue to exist, they will never cease, by night or by day, in peace or in war, to work their natural effect,...to gravitate towards their proper centre; or that the bold, the proud, the dignified, the determined, those who will great things, and will stake their existence upon the accomplishment of what they have willed, shall not finally prevail over those, who act upon the very opposite feelings; who will "never push their resistance beyond their convenience;" who ask for nothing but ease and safety; who look only to stave off the evil for the present day, and will take no heed of what may befall them on the morrow. We are therefore, in effect, at war at this moment: and the only question is, whether the war, that will from henceforward proceed under the name of peace, is likely to prove less operative and fatal, than that which has hitherto appeared in its natural and ordinary shape. That such is our state, is confessed by the authors themselves of the present treaty, in the measures which they feel it necessary to recommend to the house. When did we ever hear before of a large military establishment necessary to be kept up in time of peace? The fact is, that we know that we are not at peace; not such as is fit to be so called, nor that in which we might hope to sit down, for some time at least, in confidence and security, in the free and undisturbed enjoyment of the blessings which we possess. We are in that state, in which the majority, I believe, of those who hear me, are in their hearts more desirous that we should be, than in our present prostrate and defenceless situation, they may think it prudent to avow;....in a state of armed truce; and then the only questions will be, at what price we purchase this truce; what our condition will be while it lasts; and in what state it is likely to leave us, should it terminate otherwise than as we are willing to suppose."

Mr. Windham then considers the relative state of such a peace and of continued warfare, and clearly proves that, even in point of pecuniary interest, the latter would have been preferable to the former. His observations on this part of the subject are particularly striking, and merit the closest attention.

We would fain follow this eminent statesman through his admirable remarks on the danger to which the morals of the country will be exposed from an unrestrained intercourse with France; but we have already far exceeded the limits usually allotted to such an article; we can therefore only extract a few more lines.

"What are we to think of a country, that having struck out of men's minds, as far as it has the power to do so, all sense of religion, and all belief of a future life, has struck out of its system of civil polity the institution of marriage? That has formally, professedly, and by law, established the connection of the sexes, upon the footing of an unrestrained concubinage? That has turned the whole country into one universal brothel? That leaves to every man to take, and to get rid of, a wife, (the fact, I believe, continues to be so,) and a wife, in like manner to get rid of her husband, upon less notice than you can, in this country, of a ready furnished lodging?"

"What are we to think of uniting with a country, in which such things have happened, and where for generations the effects must continue, whatever formal and superficial changes prudence and policy may find it expedient to introduce into the things themselves."

We now take our leave of one of the most important speeches ever delivered in parliament; requesting our readers to observe, that the intention audaciously imputed to Mr. W. of wishing to wage an eternal war with France, and of urging the minister never to conclude peace with her until monarchy should be restored, is here proved to be an impudent falsehood, propagated for the worst purposes of party.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A BEEF-STEAK club, as it is called, has been lately established in Drogheda, the first resolution of which is, that the society shall meet once a week, and have but one meat dish for dinner, consisting, either of pork griskins, or mutton chops!

A dispute was lately brought before one of our magistrates, between two Jews. Nathan vs. Solomon. It turned out to be a fraud, practised upon the former, in a bargain of old clothes. After the award, the magistrate, jocularly addressing the plaintiff, said, "I wonder, my honest fellow, that you should be taken in, by one of your own tribe." "Ah! sir," replied Nathan, "your worship does not consider, that every Jew is not a Solomon!"

[London paper.]

At the time that the duke of Wirtemberg was concluding a treaty of marriage with the royal princess, Mr. Sheridan was informed that the duke was to have the next vacant ribbon; on which the wit observed, that his serene highness would be woefully disappointed, if he should receive no higher honour than that of the garter!

In the dilemma of a fourth act, an author once applied to Murphy for assistance. "Sir," says he, "I do not know how it has happened, but I have killed every being but one in my tragedy, at the end of the fourth act, and I cannot contrive business for the fifth." "Sir," replied Murphy, "as the dramatis persone are defunct, what if you were to introduce their executors, administrators, and assigns!"

One Fottrel, an actor, who used to perform, formerly in Dublin, was more remarkable for being a good hazard player than a good actor. One night, in speaking the long speech of the king, in Hamlet, the house attempted to cough him off, but to no purpose, until a fellow in the upper gallery completely gagged him, by calling out "pass the box, Jimmy!"

At a late ball, some British officers of the army gave offence to a gentleman of the navy, who, to express his dislike of their behaviour, said to a lady he could not relish lobster sauce!

An officer in the West Indies, having formed a tender connection there, and not wishing to return to his family, has lately written home to his wife at Kilkenny, that he died last year of the yellow fever, and therefore hopes she will not expect his return.

When the late marquis of Bath was a stripling of sixteen, like another Peregrine Pickle, he "was a mere dragon among the chambermaids." To one of these gentle abigails he was, one day, so rude, that she complained to his mother, who being very wroth at his incontinency, he exclaimed, "Indeed, she had so polished an ancle, and pretty a foot, flesh and blood could not resist the temptation." His mother, surveying his spectral form, replied, "though flesh and blood could not resist, yet skin and bone might."

An attorney lately attempted to quiz a country parson, who had a fine snuff box. "Doctor," said he "your box is large enough to hold the freedom of a corporation." "Sir," said the priest, "it will hold any freedom...but yours!"

A question in divinity has been lately solved, on the duke of Dorset's plea that he was a menial servant to his majesty, and therefore exempt from the hair-powder tax. In the book of Esther, chap. vi. and verse 6, it is thus written. "What shall be done to the man, whom the king delighteth to honour?" Answer, Verily, he shall have his head powdered for nothing.

[London paper.]

A conversation of considerable importance took place in the British house of commons on the night of Monday the third of May. Mr. Windham stated his reasons for giving notice of a motion respecting the definitive treaty, and entered into a detail of the objections which had been thrown out on different times in both houses by gentlemen of his opinion.... Mr. Pitt defended the definitive treaty against Mr. Windham's attacks, but reserved the full statement of his arguments until the promised motion should be made. He said, however, with respect to the apprehensions expressed for the safety of the British East-India dominion, in consequence of the non-renewal of former treaties, that not only no English member of parliament could find any solid ground of objection or uneasiness; but that no rival could discover a plausible pretence for cavil on that account. He defended generally the non-renewal treaties; and contended that the advantage of the omission was as great on the part of England as France. Mr. Windham's notice was of a motion for Tuesday the eighteenth of May; but Mr. Adlington moved as an amendment, Tuesday the eleventh. The reason he gave for this was the necessity of terminating the work of peace (already too long suspended) as early as possible.

In the course of his observations respecting the definitive treaty, remarking on the cession in Louisiana to the French, Mr. Windham said.... "By this acquisition the French are established in a space as unbounded as the view it opens, whether north or south. What a present have we made in it to the Americans! We have placed a serpent at their feet, by which they will ultimately be devoured. We have put them in that state in which they will become willing slaves under the dominion of France. We all know something of the human nature. We know that men detest the instrument less than the cause, and turn their resentment upon those whom they can make to feel it most. They will not, of course, hesitate between us and the French; and thus we shall eventually forfeit the friendship of America by the aggrandizement of the French in that quarter. As to the wealth which this establishment opens to them, it has no limits but their will. On the continent of South-America there is no power that can resist them. There are the sources of the wealth of the world: but if gentlemen do not feel the consequence of their passing into the hands of the French, it would be in vain for me to impress them with an idea of their importance."

In the year 1765 a volume was reviewed in London, entitled The Patriotic Muse, a poem on some of the principal events of the late war; together with a poem on the peace, by an American Gentleman. The merciless critics thus divert themselves, at the expense of this same American.

This Muse of the New World, is a public spirited girl, and crowds her verse with arms and George and Brunswick, and Nova-Scotia and Quebec and Monongahela and Montreal, and Shirely and Johnson, and Montcalm and Braddock, and Oswego, and Schuyler, and Minorca and Blakeney, and Byng and Cavado, and the lamented death of Jonathan Belcher, and Burissa, the wife of the Rev. Mr. Burr, and the Baron of Clarawley, who was slain in a skirmish!.... Moreover, Boscawen, Wolfe, Lawrence, Whitmore, Hardy, Saul, Jonathan, and Joshua, are severally stirred round in this poetical cauldron. Pennsylvania, Guadaloupe, the lamentation of Lewis the fifteenth, and Baaliam and his Ass, are occasionally considered. The Spanish war is put into a song, and Mr. Secretary Pitt into an acrostic!!

When the late Stadtholder, who is very plethoric and lethargic, attended the Master of the Ceremonies' ball at Bath, the music, in compliment to his highness on entering the room, struck up "Sleep on, Sleep on, my Kathleen dear."

A great orator, speaking of some of the creeping subalterns to the archfiends in the French revolution, contemptuously declares,

"They have not been guilty of great crimes; but it is only because they have not energy of mind to rise to any heights of wickedness. They are not Hawks or Kites; they are only miserable fowls, whose flight is not above their dunghill or henroost."

SELECTED POETRY.

[To the "Tales of Terror" we are again indebted for another exquisite specimen of humour and burlesque. Whatever, either in argument or song, recalls men from the horrible dreams of the witch, Superstition, whatever mitigates the morbid dread of Death, and teaches us to laugh at "old wives' fables" of exploded mummery, is highly meritorious in an author, and useful to his readers. Nothing can be more acute than the lance of our poet's wit, and when he darts it at the bug-bear legends of Mr. Lewis's muse, each ghost and each goblin skulks away ashamed.]

GRIM, KING OF THE GHOSTS,

OR THE DANCE OF DEATH,

A CHURCH-YARD TALE.

On horror's head, horrors accumulate.

OTHELLO.

This tale, as will be immediately seen by all tale readers, is written in imitation of the Cloud King, and dedicated, of course, to M. G. Lewis, Esq.

"WHY how now, old sexton, why shake you with dread?

Why haunt you this street, where you're sure to catch cold?

Full warm is your blanket, full snug is your bed!
And long since, by the steeple chimes, twelve has been told."

"Tom Tap, on this night my retreat you'll approve,

For my church-yard will swarm with its shroud-cover'd hosts;

Who will tell, with loud shriek, that resentment and love

Still nip the cold heart of Grim, king of the ghosts.

"One eve, as the fiend wander'd through the thick gloom,

Towards my newly tiled cot he directed his sight;

And casting a glance in my little back room,
Gazed on Nancy, my daughter, with wanton delight.

"Yet Nancy was proud, and disdainful was she,
In affection's fond speech she'd no pleasure nor joy;

And vainly he sued, though he knelt at her knee.
Bob Brisket, so comely, the young butcher's boy!

"For you, dearest Nancy, I've oft been a thief,
Yet my theft it was venial, a theft if it be;
For who could have eyes, and not see you lov'd beef?

Or, who see a steak, and not steal it for thee?

"Remember, dear beauty, dead flesh cannot feel,
With frowns you my heart and its passion requite;

Yet oft have I seen you, when hungry at meal,
On a dead bullock's heart gaze with tender delight.

"When you dress it for dinner, so hard and so tough,
I wish the employ your stern breast would improve;
And the dead bullock's heart, while with onions you stuff,
You would stuff your own heart, cruel virgin, with love.

...." Young rascal! presum'st thou, with butcherlike phrase,
To foul stinking onions my love to compare;
Who have set Wick, the candleman, all in a blaze,
And alderman Paunch, who has since been the Mayor.

"You bid me remember dead flesh cannot feel,
Then I vow, by my father's old pick-axe and spade,
Till some prince from the tombs shall behave so genteel
As to ask me to wed, I'll continue a maid.

"Nor him will I wed, till these terms he must own,
Of my two first commands the performance he boasts,
Straight, instead of a footman, a deep pealing groan
Announc'd the approach of Grim, king of the ghosts.

"No flesh had the spectre, his skeleton skull
Was loosely wrapt round with a brown shrivell'd skin;
His bones, 'stead of marrow, of maggots was full,
And the worms they crawl'd out, and the worms they crawl'd in.

"His shoes they were coffins, his dim eye reveal'd
The gleam of a grave lamp, with vapours oppress'd;
And a dark crimson necklace of blood drops con-
geal'd,
Reflected each bone, that jagg'd out of his breast.

"In a hoarse hollow whisper.....'thy beauties,' he cried,
'Have drawn up a spirit to give thee a kiss;
No butcher shall call thee, proud Nancy, his bride,
The grim king of spectres demands thee for his.

"My name frightens infants, my word raises ghosts,
My tread wakes the echoes, which breathe thro'
the aisle;
And, lo! here stands the prince of the church yard, who boasts
The will to perform thy commands for a smile.'

"He said, and he kiss'd her, she pack'd up her clothes,
And straight they elop'd through the window with joy;
Yet long in her ears rang the curses and oaths,
Which growl'd at his rival, the gruff butcher's boy.

"At the charnel-house palace soon Nanny arrived,
When the fiend with a grin, which her soul did appal,
Exclaim'd.....'I must warn my pale subjects I'm wived,
And bid them prepare a grand supper and ball!'

"Thrice, swifter than thought, on his heel round
he turns,
Three capers he cut, and then motionless stood;
Then, on cards made of dead men's skin, Nancy discerns
His ink fingers to scrawl invitations in blood.

"His quill was a windpipe, his inkhorn a skull,
A blade-bone his penknife, a tooth was his seal,
Soon he order'd the cards, in a voice deep and dull,
To haste and invite all his friends to the meal.

"Away flew the cards to the south and the north,
Away flew the cards to the east and the west;
Straight with groans, from their tombs the pale spectres stalk'd forth,
In deadly apparel and shrouding sheets dress'd.

"And, quickly, scar'd Nancy, with anxious af-
fright,
Hears the tramp of a steed, and a knock at the gate;
On a hell horse so gaunt, 'twas a grim ghastly
sprite,
On a pillion behind a she skeleton sate.

"The poor maiden she thought 'twas a dream, or a trance,
While the guests they assembled, gigantic and tall;
Each sprite ask'd a skeleton lady to dance,
And king Grim and fair Nancy now open'd the ball.

"Pale spectres send music from dark vaults above, Wither'd legs, 'stead of drumsticks they brandish on high,
Grinning ghosts, sheeted spirits, skipping skeletons move,
While hoarse whispers and rattling of bones shake the sky.

"With their pliable joints the Scots steps they do well,
Nancy's hand with their cold clammy fingers
they squeeze;
Now sudden appal'd the maid hears a death bell,
And straight dark and dismal the supper she sees!

"A tomb was the table, now each took his seat,
Every sprite next his partner, so pale and so wan;
Soon as ceas'd was the rattling of skeleton feet,
The clattering of jaw-bones directly began.

"Of dead aldermen's fat the mould candles were made,
Stuck in sockets of bone they gleam'd dimly and blue;
Their dishes were skutcheons, and corpses decay'd
Were the viands that glutt'd this ravenous crew.

"Through the nostrils of skulls their blood liquor they pour,
The black draught in the heads of young infants
they quaff;
The vice-president rose, with his jaws dripping
gore,
And address'd the pale damsel, with horrible laugh.

...." Feast, queen of the ghosts, the repast do not scorn;
Feast, queen of the ghosts, I perceive thou hast food;
To-morrow again shall we feast, for at noon Shall we feast on thy flesh, shall we drink of thy blood.'

"Then cold as a cucumber Nancy she grew,
Her proud stomach came down, and she blared,
and she cried,
'O tell me, dear Grim, does that spectre speak true,
And will you not save from his clutches your bride?'

'Vain your grief, silly maid, when the m ring,
The bond becomes due, which long since did I sign;
For she, who at night weds the grizly ghost king, Next morn must be dress'd for his subjects to dine.'

'In silks and in satins for you I'll be drest,
My soft tender limbs let their fangs never crunch.'
'Fair Nancy, yon ghosts, should I grant your request,
Instead of at dinner, would eat you at lunch!'

'But vain, ghostly king, is your cunning and guile,
That bond must be void, which you never can pay;
Lo! I ne'er will be yours, till, to purchase my smile,
My two first commands, as you swore, you obey.'

'Well sayst thou, fair Nancy, thy wishes impart,
But think not to puzzle Grim, king of the ghosts.'
Straight she turns o'er each difficult task in her heart,
And 'I've found out a poser,'....exultingly boasts.

'You vow'd that no butcher should call me his bride,
That this vow you fulfil my first asking shall be:
And since so many maids in your clutches have died,
Than yourself show a bloodier butcher,' said she.

"Then shrill scream the spectres; the charnel-house gloom
Swift lightnings disperse, and the palace destroy;
Again Nancy stood in the little back room,
And again at her knee knelt the young butcher's boy.

'I'll have done with dead husbands,' she Brisket bespeaks,
'I'll now take a live one, so fetch me a ring!'
And when press'd to her lips were his red beefin cheeks,
She lov'd him much more than the shrivell'd ghost king.

"No longer his steaks and his cutlets she spurns,
No longer he fears his grim rival's pale band;
Yet still when the famed first of April returns,
The sprites rise in squadrons and Nancy demand.

"This informs you, Tom Tap, why to-night I remove,
For I dread the approach of the shroud-cover'd hosts,
Who tell, with loud shrieks, that resentment and love
Still nip the cold heart of Grim, king of the ghosts."

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXV.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

Yes, "it is a mere child of fancy," and wonderful fancies some of you have, when you undertake to exercise them upon women? How long Mr. Saunter, are we to be the sport of your coxcomb-correspondents, who know not what they talk of?.... what do they mean by accusing the "young ladies of Philadelphia," of painting, of dressing indecently, and a thousand other irregularities that have no foundation in truth? What sir, because we have amongst us a few out-laws, who are always privileged to say, and to do outrageous things, are we to be characterised by their extravagancies? or do you suppose that we are not as much disgusted as you are, when our parties are disgraced by them, or is it believed that we approve, because we do not loudly declaim? No sir, we are silent although we abhor, because we know that all censures of a fashionable belle, are good-naturedly placed to the account of envy of her superior charms. Hence too the advantages which married men enjoy above single ones, that to them only, are "whispered the pointed observations, and satiric censures," because from the constant opportunities which they have of gaining an intimate knowledge of the female heart, they can believe, that they do really "flow from the creative fancy," and not from a malignant disposition that desires to give pain to any one. Be not "lured," therefore, gentle "bachelors into the matrimonial noose," by the fallacious imagination that in that state alone, "you can enjoy the unreserved confidence of a young woman;" learn to be just and liberal, and you too may "reap instruction on the subject of men and manners, and of women."

But pray, where has Mr. Maritus been so very discerning as to discover the other marks of confidence which he so prettily describes? where has he seen a young lady seating herself on the lap of a married man in company, and kissing him too! those are not the manners of genteel society in Philadelphia, we all know "obstinate as the attendants on the court of fashion may be;" it is tolerably plain, that Maritus has not the guilt of being amongst them.

It is high time to expose the unmanly ignorance and childish inconsistency of those gentlemen, whose only study seems to be, how they shall depreciate the character of their country-women, in the estimation of those who know them not. I have said, they understand not what they talk of.... witness your sagacious Mr. Tickle with his "two members," to note down every sentence, every word they hear "at a tea-party," surely his committee must have a miraculous facility in taking notes, especially as they are ordered to be accompanied with "copious annotations!" One would scarcely have imagined that the united talents of the whole club could have accomplished such a task!....note down the chattering of a collection of women, whose tongues, have been compared to the magpie and the parrot, to a mill and an aspen-leaf, and even to the perpetual-motion!....but the clubs are already in very able hands; to the judicious management of M. I leave them, and will only observe that, repeated doses, of such wholesome medicine, as she and the witty Beatrice have administered, might possibly have a good effect on some of these shallow scribblers.

It would not be very difficult to shew the want of truth, in most of the gentlemen, who have so grossly slandered us in the Port Folio, but as it is not my intention to examine the subject minutely, but only to excite some of my companions, who are more equal to the task, to overcome their diffidence and exert themselves in their own defence, I shall merely notice the extraordinary production of Fidelia, in your ninth number, for it is irresistibly absurd; and advise these kind creatures when they choose to appear in "female attire," that they take some little pains to conceal the cloven foot, and especially to take care that they do not libel themselves most egregiously when they only mean to admonish us.

Dear Mr. Saunter, be intreated to leave your study and come amongst us, stroll through the public walks of the city, frequent our agreeable tea-parties, and you will soon see how we are abused, and you are imposed upon; you shall lounge in the easiest chair in the room, and have the fullest license to censure all that you find reprehensible in our appearance or our manners.... but you shall never behold one youthful face bedaubed with paint, nor one married man indulged with a kiss from a young lady.

CHAP. XXIII.

Insignificance of the brandy insurrection....The Secretary of State, Randolph....treaty with England.

The French minister, Fauchet, says in one of his dispatches to his government, which was intercepted by the English, and published in America, that the brandy drinkers broke out too soon, and thereby prevented a general concerted explosion against the government. But perhaps this young man only meant by this, to give his superiors a high opinion of his diplomatic penetration; he makes generally throughout the dispatch a great ado, with his knowledge of mankind, and his insight into the human character. The Americans do not so readily quit their home and their families, to cut one another's throats, and this general explosion is a mere creature of the brain.

This same dispatch intercepted at sea by the English, which the English envoy, Hammond, communicated to president Washington, was attended with very disagreeable consequences to the secretary of state, Randolph. The French minister mentions in it, his frequent conferences with the secretary of state, declaims upon the corruption of so young a government: exclaims "what is to be expected from its old age, when it is already so corrupt in its infancy!" and adds, "thus with a couple of thousand dollars, the republic would have had it in her power, to raise here a civil war,"....Washington shewed Mr. Randolph this document, which excited suspicion in presence of the council of state: Randolph said he would bring explanations from the French minister, which would perfectly justify him. Fauchet was already gone to embark at Rhode-Island, for France. Randolph overtook him there, and Fauchet declared that he had always considered him as a good American patriot; that the couple of thousand dollars related to merchants, whom it was wished to have withdrawn from under a trading subjection to England, and to provisions for French account. Randolph resigned his office, and wrote his justification; there was in truth nothing proved against him.

The treaty with England, which next to Washington's retirement, is certainly the most important transaction since the peace, deserves applause, not only as a successful attempt to remove all dependence upon foreign powers, but also on account of the important possession of the forts on the lakes. For as America has neither army nor fleet; as she could oppose none but altogether insufficient means of defence, against the attack of an enemy, at all considerable, who should act with rapidity, it was certainly a master-piece of negotiation, to prevail upon the English to surrender to the Americans, the forts upon the lakes, so extremely important to the English fur trade, to their influence upon the Indians, and for their military operations in case of a war with America. This important service rendered to his country, would have been of itself sufficient to crown president Washington with immortal glory. He has thereby procured for his country, a natural boundary to the northward, strengthened by forts. This boundary is now very easy to defend, though before, susceptible of no defence at all. The colonists to the westward are thereby protected against a surprise by the Indians, who by means of these forts may be kept in check. Now, for the first time properly, are those delightful regions opened to the laborious planter, whom hitherto, the fear of the Indians restrained from settling there. Nothing but the fear that America, might in this war make a common cause with France, could have made England consent to these sacrifices. This proves likewise, how skillfully Washington knew when to seize and turn to advantage the favourable moment. It also proves the prudence of the English ministry, in perceiving that the interest of England, required her to maintain a friendly connection with America, which in that case will prove, more useful to England after her independence, than she was before. By this treaty, America extricated herself from the dependance upon France, in which she had been ever since the peace. The obligation of gratitude to France, was not thereby violated in the smallest degree, since no article of this treaty is contrary to the existing engagements of America with France. I cannot indeed bear the sentiment which the Americans, of the English party always have in their mouths; that gratitude cannot exist between nations. On the contrary; if the moral duties of individuals were to be extended to states, the world would be the better for it, and the state which should first conduct itself according to the principles of morality, would find its advantage in having set the example. As little to my taste, was their maxim, that this tribute of gratitude, if due at all, belonged not to the French nation, which at that time, had no voice in public transactions, but to their king, whom they have guillotined; for it is clear, that the king without the nation could have been of no service to the Americans, who ought therefore to be grateful to the French. But have they not likewise duties of gratitude to perform towards England? they have, by all means. Had England done for them nothing else, they were at least from the foundation of the colonies, until the period of the revolution protected by her power; for their sake, England has waged many wars, and expended her blood and treasures. From England they inherited their laws, their civil liberty, their representative system. England by her example, taught them to assert all these wholesome rights, by possessing which, she esteems herself, and indeed with truths so fortunate in comparison with other nations. Are all those benefactions at one stroke dashed out, and forever annihilated by her ill treatment, during the revolutionary war? It belongs indeed to the atheistic doctrines of our times, that one offence must sweep away the memory of an hundred benefits; but this cruel theory of revenge, dissolves all the ties of society. England is the mother of America. We still have duties to perform towards a mother, even though she may have treated us ill; especially if she returns from her errors and conducts herself better towards us....France furnished assistance against the ill treatment of this unnatural mother; and America should therefore be grateful to France too. How then must she act in the controversies between two benefactors? She should observe the most rigorous neutrality.... But is not America bound by a treaty to assist France, if she be attacked? It may be answered, did not France first declare war against England. And even if she had been first attacked, as might be maintained by those who attend more to substance than to form, was America obliged to expose herself, by engaging in the war, to the danger of a national bankruptcy, without being able, by an impotent co-operation in the war, (for it has been seen above, what her ability was in this respect,) to render such useful service to France, as she could by supplying her necessities, which, could only be possible in a state of neutrality? America has by treaties, guaranteed to France her West-India possessions. But has England declared that at the peace she meant to retain her conquests in the West-Indies? And, what is the most important of all, can America take them from the English? Has the execution of this article ever been required by France? To be sure, the Americans ought not to have sold warlike stores to the English; nor to have allowed them, in the year 1795, to purchase in Virginia more than a thousand horses to mount their cavalry in the West-Indies. It is not fit to sell to either of two parties, both our friends, arms, with which they may break each other's necks. This is what led me to the observation above, that the Americans had not been anxious to pay their tribute of gratitude to France. Against the executive power, that is, against president Washington there is not only no subject of complaint, but his conduct was conformable to the soundest principles of justice.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[Extracts from a very novel and captivating work, entitled Remarks on local scenery and manners in Scotland, during the years 1799 and 1800, by John Stoddert, L. L. D.]

TWO miles from Alloa is Clackmannan, a miserable village, which, however, assumes the dignity of a county town....It is seated on a hill whose summit is crowned by the tower of Clackmannan, once the chief seat of the Bruce's. This venerable pile, which is going fast to decay, forms, from its situation, a picturesque object and commands a view no less admirable.

Here, a short time ago, lived the old lady of Clackmannan, no less remarkable for her wit and good humour, than for her economy and her jacobitism. On a very slender income she maintained much of the state, and all the respectability of her ancestors. She preserved the sword of king Robert Bruce, with which she assumed the right of conferring knighthood; but when asked whether she was of that Monarch's family, she answered with much dignity, "king Robert was of my family."

Mr. Erskine, of Mar, has dedicated much time to agricultural pursuits, and his influence and example have contributed towards their advancement throughout the surrounding country. One of the most important results has been the institution of annual ploughing matches, at which from fifty to an hundred ploughs generally assist. Since their establishment the dexterity of the ploughman has been evidently increased: a spirit of honest emulation has been excited among them: the honorary medals, given as prizes, are carefully preserved; and though they are of considerable intrinsic value, no instance of their being sold, by those who gained them, has ever occurred.

It was long before the ancient border customs could be wholly overcome; but they may now be said to be like "a tale that is told," nay, the very tales of a tale, the popular traditions; the memory of events attached to names and places, even the dialect itself is gradually wearing out. Still the peculiarity of situation must necessarily stamp a peculiar character on the inhabitants. The whole country is divided into different dales, named from the waters flowing through them. This is so universally the case, that "the water" is here provincially used for "the neighbourhood;" and a traveller asking for salt fish or pickled herring, may perhaps be surprised at receiving for answer, that "there is none in the water."

One singular, but now obsolete, custom formerly prevailed here, called Handfasting. There was a certain Helen, where couples met and joined hands, they then lived together a year; after which repairing once more to the same spot, they either united for life, or shook hands and separated.

The most picturesque scenery, in the interior part of this country, is on the two rivers, Doon and Ayr: the former of which falls into the sea near the old castle of Greencans. The auld brig of Doon, which crosses this river, amid gloomy crags, and thick wooded steeps, consists of a single broad arch, of ancient structure, and probably of soft quiet hue, before it was treated with its trim coating of white-wash. This spot cannot but be interesting to every lover of poetry, from its connection with that genuine poet, Burns. He was born very near it, at a little cottage, now converted into an ale-house; and he has made it the scene of one of his most original poems, Tam O'Shanter. "Alloways auld haunted kirk," which stands by the road, is a small roofless pile, little remarkable in appearance; but an object of much superstitious terror to the neighbouring peasants.

The predatory life of the old Borderers forms an interesting subject of contemplation. The term free-booter was not considered as a reproach by the Borderers....who, during the open wars of the two countries, combined with their personal views of plunder, something like a spirit of patriotism. At other times they became dangerous to both parties, though generally professing hostility only to the inhabitants of the opposite territory.

Finally when the two governments agreed to measures of mutual advantage, for the suppression of the border depredations, an irregular system of conventional justice arose, which itself was not unfrequently the source of fresh dispute and bloodshed. The old Ballads pourtray these various states, with many forcible touches of humour and pathos: and their effect is enhanced by incidents descriptive of personal character or of popular superstition.... Among them may be particularly noticed Dick o' the Corry, Jock o' the Side, Robie Noble, the battle of the Redswire, Johnie Armstrong, &c.

At Mr. Brown's I had the pleasure of meeting the Rev. Mr. Mac Diarmid, minister of Comry, a very successful cultivator of Celtic literature. The arguments of this gentleman in support of the authenticity of Ossian's poems, were of considerable weight; but as I have already touched sufficiently on that subject, I shall only adduce an instance of that singular attachment to poetry, which, until the changes of modern manners, even the poorest of the Highlanders possessed. Among some specimens of poems, composed within living memory, by persons wholly untutored. Mr. Mac Diarmid favoured me with a literal translation of the following, which I shall transcribe, with the alteration only of a few Celtic idioms.

"The forsaken maid's lament,
"Tha n' oiche nochd fuar," &c.

"I wander in the cold night, and cannot rest—My heart beats quick. My mind is troubled, and heavy like a boat, tossing on the sea, without sail or rudder. Henceforth let no maid love, as I have loved, though the dear youth speak never so tenderly; though his words be never so pleasing to her ear; his affections will be light as the sea borne wind, unsteady as the fishes near the shore, which fly at the least alarm, alas, no more to return.

"Allan was my delight. His skin was white, and smooth as the down of the hills. In killing the Deer he excelled among hunters. When he bent forward on the oar, and cut his way through the waves, the misty hills and far-off glens, soon came in sight; when he sat at the helm, the boisterous billows yielded to his skill!

"O Allan the love I bear thee has darkened my face in the days of youth; it will bring me to an early grave! when first I felt it I told it to thee; but thy surprise, thy vexation, made my cheeks at once grow pale. Alas! I know thou wilt be afflicted with real grief; for soon shall I be laid low in the earth. In yonder church yard shall I be laid; and thy heart will be pierc'd with sorrow. A stone will be placed at my head; it will not reply to thy questions; then will thy woe be full."

A TRANSLATION

FROM THE PERSIAN OF NOURASSIN.

"To Allah the Most High be all honour and praise! Let every one bow down before his throne, to which all the powers of heaven do homage. Eblis, Eblis himself, though he presume to usurp divine honours on this lower world, pays his duty at the footstool of the Most High!

"After a day's severe fasting, I wandered into the woods of Kurdistan. The paths were intricate and perplexed, and I picked my way for some time with caution. Flowers of the most enchanting hues, and the most exquisite perfume, bordered the path:....the lotos flower and the tuberose scented the air; the high palmetto and the feathery acacia waved over my head; and the birds warbled in delightful melody among their branches. A rapid and transparent stream diffused fragrance and verdure over this beautiful region; and the inequalities of hill and valley, wood and heath, added charms to this most delicious spot. Yet, though I could have wished to linger here forever, I forgot not that I had to return, and carefully observed the windings of the various paths that crossed the forest. At length, having reached an opening through which I could discern the glorious hues lighted up in the west by the departing beams of Mithra, I seated myself under a large tree, and abandoned my mind to the charms of contemplation.... "Surely" thought I, "it is good for man to be here, and he needs not seek a fairer paradise, when he can enjoy such a scene as this that now ravishes my mind." Then when I beheld the magnolia already shedding its tender spoils on the ground, I called to mind the saying of Yusef Eben Ibrahim; When the leaves bud forth, think of the despoiled stalks.... "True," said I aloud, "the season of spring is delightful, and the glowing summer and the fruitful autumn come to fulfil its fairest promise; but after all comes winter, which swallows up all the benefits of its predecessors, resembling the vanguard of the sage Rhedi-al-Usuruf; Ingratitude is a wide swallow."

"While I thus ruminated, a gilded serpent came slowly gliding from between the paths, and while I admired the glossy lustre of his scales, darted out his forked tongue. Springing up, I aimed a blow at him, which laid him dead at my feet. I resumed my seat, and gazing on my crest-fallen enemy, I thus pondered.... "Even so do unsuspected villains steal across the path of the unthinking man, and wound him with their venomous fangs! Happy will be that world where winter comes not, ingratitude is not known, and malice has no entrance."

"Lost in such musings, I scarcely heeded the gradual change from day to twilight; but when at length the hooting of the bird of night roused me from my reverie, I arose from my mossy seat, and determined to retrace my way back to the city.... I wandered long before I discovered that I had taken a wrong turn, and was every moment more enveloped in the intricacies of the forest. In vain I strove to return upon my steps: the similarity of the scenes presented but very feeble indications, and even had they been stronger, the increasing darkness of night would have prevented my availing myself of them. At length the rising moon shot her rays directly across the path on which I stood, and I perceived that I was on the edge of a tremendous precipice.... I shuddered at the danger I had been thus providentially enabled to escape, and bent my knees in thankful adoration to Allah."

"I rested a while on a projection of rock, to compose my feelings after the shock this circumstance had given to them; and while I sat, the moon acquired lustre sufficient to shew me the dreadful scene in all its horrors. The chasm below seemed as if it must have been formed by the convulsion of an earthquake. Huge masses of rock were piled on each other in all directions, and the abrupt and steep sides, were, in some places, covered with rude vegetation, in others bare, and full of yawning fissures. The depth of the gulf, my eyes, assisted only by the deceitful moonlight, were unable to penetrate; but the silver rays were reflected in the rough waves of a foaming torrent, that rolled at the bottom, and seemed to rush along over rugged projections of stone. I fancied I discovered a path that led to this extraordinary abyss; and urged by irresistible curiosity, I resolved to attempt the descent."

"The only talk in the city was of the new worship; and the mysterious secrecy observed respecting its peculiar institutions, only served to render the uninitiated more inquisitive. I had heard persons, in whose authority I could not depend, talk of the Valley of Horror as the scene appointed for the celebration of the worship of Eblis; but I by no means imagined that a spot so worthy of the name, existed in the neighbourhood of the city, undiscovered by such a wanderer as myself."

"This circumstance redoubled my curiosity, and I attempted the declivity at the most accessible part. This I had never, I believe, been hewn out for a path; it was merely a channel, worn by some stream, which had either ceased to flow, or had turned its waters into another direction. I was now obliged to let myself down by tough branches of the creeper amavi, and now to leap from point to point with exertion the most perilous. Torn, bruised, and alarmed, I reached at length the bottom of the abyss, and found myself on the banks of a sluggish river, whose heavy and dark-coloured waves emitted a pitchy smoke. The banks of the river emitted cindery fragments of a volcano, and the sulphureous smell almost suffocated me. "Surely" thought I, "this cavern must be the entrance to the dominions of Arimanius, and this stream a portion of the fiery flood that surrounds his palace." At length, overcome by exertion and suffocation, I lay down, and lay for an uncertain period, in a state of insensibility. When I resumed my powers, I was surprised to see a gleam of light darting from a fissure at a remote corner of the cavern; and watching with attention its evident approach, I perceived at length several figures enter, habited in long flame-coloured robes each bearing torches, which they waved about with gestures of the most frantic wildness. This procession was closed by entrance of a tall personage, clothed in black, whose head was encircled with a coronet, which appeared to me of living fire. The whole train approached the pitchy river, on the opposite bank of which I lay. I endeavoured to hide myself among some of the singed shrubs, that were not utterly destroyed by the fiery exhalations, and succeeded in finding a place which concealed me from their view. The subordinate personages attended the figure in black, with every symptom of respect, to a spot where the river, by a sudden evolution, formed a sort of small cove. Here the whole party remained for some time immovable, while their countenances seemed expressive of internal abstraction and adoration; the personage in black then in a loud voice, commanded the stranger to be brought forth."

"The terror I felt at these words, which I concluded to apply to myself, is not to be described. I lay still in my hiding-place, resolved only to yield to absolute force, and not to betray myself by any sudden emotion; and my fears subsided, when I perceived four of the flame-coloured attendants drag from a cavern, on the opposite side, a man who seemed in a swoon. The superior uttered aloud some words in an unknown language, amongst which, however, I distinguished the name of Eblis. He then ordered the attendants to strip the man, and seizing him by the arm, plunged him, still insensible into the pitchy flood, that rolled sluggishly along. The shock recalled the unhappy man to his senses; and I beheld him, with surprise, express by his gestures the most extravagant joy. Immediately the superior took him by the hand; and while the surrounding ministers attired him in a flame-coloured garment similar to their own, he congratulated him on being now a servant of Eblis."

"After a destined period of probation," said he, "thou shalt be admitted to all the privileges Eblis confers upon his faithful worshippers. The secrets of nature and the arcana of magic shall be unveiled to thee. The spirits which fulfil his orders shall be submitted to thy power, and thou shalt be enabled to accomplish at once all thy wishes. But in order to arrive at so high a pitch of felicity, thou must, during the appointed interval, be truly devoted to his will; thou must never fail to assist at our sacrifices, and must endeavour to render them, by thy presents, worthy of being offered to our powerful divinity."

"The newly initiated made a reply expressive of gratitude, and eagerness to hasten the period of fruition. But he was dismissed with the greatest part of the votaries, through the same fissure at which he had entered; and there remained only three besides the superior. He then addressed them in the following terms;....

"The moment is now arrived when your services are about to be accepted. Ye have passed the period of probation with honour, and have never omitted any endeavours to promote the cause of Eblis among the children of the world. Come ye worshippers of the immortal fire! come, and receive the reward of your labours. One ceremony past, and ye shall be admitted to the innermost recesses of his palace, whose brightness is above all conception, and which ye have well merited to inhabit, by your noble disdain of the blind prejudices of mortals. Ye have, with a superior grandeur of soul, burst the bands of consanguinity, despised the weak maxims of what men call virtue, and sought only to increase the glory of the infernal fire: ye shall now drink of this cup, and be admitted at once to all the privileges of the most favoured worshippers!"

"With these words, the superior plunged a vessel of adamant into the pitchy stream, and offered it, steaming with sulphureous smoke, to his deluded followers. The first raised it to his lips, and having swallowed a part of its contents, fell to the ground in a swoon; the second and third drank likewise, and met with a similar fate. Quickly, however recovering, they addressed the superior with countenances and voices expressive of the most dreadful tortures."

"How hast thou deceived us!" exclaimed they. "What is this horrible internal fire we feel? Are these torments to be eternal?"

"Eternal!"....replied the monster, with a ghastly grin.... "ye now feel in your hearts, the fire that is never quenched....the just reward of your labours. It is our amusement," continued he, "to delude unwary mortals with specious tales and alluring equivocations; and, by increasing the number of the votaries, seem to obtain a fanciful relief. Go.... the mysteries of magic, and the command of spirits are yours. Go, profit by what you have so hardly earned!"

"With these words, he burst into a loud and insulting laugh, while, with horrible howlings, the three deluded victims tore open their garments, and displayed their bosoms burning with unquenchable fire. After a most dreadful interval, the figure in black placed on each of their heads a circlet of fire like his own: and recommending patience and composure to them, ordered them to seek their own habitations, and, like him, endeavour to procure new votaries to Eblis."

"The faint rays of morning began now to streak the sky, and being once more alone in the Cavern of Horrors, I determined to attempt the ascent, not daring to follow the steps of the strange beings I had seen, lest I should be led into the dominions of Eblis. Painful as had been my descent into this horrible place, I found the return to the upper world still more difficult; but at length, by perseverance and extreme labour, I effected my emancipation; and shuddering with horror, regained the place from whence I had wandered the preceding day. Exhausted with toil and fasting, I had scarcely strength to return to my own abode; but the most distressing consequence of my adventure was, the total loss of my confidence in my fellow-creatures. I wanted to pull off the turban, and tear open the vest of every man I conversed with, to ascertain whether or not he were a votary of the infernal fire; but I had the happiness, by representing to many who had wavered, the facts I yet witnessed, of fixing them more firmly than ever, in the faith of their forefathers."

Let those who shall read the adventure of Nou-assin, learn, not to be seduced by the wiles of mystery, nor to listen to the magnificent promises of novelty. The paths of virtue and true happiness are plain and open, and their dictates will bear to be tried by the touchstone of truth.

BIOGRAPHY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[The following has been elegantly translated from the French for the Port Folio, and is a new picture of an illustrious woman.]

SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF MADAME MAINTENON.

Frances d'Aubigné, grand-daughter of the famous Theodore Agrippa d'Aubigné so celebrated in history, was born in 1635, in the prison of the parliament, where her father was confined. Born in a prison, she was truly a child of misery, was early taught the language of sorrow, and too soon she learnt to suffer. In 1639, Madame d'Aubigné procured the release of her husband, who removed to the islands with his wife and daughter. There he soon amassed a considerable fortune, but by imprudence, which is very common in those who are suddenly raised from extreme poverty to great affluence, it was squandered, with more rapidity than it had been accumulated. He died soon after, leaving his affairs entirely deranged. Madame d'Aubigné was again plunged into poverty and adversity, with the additional horrors, of being removed from her personal friends; she returned to France, and educated her daughter in the calvinistic persuasion. Madame de Neuillant, and her relations obtained an order from court, and took her to her house, with an intention of making her change her religion; but firm in her first principles, Mademoiselle persisted therein so steadily, that they at last employed violent means to make her renounce them. Humiliations, however, of every kind had on her the effect, they generally have on great souls; far from overcoming, they strengthened her belief. They at last reduced her to the degrading situation of feeding poultry: but soon becoming the object of a young peasant's attachment, Madame de Neuillant, was obliged to place her in the convent of the Ursulines at Niort. It was here that she embraced the established religion, her conviction of its superiority arising from the mild, friendly and rational instructions of an abbess who had conceived a friendship for her. It was in this retreat that her mind was unfolded, and the virtues of her heart expanded. On her return to Paris, she was very soon celebrated for the charms of her mind, and the sweet complacency of her manners. She there married M. Scarron, so distinguished in the republic of letters, for original gaiety. This was a very advantageous alliance; but her happiness and independence were but fleeting, and both were sacrificed to the imprudence of her husband in publishing a libel against the cardinal Mazarin; upon which the minister withdrew the pension the court had granted him.

Scarron died in 1660, leaving very little to his widow, who retired to the convent of the blue nuns, and was under the necessity of living with very strict economy. She did not quit this place until Louis XIV. confided to her care the education of his children by Madame de Montespan. Thus, although she most unexpectedly again arose from indigence to opulence, yet she sacrificed her liberty, to a servitude, which Madame de Montespan often made very painful. In spite, however, of this sacrifice, the king had conceived a dislike to her, which was carried to such excess, that he once reproved Madame de Montespan for passing an evening with her. "With what readiness, said he to her, can you find an excuse for associating with this affected woman, do you wish she should make you as foolish as she is herself?" But when he became more acquainted with the many amiable qualities of her heart, and the great powers of her mind, he was insensibly inspired with other sentiments for her. Antipathy gave place to friendship, and friendship in his breast was but the bud of the most ardent and tender, constant and sincere love.

The king presented her with 100,000 francs as a compensation for her attention to Monsieur le duc du Maine, with which donation, she purchased Maintenon, and Lewis XIV. requested her to take the name. It has, with very little foundation, been said that she used to blush at bearing the name of Scarron, she had too much elevation of soul, to be capable of such weakness. After the death of the queen and the disgrace of Madame de Montespan, the king felt more and more the value of such a friend as she was. She held the highest station at court, and the world whispered that Louis had married her privately. The father de la Chaise, her confessor, it was said, advised this step, and Monsieur de Harlai, archbishop of Paris, performed the rites in presence of two witnesses. But of this we have no positive proof. The king was then about forty-eight, and Madame de Maintenon about fifty years old. In her present elevated station, equally modest as pious, she was constantly exercising her charity and benevolence. Among other useful establishments, she founded that of St. Cyr, and designed it for the education and protection of young ladies without friends or fortune. The king continued his attachment to her without abatement: and how could it be otherwise, towards a woman, to whom he was indebted for the wisest counsel; who had never allured him but to virtue, and who in weaning his mind from the illusions of this life, had enriched it by those religious ideas, which, when overwhelmed with sorrow, beneath the pressure of misfortune, supported him with new hope, and were at last his only consolation? This great monarch died in 1715. Death for him had no terror, but he was greatly grieved at the idea of a separation from a friend, whom he so tenderly loved, and whose claim on his affection was founded in solid and real merit. After his death Madame de Maintenon, dismissed her attendants and retired to St. Cyr, where, having formed the resolution of mingling no more in this world, she resignedly and devoutly awaited the hour, when she should in great glory arise with the blessed. At St. Cyr she received a visit from the Czar Peter I. who was desirous of her acquaintance. And there she died on the nineteenth of April, 1719.

The letters of Madame de Maintenon, are worthy of great admiration. They possess peculiar excellence. As those of Madame de Sevigné are chefs d'œuvres of delicacy and grace, so those of Maintenon are models of purity and wisdom. In reading her letter to Madame de la maison Forte, and that to Madame la duchesse de Burgoyne, we can almost imagine it came from the pen of Solomon. I shall only add that piety is their great characteristic, and, that their intrinsic merit has established a fame, which my praise cannot increase.

There is engraven on a monument, placed in the church of Saint Louis de St. Cyr, the following epitaph, composed by the abbe de Vertot, and revised by mareschal de Noailles, who married the niece of Madame de Maintenon.

Sacred to the Memory of

Frances d'Aubigné,
Marchioness de Maintenon,
A truly pious and illustrious woman:

Such, as the wise man
Vainly sought for, in his age;
And would have proposed as a model
Had he lived in ours.

Her birth was noble:
Her mind enlightened.
Her virtues many.

Wisdom, sweetness and modesty,
Dwelt in that mind
Devoid of guile.

In all the vicissitudes of this life,
She was the same:

Constant in virtue, steadfast

In her principles:

The same just rules always govern'd
Her conduct.

Faithful, in the exercises of piety:
Tranquil amid the agitations of a court:
Simple in grandeur:

Humble amid riches and honours:

Revered by Louis the great:

Sharing his glory:

Possessing his highest confidence:

The sole directress of his bounty.

She exercised her power with Equal justice.

A mother to the orphan:

A friend to the needy:

To the unfortunate her sympathy

Was healing.

Her tongue was sweetness:

Her soul was Wisdom.

A life so illustrious, terminated

In a death, holy,

And

Precious in the sight of God:

She was buried in the monastery which she founded, and has left an example of the most exalted virtue behind her.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

In Reid's Anecdotes, a new and fashionable parlour-window book, we find something like the origin of the following terrible and mysterious tale. Independently of some poetical ornaments, and the usual license of the terrific tribe of bards, the story, injurious as it is to human nature, is genuine and authentic. Events, similar to those recorded below, have taken place in the lives of some of the more flagitious of Passion's votaries.

THE HOUSE UPON THE HEATH,*

A WELCH TALE,

Triste jacet salebris, evitandumque Bidental.

THE MIDNIGHT bell had toll'd, and all was still;
Fast fell the snow on Radnor's cloud-capt hill:
The moon's unshadow'd orb reflected round,
Play'd o'er the roofs, and glisten'd on the ground;
Up the rude rock, where Glendower's fort once stood,
Hung with the horrors of its ancient wood,
Lo! anxious bending o'er his jaed steed,
A breathless horseman hasten'd with eager speed.
Loud ring the stones beneath his horses feet,
And echo dies along the distant street;
And with a deep and hollow murmuring groan,
The sighing gale sad whispers through the town,
Hark! at yon humble door, where deep repose
Relieves from care the friend of woman's woes,
A sudden silence marks the stranger staid;
Then, thus his hurried voice invokes her aid:
"Arise! for pity's sake, kind Leech, arise!"
"In child-bed's pangs a wretched female dies!"
"Oh! here is gold, and here's a courser fast!"
"Oh! haste, or life's swift waning hour is past!"
Prompt at the call of woe, the Leech arose,
Faint creaks the stair, the lowly doors unclose,
When, his dark shadow lengthening on the night,
A muffled stranger met her wond'ring sight;
Black was his garb, a mask his face conceal'd,
His mien, his gestures, dignity reveal'd.

* This story is founded on a fact, which happened at the beginning of the last century, in the neighbourhood of a market-town in the west of England; the real narrative involved the horror of incest, which the author, for many reasons rejected; indeed, as it is, he has found his principal difficulty in composing those parts, where the description must be intelligible, without being too minute.

Silent he stood, and more than human seem'd,
As on his scowling eye the full moon beam'd.
Starting, the Leech awaits his stern command;
Slow to the courser points his waving hand.
Dismal'd she shrieks...her arm the stranger grasps,
Mounts the proud steed, and firm her body clasps.
She shrieks! but lo! a dagger at her breast,
Instant the struggling sounds of fear repress'd.
Around her eyes his murky vest he throws,
And spurs impetuous o'er the scatter'd snows;
Loud ring the stones beneath his courser's feet,
And echo dies along the distant street.

Now, downward shooting to the rock's deep base,
Headlong descends the steed's unbridled pace;
His thundering hoofs the craggy passage spurn,
Behind, a fainter ray the woods return;
And now, unbroken by o'erhanging trees,
Full o'er the wild moor bursts the eddying breeze.
Now swifter still, and swifter as they speed,
The vales afar and lessening hills recede;
Up the rough steep the panting courser strains,
Or bounds resistless o'er the level plains.
Long through the lonely night's unvarying hours,
The field he crosses, and the forest scours;
No voice, no sound his silent course arrests,
Save where the screech-owls hover round their nests;
Or to their shrouds from pain and penance borne,
Returning spirits speak the rising morn;
Droop as they pass, and with prophetic groan,
Bewail impending sorrows not their own.

Keen blows the gale, a barren heath they cross,
Light flies the courser o'er the yielding moss;
Round the bleak wold he winds his circling way,
Snuffs the fresh air, and vents the joyful neigh;
Deep sink his steps amid the waste of snows,
And slackening speed proclaims the journey's close.
They stop...the stranger lifts his sable hood...
Fast by the moor a lonely mansion stood;
Cheerless it stood! a melancholy shade
Its mouldering front and rifled walls array'd;
Barred were the gates, the shattered casements clos'd
And brooding horror on its site repos'd;
No tree o'erhung the uncultivated ground,
No trace of labour or of life around.

Appall'd, the Leech surveys the solemn scene,
But watches chief her guide's mysterious mien.
He with fierce stride and stern expressive look,
Where shivering walls conceal'd a gloomy nook,
Drags her reluctant...There with anxious eyes,
Mid the rank grass an iron gate she spies:
The jarring hinges with harsh sound unclose,
A broken stair the feeble twilight shows;
Cautious the stranger climbs the rough ascent:
No lamp its hospitable guidance lent.
Speechless he leads through chambers dark and drear,
When a deep dying groan appalls the ear.
Now, with increasing haste he hurries on,
Where, through a rent, the sickly moon-beams shone.
The light directs...his trembling hands explore,
Sunk in the pannell'd walls, a secret door.
...Within this sad retreat," he faltering said,
"A hapless female asks thy instant aid."
Aloof he stands...The door with thundering sound,
Enclos'd the Leech: loud rings the roof around,
The tatter'd arras o'er the wainscoat falls,
And lengthen'd echoes shake the distant walls.
Now breathless silence reigns the mansion o'er,
Save where a faint step treads the distant floor.
Anon, it pauses...ceas'd the short delay,
It slowly stalks with measur'd pace away,
Anon, affrighted by the whispering blast,
Stands, as in doubt, irregularly fast;
And now, as listening, or in thoughtful mood,
Lo! near the secret door the stranger stood.
His eye distract'd rolls, his threatening brow,
Through bristled hair, he knits, and mutters low;
Lifts his clench'd hands, a groan of death within Impatient hears, and frantic rushes in.

Round a vast room with blackest arras hung,
Its blood-red hues a flaming furnace flung;
Full in the midst it casts a deadly glare,
And heats with sulphurous clouds the tainted air:
O'er the arch'd ceiling plays the quivering light,
And brings by turns each dark recess to sight.
Here the approaching stranger's figure shows,
And tints of horror o'er his visage throws;
Here on an humble couch, by grief bow'd down,
The lovely mansion of a spirit flown!
A female form, with yet unalter'd charms,
A child embracing in its senseless arms.
The mother's blessing with life's latest breath,
Arrested on her lips still smiles in death;
The unconscious infant on her bosom lies
Pleas'd, and forgetful of its plaintive cries.

Oh! could a brother unsubdu'd behold
The lifeless parent thus her child infold;
Shed, as he calmly gaz'd no pining tear,
With steady foot, with brow serene, draw near?
No...when extended in death's cold embrace,
That beauteous form he sees with heavenly face,
Affection rushes on his downcast eye,
And yielding nature owns the powerful tie.

"Condemn'd," he cried, "untimely to the tomb,
"Disgrace, my sister, antedates thy doom.
"Yet had thy life, unseen, ignobly flown,
"Screen'd from the world to virtuous scorn unknown,
"Though indignation wept thy wounded fame,
"Though tinged thy brother's glowing cheek with shame;
"Conceal'd dishonour had relieved my pain,
"And this stern breast return'd thy love again.
"Hid in this lone retreat from censure's eye,
"I deem'd the hour of shame would quickly fly;
"But vain the hope! what words my rage can tell?
"E'en wrath still mingles with my last farewell;
"Before my eye the guilty visions roll,
"Now thirst of vengeance fires my angry soul.

"But thou, lost wretch, ere this dark scene's reveal'd,
"Thy lips in endless silence shall be seal'd!
"The means of vengeance has thy aid supplied....
"Go! and the punishment of guilt divide!"
His murderer's dagger strikes the Leech's breast....
Groaning, she sinks to everlasting rest.

"And thou! foul offspring of a stol'n embrace,
"The hateful image of thy father's face,
"Accurs'd remembrance of my injured pride,
"Of a false sister to my foe allied;
"Three lingering pangs, protracted tortures wait,
"The parent's crimes their child shall expiate.
"This arm, to avenge a sister's virgin bed,
"The guilty blood of her defiler shed;
"Insulting union with my deadliest foe,
"How ill atoned by one avenging blow!
"Yes, should in thee a trace of guilt remain,
"My tarnish'd honour still betrays a stain;
"Love, yet unchang'd forbade a sister's death,
"But Hate, unceasing, claims thy forfeit breath...."

Furious the infant from the couch he tears,
Fierce to the flames its writhing body bears;
Aloft his arm with sway resistless whirls,
Then headlong down its trembling burden hurls.
As round the child the fiery circle creeps,
Lo! from the midst, untouch'd, unhurt, it leaps!
Nerved with unnatural strength by heavenly aid,
Its suppliant hands upraised for mercy pray'd.

Aghast the villain stands in dumb amazement...
The aspiring flames in troubled volumes blaze;
Speechless he paused...Wild frenzy fires his soul,
And bursting passions in confusion roll;
The child again he grasps...Beneath his hand,
In pointed spires, the flames aspiring stand,
Back they recoil! nor dare their victim meet,
The furnace blackens with extinguish'd heat!

Swift from the yawning depth of smother'd fire
A sulphurous stench exhales, and clouds aspire;
All ghastly pale a form terrific stood,
Its side deep gaping and distain'd with blood;
Full on the stranger's face its hollow eye
Intent it hurls, and pours a piteous cry;
Entwines its icy arms his limbs around,
Yells a loud yell, and cleaves the rending ground.

As through the black abyss the murderer falls,
Faint streaks of glory gild the mouldering walls,
Till lo! enveloped in a flood of light,
Descends a seraph-form confess'd to sight.
A radiant shroud around the spirit floats;
Above, a requiem breathes aerial notes;
When with a mother's fond encircling arms,
Sweetly it soothes the dying child's alarms,
And, as triumphant swells the angelic strain,
The soul untainted wafts to heaven again.

Far as they soar, remov'd from mortal eyes,
Lo! angry lightnings fire the troubled skies;
The sun obscur'd draws back his rising ray,
And vollied thunders usher in the day.
The storm is o'er...with still, unruffled breath
The breeze of morning fans the desert heath;
Struck by the bolt of heaven, in heaps around
A prostrate ruin strews the blasted ground!
Here, wandering shades the spell-bound circle tread,
And midnight magic wakes the silent dead.
The yawning earth pours forth a stream of blood,
And groans re-echo where the mansion stood.
Pale at the sound, with oft reverted eyes
Far, far aloof, the starting traveller flies.

Dr. John Eachard, a quaint and waggish writer of the last age, has consigned to posterity a facetious book, which will continue to excite merriment as long as man is a risible animal. In the course of these my evening labours, or levities, I have, more than once, quoted from this favourite author, and I am solicitous to have his books taken from the shelves, and read carefully over, because they are both merry and wise. Dean Swift has manifestly read them with diligence, and sometimes has not disdained to copy them with fidelity. STERN, who was a great poacher, has frequently hunted wild over the Tamasian fields of this jocose divine. He has been equally caressed by grave bishops, and the bantering jester. He has proved himself a formidable adversary to the acute HOBBS, a far famed sceptic, and in the fencing school of controversy, his force to thrust, and his adroitness to parry, rank him among the most accomplished. Let us laugh at his description of a glaring fault, incident to many preachers, who are prodigal of metaphors, at the very great expense of their understanding.

The first thing that makes many sermons so ridiculous, and the preachers of them so much disparaged and undervalued is, an inconsiderate use of frightful metaphors; which, making such a remarkable impression upon the ears, and leaving such a jarring twang behind them, are oft times remembered to the discredit of the minister, as long as he continues in the parish. I have heard the very children in the streets, and the little boys close about the fire, refresh themselves strangely, with the repetition of a few far fetched and odd sounding expressions. Tully and Cæsar, the two greatest masters of Roman eloquence, were very wary and sparing of that sort of rhetoric. We may read many a page in their works before we meet with any of those bears: and, if you do light upon one or so, it shall not make your hair stand right up, or put you into a fit of convulsion, but it shall be so soft, significant, and familiar, as if it were made for the very purpose. But, as for the common sort of people, that are addicted to this way of expression in their discourses, away presently to both the Indies, rake heaven and earth down to the bottom of the sea, then tumble over all arts and sciences, ransack all shops and warehouses, spare neither camp nor city, but that they will have them. So fond are such deceived ones of these same gay words, that they count all discourses empty, dull, and cloudy, unless bespangled with these glitterings. To which may be further subjoined, that metaphors, though very apt and allowable, are intelligible but to some sorts of men of this or that kind of life, of this or that profession: for example, perhaps one gentleman's metaphorical knack of preaching comes of the sea, and then we shall hear of nothing but starboard and larboard, of stems, sterns, and fore-castles, and such like salt water language: so that one had need to take a voyage to Smyrna, or Aleppo, and very warily attend to all sailor's terms, before I shall, in the least, understand my teacher. Now, although such a sermon may possibly do some good in a coast town, yet upward in the country, in an inland parish, it would do no more than Syrian or Arabic. Another, he falls a fighting with his text, and makes a pitched battle of it, dividing it into the right wing and left wing, then he rears it, flanks it, intrenches it, storms it; then musters all again to see what word was lost or maimed in the skirmish, and falling on again with fresh valour, he fights backward or forward, charges through and through, routs, kills and takes, and then, gentlemen, as you were. Now, to such of his parish as have been in the late wars, this is not very formidable; for they do but suppose themselves at Naseby or Edge-hill, and they are not much scared at this doctrine; but, as for others, who have not had such fighting opportunities, it is very lamentable to consider how shivering they sit, without understanding, until the battle be over!

It may be remembered, by those, who have looked into that kind of theological trash, with which many of the disciples of John Knox have overloaded the groaning world, that quaint divisions and violent ruptures of a text were thought to be of the very essence of ingenium. Observe with what exquisite humour, and with what correct taste, EACHARD describes the dreadful dislocation of the Scriptures.

In the next place, he comes to divide the text. Now off come the gloves, and the hands being well chafed, he shrinks up his shoulders, and stretches forth himself, as if he were going to cleave a bullock's head, or rive the body of an oak. But all texts come not asunder alike; for sometimes the words naturally fall asunder; sometimes they drop asunder; sometimes they melt; sometimes they untwist; and there are some words so willing to be parted, that they divide themselves to the great ease and rejoicing of the minister. But if they will not easily come in pieces, then he falls to hacking and hewing, as if he would make all fly into shivers. I have known now and then some knotty texts, that have been divided seven or eight times over, before they could make them split handsomely, according to their mind.

But then comes the joy of joys when the parts jingle, or begin with the same letter; and especially, if in Latin. O how it tickled the divider, when he had got his text into these two excellent branches; accusatio vera; comminatio severa; a charge full of verity; a discharge full of severity. Duplex miraculum; miraculum in modo, and miraculum in rodo. But the luckiest, both for wit and keeping the letter, is upon these words: when the unclean spirit is gone out of man, he walketh in dry places, seeking rest, and finding none. Then he saith I will return. In which words all these strange things were found out. First, there was a captain and a castle. Do you see, sir, the same letter. Then there was an ingress and egress. Then, there was unroosting and unresting. Then there was number and name, manner and measure, trouble and trial, resolution and revolution, assaults and assassination, voidness and vacuity.

But, for a short text, that certainly was the greatest break that ever was, which was once occasioned by these words of St. Luke, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves. It is a plain case, sir; here are but eight words, and the business was so cunningly ordered, that there sprung out eight parts. Here are, says the doctor, eight words and eight parts; 1. Weep not. 2. But weep. 3. Weep not, but weep. 4. Weep for me. 5. For yourselves. 6. For me, for yourselves. Weep not for me. 8. But weep for yourselves. That is to say, adds the merry Eachard, the wittiest of the clerical flock; North; North and by East, North North East, North East and by North, North East, North East and by East; East North East, East and by North, East.

FESTOON OF FASHION. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

To those who are ashamed of red hair, which the Romans thought a beauty, and to those who are ashamed of grey hair, which many think looks venerable, we must recommend the following suggestion, by the ingenious Mr. Overton, who seems to contradict the scripture assertion, "Thou canst not make one hair white or black."

To the nobility and gentry, &c.....No. 47, new Bond street, Mr. Overton's, where may be seen specimens of red or grey hair changed to various beautiful and natural shades of flaxen, brown, or black. As many ladies are compelled, from their hair changing grey, at a very early period, to adopt the use of wigs, such ladies are respectfully informed, that their own hair may be changed to any shade they chose, in the course of a few hours, by the use of the never failing tricosian fluid, and such is its permanency, that neither the application of powder, pomatum, or even washing, will, in the least, alter the colour. It is easy in application, and may be used at any season of the year, without danger of taking cold, being a composition of the richest aromatics, and highly beneficial in nervous head-achs, or weakness of the eyes. To convince the nobility, &c. any lady sending a lock of her hair, post paid, (sealed with her arms so as to prevent deception) shall have it returned the next day, changed to any colour shewn at the places of sale. Sold in bottles at £1 1s. by Mr. Golding, perfumer to her majesty, Cornhill; Mr. Overton, No 47, new Bond street; Mr. Wright, Wade's passage, Bath; and no where else in the kingdom.

Mr. T. Bowman of London, peruke maker, &c. gives a noble specimen of a disinterested spirit, when he tells the ladies that his "Full dress patent head dresses, are beautifully simple, when folded up and fastened with a bookin; are easily dressed in any style the best head of hair is capable of, and much superior in beauty." Price 6. 8. 10. 12. 15. and TWENTY GUINEAS!! The beautiful simplicity of Mr. Bowman's charge will, it is feared, occasion some complex calculations, in the heads of rational, plodding, and pains taking husbands, who have any heads, rather than patent heads.

The following broad hint is extracted verbatim from a London paper. It seems it sometimes is the fashion for modern ladies to ape the ardour of Sempronia of whom Sallust informs us, that such was the warmth of her heart, she solicited her lovers, rather than they solicited her.

TO THE GENTLEMEN.

A widow lady of respectable connections free from any family, mistress of a genteel house in one of the principal streets of the strand, by the malicious insinuations of a pretended female friend, has been misrepresented in such a manner as to cause her to be extremely embarrassed for the small sum of £60. To any gentleman of liberality and generous sentiments, who through humanity will step forward and advance the sum of £100, she will not only give every necessary security, but will be particular in her endeavours to render her house a comfortable home for him for any period of time agreed upon as a lodger and boarder, or lodger only as may be most agreeable. Address to A. B. at Mr. Underwood's, No. 3. Angel court, Strand.

I challenge the critics to amend the above admirable advertisement. Was ever a loan of money, never to be repaid, solicited with such a winning grace. How liberally, liberality, generous sentiments, and humanity are ascribed to that courteous knight, who will advance to the protection of this distressed damsel. How particular is she in her endeavours to allure him to her comfortable house and how she intreats him to tarry all night, with a persuasive turn in hither I beseech thee. How many honest gentlemen in the warmth of their generosity, will inquire for this angelic A. B. who lives at No. 3 Angel court!

PARISIAN FASHIONS.

The young men still wear their coats very short, excessively degagé, and with the lapels buttoned.... Each lapel has now seven buttons instead of six. The three cocked hat is strictly and exclusively for full dress. The cockade is subject, as well as the zephyrs which surmount it, to almost daily changes in the combination of the three colours. The cravat is no longer so large. A great many wear frills. They wear to their knee bands very small, plain gold buckles, round or square, with rounded corners; and in their shoes silver buckles of a middling breadth, from fourteen to sixteen lignes, with cords or pearls. These buckles are also round or square, with rounded corners. The use of gold pins is no longer so general among either men or women. They wear boots a la Suwarroff, without a seam, or with loose turns down of a leather colour. The artist, who has discovered the mode of kneading the leather so as to make solid boots, without any apparent seam at least, uses for the turns down a glossy gum, which prevents stains.

In the lady's dress, rose, orange, and scarlet are the prevailing colours. The last has the preference. A broad velvet ribbon of scarlet colour, with black edging, is worn round the crown of the white hats a la Pamela, which are as yet confined to the class of the first rate fashionables. The head-dresses in hair, which are equal in repute with the turbans, are generally ornamented with a wreath of two branches, in shape of a diadem, made of cherry blossoms, without leaves and sometimes of camomile flowers.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Various articles of great merit have been received of late from many of the most ingenious of our correspondents. At the convenient season, they shall be specially acknowledged, and receive due attention.

We praise the good taste, and are obliged by the kindness of the gentleman, who has sent us some judicious extracts from Stoddert's remarks on local scenery and manners in Scotland. This is one of the most agreeable travellers we have ever accompanied. His book is the darling, both of the patron of the fine arts, and the lover of romantic nature.

An ancient associate in literature, who, when the editor conducted a rural Miscellany, furnished him with poetical ornaments, both bright and durable, is anxiously entreated to assist him and delight the public with the gaiety of his wit, and the splendid sallies of his invention.

The Moral Painter, who sometime since favoured us with a spirited sketch of the character of "MADELINA," is requested to persevere in this kind of delineation. We know him to be a great observer, and that he looks quite through the ways of men. If in any of the nooks of society, he will pluck out his sketch book, or cry give me my Tablets, he has the power to fill them with the finest moral proportions, and with an interesting group to arrest the attention of every Connoisseur.

"Stanzas, written by moonlight," are poetical and pathetic. The Defence of Cowley is powerful. It has been candidly read, and shall be promptly published.

We shall always find room for "HARLEY".

"ASMODEO" delights us. "A sketch of the private history of St. James's, since 1792, with the views, conduct, and character of Pitt, Fox, Burke and Windham" is impatiently expected.

The biography of Boileau will be resumed next week.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

Messrs. Bronson and Chauncey have issued proposals for publishing, by subscription, Roscoe's delightful Biography of Lorenzo, the Magnificent. We are preparing a more detailed account of this work, which has a double claim to our attention, as it was composed by an accomplished scholar, surrounded by opposing circumstances, and severer cares; and as it transmits to posterity a splendid name, memorable not merely from the illustrious house of Medici, but because it associates every idea of LIBERAL GENIUS.

Mr. Groff proposes to publish the works of POPE, from the edition of Dr. WARTON. The writings of a Bard, so justly famed, and with text, regulated and explained by one of the most candid of critics, are fully entitled to the patronage of every literary American.

A new edition of Shakespeare, very carefully and elegantly printed, and at once cheap to the purchaser and creditable to the publishers, is projected.

Messrs. Conrad, & co. have printed a neat edition of Lewis's new play, Alphonso, king of Castile. The rigour of contemporary Criticism, and the intolerance of party prejudice, have allowed that this is one of the best tragedies, which have been written within the last twenty years.

Mr. Bronson has published a "Specimen of republican Institutions." This work is neither an eulogy of democracy, nor an apology for the murderers of Charles I. or Lewis XVI. But an honest description of the polity of a state, "enjoying great quietness," without a written constitution.

Mr. Maxwell has in his press, and in a state of very considerable forwardness, a complete and elegant edition of the theological writings of Dr. William Smith, a divine who is justly celebrated for the fervour of his imagination, and the popularity of his discourses.

Mr. Dobson has published The new American Practical Navigator, by Nathaniel Bowditch, a work eminently useful to the mariner.

Mr. Morgan has published an octavo edition of Forsyth on Fruit trees, with additional notes and observations, applicable to our own country. The reputation of Mr. Forsyth has been tested by the experience of the gardener, and by public rewards, and his book supersedes every other work on this branch of Horticulture.

Messrs. Conrad and Co. have in the press a good edition of Emmeline, one of the most approved novels from the pen of Charlotte Smith.

The prospectus of a Philadelphia Magazine, to be conducted on the most liberal plan, and devoted solely to science and literature, will, at no very distant period, be presented to the public.

Mr. Humphreys has published of late many valuable Law books. He has now in his press some recent publications, which will be sought for with avidity, both by the lawyer and the merchant.

Mr. Carey offers a second edition of his quarto BIBLE, in the publication of which he solemnly pledges himself that neither care, attention, pains, nor expense, shall be spared, to render it as elegant as any offered to the American public, either of foreign or domestic manufacture.

Messrs. Davies and Morgan propose soon to commence the republication of the British Classics. The first volume, which they will offer to the public, is Goldsmith's Citizen of the World, a book delightful from the playfulness of his "well natured" muse, the easy simplicity of his style, and the harmony of his periods.

Mr. Bronson has published a correct and authentic copy of the interesting debates in the Senate on the Judiciary.

Mr. Byrne has published the valuable reports of Vesey, Willis, and East.

Mr. Woodward will soon exhibit the Beauties of the Evangelical Magazine.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A Mr. Paux is an inn-keeper in the vicinity of this city. As a party were making merry at his house, he abruptly entered the room in a boisterous manner. But he was soon gagged by a wag present, who remarked that he was vox et preterea nihil!

A sporting parson, in the west of England, had the misfortune to lose his Bible and his Pointer. In an advertisement of his loss, posted next day upon his church door, the Bible is described as dog-eared, and the Pointer littered on the back!

Two French teachers lately set forth, in the public papers, their rival pretensions to public favour. One of them declares he was offered fifty-three young ladies at a celebrated Boarding School; but that he declined the flattering proposal, not thinking himself equal to the number. This gentleman may be a very wise French teacher, but he is certainly no Solomon.

"Truth," they say, "lies in a well." For our part, say the wits of London, we always thought it a property of Truth to lie no where.

A dashing young buck, from one of our universities, was lately congratulating himself upon being appointed to an advantageous situation as tutor to a young nobleman. A friend observed, that he would now have the delightful occupation of "Teaching the young idea how to shoot." Aye, aye, he replied, I will teach the young dog how to shoot. [M. Post.]

English visitants describe Parisian societies as consisting of men remarkable for their ignorance and barbarism, of adventurers and banditti; of women without honour, without chastity, and even without common decency.

Citizen Bullock, a French physician, has written as might have been expected, an excellent treatise upon the Cow-Pox. "Et vitula tu dignus."

Mr. Pitt's predilection for Bond street is easily accounted for. He had always an eye to security. [Morning Post.]

A curious bet, for a thousand pounds, has lately been made. Two noblemen, well known on the turf, have agreed to run against each other the first windy day on Hampstead Heath. The one is to wear Jack boots, and to run backwards against the other, who is to carry a large Umbrella over his head, and to run forward. They are both to run against the wind. All the sporting world are to be present, and great bets are already made.

It is a fact that a certain beau wears as much muslin and linnen round his neck, as his wife wears on her whole body!

Many who love to play upon words, take a delight in publishing fictitious marriages, for the sake of punning upon the convenient names of the parties. But in the Nuptial Register of that accurate and respectable paper, the Gazette of the United States, the following actually occurs, Married at Norwich, (Conn.) Mr. David Pitcher, to Miss Mary Gibbons.

Here we have an irresistible temptation to apply a few stanzas of a well known drinking song, and as we do it in the most perfect good humour, we hope it will give offence to none.

In search of bliss I'll never roam
From clime to clime, even tho' I'd leisure;
More rapture yields my peaceful home,
Where lives my love, my only treasure.

My friend so rare, my friend so fair,
With such what mortal can be richer;
Give me this boon, I ask no more,
Than my good man, and darling Pitcher.

Prolific Nile overflows her banks,
And Vegetation skips to meet her;
I'll imitate dame Nature's pranks,
And spring with joy to meet my Pitcher.

From morning sun I'd never grieve,
To toil a Hedger or a Ditcher;
If, coming wearied home, at eve,
I might enjoy my friend...and Pitcher.

SKETCHES FROM LA BRUYERE.

To a man puffed up with vanity, impudent, who talks much and indulges in impertinent raillery, who speaks of himself with confidence, and of others with contempt, impetuous, haughty, obtrusive, without morals or probity, without judgment and indulging in the extravagances of an unbridled imagination...to such a man nothing is wanting to render him an object of the adoration of many women, but a handsome face and fine person.

The spirit of conversation consists much less in making a display of our own wit, than in drawing it from others: he who retires from your society, satisfied with himself and his colloquial powers, is also perfectly satisfied with you. Men love not to admire you, they desire to please; it is less their wish to be instructed and delighted, than to be approved and applauded; and the most requisite of pleasures is that of pleasing others.

Some women have endeavoured to conceal their conduct under a veil of false modesty; and they have gained nothing by a continual affliction, but to have it said of them, "One would have taken her for a vestal."

EPIGRAMS.

Says Kate to Ralph, with syren lure,
Her ankle full in view, sir;
That is the love-sick number sure,
Where one and one make two, sir.

Quoth Ralph (a wag in gallantry)
The figure's not uncivil;
But Kate, where one and one make three,
It plays, you know, the devil.

On a late regulation at a country work-house, by which the Paupers are deprived of both sugar and vinegar:

Don't exclaim, ye half starved crew,
Against the men in power,
Though they have took from you the sweets
They have also took the sour.

A barber in a borough town, it seems,
Had voted for Sir John against Sir James,
Sir James, in angry mood, took Suds aside,
"Don't you remember shaving me," he cried,
"Five pence for five minutes work I gave;
"And does not one good turn another crave?"
"Yes," quoth the barber, and his fingers snapt,
"I grant the doctrine...I admit the fact,
"Sir John, on the same score, paid the same price,
"But took two shavings; and, of course, paid twice."

A certain visionary once declared that his geese and ganders were possessed of souls as well as men. The next night all his poultry was stolen, and around the neck of a throttled gander, the purloining wit left the following distich.

Since, though 'twas never yet divin'd
In Athens or in Greece,
Your wisdom has explored a mind
In ganders and in geese.
Goosecups you treat of different kinds,
With eating and with arguing;
I take their boluses...you their mince,
Which has the better bargain?

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO

ODE TO POVERTY.

Thou squalid, sharp-nos'd, lank-jaw'd, hawk-eyed creature!

What business hast thou, squinting in my face?
I so detest thy look, thy ev'ry feature,
That I ne'er think of thee, without grimace.

Then why or wherefore dost thou come, bewitching
Each thing I love? to water turn my grog,
And stealing (so insidious!) to my kitchen,
Annihilate each article of prog?

The dollars, that once jingled in my pocket,
Now by thy cursed art so scarce are grown,
That if thou hadst a wooden heart, 'twould shock it;
Nay, though thy heart were even made of stone.

But not alone of this am I complaining;
Nature herself's so alter'd by thy power,
That fields and meadows, each gay tint disdaining,
No more to me display the gaudy flower.

Thou'lt late with rural charms each thought delighting,
Thy maids and milk-pails now no more can please;
The billing turtle-doves to me seem fighting,
And gentle zephyr turn'd the boreal breeze.

The din around is louder than the city's
The pigs and geese are worse than carts and drays;
The birds that chaunt on ev'ry spray their ditties,
Are to my ears a flock of screaming jays.

Where Schuylkill winds along in soft meanders,
I see no pebbly beach, no crystal wave:
His swans to me look very much like ganders,
And nought but mud his sordid waters lave.

And worse than all the rest, my friends don't know me;
But hold their heads so high with haughty stare,
That there's not one of them whom thou canst shew me,
To whose identity I'd like to swear.

E'en Chloe, who erewhile so condescending,
Would sit upon my knee with smiles so meek,
Now frowning, says, "in troth you need much mending,"
And scarce will suffer me to touch her cheek.

Old Noll, who always was the true quintessence
Of honest fellows.....sprightly, gay and clever,
When I approach the bar-room, shuns my presence,
As if he thought I had the yellow fever.

His nose was comely once, and finely florid;
His cheeks possess of health the roscate hue;
With pimples cover'd now, his nose is horrid,
And, to my eyes at least, his cheeks are blue.

Tim Staytape too, who rigg'd me out to cozen
The hearts of ladies fair, with witching looks,
By whose attraction, Delias by the dozen,
I flew to my arms, like school-boys to their books,

E'en Tim himself is chang'd! no more he capers
For me to cut the cloth, or wield the sheers;
No more that certain cure for spleen or vapours,
The splendid coat or vest this bosom cheers.

I cannot say how ugly I think Tim is;
I hate him as I do the doctor's pill!
His aspect, that was once so smiling, grim is!
His face grows even longer than his bill!

But as I'm sick of thee, and don't love railing,
And would not call thee an indecent name,
(I never was accused of that failing)
I will not say a word more in thy blame.

Yet, would it not vex even Job's meek nature;
And I, thou know'st, possess not half his grace:
Then what, thou sharp-nos'd, lank-jaw'd, hawk-eyed creature!
What business hast thou squinting in my face?

SELECTED POETRY.

[He, who venerates the valiant spirit of a Scottish warrior, or who delights in Caledonian imagery, will peruse with no languid emotions, a ballad, descriptive, natural and pathetic. The Editor has copied it from one of the newest books on his shelves. Its novelty will allure some, but he hopes its merit will captivate many.]

OSRIC AND ELLA,

A NORTHERN TALE.

.....Medio de fonte leporum
Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipsis floribus angit.
LUCRETIVS.

The youths rejoiced, the maidens smiled
And cold age cheer'd his furrow'd brow,
To hear that Ella, fair and mild,
Had listen'd to brave Osric's vow.

The sprightly bagpipe's patriot lay
Resounded on the banks of Clyde;
Renfrew ne'er saw a happier day,
A braver chief, or fairer bride.

But, ere the festive board was clear'd,
And ere the festive dance began,
Sudden, a messenger appear'd,
And thus his breathless errand ran:

"Haste, Osric, haste! to idler days
"Leave, Osric, leave, these ling'ring maids;
"Your valour thus while love delays,
"Our western isles a host invades.

"Perhaps amid this joyous crowd,
"No voice but that of love you hear,
"And honour's trumpet, once so loud,
"Sounds scarce a whisper in your ear.

"Haste, Osric; long ere evening fall,
"Our vessel far from hence is borne:
"I hear your brave companions call;
"Let me not see your laurels torn.

"Stay, Osric, stay," the maid return'd
"Her cheeks all pale and dim with woe;
"Your heart, that late with rapture burn'd,
"Can it so soon forget to glow?

"Ere yet upon my lips is cold
"The kiss you vow'd our love to seal;
"Ere yet the words the priest has told;
"Have perish'd in the parting gale.

"The gales, that waft you hence away
"No more shall bear the words of love;
"And ere again a kiss you pay
"Cold, cold, I ween those lips will prove.

"Your honour give the winds to take,
"To me you vow'd it all was due,
"And he, who can his love forsake,
"Will never to his king be true.

"Deserted in a foreign shore,
"Will honour heal the wounds of care,
"Or when the battle's wrath is o'er,
"Will honour smooth your pillow there?

"Stay, Osric, stay! full sure you go
"A double victory to pursue:
"That valour, which o'erthrows the foe,
"Your helpless bride will conquer too.

"Tempt me no more," brave Osric cried,
"Nor thus in fruitless tears repine;
"Ere back I turn to claim my bride,
"Honour and love must both be mine.

"When Osric shuns the dangerous field,
"Let infants lisp of Osric's shame;
"And all, who can a claymore wield,
"Shall pluck a wreath from Osric's fame."

He said, and hasted to the shore;
Long Ella's voice her love bewail'd,
And when her voice was heard no more,
Her eyes beside the vessel sail'd

Not now the east her steps betray'd,
She seem'd, so strong is fancy's sway,
As on the western shore she stray'd,
All nearer to her love to stray.

There oft she did her truth approve,
Her messenger the evening breeze,
And looking through the mist of love,
No longer saw the pathless seas.

But when the sun in clouds had set,
And slept beneath the western main,
'Twas all as if her love she'd meet,
And now was forced to part again.

"O cruel sun, so soon to fail,
"O cruel Ocean," oft she said,
"Could I but o'er thy billows sail
"To where yon happier sun is staid.

"Quick beat my heart, my bosom glows,
"To think how-smooth the night would flee;
"To think that when the dawn arose,
"I nearer, nearer still should be.

Love, neither fear, nor reason hears:
The vessel parted, fair the wind;
But thoughtless Ella views with tears
Her country fading far behind.

What sail is this that onward hies?
And who towards yon eastern haze,
So sternly throws his eager eyes,
As if he kenn'd his mistress' gaze?

'Twas Osric kenn'd his mistress' land,
Her, little thinking soon to see,
Her, flying to the westward strand,
He, hasting to the east countrée.

Ah! who could bear such matchless pain,
Who in his bosom love has found?
But who the viewless wind can chain,
Or anchor in the wave profound?

He leap'd into the foaming tide,
He sought the ridgy surge to cleave:
And once, he touch'd the vessel's side:
Why dash'd him back an envious wave?

Faint and more faint his efforts grew,
Dim and more dim, poor Ella's eyes;
Now half he's lost, now quite to view;
She saw him sink, she heard his cries!

Death, like a whirlwind, shook her frame:
No more she heardbut only gave
The last farewell to Osric's name,
Her parting look to Osric's grave.

HORACE.

The following petition, or memorial, as my correspondent more melodiously terms it, was sent to me with a request, that I would present it, at the next meeting of the committee of literature, or in the course of my earliest saunter into the Philadelphia library. But I am so conscious of my little influence, on the one hand, and of my great diffidence on the other, that I have deemed this mode of publication would most effectually subserve the wishes of "Literary Leisure." It is almost superfluous to add, that my own prayers for success are added to those of the ingenious petitioner. Our city library at present resembles the "sister and spouse," of Solomon. It is a garden inclosed. It is a spring shut up, and a fountain sealed. 'Tother morning, my pale cheek had actually a kind of crimson tint, when a learned foreigner, requested that we might go to the library together, and consult the Polymetis of Spence to ascertain the proportions of an ancient statue; after which, added he, I shall easily have time before dinner, to look into a volume of the journals of your Congress, while you, in your miscellaneous mode, are running from this poet, to that philosopher. Confused as I was, I could not avoid smiling, while I assured him that though the capital of the United States, boasted of the amplest library in our rising empire, yet it was locked up, during the golden period of the day, and that neither Laborious Research, nor the listless loiterer could obtain a volume, until a full dinner, and the gloomy brevity of a winter's afternoon, or the enervating heat of a summer's, had finely prepared the mind for all manner of studious exertion. My foreign friend shrugged up his shoulders, with that air of acquiescence, the characteristic of his countrymen, and said gaily, we order these things better in France. After dinner, we converse with claret rather, than Cicero, and pore upon nothing but the crowds in the Palais Royal, or the volatile figures at the Opera.

TO THE DIRECTORS OF THE PHILADELPHIA LIBRARY.

THE MEMORIAL OF LITERARY LEISURE.

Respectfully representeth,

THAT your memorialist, though of a remarkably pensive and quiet character, hath ever been of an inquisitive turn of mind, an ardent lover of books, and a great asker of ways and wherefores, whenever she happens to be in the company of profound pages, or profound scholars.

Although your memorialist commonly elects the most sequestered spots for her dwelling, and affects no noises louder, than the gentle water fall, the rustle of leaves, the soft pipe of the robin, or the hum of a bee hive, yet sometimes in despite of party jangling, dusty streets, lumbering drays, and lazy loiterers, she adventures into populous cities, moved thereunto by an irresistible impulse to gaze at many books; to purchase some; to listen to news, and to learn from wisdom.

THAT not many years have passed, since she was apprized by one of Fame's messengers, that in the city of Philadelphia, surnamed the magnificent, there might be found a studious cloyster abundant in literature, and sacred to quiet, where your memorialist might read and meditate whatever of moral and wise, whatever of exquisite and fair, Learning, in her bounty, imparts to her votaries.

THAT, fraught with eager expectations of reasoning high, and enjoying thought more absolute, in a situation, so propitious to studious adventure, your memorialist forsook her village studies, and, at her own proper cost and charges, actually travelled from Dan to Beersheba, that is to say, from New-Hampshire to Pennsylvania.

THAT, on her arrival, after having shaken off the dust of her feet, and cleared her studious brain with a pinch of rappee, she forthwith repaired shortly after breakfast to the library room, and had the mortification to find the door shut in her face.

THAT, supposing this was a personal affront, she immediately appeared in all public places, with a countenance, as Mr. Noah Webster, would say, somewhat lengthy; but quickly was apprized that this was a common case, and that no one was permitted to read in a public library till food, and wine, and the fumes of tobacco had, at a late hour in the afternoon, ingeniously pioneered the way to the clear understanding and laborious perusal of any, the most difficult books.

THAT your memorialist is not only startled at this novel doctrine of slumbering study, after dinner, but being of a delicate constitution, with nerves vibrating at the slightest impulse, she finds herself but meanly qualified in the afternoon for any other studies, than Tristram Shandy, the London Songster, Mr. Jefferson's notes, or any other performance, remarkably light and superficial.

THAT, moreover, in winter, as your memorialist is rather dim sighted, from the united effects of long lucubrations, and bad candles, at least twelve to the pound, she confesses she cannot amid the haze of a December afternoon, very distinctly discern even the brightest sentiments; and further, if, as is sometimes incident to the most circumspect Literary Leisure, her pure mind is obscured by the fumes, either of the Tuscan grape, or the Havannah cigar, she cannot accurately distinguish between a page of pleasure, or a page of philosophy.

THAT, in summer, from the listless languor of the season; from the intrusion of impertinent flies, who sometimes maliciously buzz in the ear, or tamper with the nose of your memorialist; and from divers nods, and yawns, and other symptoms of drowsiness, she is altogether incapable of reading, even the Aurora.

THAT for these, and divers other good causes and considerations, your memorialist hopes, that she may be indulged with a more early interview with the muses of Philadelphia, in their favorite haunt, the library: that she may be permitted to expatiate freely among the shelves from five to three: that she may be permitted to make the most of the "cool, the silent, and the studious" hour, which, peradventure, may give birth to new Loungers, or something more worthy; and your memorialist, as in duty bound, will ever pray for her natural patrons and protectors.

LITERARY LEISURE.

To the Directors of the Library } company of Philadelphia. }

Though the topics in the above memorial are not very carefully multiplied, nor very skilfully urged, yet I think even this artless representation deserves some regard from the very respectable characters, who are the guardians and directors of our best repository of literature. The present discipline of the library is obviously imperfect. It is a great injury to those, who are honestly desirous of information, to be in a situation, where they cannot obtain books. It is a greater and more tantalizing evil to stand, as it were in Minerva's porch, and not be admitted into the temple; to wander on the banks of Helicon, without the power of imbibing a draught. It is in vain to urge that the library company already meet the wishes of the studious, by cheerfully loaning books, which the borrower may read in his closet. But this favour does not, in the smallest degree, benefit him, for example, who is composing a book, in which he wishes to refer to multiplied authorities: here, the habit of research, the convenience of running from book to book, the long and quiet solitude of a serene morning, and the unrestrained liberty of an accessible collection, are absolutely necessary to the accomplishment of his work. Men may trifle with books, in the afternoon, but they must be studied in the morning. Indeed, no one, I believe, in the Philadelphia library, ever dreams of any higher effort of his mind, than to gaze with half-shut eyes at Hogarth's prints, or the maps on the wall, to read a magazine or a review, to discuss the intelligence of the last gazette, or quietly to sink on the shoulders of the arm chair, and enjoy a long vision of the Muses. An English gentleman, a stranger, ironically complimented me that our library establishment was so far monastic, as not to want a dormitory; that under the fervour of a July sun, it was the coolest room in the city for a nap, and that, on a late visit, he saw some half dozen hard students, whose studies might be very profound for aught he knew, except that they were occasionally interrupted by a profound snore, convulsive twitchings, the grinding of the teeth, and other symptoms of the most studious slumber.

It has been darkly hinted that pecuniary considerations affect the liberality of the establishment, and that an early passage to the library is obstructed.

ed, by the figures of arithmetic. But this we look upon as a downright calumny. The very genius and characteristic of literature is liberality. Her eagle eyes cannot look upon pins and needles. She does not measure her book with a joiner's rule, nor ascertain the depths of her wisdom with an excise-man's gauge. Gibbon could not "forget the joy, with which he exchanged a bank note of twenty pounds for twenty volumes of the memoirs of the academy of Inscriptions," and Cicero assures us that he despises the possession of meadows and cattle, and corn fields, in comparison with the AFFLUENCE OF LITERATURE. It is fervently hoped for the honour of our country, too long tarnished by this vile stigma of avarice, that no plan, calculated to enlarge the Empire of Knowledge will be frustrated, for want of a paltry sum, to carry it into execution. Let not the avenue of science be blockaded by the pence table; by the sordid imps of a penny wise, and pound foolish economy. Let not learning be locked up, for lack of a golden key. But let all, who have the exalted privilege of standing around the well-spring of literary refreshment, exclaim in a munificent spirit, generous accents and the eloquent phrase of a Jewish classic, "Ho every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters!"

CHAP. XXIV.

In continuation....English and Spanish treaties....Washington's firmness....Wavering conduct of the House of Representatives.

It is evident from Washington's letters, written to the Secretary of State Randolph, that he saw clearly before hand, the noise which the French party would make, in case he should ratify the treaty with England. Of two evils however, he chose the smallest and ratified it. The French party, which Washington, in those letters characterizes as the "friends of war and confusion," now rested all their hopes upon the house of representatives in congress. The democratic news-papers talked about an impeachment of Washington. "The Senate," added they, "which judges in such cases, will indeed acquit him;" but still he was thus held up to the people, as deserving punishment. He was accused in the same papers, with having drawn from the treasury more money than to the amount of his salary. He justly thought it beneath his dignity, to take the smallest notice of the charge. The former minister of finance, Hamilton, justified him substantially, and shewed that twenty-five thousand dollars a year, with the dearness then prevailing, was really not much for a president. In the house of representatives of Congress, the French democratic party seemed indeed to have the majority on their side. A certain Mr. Livingston, member from the state of New-York, a zealous democrat, brought forward a resolution, "that the president be requested, to lay before the house, all the papers relating to the treaty with England." Hereupon there was in this session of 1796, a debate, three weeks long. It was calculated that, as every member receives six dollars a day for pay, this resolution cost the public nearly thirty thousand dollars. Every representative wished to shew how deeply versed he was in the theory of political government, and discoursed in speeches of two days length, of legislative, executive, and treaty making powers. It was generally concluded that the fate of this resolution would decide that of the treaty itself, in the house of representatives; the democrats were therefore highly rejoiced, when the resolution passed by a great majority. A deputation of three members, for which the most violent antagonists of Washington, such as Gallatin and Livingston, the mover of the resolution, were selected, was sent to the president, to require of him to lay the papers before the house. Washington refused them, and declared he would deliver them, only in case an impeachment should first be voted. The house of representatives hereupon voted that they had the right to demand, for their inspection, all papers relating to a treaty; that they had a right to refuse appropriations of money, necessary for the fulfilment of a treaty with a foreign power. After this, the treaty itself was debated upon, or rather the resolution to vote the sums for the execution of the treaty. This debate was purposely drawn into length, in order to learn the sense of the people. There poured in from all quarters petitions that the treaty might be executed. There was however, one petition to the contrary, signed by more inhabitants of Philadelphia and its neighbourhood, than that in favour of the treaty, which proves that the two parties were nearly equal in strength. But it proves perhaps still more, that the Americans very often sign petitions when a man of influence carries them round, without well knowing what they contain. The aristocratic party were incomparably more active than the democrats. The latter, in the country signed no petitions at all; probably because they relied upon the house of representatives, where the majority was on their side. Besides, Washington has had the address to bring the democratic societies into such discredit, that they scarcely assemble any longer in the country, at all. In truth, the democrats could not foresee that the absence by design of several members, should render the number of votes equal on both sides, and that the president of the committee, Mr. Muhlenberg, who had until then, been on their side would have given the casting vote in favour of the treaty; observing that although he deemed the treaty disadvantageous, he gave his vote in favour of its execution, in consideration of the great misfortunes which would arise from a refusal of the monies requisite for its fulfilment. The confusion would indeed have been astonishing, and Mr. Muhlenberg by this decision in favour of the treaty, rendered an essential service to his country. It is however evident that the firmness of Washington, who stood like a rock in a stormy sea, immoveable amidst the cries of faction, which broke at his feet, gave no small increase of energy to the executive power, by the refusal of the papers demanded, and that on the contrary, the wavering conduct of the house of representatives, in first demanding the documents, and then not only omitting all animadversion upon their being denied, but even finally voting against their will, and as if through fear, the sums necessary for the execution of the treaty, will in future be a precedent by no means advantageous to the privileges of the house.

At the same period, was ratified likewise a treaty of commerce with Spain, the principal object of which is, the liberty of navigating upon the Mississippi. The inhabitants of Kentucky, had always strenuously urged for this liberty to export their produce, upon the Mississippi, and had maintained that the government did not exert itself seriously to obtain it of the Spaniards; because it was against the trading interest of the atlantic states. This complaint is now removed. But whether the Kentucky people, would make such uncommon profits by this free exportation, was doubted in the atlantic states. For it was said, I think, very justly, that the great superfluity, and of course extraordinary cheapness of provisions, would give rise there to manufactures, and many enterprising people have already formed the design to set up manufactures in Kentucky. But by the exportation of the produce, it will grow dear, and of course by raising the price of labour, will counteract the establishment of inland manufactures....This reasoning proves that in the atlantic states, the truth is understood without being followed. I believe, however, that the natural organization of the country will set the proper limits to this exportation. For the rapidity of the Mississippi prevents the navigation up the river, and of course the return of the vessels which carry the produce to New-Orleans; hence the owners are obliged to sell it there, then to proceed by sea, to one of the ports of the atlantic states, commonly Philadelphia or Baltimore, whence, after purchasing manufactured goods there, they are obliged to transport them by a difficult land conveyance, to Kentucky. All this is very tedious, very much subject to accident, and will never allow their exportations to reach the extent which they have attained in the eastern states....Hence, manufactures will first arise in the western states.

CHAPTER XXV.

In continuation....Surrender of the forts....Washington's retirement.

After the conclusion of the commercial treaty with England, the delivery of the forts upon the lakes, from the English to the Americans was necessary, before the treaty could be said to be executed. This delivery took place: and now was Washington's great work completed; he could now retire from his public career, not after having been like Sylla, the terror of his fellow citizens, but after having secured their liberty, and by a masterly negotiation confirmed the independence of his country, which as the celebrated general Lloyd has long since indisputably proved, was always exposed to the attacks of the English from Canada. Before he retired as a statesman from the theatre of the world, he left behind, to his nation a political legacy, in the excellent farewell address, wherein the overflowings of a benevolent heart, glowing with the love of its country are united with the wise maxims of a profound statesman; which important historical document, has been preserved by Mr. Archenholz in his Minerva, for December 1796. He anticipates the reproach, of wishing to withdraw from the service of his country, by observing in this admirable address, that so long as her situation had been critical, he had submitted though contrary to his inclination, to the burden of public office; but that now the ship was brought into port, no duty prevented his return to domestic quiet, which five and forty years, devoted to the benefit of his country, entitled him to enjoy. Men who believe in no virtue, because they can trace nothing like it in their own hearts, might perhaps maintain that his offended egotism, induced him to retire because he had been very indecently treated in the opposition prints. But this rare, and excellent man is certainly insensible to the censure of selfish little beings, as will be every man, of whose labours, the general good is the sole object. Egotism alone makes us vulnerable to the darts of egotism.

The danger of a new election to the office of President, must at any rate have occurred after his death, and then, as there would have been no Washington, to seize in case of need, with a stronger hand the reins of government, to bring order once more out of chaos, the evil would have been without remedy. Thus in every point of view, the resignation of his office was not blameable, but a new addition to his immortal glory.

BIOGRAPHY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN ESSAY ON THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF

BOILEAU DESPREAUX.

THIS edition records a fact too honourable to the memory of Lewis XIV., to be passed over in silence. That great monarch, whose glory the present age of false, of meretricious philosophy, has attempted to tarnish, loved and protected the arts and sciences, not as a prince whose judgment is directed by the opinions of his courtiers, but as an enlightened monarch, whose decision is the result of deliberate examination, and of firm conviction. He was not blind to the splendour, which royal favour and protection when conferred on genius, reflect upon the sovereign, nor to the glory of which they are the source to the nation. The works of Despréaux were recited to him as soon as they appeared. The taste and judgment which characterize them, had made a vivid impression on his mind; he had frequently expressed his approbation of them; but this he regarded as insufficient. A public testimonial of his esteem appeared necessary, and he gave it in the privilege granted for the publication of this edition, in which he ordered, that particular mention should be made of the satisfaction he had derived, from the perusal of the works of our author; a distinction which reflects much less honour on its object, than on the prince by whom it is conferred.

Until now Despréaux had addressed himself in his works, only to reason and to taste. A quarrel which happened between the treasurer and the clerk of the holy chapel, occasioned by the removal and the restitution of a pulpit, furnished him an occasion of displaying all the brilliancy of his imagination. The affair was brought before the parliament. The first president Lamoignon, struck with the ridiculous folly of this controversy, jocosely said to Despréaux: "could you not write a poem on this subject?" "what should prevent me," answered he. "It is imprudent to set the head of a madman at defiance." To genius nothing is difficult. This pleasantry of the president Lamoignon, gave birth in the imagination of the poet, to a crowd of ingenious ideas: in the space of a few hours he formed the plot of the most piquant and original poem which adorns the French language.

Whilst he was engaged in writing the Lutrin, he composed his first epistle to the king. Madame de Thiange, sister of the mareschal de Vivonne and of Madame de Montespan, promised to present it to his majesty, Louis XIV. till then unacquainted with the author, except by his works; desired to see him. He consequently ordered Colbert to introduce him at court. Some days after, the mareschal de Vivonne presented Despréaux to the king, who received him with that kindness which, notwithstanding the haughtiness of deportment with which he has been so often charged, always tempered the air of grandeur and of dignity, which characterised all his actions. The king mentioned to him the pleasure which his compositions had afforded him, and expressed a desire to hear him recite parts of them. Despréaux repeated to his majesty a part of the Lutrin, which had not then been published, and some passages from his other compositions. The king, whose attention the various species of the truly beautiful never escaped, testified the highest approbation, and asked Despréaux with what part of his works he was best satisfied. He intreated his majesty to dispense with his opinion on that subject, adding that an author was incompetent to form a correct judgment of his own works, and that, with respect to himself, he entertained not an opinion sufficiently exalted of his, thus to weigh them in the balance. That is of no importance, replied the king, I insist on your expressing an opinion. Despréaux obeyed. "That part of my works, with which I am best satisfied," said he, "is the conclusion of an epistle, which I have presumed to address to your majesty." He then recited the last forty verses of the first epistle. This conclusion, which the author had but a short time before composed, and which he had till then concealed from his friends, made a sensible impression on the mind of the king. The emotions which it produced, were visible in his eyes and on his countenance; he rose with transport from his seat, but immediately repressing this movement, "that is very fine," said he, "that is admirable. I would give you more praise, if you had not lavished so much of it upon me. The public will pronounce on your works, the eulogy which they merit; but, it is not enough for me to praise you. I give you a pension of two thousand livres: I will order Colbert to pay it in advance, and I grant you the privilege of impression for all your works*." Before the king had addressed himself in this flattering manner to the author, M. de Vivonne, transported by the beauty of the verses, seized him by the throat, and exclaimed "ah traitor! you concealed that from me." This sally, which even the presence of the king did not suppress, was a great source of amusement to the persons present. Despréaux retired from the court crowned with glory, attended by the smiles of fortune, and filled with admiration and gratitude towards his sovereign. But soon, according to his own confession, did sorrow assail him: his newborn honours and the munificence of the king lost their charms, and soon did he regard them merely as the price of his lost liberty.

An occasion was not long wanting to Despréaux, for paying his tribute of gratitude. The war which had just kindled, was one of the most glorious that France had ever waged. It elevated the glory of the nation and of the king, to the highest eminence. Every day was marked by new successes; to appear before the enemy, and to conquer seemed to be equally easy. Amidst this rapid succession of conquests, Despréaux selected the famous passage of the Rhine, and the capture of Namur, as the two actions most susceptible of all the embellishments and charms of poetry. He celebrated the first in an epistle of singular excellence, not less distinguished for the nobleness of the thoughts than for the elegance and harmony of the diction; and the second in an ode, which, unfortunately did

* Lewis XIV. was desirous of distinguishing men of letters, and loved to converse with them. It is universally known, that Moliere, Despréaux and Racine, frequently enjoyed that honour. Madame de Sevigné, has recorded an anecdote, which proves the extensive information he acquired, relative to literature; and the protection and patronage with which he honoured authors of celebrity....It refers to the extreme kindness, with which he received M. Arnauld d'Audille, brother of the celebrated doctor Arnauld and father of the marquis de Pomponne. "The king," says Madame de Sevigné, "passed an hour in conversation with the good man d'Audille, as pleasantly, with as much kindness, and as agreeably as possible; he was pleased with the opportunity of displaying his wit to this excellent old man, and of attracting his admiration. He told him that vanity had prompted him to mention, in the preface to Joseph, that he was eighty years old, and that it was sinful. The king added, that he must not flatter himself with the hope of being suffered to remain in his desert; that he would send for him, for he felt pleasure in the society of a man who had rendered himself so illustrious. When the good man gave him assurances of his fidelity, the king said that he entertained no doubts on that subject, and that a man who truly served God, was always a good and loyal subject. All this was charming. The king condescended to request him to dine, and to take an airing in a calashe, which he ordered to be provided; during a whole day did he speak of him with admiration." After such proofs of protection and of kindness, on the part of a king, whose enterprises were all crowned with the most brilliant success, can we be surprised at the enthusiasm with which men of letters have spoken of him.

not answer the expectations of the public, nor the good intentions of the author. In all the former works of Despréaux, he had shone only as a great luminary of literature and an excellent poet; but these two last productions distinguish him as a citizen zealous for the glory of his country. This it was which induced Louis XIV. to appoint him, in conjunction with Racine, historiographer of his reign.

The distinguished favour and protection with which the king honoured Despréaux, finally induced the French academy to receive into its bosom, the man of his time, the best entitled to the honour of a seat in that illustrious company. His enemies, who were predominant in the academy, had until then exerted their power to exclude him....contemptible vengeance which produced no other effect than that of rendering its authors objects of ridicule: but the firmness which the king displayed, in refusing his assent to the admission of la Fontaine, whom they had preferred to him, disconcerted and crushed the cabal. They dreaded the king's displeasure, and nominated Despréaux to the first vacancy. He and la Fontaine were installed at the same time. He was soon after received as a member of the academy of Inscriptions.

MISCELLANY.

FROM LITERARY LEISURE.

In a rainy journey in a post chaise the other day, I amused myself with tracing many analogies between the progress of human beings through life, and that of the drops of rain from the top of the glass to the bottom. It was fortunate for me that this idea presented itself to my mind; for the rain was so violent, that it precluded all entertainment from without: but the speculation I had thus engaged in, offered me sufficient occupation within. I observed certain drops start from the top with equal advantages. An accident impedes one, and its course to the bottom is slow, irregular, and crooked;....another, on the contrary, is forwarded by some lucky accession, and rolls down in a swift straight current; while a third, perhaps, which seemed to have a thousand prosperous events in its way, which it was scarcely possible to miss....a large bubble immediately beneath it, which must send it speedily to the end of its journey, or a new drop of rain so close to it, that it could hardly fail of joining its current,....falls in with a small drop to the left-hand of its regular course, is retarded, turned aside in its career, and reaches no farther than to the middle of the pane, where it dries up in obscurity;....another sets out brilliantly, and promises to perform its journey in a straight and regular line; when, behold, an overwhelming torrent pours precipitately upon it, and buries it in a superior current;....while a fifth, from small and unobserved beginnings, never deviating from the right way, and collecting with diligence all the little tributary bubbles which lie in its road, suddenly calls the attention to the rapidity with which it now reaches the end of its labours.

Many fanciful resemblances might here be traced to the course of events in life....Chances, equally strange, occur in the pursuit of honour, riches, and happiness. In events which depend not on our own endeavours, we may trace the same similitudes. One is hurried rapidly off the stage by disease;....another withers and dies at the root in the midst of life; another lingers through slow and lasting disorders, and reaches, by a painful and crooked course, the extreme of old age; while another, who sets out with a full stock of health, and every prospect fair and blooming round, is suddenly driven off the stage by accident or misfortune!

Eumenes and Lysander were schoolfellows. A similarity of age, of disposition, and of talent had united them in a strict and affectionate friendship: they went through their school exercises with alacrity and credit, and removed together to Cambridge, where, notwithstanding some trifling disparity of pursuits, their mutual friendship still continued unabated....When they quitted Cambridge, however, they lost sight of each other. Lysander, who was intended for the law, removed to chambers in Lincoln's inn, whence, after eating the proper quantity of mutton, he was called to the bar, and went the western circuit....He had studied hard, and rose to some degree of consideration among his compeers; nor was he only eminent as a counsellor....he shone also in the courts of fashion and elegance. He was universally allowed to be the best partner of any member of the circuit; and after two or three revolving seasons, he brought back with him to London the fair daughter of a wealthy banker in the west of England....His patrimonial fortune enabled Lysander to support a family. He took a good house in Queen-square, regularly attended the courts and the circuits, while his beloved Leonora presented him with a babe every year.

Business now flowed in apace, his hours were all employed, and scarcely ever had he a moment to enjoy the company of his wife and children: however, he consoled himself with the reflection that money came as fast as business, and that Heaven certainly had ordained him a few years of severe toil, that he might enjoy the evening of his days in peace and indolence.

It was with Lysander, however, as with most men: the desire of accumulation increased with the power. When he had laid by a sufficient fortune to support his wife and children genteely after his death, and to enable him to live the rest of his days in peace and indolence, he thought he might as well leave them affluent as comfortable; and two more years of application would accomplish this object. He was now a judge, and presided one year upon the northern circuit.

As riches had increased, Lysander had grown luxurious, and had experienced the natural consequences of luxury, gout and corpulency....His medical advisers recommended more exercise than a chariot, and he agreed to ride part of the circuit on horseback, derogatory as it might appear to the dignity of a judge; but he considered that health was worth more than dignity, and that, as his chariot would be on the road, his importance would still be preserved.

One morning, when a cloudless sky gave promise of a day without rain, Lysander sent his carriage forward betimes, and determined to ride the whole stage, which was indeed romantically beautiful. All things, however are uncertain in this best of all possible worlds, and nothing more so than the weather. Some thin vapours dispersed themselves over the sky....they congregated....they became an immense mass of clouds,....and in the middle of a large common, Lysander perceived that they would speedily fall in torrents. What a misfortune for a rich gouty Judge, who had his chariot at some distance on the road, to be overtaken by such a storm in so unsheltered a spot! There was no help for it, however, and the clouds were unpolite enough to keep their promise. A few prelude drops gave the first alarm. Lysander mounted a thick great-coat; but coverings were but as gauze before the fury of the squall: he was presently wet to the skin, and the uncivil sky looked as if it never intended to clear any more, nor was there any town, village, or even habitation within ken.

At length, after riding some time, greatly annoyed by the fickleness of our English climate, but unable to think of any remedy for it, except never venturing on horseback without the chariot at his side, he saw a low white cottage, peeping through the trees, and ordered his servants to search for ward, and obtain a shelter for him there. He soon followed his attendants, and entered the cottage with an air of conscious superiority, pulling off his drenched garments, and demanding some covering while these were dried. The man, woman, and three or four young people bustled about with alacrity:....the judge was soon equipped with some dry habiliments, coarse indeed, but clean and whole; a comfortable fire was made up....the soaked garb of dignity was hung before it; a table was set forth, covered with a clean white cloth, and a loaf of household bread, a pat of butter, a slice of cheese, and a jug of ale set upon it. The civility was extreme, and the welcome undoubted; so Lysander, who in spite of his dignity and his drenching, found himself hungry, drew near to the table, ate some of the bread, thought it excellent, added butter and cheese to it, felt more appetite than he had often experienced at a loaded table, and, in short, made an excellent meal. He then would have sent his servants to fetch his chariot, and some of his own cloaths: but the master of the cottage said, they might also be hungry and bread and cheese would not detain them long.

It was undoubtedly, derogatory to a Judge's dignity to remain longer in a mere cottage than was absolutely necessary, and this was no more; for the room they were in had a brick floor, whitened wall, adorned with pewter and copper utensils, and the table was only of deal: however, Lysander made his dignity for once give way to his host's hospitality, though he felt some few uneasy sensations while his servants were eating in the same room with himself. What, however, was to be done? There was no other room in the mansion, and Lysander was not inhuman: at length, however, the servants had satisfied their appetite....the rain was a little abated, and they departed in quest of the chariot, and their master's dignity.

A little fatigued, and feeling inclined to quiescence by the potency of the ale, Judge Lysander leaned back in his wicker elbow chair, and surveyed the habitation. He had already performed this operation three times, when a delicate fair young woman caught his eye. He was surprised to find not merely beauty, but grace and elegance in a cottage; and it occurred to him that the other human beings that surrounded him, might be as worthy of his regards, as the shining pewter plates that decorated the shelves. He now therefore turned his attention to the young people, found they possessed an air of superior dignity, if it were possible to to apply such a word to the inmates of a cottage, and that their manners were such as would not disgrace a Court. He then looked at the father and mother, who had for some time, (observing that their guest had noticed them so little) been gazing at him, and conversing in a low voice together. In the mother he saw the countenance of discretion, the remains of elegance subdued by station, an illumined eye that bespoke a cultivated mind, and a dress, though suited to a cottage, yet such as displayed the true gentlewoman. His surprise every moment increased! He looked at his host, and in the thin pale man who sat at the opposite side of the fire, he saw....Eumenes!

The discovery was no sooner made, than all the better feelings of Lysander's heart were roused, and he was in an instant in the arms of his friend. The young people gazed in surprise; the eyes of the mother betrayed her emotion; those of Lysander and Eumenes overflowed. As soon as the first transport was over, "I told you," said Eumenes to his wife, "I told you he had a warm, affectionate heart."

"How is it, dear Eumenes," said Lysander, "that I see you here? when we parted in early youth, your prospects were as fair as mine, your patrimony as large, your talents more brilliant....how is it that our fortunes are so different?"

"Fortune, to be sure," replied Eumenes, "has not smiled on me; but instead of splendour, I possess happiness....instead of dignity, virtue."

"They are not, I hope necessarily incompatible," answered Lysander.

"Pardon me, my friend," said Eumenes, "I spoke at the moment with the silly pride of a disappointed man....at least so it must have appeared to you; but believe me, I meant no misanthropic reflections....I doubt not but your happier lot combines all those advantages."

"Of that yourself shall judge, Eumenes," replied the Judge, "for that lot you must consent henceforth to share or it will lose all its advantages to me. I will introduce your wife to my Leonora, your children to mine; they shall renew the friendship of their fathers....Perhaps cement it by still closer ties."

"In this warmth," returned Eumenes, "I recognise my own Lysander....but you shall hear my story!"

"You may remember that at Cambridge I felt a strong bent for the study of physic, and at the very time that you devoted yourself to jurisprudence, I was attending medical lectures, and amusing my leisure hours with poetry. When we separated on leaving Cambridge, we lost sight of each other, not, I am persuaded, from an abatement of attachment on either side, but from the difference of our pursuits. I spent one year at Edinburg, and another at Leyden; and having obtained a sufficient stock of medical knowledge, I fixed myself in a distant town, having first taken out my diploma. I found it difficult to subsist, for the situation of the town was healthy and the apothecary of the place had, from time immemorial, been in possession of the title of Doctor. Either nobody was sick, or nobody chose to send for me; and my patrimony had been very much lessened in the pursuit of medical education.

"This deficiency I had made no doubt of speedily supplying when I began to practise; for I was conscious of knowledge, and I had never been reckoned deficient in benevolence. To amuse my leisure hours, of which I had enough, I wrote verses; but the inhabitants of....had no turn for verses, and I determined to change my quarters. I removed to another town, and succeeded a physician of some eminence, in a great part of his practice fees now flowed in with tolerable rapidity. I was also courted as a companion, and Felicia perused my verses with pleasure....they even made me an interest in her heart, and a lingering hectic complaint, of which I had the happiness to cure her, endeared us both to each other.

"Felicia's father was rich, but I was getting into very good practice. Unfortunately the old gentleman wished some more time to elapse before he gave me his daughter. I told him he was wrong, for that till I could call her my own, I should be less able to attend to business. The truth of this reasoning availed nothing with the obstinate old man, and I lost my time and my practice. I was no longer thought worthy of the hand of Felicia, and it was disposed of to a dealer in sugar.

"Enraged with Felicia, her father, and physic, I gave up my thoughts wholly to the Muses, and produced a play. There was no theatre in...., and I resolved to publish it. While it was in the press, I was once more called in to a patient....This was a crabbed old woman, who had a lovely niece. Now the bright eyes of this certain Emilia soon obliterated all the traces Felicia had left in my heart and the obstinacy of the old lady's complaint gave me time to obtain a share of her favour. At length the old aunt recovered, and Emilia very conveniently fell sick. My visits therefore continued; but the watchful old maid perceived the purpose of my heart, and Emilia was consigned to the care of the apothecary, an old man of sixty, and father of a numerous family. I made my proposals in form and was told Emilia's hand was destined for a cousin of her's then in India and that if it were not, it should never be given to a poet.

"Emilia liked this arrangement no better than I did, and as she could not conceive that she owed implicit obedience to this old aunt, with whom she had not resided above a twelvemonth, and as she knew nothing very favourable of the cousin in India, she agreed to disappoint the old lady's schemes, and give herself to me. As she was two-and-twenty, and her little fortune under no restrictions, this was attended with no difficulty, and Emilia became my wife. The old lady's vengeance, however, deprived me of many of my patients, many more objected to a writing doctor, and a circumstance, in which the preference was given to an ignorant young man, who had neither studied at Edinburg nor at Leyden, disgusted me with physic.

"About this time an uncle of mine died, and left me £5000. We calculated on our future mode of life, and found that the interest of our money would enable us to live without the assistance of medicine. We took a small house in a beautiful village, deposited our fortune in a capital mercantile house, and for many years enjoyed all the comforts of leisure and independence. We brought up our girls to suit any station, and I have two boys fighting for their country. Our income, which some fortunate circumstances had increased, was regularly remitted to us by my mercantile friend: but about four years ago the house broke, and we were involved in the ruin!

"Sick of the world, we retired hither, grieved only for our children, who, however, support the demolition of all their more brilliant prospects with dutiful resignation. For my part," continued Eumenes, "I am satisfied for myself:....I have not long to live; disappointment and uneasiness have preyed upon my health, and a few months will terminate my life. My wife and my children might perhaps live to thank the friendship of Lysander...."

"And they may depend upon it!" exclaimed Lysander; nor did he break his promise. Poor Eumenes was, indeed, soon after consigned to the grave, ending in obscurity a life, whose morning promised more unclouded sunshine. The widow and orphans were removed to Lysander's house, where a more intimate connection took place between the children than had ever subsisted between the parents; and Lysander joyfully became the father of two of the daughters of Eumenes.

Not always do those, who set out in life with equal prospects, enjoy the same good fortune? nor does prosperity universally harden, nor adversity uniformly sour the human heart.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEE.

In this languid season of the natural year, and in this gloomy season of the political one, I am obliged to take more than ordinary pains to ward off the attacks of melancholy, and strive to lose, or at least to mitigate my sense of the tyranny of the American populace, by reading merry books, produced by laughing wit in tranquil times. We read in HORACE, of one, whose characteristic was risus undique querit. This seeker of mirth was a wise man; and while we are restrained in this "prison-house the world," it is the most judicious part to look as smilingly as we can from our grate, and to ridicule and deride the wayward pranks of the many fools and rascals, who pass by. When my ear has been pained through the day, with the awkward music of militia drums, and with the lying principles and broken metaphors of a hot holiday declaimer, I sit up all night to read FIELDING and RABELAIS, and sometimes copy such a pleasant jest as the following.

When I inform you that I was a chief partner in the poetic firm of Della Crusca, Anna Matilda, and that brilliant phalanx of poets, who illustrated the world some time ago, you will probably recollect having read many of my most astonishing and super-excellent performances. Evil days, however, have at length come upon us; we have been partly laughed out of notice, and some of us by perseverance have fairly written our school down. You will probably recollect, that the basis of our poetry was epithet; none of our substantives were allowed to stand by themselves, but were gravely accompanied by a weighty adjective, as you may sometimes see a tiny miss followed in her shopping excursions by a tall footman. Of these epithets I have yet a large collection, which I am disposed to sell by auction, either together, or what perhaps would be preferable, in small lots, for the accommodation of families or individuals. I can assure you, that, although they have often been used, they are as good as new; and I will venture to say, will appear to as much advantage twenty years hence, as now. Although our school may be at present under a cloud, it is probable it may revive at some future period, and our language be again involved in all the charming obscurity of sentimental expletives. Meanwhile, I send you my catalogue, and you may print them in the usual letter; although when we print them in our poems, we generally use SMALL and GREAT CAPITALS, and plenty!! of notes of admiration!!!

A DELLA CRUSCAN.

P. S. I must request your compositor to be very correct in the printing of these articles. It is very difficult to mend the errors of the Della Crusca school. I intend this catalogue as an exercise for children on "words of two or three syllables." I think I hear the mistress saying....come Anna Matilda, cast a glimmering glimpse on this paper, and let me see if you can spell murky hours. Laura Maria, what filmy vapours keep you so long on the pebbly way? Why don't you come to your leafy bed, &c.

POLITE LITERATURE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

I have just been perusing the twenty-fourth number of your paper, and with your leave, will make a few observations on some part of its contents, which I have the vanity to flatter myself will not be found altogether impertinent.

As I have no doubt but the genuine Old-school principles, as well of language, as of morals, politics and philosophy, are meant to be adhered to in this publication, I make no apology for commencing these remarks, by observing, that there occurs a flagrant instance of American corruption in the letter to Samuel Saunter Esquire. I know it may be urged, that this is not imputable to the Editor, as not being the author of that letter....This is granted. But surely, the mere noticing of such a blunder, may have some tendency to prevent similar blemishes in future. The sentence alluded to is this...."I suspect myself of misapprehension, not only because the style of J. D. is not remarkably clear, but because these sentiments are very strange in one, who has read either of the works of any of the authors mentioned." Apply the word "either" to the context, and should we not imagine that Richardson, Le Sage, Smollett and Fielding, were each of them the author of only two works? I am far from wishing to enter into the controversy between J. D. and H. E. but I think an author ought to be very careful to write with great perspicuity and accuracy, before he accuses another of adopting "a style not remarkably clear." I confess I found no difficulty in understanding the language used by J. D.

I now proceed to say a few words on the sentiments respecting Cowley, hazarded by Messrs. Colon and Spondee. I cannot but think them most unmercifully severe. I am no great admirer of Cowley, yet I must confess that, in my opinion, neither his Mistress, his Davideis, his Constantia and Philetus, nor even his Pindaric Hymns, deserves that unbounded censure, which has been so liberally bestowed. I am not in possession of the original Latin of his Books of Plants, but sure I am, that the translation of them by different authors, exhibits some of the genuine beauties of poetry. I am afraid that Messrs. Colon and Spondee, by avoiding his Mistress, and skipping over his Davideis, have deprived themselves of the pleasure which the perusal of many an exquisite poetical morceau contained in these two works, would have afforded. Have they, indeed, yet to become acquainted with The Spring, The Change, The Inconstant, Her Name, and The Waiting-Maid, from the Mistress, or the following passages from the Davideis?

But now the early birds began to call
 The morning forth; uprose the sun and Saul:
 Both, as men thought, rose fresh from sweet repose,
 But both, alas! from restless labour rose:
 For in Saul's breast, envy, the toilsome sin,
 Had, all that night, active and tyrannous been;
 She expell'd all forms of kindness, virtue, grace,
 Of the past day no footsteps left, or trace;
 The new-blown sparks of his old rage appear,
 Nor could his love dwell longer with his fear.
 So near a storm wise David would not stay,
 Nor trust the glittering of a faithless day.
 He saw the sun call in his beams apace,
 And angry clouds march up into their place.
 The sea itself smooths his brow awhile,
 Flattering the greedy merchant with a smile;
 But he, whose shipwreck'd bark it drank before,
 Sees the deceit, and knows it would have more....
 Such is the sea, and such was Saul....
 But Jonathan his son, and only good,
 Was gentle as fair Jordan's useful flood;
 Whose innocent stream, as it in silence goes,
 Fresh honours and a sudden spring bestows,
 On both its banks, to every flower and tree;
 The manner how lies hid, th' effect we see.
 But more than all, more than himself he lov'd
 The man whose worth his father's hatred mov'd.
 For when the noble youth at Damnair stood,
 Adorn'd with sweat, and painted gay with blood,
 Jonathan pierced him through with greedy eye,
 And understood the future majesty,
 Then destin'd in the glories of his look.
 He saw, and straight was with amazement strook,
 To see the strength, the feature and the grace
 Of his young limbs; he saw his comely face,
 Where love and reverence so mingled were;
 And head, already crown'd with golden hair.
 He saw what mildness his bold spirit did tame,
 Gentler than light, yet powerful as a flame;
 He saw his valour by their safety prov'd
 He saw all this, and as he saw he lov'd.

DAVIDEIS, L. 2. c. 1. et seq.

Awake, awake, my lyre!
 And tell thy silent master's humble tale,
 In sounds that may prevail;
 Sounds that gentle thoughts inspire;
 Though so exalted she,
 And I so lowly be,
 Tell her such different notes make all thy harmony.

Hark! how the strings awake!
 And though the moving hand approach not near,
 Themselves with awful fear,
 A kind of numerous trembling make.
 Now all thy forces try,
 Now all thy charms apply,
 Revenge upon her ear the conquests of her eye.

Weak lyre! thy virtue, sure,
 Is useless here, since thou art only found
 To cure, but not to wound;
 And she, to wound, but not to cure.
 Too weak, too, wilt thou prove
 My passion to remove;
 Physic to other ills, thou'rt nourishment to love.

Sleep, sleep, again my lyre!
 For thou can'st never tell thy humble tale,
 In sounds, that will prevail,
 Nor gentle thoughts in her inspire;
 All thy vain mirth lay by,
 Bid thy strings silent lie;
 Sleep, sleep again, my lyre! and let thy master die.

DAVIDEIS, L. 3, ad finem.

I think no real judge of poetry could deny the beauty of the passages thus quoted and alluded to, though it must be confessed that they partake, in common with all Cowley's works, of his peculiar kind of quibble and conceit.

The White-Lily, the Poppy and the Rose; Life and Fame, and the Extacy, will at least plead some extenuation, at the bar of candid criticism, for the Books of Plants, and the Pindaric Odes. Even in the juvenile poem of Constantia and Philetus much might be found to praise. But, having already extended my observations, beyond the limits, which I at first prescribed to myself, I shall conclude, without particularly specifying what passages have struck me as most beautiful in this piece, by thanking these critical gentlemen for calling my attention to an author, who, though very unequal, has often afforded me real gratification.

And now permit me to introduce to your acquaintance a few lines from my own shop, (to use the allusion of Messrs. Colon & co.) which you are welcome to treat as you think proper.

HORACE, ODE 38, BOOK 1, TRANSLATED.

Boy, this Persian pomp disgusts me,
 Gaudy garlands cease to braid,
 Seek not where the blushing rose-bud
 Lingers in th' autumnal shade.

Simple wreaths of modest myrtle
 Best become thy brows and mine,
 Thee the laughing nectar serving,
 Me carousing, 'neath the vine.

REVIEW.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

"An Address to the Members of the Massachusetts Charitable Fire Society, at their annual meeting, May 28, 1802. By John Quincy Adams." Boston, printed by Russel and Cutler, 1802. 8vo. pp. 25.

A benevolent institution to relieve those, whom a destructive element often reduces to penury, has been long established in the capital of New-England, and by the annual custom of the society, it is not only auxiliary to alms giving, but to eloquence.

In modern times, holiday orations are so trite in their topics, or so feeble in their structure, that, like most ephemeral productions, they glide to the tomb of forgetfulness, with little more notice, than the ironical regret of the poet

"These are....ah no! these were....the Gazetteers."

But, the performance before us, is of a more splendid character, and will enjoy a more honourable destiny. Though necessarily local, and though its author was cramped by the triteness of his theme, yet, it is vivified and decorated by that charming power of genius, which can always

....."What is dark illumine,
 "What is low raise and support."

It is the vigorous and graceful off-spring of a mind, stored with the aphorisms of wisdom, and imbued with a deep tinct of classical literature. The style is nervous and rhetorical. The sentiments are liberal and manly, and the whole is a favourable specimen of the talents and catholicism of a sensible and feeling writer.

The orator, alluding to the late conflagrations, which have defaced his natal town, and to the death of an infant, who perished miserably in the flames, employs the following animated apostrophe, which is coloured with the glowing pencil of Rousseau.

What these perils are, the experience of the last winter has depicted in colours, which the pencil of description could only dilute and weaken. The treasures of commercial opulence, the shelter of honest industry, the solemn temple of Almighty God, have alternately fallen within the ruffian grasp of insatiate ruin. Would to heaven this were the worst!....Daughters of the land! If virtuous sensibility could assume a form, and appear in person here, she would only be the loveliest of women: If tenderness has a throne of glory upon earth, it is in the heart of a mother....Lovely women! tender mothers! will you forgive me, for renewing the pang, which thrilled in your bosoms, when the destroying angel laid his hand upon the helpless innocence of infancy? Yes! the tear that steals from your eyes, is a tear of compassion, and not of bitterness; it is the pledge that henceforth your irresistible influence will unite, with that of all our public spirited citizens, to redeem the future generations from this impending sword of destruction.

In pages 6, and 7, the following remarks announce, that the orator is not led astray, by the meteors of imposing novelty.

"One of your great and laudable purposes is that of stimulating genius, to useful discoveries tending to secure the lives and property of our fellow men from destruction by fire. But the discoveries of genius are seldom the result of external stimulus: genius is of an eccentric character; of a restive temper; disdainful of guidance or controul, he resists all influence from without; he deserts every path not traced by himself. Nor is it your design to ask of genius, assistance, which even he is incompetent to afford. In vain would genius stand upon the beach and forbid the waves of ocean to approach his feet: In vain would he bid the flowers of spring to bloom on Zembla's eternal snows: In vain would he command golden harvests to smile on Zara's scorching sands: In vain would he resist or evade the laws of nature, and of nature's God.... All his attempts to render permanent what they have proclaimed perishable are but the memorials of his impotence. Let us then not be sanguine to indulge hopes of obtaining much relief from the discoveries of genius. It is by reiterating with unwearied hand, the exhibition of truths long known but not sufficiently felt, by redoubling line upon line by crowding precept upon precept, by wearing down the garb persuasion to the very tatters of opportunity, that your association will most effectually contribute to arrest the progress of desolation, and disarm the fury of the element. If we spurn the long tried, faithful shield of prudence, with what authority can we call upon genius for new devices to supply its place? Is it not like the Countryman in the Fable, who appeals for aid to Hercules, when he should apply his own shoulder to the wheel? Alas! my friends, we have here less occasion for the inventive faculties of genius, than for the warning voice of experience. We want firmness rather than fancy, discretion rather than discovery, stubborn prescience in demonstrated right, rather than eager search of ingenious novelty."

The following eloquent peroration, abundantly evinces, that Mr. ADAMS has not disdained to imbibe from the classic fountain.

"My countrymen! When memory turns a retrospective eye upon the days that are past, how short is the space, before she meets the venerable forms of a Clarke, a Belknap, and a Minot! When she returns and searches with anxious look, once more to find them in the ranks, among the living friends of science, of virtue and of man, she seeks in vain! They are here no more! Where can we look for support under such reiterated and heavy blows, but to the pillars of stoic fortitude? Where can we hope for comfort under such great and multiplied bereavements, but in the arms of christian resignation? It is not for man to question or scrutinize the dispensations of his Maker. Unavailing lamentation is inconsistent with the dignity of our nature: It is incompatible with the duties of our religion....Sainted spirits of our absent friends!...If from the abodes of blessedness, the spirits of the just, made perfect, are permitted to look down upon this dreary scene of human life, and to influence the conduct of their former partners of mortality, call us away from the contemplation of our loss, by alluring us to the imitation of your virtues! As the Grecian sculptor proposed by the chissel to convert Mount Athos into the statue of a mortal hero, may the holy mountain of our nation and country bear throughout its extent the lineaments of your immortal minds? If we have not yet learnt to preserve the features and honour the memory of departed excellence in monumental marble, may your example by its operation upon the hearts of the rising generation, erect the fabric of your fame on a basis stronger than of earth; on foundations more durable than the everlasting hills! May we learn of you to combine in happy union, sincere devotion with enlightened philosophy; the fervid love of freedom with the chastened discipline of good order; true christian meekness of spirit with intrepid boldness in the cause of truth; mild compassion for the guilty with inflexible opposition to guilt; glowing patriotism with universal philanthropy! So shall some emanations of your exalted characters remain to latest time on earth! So shall the kindly radiance of your memory here point the way to your cloudless effulgence in the skies!"

The motto, which the author has most happily applied, is derived from the Annus Mirabilis of DRYDEN, a poem which will be always admired, for its double excellence of strength and splendour.

"Methinks already from this chemic flame,
I see a city of more precious mold;
Rich as the town which gives the Indies name,
With silver pav'd, and all divine with gold.
DRYDEN'S Annus Mirabilis."

On the whole, whether this address is viewed as an animated exhortation against improvidence, respecting one of the most merciless of the elements, or as a just eulogy of the amiable MINOT, or as a specimen of chaste and classical eloquence, unblemished by the metricious affectation of the herd of holiday harranguers, we have no hesitation in declaring, that we think it not only deserves the attention of the inhabitants of Boston, but of men of letters at large.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

A valued friend, who has often assisted and cheered the Editor in his course, is affectionately addressed in the following lines from the generous and classic GIFFORD, and the Editor hopes that in some pause of judicial care, his friend will forget for a moment the eloquence of the forum, and turn his "bright fantastic eye" to every willing muse.

.....You too, whole Menander, who combine,
With his pure language and his flowing line,
The soul of comedy, may steal an hour
From the fond chase of still escaping power,
The poet and the sage again unite,
And sweetly blend instruction with delight.

The Life of BOILEAU, which we are presenting to the public, is no stale scrap of biography. It is a recent composition from the polished pen of the Abbé Levisac, one of the politest scholars among the French emigrants in London. To a literary friend the Editor is indebted for a translation faithful to the sense, and easy to the ear.

We wonder how the love-sick "Damon," with such a "deep hole through his heart," could sit up long enough to write his "Complaint to his mistress". He is fairly stab'd, as master Shakspeare saith, with a white wench's black eye. Hudibras has long since described his case.

.....His soul
Is burnt in his belly to a coal.

He is one of those, who, according to the sarcastic GIFFORD.

.....die,
Thrill'd by the liquid peril of an eye.
Gasp....at a recollection, and drop down
At the long streamy lightning....of a frown.

As we look upon him to be defunct, and as his muse is as dead as he, to the consideration of his executors we recommend Potter's field, rather than the Port Folio, as the repository for Damon and his ditties.

Our highly esteemed correspondent, N, we hope, will write frequently. His choice of an article from the Memoirs of baron Pollnitz, demonstrates his taste, and his translation is an agreeable specimen of his talents.

The hint, respecting Norris's Sermon, shall be regarded.

In our copy of Mr. Gifford's exquisite imitation of HORACE, in No. 23 of this paper, a strange hallucination in the text escaped us. A whole line was omitted. We beg pardon of Mr. Gifford for distorting a limb of his charming child of poetry, and we thank our critical correspondent for indicating this blemish.

The Editor is delighted to have an opportunity to pay a just tribute to the genius and various literature of the author of the Oration, lately delivered in Boston, before the Massachusetts Charitable Fire Society. The "Review" was promptly prepared, and unavoidably delayed. To a friend and to a man of letters, the Editor has a right to use the following language, which, though fervid poetry, is honest truth.

"I long have seen thy merits, long have lov'd,
Yet lov'd in silence, lest the rout should say
Too partial friendship tun'd the appiausive lay;
Now, now, that all conspire thy name to raise,
May join the shout of UNSUSPECTED PRAISE."

W. GIFFORD.

"ASMODEO" is one of the most agreeable of our correspondents. The editor of the Walpole paper, who has a good taste in polite literature, declares, that the burlesque of the modern opera airs, "where Schulkill o'er his rocky bed roars," &c. bids fair to be one of our staple songs.

The "Imitation of the fourth Satire of Boileau" is strong and bitter as Tewksbury mustard. It will appear in the fulness of time; but we must retrench and modify a little, so as not to offend their worship and their reverences. We wish that our correspondent would frequently communicate a share of his poetical stock. We regret our blunder, and assure him that it was unwittingly committed.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

The uncertainty of events to come, and the total darkness of mankind, with respect to futurity, have been the darling themes of ancient and of modern declaimers. An Hibernian gentleman was lately complaining that he had read yesterday's papers, and to-day's papers, but he could never get sight of to-morrow's paper.

Mr. Lewis is said to be manufacturing another shocking tragedy. We hope this will not interrupt his long expected pantomime, called Harlequin death. We understand the hospital scene, and the inside of the graves, to be two of the most charming spectacles ever offered to the public, and the coffin and death-bed scenes are reported as truly comical. The public must be anxious for a performance in which they will be so delightfully frightened and so horribly entertained. [M. Post.

One would scarcely wish for a more glittering reputation, than that which has been bestowed upon an emigrant prince, by an eloquent statesman.

He is eloquent, lively, engaging in the highest degree; of a decided character, full of energy and activity. In a word, a brave, honourable and accomplished cavalier.

In the "New-York Evening Post," a gazette, which we "delight to honour," there appeared sometime since, a parody of Gray's elegy, written in a country church yard. Of this parody it is nought but justice to declare, that a sharper satire, in purer phrase, or with more sparkling wit, has not yet appeared, at the expense of Mr. Jefferson and African philosophy. The Port Folio, is so crouded with literary miscellany, that we are often hindered from copying from the leading papers, many articles of unquestionable merit, which allude to the "transient topic of the times." Our silence is by no means a proof of indifference or contempt. We hope to find opportunity to preserve many fugitive papers, which appear in an ephemeral form.

SERMONS OF THE PRESIDENT OF PRINCETON COLLEGE.

In one of the latest numbers of "The British Critic," we are much pleased to read the following candid criticism upon the discourses of one of the most eloquent of our Divines.

"Sermons on various subjects, by Samuel Stanhope Smith, D. D. President of the College of New-Jersey, in America. 8vo. 400 pp. 7s. 6d. Mawman, 1801.

"The following Sermons," says a short advertisement, "were transmitted by the author, with a view of ascertaining how far his mode of thinking and writing might be acceptable to the people of the United Kingdoms of Great-Britain." We doubt not, that they will be found acceptable to many in this country. The style is lively and vigorous. The remonstrances of the author against infidels and corrupt philosophy, are pointed and strong, and many of his observations are recommended also by novelty. That the writer admires and copies the manner of the French preachers, of eminence, would have been perceived, without his confession of it; but this will be an additional recommendation, to those who condemn the discourses of the English pulpit in general, for want of animation.

The following very striking prayer which concludes the eight discourse, will perhaps as strongly characterize the writer, as a longer extract. "Oh God! in thy mercy arrest the profligacy of this age! Make thy word quick and powerful! Let it penetrate, with deep and effectual conviction, the conscience of secure guilt, and destroy those deceitful maxims, which the heads of sinners framed only to justify their crimes! Let it triumph over the pernicious principles of a false philosophy the offspring of our degenerate manners. Amen."

To this prayer, we also most earnestly repeat Amen: and, for the sake of this, and many other good passages, we strongly recommend the volume.

The conductors of "The Balance," a spirited paper, published at Hudson, in the following manly manner, announce their partiality and their pride. We are never more gratified than to have an opportunity to re-echo the bold tones of those, who appear to have a just scorn for that most ignominious of all possible thralldom, a SERVITUDE TO THE POPULACE. We rejoice that some of our public papers, openly, constantly, clearly and decisively express honest truth in explicit language; and we lament that there are so many, which appear to have no other object than to retail the nauseous stuff of political mountebanks, to flatter the prejudices, and foster the delusions of the people, to puff up changeling imbecility with intoxicating fumes and by every ingenious and vile art to stifle the voice of experience and suffocate genius and virtue.

Amidst the strife of contending parties the editors have taken a firm and independent ground. They have pledged themselves to no "sect." They are awed by no threats....they are won by no flattery. They are the sincere advocates of principles....not the pliant tools of men. Faithfully adhering to TRUTH, and studying to be useful, they rely on the good sense and candour of the public for support....and when they are called upon to decide whether they will sacrifice their opinions, or relinquish their business, they will, without hesitation, choose the latter....None but a fool would place himself precisely between the fires of two contending armies; and none but a knave would desert his side, even if threatened with defeat.

One tear of sorrow, when she died,
Her life had made so many flow,
That all the briny fount was dried.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

[I was yesterday sympathizing with a friend, at the fate of poor captain Jack, alias Quashee, who was unfortunately hung at Winton, North-Carolina, only for an "intention to rise, and commence a general massacre of the white inhabitants." My friend told me, that, among the accomplishments he was universally known to possess, his poetical talents had not been much noticed; that many of his fugitive pieces possessed considerable merit, and he hoped they would be collected and published by the democratic society, of which he (poor fellow!) had been a member; in proof of this, he produced from his pocket the following copy of admirable verses, which I requested, and obtained permission to send you. The only liberty I have suffered myself to take, is to place the line of Persius at its head, which I have no doubt Quashee would have approved of, on its being explained to him, for, in all probability, his knowledge of the languages did not extend beyond that of the Gold Coast, and a little English. The orthography I have not dared to alter, as, I think, by reducing it to rule, it would have lost much of its inimitable wildness and simplicity.

Dat all mans free alike are born;
Den tell me, why should Quashee stay,
To tend de cow and hoe de corn?
Huzza for massa Jefferson!

And if all mans alike be free,
Why should de one, more dan his broder,
Hab house and corn? for poor Quashee
No hab de one, no hab de oder.
Huzza, &c.

And why should one hab de white wife,
And me hab only Quangeroo?
Me no see reason for me life!
No! Quashee hab de white wife too.

Huzza for us den! we de boys
To rob and steal, and burn and kill;
Huzza! me say, and make de noise!
Huzza for Quashee! Quashee will
Huzza for massa Jefferson!

STANZAS WRITTEN BY MOON-LIGHT.

The full orb'd moon o'er the blue arch of heaven
Serenely sails;
Breathes through the whispering groves the breath of even,
In cooling gales.
As on the planetary worlds I gaze,
Which gild the pole,
Scenes of past times, and deeds of other days
Steal o'er my soul.

England's white cliffs in fancy's visions shine,
Beetling the main,
Where my young muse, at Nature's lovely shrine,
Pour'd her first strain.

Ah! scenes below'd, which from my pensive breast
Foroe the warm sigh.

When shall I from my weary wanderings rest
Beneath your sky?

Oh! when shall I retrace my native plain
And favourite grove?

When shall my throbbing bosom greet again
The friends I love?

Fair is Columbia's land, where Nature pours
Her richest stores;

Fair as the laughing vales and genial bowers
On Albion's shores;

Yet Fancy ever loves the spot to trace,
With fond delight.

When wing'd with rapture, life's young moments flew,
Unstain'd and bright.

Where many a warm affection round the heart
Entwin'd its chain.

Kind friendship, candid pity's generous part,
And love's sweet pain....

Shine, then, thou full orb'd moon, and breathe, soft gale

Along the grove;
And as I wander o'er the silvery vale,
In pensive musings oft shall memory hail
The distant scenes, and absent friends I love.

[The following rustic dialogue, the jeux d'esprit of a youthful American, and imitative of the classical colloquy between Lydia and Horace, is easy and humorous.

JONATHAN.

While I was lov'd by sweet Jemima,
How, like a whirligig, flew time;
But now some rival steals my rest,
To 'Mima's bosom gently prest.

JEMIMA.

While I alone claim'd all your care,
And Chlo' than 'Mima was less fair,
Who then such bliss as mine could prove?
Or equal me in warmth of love?

JONATHAN.

The silken chains of Chlo' I wear;
Her voice and lute are soft as air;
For her I live, and gladly I,
Contented, for her sake would die.

JEMIMA.

Teddy, fond youth, well known to fame,
Glow with a lover's purest flame;
So warm the heart he gives for mine,
For him I life would twice resign.

JONATHAN.

But 'Mima, if we both should wish
Again in love's horse-pond to fish;
Should I reject Chlo's dazzling charms,
And press thee glowing in my arms.

JEMIMA.

Though Teddy thee excell'd as far,
As Sol the glimm'ring of a star;
Though beauty's form should make thee rove
To taste the sweets of various love,
True, as the needle to the pole,
Thou should'st attract Jemima's soul.

SELECTED POETRY.

[They, who have laughed at the merry story of "Rebecca Strype," lately published in the Port Folio, will smile at the following, which seems to be of the same family of merriment.]

A SHORT STORY.

Jack Dash, in town a first-rate beau,
Some time ago,
For near a month had never ventur'd out;
'Twas wise; for Jack was poor; and what bespoke it
Was, that he had no money in his pocket;

And therefore was not quite prepar'd to meet
A friend of his, who slyly in the street,
To tap him on the shoulder, lurk'd about.

A doctor's wife, hard by;
Who much delighted in his company,
For Jack to please the ladies had the skill,
Began to think him ill;
So sent her servant, Thomas, to assure him
That if by fell disease he was assail'd,
And would but freely tell her what he ail'd, She'd get some draughts that very soon should cure him.

The message hearing, thus replied young Dash....
Friend Tom, then tell your mistress I will thank her,
As my disorder's only....want of cash,
To let the drafts be....on her husband's banker.

For many unsuccessful years,
At Cynthia's feet I lay,
Bathing them often with my tears,
I sigh'd, but durst not pray.

No prostrate wretch, before the shrine
Of some lov'd saint above,
E'er thought his goddess so divine,
Or paid more awful love.

Still the disdainful nymph look'd down
With coy insulting pride;
Receiv'd my passion with a frown,
Or turn'd her head aside.

Then Cupid whispered in my ear,
"Use more prevailing charms,
"You modest, whining fool, draw near,
"And clasp her in your arms.

"With eager kisses tempt the maid,
"From Cynthia's feet depart,
"The lips he briskly must invade,
"That would possess the heart."

With that I shook off all the slave,
My better fortunes tried;
When Cynthia in a moment gave
What she for years denied.

[An elegant modern poet, in the following Impromptu, in allusion to some partnership in a lottery ticket, has thus jeered Mrs. ... who is a beautiful, but a very large woman.]

In wedlock a species of lottery lies,
Where in blanks and in prizes we deal,
But how comes it that you, such a capital prize,
Should so long have remain'd in the wheel?

If ever, by Fortune's indulgent decree,
To me such a ticket should roll,
A sixteenth, heaven knows, were sufficient for me,
For what could I do with the whole?

IMPROMPTU

ON TWO VARNISHED BEAUTIES.

In either face such mad'ning beauties dwelt,
That wild-ey'd rapture scarcely knew restraint;
But now in pity for the pang I felt,
The tender creatures cover them with paint.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXVI.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

Quodcumque ostendis, mihi sic, incredulus odi.
HORACE.

MR. SAUNTER,

When the comparative merit of the works of the author of Charles Grandison &c. was formerly considered, the object was to ascertain, or rather to enquire, whether his plan, was more likely to have a beneficial effect upon the taste and morals of society, than the plan of others who did not aim like that author to exhibit highfinished models of moral excellence.

These observations I see have attracted the attention of a correspondent, who I find is a warm admirer of Richardson; the animadversions, he has made relative to this inquiry, deserve some reply.

It was before predicated, and without much apprehension of contradiction, that some of the heroes of this author, were exhibited in a character, above or beyond what any observation, on human life or human conduct could recognize as a transcript.

This was indeed admitted by your respectable friend, for he justified the excess of perfection which the picture exhibits, by arguing that this ought not to damp the desire of imitating though it cannot equal; for even (says he,) the surest way of becoming a Jones was to aim at being a Grandison....the only difference between Mr. Griffin and me, was, that he thought the representation of those rendered most to promote moral improvement and useful instruction, and I thought they did not.

But your correspondent H. E. after some caveats respecting want of comprehending the former remarks &c. contends for the fidelity of the portraits to prototypes in life; and vouches for the accuracy, by assuring us of his individual reminiscence which realized the image in his own mind, and banished every doubt of want of probability: I can only congratulate him on his intellectual perspicacity, without pretending even to claim the honour of participation.

But because I have applied the epithet "faultless monsters," to some of Richardson's portraits, your correspondent asks whether this is meant to extend to all....the answer is, by no means;...the converse of the proposition was comprehended, and even considered an object of animadversion. Richardson's Lovelace is a monster of depravity, even so much so, that Dr. Johnson thinks it necessary to discriminate between him and Rowe's Lothario; while Dr. Beattie disputes the moral tendency of the representation of the character altogether. Of his Pamela I can only say that I met with it in French when I was young, that I read it attentively, and that I conceived it even then to be very outre; and my latter perusal has not led me to consider it as exemplifying any thing like reality. A query may arise here whether it is to the credit or discredit of this author, that the French are very fond of his works? It will not be denied that he treads in the path in which many of their authors of fictitious history excel; viz. in the delineation of a nicety and subtlety of feeling; in the entanglements of delicacy, which are interwoven with the characters and conduct of many of their most celebrated novels; nay, I know not how your correspondent can consistently withhold extending his approbation to Rousseau, whose novels for many properties in which Richardson excels (and chiefly in these) stands highly eminent say for tenderness of sentiment, energy of passion, and power of eloquence; but notwithstanding even this, I do not consider Rousseau, as a good moral instructor.

Your correspondent has endeavoured to shew that I cannot have perused attentively, because I do not appreciate as he does, the character of Richardson's writings, or of Fieldings. It is true I did not attempt to apply arithmetical or longinmetrical calculations to ascertain the comparative altitude or extent, (if such calculations, had they been practicable, had been applicable) of Richardson and Fielding's moral discernment.

I took it for granted, that he who thinks and writes reasonably, writes morally and usefully; nor did I consider, that the metaphysical inquiry's of sounding the heart for the motives of action, or analyzing the mind on purpose to unfold the seminal principles of virtue; even if these researches had been practicable, would have solved our inquiry; for the question still recurs, whether we are more likely to be benefited by the perusal of characteristical novels, that are formed upon nature and upon life....or by studying those who depart from this plan, and in reliance on their conceptions of moral perfection exhibit their heroes as models for imitation, or conversely as monsters of deformity to startle the imagination. Will any one say that this does not appear obviously to be the purpose of Richardson in his most admired performances? and to realize this ideal perfection, is not probability violated and life misrepresented? It was observed of the ancient schools of declamation, "that the more diligently they were frequented, the more was the student disqualified for the world, because he found nothing there he should ever meet in any other place;" may not the same remark apply to the author and to almost all the tribe of his imitators, for his example has had wide influence in this way; indeed I have read a literary performance of considerable merit lately, wherein the author warmly depreciates the unrestricted perusal of Richardson's novels....because in a class of young females of his acquaintance, their conversation and letters, which they were continually transmitting to each other; were nothing but a studied attempt to imitate the sentimental idioms &c. of Clarissa Harlow.

Is there then no danger in this enthusiasm of sentiment, of the substitution of certain feelings in place of real practical duties? of forming wrong ideas of virtue, as well as false estimates of happiness?

But Sir, I think Clarissa Harlow an unfit model for imitation, not only because her character is too highly drawn, but because of the "war of duties," which her admirers are but too apt to misapprehend, merely because she is otherwise held up as a model; and the abilities of the author in pursuance of his chief plan, are apt to induce his readers to overlook too much, the smaller incidents; but I do not think these observations apply to Fielding's characters, for I do not remember any of them as exhibited with more than human virtue, and do not seem to be designed or taken for models.

But your correspondent in apparent surprize at my opinions and conclusions, seems to inquire how I read and how I examined? there is doubtless subtlety in the question? happily I do not stand alone in opinion, and since it does not admit of a better solution, I can only say that I must rely on my own perceptions, nor can I change my opinion until stronger impressions shall be made.

Your correspondent H. E. who appears to have read much, and with attention, and who has the faculty of expressing his ideas very clearly, endeavours to investigate the character of Fielding's and Smollett's writings in connections with their taste, and moral discernment; with their attainments I have nothing to do. It is not surmised that they wrote but with a moral purpose, and I am far from denying this motive to Richardson; nay, he seems to have been eminently qualified to instruct, but his genius brooding over the embryo of ideal perfection which his mind conceived;....lead him to people his novels with such characters as were never seen....makes them converse in a language, which was never heard; and sometimes upon topics which will never arise in the commerce of mankind....this being admitted, will it be wrong to infer, that such performances are more calculated to delight than to improve, exclusive of the objection that they inculcate precepts, and hold forth examples of a refinement, that virtue does not require, and honesty is at least as well without.

We need not be told of the excellence of Richardson's pencil, this we are not all disposed to deny. Variety, vividness and minuteness, belong to his portraiture....But is not Shakspeare's Caliban a picture vivid as well as minute? and we cannot but be pleased with the delineation, but it cannot any more than some of Richardson's be called a faithful portrait, because there is no prototype in life.

When I appeal to and rely on my own experience, and H. E. owns we ought not to admit of any other decision, I do avow that I receive more useful information from the perusal of the works of a Le Sage, a Fielding, a Miss Burney, and a Dr. Moore, than from this author, and in support of which I offer the above rather as deductions than arguments, and to which some of your readers may be inclined to assent.

Your correspondent, in his last paragraph, suffers his enthusiasm for his favourite author, to sparkle too much when he would permit the extinction of all other works of fictitious history; if their co-existence should become incompatible with that of Richardson's. As enthusiasm is an uncertain and ambiguous virtue, we ought to restrain it within due bounds, lest it should swell too high, fill the whole capacity of the soul, and leave us less room for the love of truth.

CHAP. XXVI.

In continuation....Proposal of the state of Virginia, for an amendment of the constitution....Result of the historical sketch.

The year 1796 was further remarkable on account of certain proposals for an alteration of the constitution, which the state of Virginia made to her confederate sister states....Virginia is of all the states, the one, most dissatisfied with the English commercial treaty. For the Virginian merchants have very little credit in England, and must therefore draw their goods, at second hand, chiefly from Baltimore, without being able themselves to import them. This is the principal cause of the growth of Baltimore, which, as that city is not situated on a river, would without this circumstance, be an effect without an adequate cause. Virginia therefore proposed. 1. That the power of ratifying treaties whether commercial or political, should be extended to the house of representatives, in concurrence with the senate. 2. That the senators should be chosen for three instead of six years, so that one third of the senate of the United States, might be elected every year. 3. That the power of trying impeachments should be taken from the senate, and given to the supreme court of the United States, so that the senators might no longer be judges in their own cause, in case they should be impeached for traitorous negotiations with foreign powers. These alterations of the constitution were rejected by all the state legislatures north of the Potomac, but was adopted by all the southern states except North-Carolina, where they were rejected by a feeble majority. The Potomac forms a political as well as a natural dividing line. To the southward of this river other political principles, other manners prevail, and in one word a different people dwell, than to the northward. The circumstances dangerous to the duration of the American union, arising from this, induced president Washington in his address to draw the attention of the American people to the reciprocal usefulness of the south and of the north to each other, and to urge most forcibly upon the hearts of both these divisions their continuance of the union.

From this sketch of the history of the United States to the present day, it appears in my opinion clear, that America has had the good fortune to possess great men, at the head of whom stands Washington, but not that the Americans are a wise and virtuous people, who trample under foot all personal interest, whenever the public good requires it; not a people who in the struggle for freedom by resolving to conquer or to perish, unfolded gigantic powers: but a people carefully attentive first, to their private interest, and afterwards attached to the public interest, as much as to other concerns, while it stands in need of no sacrifices; a people who sold at an high price their services to their distressed country, and soldiers of liberty who very often turned their backs before the hireling slaves of England and Hesse. As I have drawn from the letters of general Washington no inferences but such as necessarily flow from the premises, and have barely made the facts therein related speak for themselves, those who can make any objection to this must be very strongly possessed of the Americo-mania. The Americans therefore appear in their history, exactly such as from reasoning a priori concerning their origin, and the organization of their country, we should expect to find them.

CHAPTER XXVII.

The laws in the United States, are the English laws, modified by acts of the assemblies....Every state has its separate civil and criminal code; which gothic confusion, Congress has never removed, though they might have done it....Excellency of the Pennsylvania criminal code, as reformed by Franklin and Caleb Lowmes.

Their laws might be considered as proofs of their national wisdom if it were not notorious that they are copied from the English. Their lawyers constantly quote the English laws as authorities. Their law students, who learn their trade, from some lawyer of reputation, whom they pay for it, as they have no universities at all, unless the schools at Princeton, New-Haven and elsewhere be considered as such, study the English laws, upon which the acts of the state legislatures or assemblies are founded. These assemblies occasion a diversity of laws in the different states, for the congress has not hitherto interfered in this case, and indeed by the constitution ought not to interfere, though by virtue of the clause that "the laws of the congress shall be the supreme law of the land, throughout the union," their power is competent to any thing. Nor is any controul over a supreme legislative power conceivable, as every one who has at all studied the theory of politics will readily acknowledge. Indeed the subject of national education, is not expressly committed to congress, and yet Washington, who must probably know how far the powers of congress extend, proposed in his speech at the opening of the session, on the seventh of December 1796 the establishment of a national university.

Every state, however, now has its separate laws. In New-Jersey, theft to a considerable amount, is punished by hanging. In Pennsylvania, it is not. In this last state the criminal code is excellent, and the bloody English code is softened by the philosophy of the age; but who can here avoid perceiving the genius of a Franklin? William Penn himself had made humane laws, and Caleb Lowmes, a quaker has I believe in this respect had great merit. A great man, like Franklin, must in a country where opinions are freely expressed, always have great influence, and consequently these wholesome laws, testify the wisdom of Franklin, and not the wisdom of the nation.

The other laws are not however improved in the same degree with the criminal code, as the law respecting bankruptcy, which I have already mentioned, and which may be called a public sanction to theft, abundantly proves. Besides which, there are multitudes of other absurd laws. For instance, when the tenant of chambers in the second story cannot pay his rent, the person who lives in the rooms beneath, must pay it for him; in like manner, when one of several tenants in an house disappears, carrying away with him his furniture, in order to be relieved from the payment of his rent, the remaining tenant or tenants must pay for the fugitive....The argument against them is "you must look to it, why did you suffer him to run away?" I was further assured, that the owner of a dog, may kill upon the spot, a man who kills in his presence his dog; but then the dog must wear on his neck a collar with the name of his owner. Yet others, when I inquired whether this was a fact or not, answered me so equivocally that I do not certainly know how the truth in this case is. The laws do not in the smallest degree strengthen the subordination of children to their parents, but on the contrary take them under their protection against parental chastisement. Perhaps a medium between the Roman severity (for among the Romans, the father had the power of life and death over his children) and so great a loosening of family ties, would be best adapted to our times. In so corrupt an age as ours, so unbounded a power cannot be intrusted to fathers; but in all republics family subordination has been in exact proportion to the public liberty. A husband is likewise in Pennsylvania severely punished, if his wife accuse him barely of threatening to strike her; this courteous law, is said to have originated with the quakers. The tenant of an house may kill any one who disturbs him in it, for example, by breaking down the windows in it. This deserves praise and is inherited from England, where it was introduced from ancient Germany. In Virginia, no lands can be attached by creditors to answer for debts. The reason of this is, because the debtors make the laws, and possess nothing but lands. If any one affirms that another owes him a certain sum, and swears to it, that is kisses the bible, and can purchase two witnesses who will kiss the bible to testify the same thing, the other is compelled to pay the money. Solemn as this asseveration upon oath, by kissing the holy scriptures may be to conscientious persons, of refined moral sentiments, it makes less impression upon the great sensual multitudes, and must thus occasion a great number of perjuries in America, as in truth, according to all I have heard they are extremely frequent.

The praise worthy part of the laws, together with much that deserves censure was inherited from England; Franklin with a true philosophic and philanthropic spirit improved them; the American people contributed very little thereto.

BIOGRAPHY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN ESSAY ON THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF

I will not proceed with the examination of the works of Despréaux. I shall only mention that his three last satires, the greater part of his epistles, his odes and epigrams were composed after his presentation to the King.

Although Despréaux was not of a robust constitution, yet by extreme temperance and rigid abstemiousness he enjoyed during a period of fifty years, a moderate portion of health. But in the year 1706, it began sensibly to decline. Frequent swoons, acute pains, and habitual fever, announced the termination of his life. He viewed the approaches of death with the calm resignation of a christian philosopher. From that time he renounced the great world into which he had against his inclination been introduced, and confined himself to the society of a small number of friends. Thus he lived, suffering the vicissitudes of pain and of languor until the year 1711, and died on the 13th of March, at the age of 74 years and some months.

It would be an easy task to collect a great number of anecdotes relative to Despréaux. His commentators have with the most scrupulous accuracy recorded them. But I shall restrict myself to the selection of only a few of those, which shew that the elevation of his soul and the nobleness of his sentiments, equalled the superior excellence and graceful beauties of his mind. The celebrated Patru, one of the most enlightened men and the most sound critic of the age in which he lived, devoted himself to the pursuits of literature, the profession of the law, in the exercise of which his distinguished probity, his pure and brilliant eloquence and his extensive knowledge, promised him an ample fortune. Indigence was the consequence of this sacrifice of fortune at the shrine of taste. Reduced to the necessity of selling his library in order to procure the means of subsistence, he was on the point of suffering the privation of all that could afford him consolation in his misfortune. Despréaux was informed of his situation, and at the same time learned that the financier who intended to purchase the library, took advantage of the distressful condition of Patru, to make the acquisition at a price far below its value. He immediately hastened to his friend, purchased the library at a price one third above that which the financier had offered for it, and, after the payment of the money, stipulated that he should possess it only in reversion. His conduct towards Cassandre, that estimable man of letters whose character and misfortunes he has with so much force and truth depicted in his first satire, was not less marked by generosity. His purse was always open to him, and often did Despréaux anticipate his wants. His munificence was extended even to Linnière by whom it was abused, and who, with the money which he had received from him, went to a tavern and composed opprobrious verses against his benefactor. But that action which reflects the greatest honour on Despréaux, that which would of itself suffice to ensure to his memory the tribute of our affection and esteem, is a trait of which the history of literature affords but few examples. He was informed at Fontainebleau, which was at that time the residence of the court, that the pension of the great Corneille had been suppressed. He immediately hastened to Madame de Montespan, and, after having related the fact, he proceeded thus warmly in his expostulations: "the king, said he, although perfectly equitable, cannot, without some semblance of injustice, grant a pension to such a man as myself, who am but commencing my journey up the Parnassian mount, and deprive Mons. Corneille of his, who has long since reached its summit. I entreat you, Madam, for the glory of his majesty, to prevail on him rather to suppress mine than that of a man who has much higher claims on his bounty; let my pension be extinguished, but do not Madam by the suppression of his, wound the sensibility of a man so illustrious as M. Corneille." He afterwards dilated with so much persuasive eloquence on the transcendent genius of Corneille, and depicted in colours so glowing the glory which his works reflected on the French nation, that Mad. de Montespan, not less affected by the noble disinterestedness of Despréaux, than by his eloquent encomium on Corneille, promised to exert her influence with the king. The pension was soon after restored, and to the generous conduct of Despréaux on this occasion were the king and Corneille equally indebted: the former was thereby prevented from incurring the imputation of injustice, and the latter recovered the just recompense of his meritorious labours.

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

As you have had a good deal to say about clubs in your paper latterly, I think it will not be amiss, to send you some minutes of the transactions of the one, of which I am an unworthy member. It was instituted by half a dozen enlightened spirits, for the investigation of truth; by which the energy of man might be called forth and directed, and political and physical happiness discovered and disseminated; and, deriving its name from the various objects, it was intended to embrace, they called it the philosophico-mathematico-democratico-republican club.

Notwithstanding the benevolent intentions of its founders, and the amelioration of society, an institution of this kind is calculated to produce, many have been the attempts of the neighbourhood to destroy it, particularly by laying informations against us for riot, and several times sending constables amongst us, merely because some of our members, in the height of discussion, had directed their energy to the argumentum baculinum; but to the purpose.

The club having met at the usual hour, last evening, Tom Murphy according to vote, took the chair, and with an authoritative tone of voice called "order! order!" which was immediately obeyed by all the members present, except Dick Noggle, who said, "he'd be damned if he'd be called to order by him, or any like him, for that he had cheated him out of two dollars that morning, at all-fours, and that he could prove it;" upon which Tom Murphy, with great spirit, told him, he was a liar, and immediately began to strip off his coat to fight him; but Dick, seizing a bottle of whiskey, which he had just before applied to his lips, threw it with so good a direction, that striking on Tom's napper (which, by the by, is a pretty thick one) he measured his length on the floor; and it being supposed that he would be unfit for any further debate that evening, he was carried into the next room, and Dick having fully proved himself to be the better man, was desired to take the chair in his stead.

Order being now established, the club were just entering upon business, when we were interrupted by the entrance of the landlord, who came to complain, that it was a custom with several of the members to go away without paying their reckoning, and declared he would not send up any more drink, unless it were paid for at the time; and begged gentlemen to consider the loss it waster to him, especially as his house had got a very bad name, in consequence of the club's meeting there; and that, every thing considered (though he must own they were very good customers in the article of drink, if they'd but pay) he wished the club would procure an apartment at some other house.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table for further consideration; and the order of the evening being called, the club formed itself into a committee of the whole, on the important question, "The expediency of insurrections."

After many arguments pro and con, had been advanced by different members, my friend Patrick Fagan, got up, and in a very able speech of considerable length, clearly proved, that insurrections were highly improper, while our numbers were insufficient for the attainment of our wishes. I shall however omit his reasons, which, he said were obvious to all, except those blinded by envy and ambition, and give the conclusion of his speech, in his own words: "Without a moderate portion of these qualities (speaking of envy and ambition) Democracy would cease to exist; but, like whisky, too much destroys their beneficial effect, and produces an intoxication, which prevents us from examining the propriety of the step we are about to take, and prudently avoiding all danger. In this manner may the exertions and assiduity of the whole party for a twelvemonth, be destroyed in a day, by the folly of one man. Very different from such rashness is a perfect democratical character. Let me attempt a rude sketch.

A perfect democrat is firmly attached to natural unadulterated liberty. He believes the origin of all power to be in the people, and, consequently, thinks it improper that it should ever, even for a moment, be out of their hands, or delegated to a few, when the many are so capable of exercising it. He thinks it a sin against nature, for man on entering into compact, or society with fellow men, to give up any of those rights which she has bestowed on him at his birth; these he will say, are liberty of action, equality, &c. the former he demonstrates to be the right to seek pleasure wherever it may present itself, or his inclinations lead him, without being cramped by the interferences and whimsies of others....thus pointing out the impropriety of laws; the latter affords him an excellent argument against subordination, or the injustice of one man possessing more power, property, sense or genius than another. He is well able to represent the proper restrictions of government, as intolerable grievances; and all taxes for its support, as being merely for the maintenance of a set of lazy, luxurious courtiers, by which name he distinguishes its officers if they are not of his own party; and, separating as much as possible the constitution from its administrators, is lavish of his praises of the former, that he may be more pointed in his sarcasms on the latter. If he succeed in removing the persons in power, and getting proper ones in their place, he then pours the phial of his wrath on the constitution, which he has been hitherto only sapping, and creates a resemblance between it and the most decided aristocracy, or even the Russian and Turkish despotisms; taking care to introduce a number of hard names, as Chouans, Hulans, Pandours, Crim-Tartars, Mamelukes, Bashaws, Viziers, &c. &c. the more effectually to perplex and obscure the subject; and the more hideous the picture he draws his comparison with, the better; since as his intention is only to inform the ignorant, they will be unable to perceive any dissimilitude; and should his arguments fall under the observation of the better informed, if federalists, they are already so tired with execrating our falsities, that I fancy they will not think them worthy of refutation; and if democrats, the intent will readily excuse the means. He is well versed in the intricacies of argumentation, so that he is able whenever reason and truth fail him, to call in a sophism to his assistance. His knowledge of law is not perhaps, very extensive, but he has a good recollection of names, and with a proper use of these, he in the opinion of his party, raises a formidable barrier against the attacks of his antagonists, even should his quotations not be very accurate. If unfortunately at any time detected in a misrepresentation of the existing laws of his country (and whatever country he may be in, has the happiness of being considered by him as his own) he escapes from his embarrassment, in the same manner the brothers in the Tale of a Tub discovered every thing they wished in their father's will; for by picking a word here and there, or if a word cannot be found, a syllable or letter, he forms any meaning he pleases; thus he can convert the bible into the koran, or the Lord's prayer into a jacobinical hymn. In short, a true democrat can be every thing with every person; religious with the religious, profane with the profane; chaste with the chaste; amorous with the amorous; honest with the honest; and a rogue with rogues. He unites the most consummate impudence with the deepest cunning; and, finally, he is perfectly unbiassed by any religious scruples.

"As we have many men of this description amongst us, I have no doubt that our endeavours will, eventually, be crowned with the most perfect success; for the union and exertions of a very few, are sufficient to make the multitude believe Thomas McKean to be a better governor than James Ross, and Thomas Jefferson a better president than John Adams; that the present disposition of France is productive of more happiness than the mild constitution of the United States, Hell a more eligible place than Heaven, or even were they possible, still greater absurdities."

Mr. Fagan having concluded amidst repeated acclamations, was asked by several of the members to take some grog with them; and Mr. Chairman Noggle, after counting the ayes and nays, declared "that it was the opinion of the club, nam. con. some for and some against it, that premature insurrections were improper, and that a true democrat was a clever fellow."

The business of the night being now over, and the feast of reason dispatched, the flow of soul commenced among those members who could comply with the unjust and unprecedented restrictions of the landlord. Mirth and harmony prevailed, interrupted only by a slight fracas between Ned Whiffle and Dick Slang, occasioned by the former refusing to lend the latter eleven pence, to get a glass of gin twist, which terminated in Ned's receiving a pair of black eyes.

Many patriotic songs were sung, and at one o'clock in the morning, all that were able to walk dispersed, without any accident, except a couple being taken up by the watchmen, and confined until daylight, when they were liberated on paying a small fine.

Yours &c.
TURLOUGH MULLIGAN.

MISCELLANY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL

[The pleasure I have often received from the perusal of your ingenious work, makes me conceive myself under an obligation, when leisure permits, of assisting you with my mite. Subjects of literature are nearly threadbare, and often passed over by a large part of your readers; I shall therefore beg your acceptance of a description of the bull-feasts in Spain, extracted from my journal kept in that country, to which I may, at a future period, add a few observations on a people, with whom we are not well acquainted, and of whom we have perhaps received information from channels warped by prejudice.

Your's sincerely,
W. W.]

4 BULL-FEASTS IN SPAIN.

I cannot but conceive it an egregious error in those travellers, who have attributed bull-feasts, or amphitheatrical entertainments in Spain to the Moors, and stiled them the barbarous relic of their customs. It was not till long after the Christian era, that Gibraltar was first conquered by Tarick, the famous leader of the African adventurers: but this practice can be traced to epochs long before that period from which we now date; of consequence, if it is an exotic custom, they must owe its origin to the conquest of the Romans, or the imitation of their European neighbours. It cannot be denied that the Spaniards retain to this day many remains of Moorish customs and manners; and it would, perhaps, be more to their credit, if they retained more; for if we may judge from the monuments the latter have left behind them, they possessed the most valuable ideas of architecture, tilling, draining, watering, and laying out grounds; which once made the now rude plains of Grenada a perfect garden, and beautified them beyond our most romantic ideas of an elysium; but amidst all their splendour and dreams of dear bought happiness, amidst the gaieties of a Boabdil's reign, they did not practise fighting bulls; for their entertainments consisted of hunting, feats of the sword, club and lance, wrestling, &c. at which their jealous dispositions did not suffer their women often to be present, the very soul of the exercise under our consideration; nor is it the theme of any of the Spanish writers of romance, who have handed down to us their customs. The many remains of Roman architecture in Spain, the circular and oval forms of places, built for exhibitions of this kind, together with the cells, vomitoria, podia, seats, and other yet visible ruins, evince to us, that those conquerors of what they called the Provincia Cunicularis, not only spread the glory of their arms amongst this newly subjugated people, but celebrated their victories by triumphal arches, and those public exhibitions, which were common amongst themselves. Few Roman historians have mentioned the amphitheatrical games; and the early annals of the church are filled with the mention of victims, that were exposed both to the contumely of the mob, and the assaults of the lion and the tiger; whilst their liberty and pardon were the rewards of their courage. This was a favourite punishment for their criminals, and at once evinces to us, that these masters of the world, of learning and of renown, had only advanced a few removes beyond barbarism. Legislation afterwards altered this practice, and the combatants were either hired, or served as volunteers. We are then only at a loss how to account for bulls being pitched upon as the tortured object of this practice, which is easily done, when we consider the difficulty and expense of obtaining the lion* and the tiger alive, particularly after the Moorish conquest, when the Spaniards had only a partial access to the shores of Africa, and when they had such ferocious beasts on their own plains, which would afford nearly an equal display of courage, without that excess of danger.

In tracing this practice, for the information of my readers, I shall be explicit and correct. Formerly the most valiant captains of the Lusitanian bands entered the lists in this ferocious combat. After conquering the Saracen, a Gonsalvo, a Lara, wielded the spear and sword against the dart-enraged bull: their recompence was the smile of approbation from their favourite fair one. The greatest merit in her eyes, was courage, and the greatest bond in love, was the contempt of danger. Arrayed in the scarf their mistresses had embroidered, it was their pride to shew their familiarity with scenes of peril, and the lengths to which they would go for objects incomparably more deserving. This spirit was fostered by their generals: it made their hearts martial, and counteracted the inert languor and inactivity of the camp. Not such the present champions: their pristine nobleness is fled; they are hirelings, and the traits of their courage are ferocious and butcher-like.

The days chosen for this sport are generally the anniversaries of some saints, with which the calendar is filled; but, in the great cities, during the season, it may be seen three times a week. No sooner is the day fixed on for this exhibition, than the news is eagerly spread, and electrifies every class with joy. The topic becomes general, every countenance exults in the glad tidings, and old and young equally joyous, anticipate the scene. From all parts they crowd to the spot; neither distance nor penury withholds them, and if government and the police of the individual cities had not fixed restrictions to these games, the fields would remain untilled, and the grapes ungathered.

The bulls intended for the day's sport, are brought into the city in the night, when the streets are empty, by means of a tame ox or cow, which serve as decoys. They are pent up in separate cells, so small that they have not room to turn, and with their heads to the arena. They are here goaded, and rendered furious, by every artificial means.

Already is the amphitheatre crowded by an immense concourse, impatient for the signal to begin. Perhaps not a sight in nature is equal to this of the thronged spectators, clothed in all the gaieties and luxuries of dress, filling the progressively rising seats, and almost frantic with pleasure. The eye, enraptured, measures its favourite circle, rows on rows at once swell the grateful focus, and pleased, the visual orb indulges in the scene. The men are clothed in their short cut jackets, loaded with innumerable rows of buttons à la majo; with broad brimmed hats, or small high velvet caps; their hair confined within a silken net, and cloaks of black or scarlet, half envelope their shoulders. The women, whose general street attire is black, now appear decked in all the shewy contrast of colours, gay bunches of ribbons ornament their jet black hair; the richest mantles flow down their comely waists, over a short fringed petticoat; and at once give to view forms the most divine; without hiding those soul-enlivening eyes and animated countenances, which allure, enrapture and command. Costly fans produce an artificially cool atmosphere, and with great legerete de main, serve to salute their distant friends. Refreshing drinks and cakes of every kind are handed about by their attendants; handbills announce the particulars of the entertainment, and the different coloured ribbons that are affixed to the bulls' manes, to denote their race, progeny, and from whence brought. A gay display of flags wave on the tops of the battlements; and when at war with any nation, they fix their's, reversed, in the most conspicuous place. The shouts of the gay multitude, and the swift winged rockets, that break high in air, announce the approach of the hour, generally four in the afternoon. The signal trumpet sounds; a company of soldiers, with a lively band of music, enters at the gates, and after forming into a line, clears the arena of its numbers. One of them is then placed at each of the little recesses, made at small distances in the inner palisado, and sufficient to admit the body of the combatants, for whose safety they are intended.

* The lion and tiger to this day form part of the tribute of the dependent bey in Africa; and the bagnios and slave prisons are peopled with these savage rangers of the wild, but only for show; and to the shocking torture of every feeling of humanity, they are made the inmates of the wretched and equally fettered slave, who is often destined to be their keeper.

The governor next appears, and the ministers of police are seated nearly over the place where the bulls are confined. Two trumpeters stand behind them, and under their direction the feast is conducted. Every thing in readiness, four champions in different coloured dresses enter the arena on horseback, their legs and thighs are cased in tough leather, in their right hands they bear a long ashen lance tipped with a small piece of iron, and with their left dexterously manage their steeds. They prance gaily along the circle, make their devoirs to the governor, presidents of the feast, and their individual patrons and protectors. They then range themselves according to their merit opposite the first cell, from which the bull is expected to issue; but on the left, as the animal from instinct makes his attack on that side. A trumpet again sounds, a trap door is raised, and forth rushes the bellowing monster, astonished, enraged, and frantic from hunger and frequent goadings. With impetuous onset he rushes on the prepared horseman, who with his lance repels him to the right or left of his horse. The second champion then follows, invites him to combat, and receives him in the same way. The greatest strength and dexterity are evinced in these frequent onsets, but it often happens, that the greater furious strength of the horned enragé overturns both horse and rider, and lays both promiscuously in the dust. Both then often share the frantic revenge of the animal, and are promiscuously torn with his horns, notwithstanding the efforts of the others to get him away and divert him on another side. He often buries his towering antlers in the bodies of both, throws their shattered limbs in the air, and strews them on the arena. More frequently the rider escapes by the recesses in the palisado, and returns remounted with fresh courage to provoke battle. It is not unusual for one bull to kill several horses, but these animals, particularly in Andalusia, are so noble that with their entrails dragging on the ground, they face the tortured beast, and by their neighing and snorting seem to enjoy the sport, although not trained to it. Should they prove refractory, the riders cover their eyes with a handkerchief, that they may be unconscious of their danger, though such is the courage and noble spirit of this domestic animal, that this is seldom necessary; but it is grating to every feeling of humanity, that the end of this first of beasts should be thus perverted by practices so cruel. After a round of feats of this kind equally horrid and disgusting, the trumpet again sounds, and the horsemen retire. The foot combatants then come forth, gaily dressed, and each bearing a pair of darts in his hands. With these they provoke the furious animal to battle, and when he puts down his head in an attitude to tear them with his horns, they dexterously stick the barbed darts behind his neck, and evade his horns by slipping aside. These shulitos a pie croud around him, wound him by incessant darts, and when he goes near the seats he receives showers of small ones from the people. In the tops of these darts, gaily ornamented with coloured paper, fire-works are fixed, which when the match burns down, explode with frequent crackings. He stands with an aspect of rage and terror. His flaming eyes dart around the circle, he seeks objects to sate his rage; they evade him, the place resounds with horrid bellowings, streams of red froth issue from his mouth and nostrils, he paws the blood stained ground, and in vain shakes his sides and neck to dislodge the galling load. Furious from rage and pain he bounds across the arena, attempts to climb the pallisado and wreak his revenge on every opposing object. Frequently he catches them on his horns, but generally from their great agility they escape, and he only bears away in triumph, part of the red garment with which he had been provoked and deceived. I have seen one of these combatants hard pressed by the enraged bull, and apparently without means to escape. He was pent close to the palisado and no recess at hand. Already had the furious beast stooped to tear him to pieces, and the terrified spectators imagined him horribly mangled on his horns. The active combatant undismayed and with unexampled presence of mind, put his foot on the forehead of the bull, with one leap was out of danger, and lighting behind the furious animal, seemed to laugh at his unavailing efforts to catch him: he skipped gaily and unhurt away. He then walked round the circle with his hat in his hand, money from all sides was showered down to him from the pleased spectators and his patrons, who always requite an extraordinary display of agility by a collective reward. Formerly a favourite flower from the breast of the fair, or a bunch of ribbons, was thrown down to the victorious champion and he was happy in that return, for the exertion of his courage and agility. When every means of harassing the animal has been exhausted, the trumpet again is blown, the footmen leave the arena, and a single champion steps forth. In his right hand he bears a double edged Toledo, and on his left arm a red cloak. After making his obeisance to the spectators, he provokes the bull by holding to him the red garment, and after several evasions of his horns he prepares for the last and most noted exertion of skill in this way. He places himself in a firm position before him, holds his sword obliquely, on which the maddening beast rushes with such impetuosity as to bury it to the hilt. Already the staggering bull bellows with agonizing pain, streams of black gore burst from the wound and mouth, his haggard looks proclaim his tortured state; the dreadful steel entering at the collar bone has searched the source of life, his feeble limbs deny support, he sinks and struggles in the dust. Incessant peals of applause re-echo through the vast circle, and frantic acclamations, such as resounded at the Olympic games of the Greeks, or the gladiatorial scenes of the Romans. The most lively and animated music joins the loud sound, but is nearly drowned by the plaudits of the mob. Three mules yoked together, and ornamented with gay streamers drag the mangled and bloody carcase from the arena, and every preparation is made for a repetition of the same sport, which only varies according to the courage of the men, and the fury of the bull. Ten or sixteen are often killed in an evening, and the amusement from neither its sameness nor disgusting scenes appears to tire. As many horses often fall, and the men are frequently killed or maimed. Romero was the most famous matador the Spaniards ever had, and his end was snocking. The meat is exposed for sale but bought only by the common people. The scene is often varied by the fighting of two horses which is indeed grand, and though horrid, has something in it noble and fierce. They sometimes let loose the wild boar, the stag, and other animals to fight dogs, and if a bull will not face the combatants, dogs are let loose upon him, which becomes quite an English bull bait. The last bull is embolado or his horns are tipped with wood; the common people all rush out, cling to the horns and tail, and wrestle with him in bodies. The entertainment is often closed with fire-works, and the interval is agreeably filled up by all the men striking their arms and steels which they always carry, and which give a most curious gleam around. Part of the funds arising from these entertainments belongs to the hospitals of St. John of God, the other pays the expenses. The amphitheatre in Cadiz is of wood, holds ten or twelve thousand people, and belongs to the city. It is rented to a company under great restrictions, but this cannot hinder frequent impositions on the public. Those in Madrid, Seville, and Grenada are of stone, and of royal foundation. In the smaller cities where they have none, they use the market squares, but on a very paltry scale. Indians from South America often display their feats with a leathern thong, with which they dexterously entangle the bull and throw him on his back, when they mount, and by their dexterity render vain the exertions of the animal to shake off the unusual load. Many gypsies are amongst the foot combatants. Their pay is from ten to sixty dollars an afternoon, according to merit. That side of the amphitheatre on which the afternoon sun beats, is only half price. There is a small difference in the several cities, but in all, these are the leading traits.

To foreigners, accustomed to see the dexterous feats of equestrian riders, such diversions appear uninteresting and barbarous, and from the continual danger to which the riders and the horses are exposed, the feeling mind can derive no satisfaction. Even in this age of refined philosophy, man seems to be glad to multiply means for the extinction of his own species, which, from the brute creation, he might learn to husband. This familiarity with scenes of blood darkens the traits of the national character; and were a revolution to agitate the people, it would possibly be more sanguine than we have yet witnessed. Government has often wished to abolish this practice; but in vain; it is so generally relished. It is astonishing that the Spanish ladies enjoy this sport, so savagely monotonous. Possessed of susceptibility and the finest feelings in nature, with every sense in unison with delicacy and sentiment, one would imagine they would fly it as a bane; still do they frequent it; a contradiction, which neither the moralist, nor the keen observer can reconcile or combine.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEE.

In Nottingham church-yard there occurs the following epitaph on an old lady, memorable for her love of liquor. Its moral seems to be that Bacchus is not always a foe to longevity;

"She drank good ale and beer and wine,
"And liv'd to the age of—ninety-nine."

A British critic apprizes us that the following lines in MILTON, describing one of the finest attitudes of "divine melancholy,"

With a sad laden downward cast,
There fix them on the earth as fast;

are supposed to be derived from Du Bartas.

That fallow fac'd, sad, stooping nymph, whose eye
Still on the ground is fixed stedfastly.

We are often asked the meaning of Blue Stocking club, to which Peter Pindar and many other ephemeral writers often allude. The following is a brief history of this club.

Mrs. Montague was in habits of friendship with the first wits and scholars of the age, and was the reputed founder of a society, known by the name of the Blue Stocking club. This association was founded on the liberal and meritorious principle of substituting the rational delights of conversation for the absurd and vapid frivolities of the card table. No particular attention or respect was paid to her, but the conversation was general, cheerful and unrestrained: for different from what is insinuated respecting the company, by a satirist, who accuses them of going "To barter praise for soup with Montague."

The name of this club is said to be derived from the following circumstance. One of their most distinguished characters in the early days of the society was Mr. Stittingfleet, who always wore blue stockings: his conversation was distinguished for brilliancy and vivacity, insomuch that, when in his absence, the stock of general amusement appeared deficient, it was a common exclamation, we can do nothing, without the blue stockings; thus was the appellation acquired, which is now become frequently in use for a learned and witty lady, even though she never drank tea in Portman Square.

In a volume of poems under the assumed name of Little, but actually composed by Moore, the elegant translator of Anacreon, I have read the following, which I think exceeds a poem of Metastasio on a similar subject.

With all my soul, then, let us part,
Since both are anxious to be free;
And I will send you home your heart,
If you will send back mine to me.

We've had some happy hours together,
But joy must often change its wing;
And spring would be but gloomy weather,
If we had nothing else but spring.

'Tis not that I expect to find
A more devoted, fond, and true one,
With rosier cheek, or sweeter mind—
Enough for me that she's a new one.

Then let us leave the bower of love,
Where we have loiter'd long in bliss;
And you may down that path way rove
While I shall take my way through this.

Our hearts have suffer'd little harm
In this short fever of desire,
You have not lost a single charm,
Nor I one spark of ardent fire.

My kisses have not stain'd the rose
Which nature hung upon your lip,
And still your sigh with nectar flows
For many a raptur'd soul to sip.

Farewell! and when some other fair
Shall call your wand'rer to her arms,
"Twill be my luxury to compare
Her spells with your remembered charms."

"This cheek" I'll say "is not so bright
As one that us'd to meet my kiss;
This eye has not such liquid light
As one that us'd to talk of bliss!"

Farewell! and when some future lover
Shall claim the heart which I resign,
And, in exulting joys discover,
All the charms, that once were mine.

I think I should be sweetly blest,
If, in a soft imperfect sigh,
You'd say, while to his bosom press'd
He loves not half so well as I.

A passionate lover has thus warmly addressed his mistress, who talked coldly of something like platonic friendship....

Oh! why should Platonic controul, love,
Enchain an emotion so free,
Your soul though a very sweet soul, love,
Will ne'er be sufficient for me.

If you think by this coldness and scolding
To seem more angelic and bright,
Be an angel, my love, in the morning,
But, oh, be a woman to night.

My readers have lately been apprized that I frequently light my lamp to discern merry passages for their amusement....and my own. This evening, which is more unwholesome than any in the West Indies, in spite of all the fine things said of our climate by our philosophers and physicians, can be combated by no more poignant weapon than one, which I have borrowed from a foreigner. It is sharp and I think it will drive away care.

Prospectus of a history of weeping, addressed to the crying club. From the creation of Eve to the present time. Compiled from the most authentic sources, and under the immediate eye of some ladies of the first distinction, who have made weeping their particular study. The whole to be comprised in ten volumes folio, or the overplus, if there should be any, given gratis to the subscribers,

CONTENTS.

VOL. I. Origin and antiquity of tears. State of tears before the flood.

VOL. II. Progress of weeping among the most ancient nations: origin of whimpering, with a dissertation on the boarding schools of the ancients.

VOL. III. Propagation of tears in Europe, with biographical notices of eminent blubberers. State of discipline and progress of tears under the whip. Dissertation on the slave trade.

VOL. IV. Great Britain. Arithmetical discussion of crying accounts, progress of tears in families, with a digression on the metamorphoses of "grey mares" into "better horses."

VOL. V. History of coaches and carriages, how increased by crying; origin of fits and hystericks, perspective view of long acre.

VOL. VI. Rise of white handkerchiefs, with an historical view of the British stage; calculation of the depth of tears, shed at a tragedy with the crying parts coloured for the boxes.

VOL. VII. On the use of onions at funerals. Dissertation on widows. Exact measurement of a flood of tears.

VOL. VIII. On the various causes of weeping. Ingenuity of those, who weep without any cause. Medical dissertation on the "more you cry," &c.

VOL. IX. On the crying sins of the nation. Effect of tears upon the works of nature....poetical deluges, how far canals may be swelled by tears.... true relation of a farmer's daughter, who drove a mill, while in love.

VOL. X. On novel writing....On tears divided into genera and species....Salt tears, bitter tears, sweet tears, sweet bitter tears, salt delicious tears, tears half delicious half agonizing, and other varieties manufactured and distilled in the writings of the new philosophers....On sentimental torrents, cataracts of sensibility, and water falls of fine feeling....Conclusion.

The whole to be embellished by engravings by the first artists, of black eyes, blue eyes, and hazel eyes in all the stages of crying, from the glister to the sob. Portraits of eminent cryers, from the originals, in water colours; views of noted whimperers, in distemper; ground plans of teasing schemes, with distant prospects of sets of china, diamond necklaces and new carriages, &c. &c.

The price to subscribers will be three guineas each volume; to non subscribers, four. A few copies will be printed on a superfine magna charta, wire woven and hot pressed, with proof impressions of the plates, price six guineas each, and which when bound corio Mauritanico, foliis deauratis lineis rubris elegantissime compact per Kaltheber, will form one of the most splendid books, ever presented to the eye!

LACHRYMAT RESPUBLICA!

FESTOON OF FASHION FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[As the votaries of the fantastic goddess, who gives a name to this department of our paper, are all ambitious of notoriety, I shall subjoin a few admirable lessons from an experienced master.]

One of the easiest and therefore the commonest methods of drawing attention by trifles; is that of talking loud at all places of public resort. There is something so spirited in it, so charmingly careless and it gives such an air of superiority, by seeming to despise all the hearers, as if they were no more than stocks and stones.

I have heard many a fine gentleman and lady while strolling up and down a crowded walk, question each other on the last night's ball, or their engagements to dinner, in a voice so loud as silenced the rest of the company, and caused a general hum of inquiry. Who are these? Thus the end was answered, the spectators were awe-struck and brow-beaten and the happy pair marched off in triumph till next morning, when they returned to make new conquests. From their volubility and vehemence they acquired among many listeners the character of people of infinite sense and spirit.

Another method of gaining admiration, is to swear and swagger at inns, or at any other place, where we are among our inferiors, or are unknown. It is to be sure wonderful to observe how respectful a reception he meets with, who with a bludgeon in his hand and an oath in his mouth enters an inn, and calls about with the voice of our guttural watch, or the men who cry peas and beans.

Knocking vehemently on a floor, especially if it be done according to the latest method, adds very considerably to personal importance.

Singularity in dress is one of the commonest modes of seeking distinction; but by singularity, I do not mean a deviation from the established fashion, but compliance with it, carried to an extreme. An enormous hat has given many a young man a degree of confidence, which no learning or virtue, which he possessed could have ever supplied. A coat, a shoe, or a shoe-string, exceeding the ordinary mode have fixed the eyes of a whole assembly and gratified the ambitious wearer with the most heart-felt satisfaction.

But of the greater part of these ambitious persons it may perhaps, be said that they would act wisely to avoid, instead of seeking distinction, for they seem to be of that character to which the emphatical words of an elegant political character may be applied "a character, which will only pass without censure, when it passes without observation."

The stockings of the elegantes of Paris appear like gauze, and are of open worked silk. Their covering is transparent muslin. A plate of the Parisian fashions in May represents modish female impudence nearly in the style of Eve, before her fall. The bosom is prodigally displayed, and the petticoat is festooned and hitched rather higher than the ankle.

The following morceau from the shop of a barber is a brilliant specimen of the sublime and beautiful.

Ross respectfully informs the ladies that he has on exhibition a most elegant and whimsical head dress, calculated either for mask balls, full dress, or undress, and may be worn, instead of a veil, having the peculiar quality of changing its shape, occasionally covering the whole face, yet capable of being disposed into wandering ringlets; as a mask the disguise is complete without oppression; as a veil it protects without the dull uniformity of drapery, and may be scented to the perfume of any flower; for beauty it cannot be surpassed, and for simplicity it stands unrivalled. The patent was granted by the Goddess of taste, inspired by the spirit of fancy, secured from imitation by the genius of merit, patronised by the votaries of elegance and exhibited in the temple of fashion.

One of our most delightful and fashionable promenades within the precincts of the city is that agreeable area, which the indulgence of Mr. Dunlap has given to the public. This shaded walk commanding a view of his pleasant gardens, and well ventilated by a purer breeze, than is commonly inhaled in the city, is frequented at the close of many a sultry day by those, who love to muse by moon-light, and by those who love to walk and prattle the evening away. It realizes a description in HORACE.

Nunc et campus et area.
Lenesque sub noctem susurri
Composita repetantur hora.

which for the benefit of the country gentlemen must be translated in the words of FRANCIS.

Now at the grateful evening shade
The public walks, the public park,
Are assignations sweetly made,
With gentle whispers in the dark.
While age morose thy vigour spares,
Be these thy pleasures, these thy cares.

A wit assures us that an historian is actually employed in compiling memoirs of the king of Spades, annals of the king of clubs, anecdotes of the king of hearts and remarks on the king of diamonds. In this work will be interwoven the private characters of the knaves with the secret history of the queens to be published in weekly numbers price one guinea each. A work of this kind may serve to give posterity some idea of the grandeur of the present age.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We perceive that Lyce is a grey coquette, and we advise her to think more of her tombstone, and less of her toilet.

But adoration, give me something more,
Cries Lyce, on the borders of three-score;
Nought treads so silent as the foot of time;
Hence we mistake our autumn for our prime.
'Tis greatly wise to know, before we're told,
The melancholy news that we grow old.
Autumnal Lyce carries in her face
Memento mori to each public place.
O how your beating breast a mistress warms,
Who looks through spectacles to see your charms.
While rival undertakers hover round,
And with his spade the sexton marks the ground.
Intent not on her own, but others' doom,
She plans new conquests, and defrauds the tomb.
In vain the cock has summon'd apries away,
She walks at noon, and blasts the bloom of day.
Gay rainbow silks her mellow charms infold,
And nought of Lyce....but herself....is old.

A. B. supposes that the Editor of the Port Folio is not only unacquainted with the mysteries of the belle passion, but that he never attempted, and therefore never can relish the amatory stile. Our answer is in the words of the poet Gifford;

.....For heav'n's sake not so fast.
I, too, my masters, ere my teeth were east,
Had learned, by rote, to rave of Delia's charms,
To die of transports, found in Chloë's arms,
Coy Daphne with obscure perous plants to woo,
And cures the cruelty of....God knows who.

The Editor hopes soon to hear from his friend, and quondam companion, S. Our invocation to this much loved bard is frequent and fervent. Gifford has well commemorated the friendship of men of letters.

I only seek, in language, void of art,
To ope my breast, and pour out all my heart;
And, boastful of thy various worth, to tell
How long we lov'd, and thou canst add how well
Proud of thy friendship, while the voice of Fame
Pursues thy merits with a loud acclaim,
I share the triumph, not unpleased to see
Our kindred destinies; for thou, like me,
Wast thrown too soon on the world's dangerous tide,
To sink or swim, as chance might best decide.

Our friend S. C. we hope will keep his promise. He shall hear from us shortly.

By writing every week "Asmodeo" will please the Editor.

"Ruralina" is received, and shall be treated with the courtesy, which we owe to a lady.

J. D. is received, and we are grateful.

We feel an insupportable nausea at the prostituted name of "a Patriot". We cannot swallow his emetic. Let him drug those papers, which are in slavery to the populace.

Our fair correspondent H. we perceive is quite a town bred lass. With Dr. Johnson, she would prefer Fleet street to the greenest vallies of Kent, and thinks rose bushes and blooming orchards not half so brilliant as the glass case of her milliner. Dr. Young has pleasantly described such a lady.

Such Fulvia's passion for the town, fresh air,
An odd effect! gives vapours to the fair:
Green fields, and shady groves, and chrystal springs,
And larks and nightingales are odious things;
But smoke and dust and noise and crouds delight,
And to be press'd to death transports her quite.
Where silver rivulets play through flowery meads,
And woodbines give their sweets, and vines their shades
Black kennels, absent others she regrets,
And stops her nose at beds of violets.

"A Poetical Weaver" we would advise to "Weave the warp and weave the woof, and not meddle with the Parnassian loom.

"SYDNEY" is rejected. We dislike his name.

Bunker Hill embarrasses its poor poet not less than the names of the Dutch towns, taken in queen Ann's wars, used to vex the ballad inditers of the last age. For, as one of our own poets wittily sings,

Kind reader, know it takes a deal of time
To make a crooked word lie smooth in rhyme.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

The "New-England Palladium," one of those classical papers, whose praise is worth receiving, thus eloquently commends the late address by John Quincy Adams Esquire.

"Much was expected from the Address, and it is the highest praise to say, that none were disappointed. It was the production of a fertile and richly endowed mind, uniting that diffusive kind of eloquence, best adapted to a promiscuous assembly, with vigour of thought and justness of sentiment. The subject was trite and familiar; hence the remark so often made on such occasions, that nothing novel could be expected. But the animated eye of genius marks for itself new courses, and discovers new beauties, where others see nothing but beaten paths and barren wastes. It is its province to add the charms of novelty to objects the most common; to place them in new attitudes, and invest them with new drapery. Their features are readily known, though much changed by circumstances, and the wonder is, that they never appeared so before. To place a subject in a view, which is at once natural and graceful, though not obvious, to present it in a new circle of associations, without changing its form and pressure, is the perfection of fine writing. But this is the magical operation of genius, which discovers new relations, traces new associations, and sees those slender golden threads, which connect objects of sense and reflexion. By following these, the whole imagery of nature is opened to her eye, selected and brought home to array, enrich and beautify the plain, solid materials of the understanding. Hence the diffusion of her enchantments, the despotism of her controul. She opens, at pleasure, the sources of sympathy, and touches the secret springs of affection. She pours her radiance into the sober chambers of intellect, or bewilders in the secret mazes of fancy. She gives to "airy nothing" a form and habitation, and paints it with a pencil dipt in the colours of heaven. At her call, the past and the future are brought together, scenes are shifted, places changed, and the mysteries of her power revealed; like the spirit of Ariel, whose solemn melodies were heard in the coral caves of the sea, while he himself was treading the fleecy clouds, or reposing in the gale.

On occasion of the marriage of the princess Royal of England, the address from the city of London regretted, "that their daughters are now deprived of one of the most conspicuous models of maiden excellence!" on which the wags remarked that the young ladies in the city would not be sorry if all such models were broken.

It is said that Mr. Jefferson, a philosophical republican, or a republican philosopher, has a little grimerack piece of machinery, which he wears in his breeches pocket, to measure his steps, whenever he rambles through the woods of Washington. We suppose that the hint of this instrument was derived from a perusal of the following advertisement in a London journal. Mr. J. condescends to borrow even from the British, and although he has kindly told England that "her philosophy has crossed the channel," yet, somehow, a little remnant has been saved.

The improved pedometer, or waywiser, which when worn in the pocket, ascertains the distance the wearer walks (price two guineas). Sold by Spencer and Perkins, watch-makers, No. 44, opposite St. Sepulchre's Church, Snow-hill; who, for near thirty years, have fabricated these machines; and though they do not claim the invention, it being almost as ancient as pocket watches, yet all that ever came to their knowledge, have been so rude in their shape, inconvenient in wearing, and incorrect in their performance, as to have been soon laid by as useless.

This, which they take the liberty to offer to the public, is elegant in itself, most conveniently used, perfectly correct, and, what is desirable in all machines of fancy, cheap, not liable to pe out of order, and is a most amusing companion to gentlemen, who are fond of walking and shooting.

Flattering themselves the great improvement lately made, has carried it to its ultimatum, they take this method of making it public, to secure to themselves at least the credit thereof, having been materially injured by plagiarists, who have copied their machines, and passed them off to gentlemen as their own inventions, though at much higher prices, and very inferior work.

An apprentice to a celebrated surgeon, lately eloped with his master's wife. The lady complained that her husband's practice was on the decline.

We read in ecclesiastical history, says the editor of the Times, that a celebrated bishop was condemned in a synod, to destroy his novel Theogenes and Chariclea, or be expelled his see. He preferred the latter. If a modern monk were reduced to a similar dilemma, and obliged to choose between the glories of authorship and legislatorship, should we see the poet accept the Chiltern Hundred's, or M. G. Lewis burning his Ambrosio?

An Hibernian traveller, expressing how cheering and comfortable the roads are made by means of mile-stones, suggests to his readers that it would be a great improvement, if they were nearer each other.

We copy from the Walpole paper the following judicious paragraphs. They exhibit good sense in elegant attire.

On the interesting close of the three late general elections of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New-Hampshire, we congratulate not only the citizens of these respective states, but also the friends of good order and government throughout the union. In the language which Shakespeare, in his Henry VI. put into the mouth of Edward, we would add.

"Thus far our fortune keeps an upward course
And we are grac'd with wreaths of victory,
But in the midst of this bright shining day,
I spy a black, suspicious, threatening cloud,
That will encounter with our glorious sun,
Ere he attain his easeful western bed:
We mean, my lords, those powers, that were rais'd
In Gallia's regions, have arriv'd our coast,
And, as we hear, march on to fight us."

Our "penny wise, &c." rulers, with all their ardent zeal for public economy, after all, do not understand the subject a jot better than their prototypes, of whom facetious mention is made in Shakspeare's Henry VI. The rage for reducing taxes, and alleviating the burdens of their subjects, is equally sincere, and unpatriotic. The former are very particular to reduce the price of double refined sugar, to make riding in carriages less expensive to our more wealthy citizens, and to make whiskey drinking palatable and obtainable by all. Jack Cade and others, when they were plotting the reformation of English police, mouthed much of national savings. It must be left to the reflecting mind to determine whether an adherence to promises would not have been equally beneficial to a duped community, as the system which has been since followed. Cade said, "there shall be in England seven half-penny loaves sold for a penny; the three hooped pot shall have ten hoops; and I will make it felony to drink small beer: all the realm shall be in common, and in Cheapside shall my palfrey go to grass. And when I am king, as king I will be,"....There shall be no money: all shall eat and drink on my score: and I will apparel them all in one livery, that they may agree like brothers, and worship me their lord."

A relation of the bishop of P....ter....h's lately applied to him for some small preferment which was in his gift. The learned and worthy prelate, who had never seen the candidate before, was highly pleased with his wit and sprightly conversation, but told him he was too late, for that it was already disposed of; however, as a mark of esteem he presented him with a diamond ring. The gentleman thanked him in the politest manner; but added: "My lord, 'tis a somewhat unchristian-like gift." How so," replied the bishop. "Why my lord," said the candidate, "I asked you for bread, and you have given me a stone."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

SONNET, WRITTEN AT SEA,

After many abortive attempts to arrange my scattered thoughts, and clothe them in verse.

It may not be—the gentle muse is fled,
Fled with those scenes, which erst inspir'd her song;

No more her visions hover round my head,
Nor her wild witcheries on my fancy throng.

Yet faithful memory oft shall fondly trace
The dear lov'd spot where dwells my bosom's queen;

Even now methinks I feel her last embrace,
While my soul melts in anguish o'er the scene.

—My fair one weep not thus, tho' distant far
Drives the bold bark across the boisterous sea,
Soon, like the varying needle to the star,
Thy long lost wanderer shall return to thee:
Then never, never, from thy circling arms,
Shall commerce lure him more, or gold's delusive charms.

HARLEY.

SELECTED POETRY.

[In an old collection of Poems was found the following description of the vicissitudes of the tender passion in an infatuated and enthusiastic bosom. He who loves nothing but beef and beer will deride our sentimental bard. He, whose nerves vibrate at the slightest touch of beauty, will acknowledge the justice of the ensuing picture.]

THE LOVER AND THE FRIEND.

O thou, for whom my lyre I string,
Of whom I speak, and think, and sing!
Thou constant object of my joys,
Whose sweetness every wish employs.
Thou dearest of thy sex attend,
And hear the Lover and the Friend.

Fear not the Poet's flattering strain;
No idle praise my verse shall stain;
The lowly numbers shall impart
The faithful dictates of my heart,
Nor humble modesty offend,
And part the Lover from the Friend.

Not distant is the cruel day,
That tears me from my hopes away:
Then frown not, fairest, if I try
To steal the moisture from your eye,
Or force your heart a sigh to send,
To mourn the Lover and the Friend.

No perfect joy my life ere knew,
But what arose from love and you;
Nor can I fear another pain,
Than your unkindness, or disdain;
Then let your looks their pity lend,
To cheer the Lover and the Friend.

Whole years, I strove against the flame
And suffer'd ills that want a name,
Yet still the painful secret kept
And to myself in silence wept,
Till, grown unable to contend,
I own'd the Lover and the Friend.

I saw you still. Your generous heart
In all my sorrows bore a part;
Yet while your eyes with pity glow'd,
No words of hope your tongue bestow'd,
But mildly bid me cease to blend
The name of Lover—with the Friend.

Sick with desire, and mad with pain,
I seek for happiness in vain:

Thou lovely maid, to thee I cry,
Heal me with kindness, or I die.
From sad despair my soul defend,
And fix the Lover and the Friend.

Curs'd be all wealth, that can destroy,
My utmost hope of earthly joy!
Thy gifts. O fortune, I resign,
Let her and poverty be mine!
And every year that life shall lend,
Shall bless the Lover and the Friend.

In vain, alas! in vain I strive,
To keep a dying hope alive;
The last sad remedy remains,
'Tis absence that must heal my pains,
Thy image from my bosom rend,
And force the Lover from the friend.

Vain thought! though seas between us roll
Thy love is rooted in my soul;
The vital blood that warms my heart
With thy idea must depart,
And death's decisive stroke must end
At once, the Lover and the Friend.

MODERN PHILOSOPHY.

(FROM THE SUN.)

[The following stanzas were, we are told, the first poetical effusion of a celebrated modern philosopher, inscribed to a lady, whom he afterwards married; they will, no doubt, be favourably received by the admirers of that writer, as they appear to contain the cream of his doctrines. Those to whom the lines may appear somewhat obscure, will find that obscurity vanish, if they take the trouble to peruse the Strictures upon Marriage, Gratitude, and Human Perfectibility, in a work published under the title of Political Justice, together with an Eulogy on Avarice, a Dissertation on the Condition of Servants, &c. contained in a late publication called The Inquirer.]

In spite of Philosophy's aid,
I feel the soft passion of love;
The doctrines my pages convey'd,
In practice I'm forc'd to disprove;

For oft hast thou heard me maintain,
That the mind, for eternity born,
Should the fetters of Hymen disdain,
And treat Love's delusions with scorn.

I have held it to manhood a stain,
To sigh at the feet of the fair,
In accents desponding complain,
And prattle of love and despair:

For reason with absolute sway
My turbulent passions repress'd;—
Ah! when shall its wandering ray
Revisit this love-stricken breast?

The motives (alas! 'tis too plain)
Which me to Maria would draw,
Are stronger than those which restrain;—
I submit to Necessity's law;

And G——n, the champion renown'd
Of freedom, but not of free-will,
Though conquer'd by love, will be found
The first of philosophers still.

Then turn, my fair pupil, a while
To your tutor, your lover, and friend,
On your William complacently smile,
And while he instructs you, attend.

Do not grieve if hereafter I flee
Your caresses, nor deem me capricious:
I fain would be grateful to thee;
But, alas! to be grateful, is vicious.

And should I appear in your eyes
To be what the world calls a miser,
Though others my conduct despise,
Yet you, dear Maria, are wiser:

For you know in my late publication,
I've prov'd that 'tis base beyond measure,
To give money a free circulation;
But 'tis noble to hoard up one's treasure.

And mark me, I ne'er will consent
A servant or slave to maintain;
For with these every moment is spent
In mental repining and pain:

For envy and malice combine
The mind of the servant to stain;
Restricted, alas! to port wine,
Whilst his master is quaffing champagne.

As for me, I will never confine
Your beauties alone to these arms,
Nor yet will you hear me repine,
Though multitudes taste of your charms:

You will vow at the altar, indeed.
To your husband alone to adhere,
But you're from that prejudice freed,
Which would make you perform what you swear.

Though falsehood I greatly detest,
And hypocrisy never could bear,
What must not be plainly express'd
A man may most virtuously swear.

Observe the distinction I draw,
Since clearly are oaths superstitious:
Pure truth I consider with awe,
But cannot deem perjury vicious.

Inconstant perhaps, not unkind,
'Twill be ever my study to please;
I'll teach thee, by strength'ning thy mind,
To vanquish old age and disease:

For thinking can surely restore
Your teeth and your eyes when they fall,
Give the vigour of youth to fourscore,
Make "mind over matter prevail."

SONNET TO MY LOVE.

(FROM COLERIDGE'S POEMS.)

Maid of my love! sweet Genevieve!
In beauty's light you glide along:
Your eye is like the star of eve,
And sweet your voice, as seraph's song.

Yet not your heavenly beauty gives
This heart with passion soft to glow:
Within your soul a voice there lives!
It bids you hear the tale of woe.

When sinking low the sufferer wan,
Beholds no hand outstretcht to save,
Fair as the bosom of the swan
That rises graceful o'er the wave,
I've seen your breast with pity heave,
And therefore love I you, sweet Genevieve!

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

No. XXVIII.

Beatrice. I pray you is signior Montanto returned from the wars? I pray you how many hath he killed and eaten? But how many hath he killed? For indeed I promised to eat all of his killing.

Messenger. He hath done good service, lady, in these wars.

Beatrice. You had musty victual, and he hath help to eat it: he is a very valiant trencherman, he hath an excellent stomach.

SHAKESPEARE, Much ado about Nothing, act 1.

Hogarth, in his plate of the Industrious 'Prentice, Lord May or of London, has introduced, in the most ludicrous attitudes, the train-bands, as they are stiled in England, or, in other words, the city militia. These men, conformably to their habits of life, and to their unwarlike character, are aptly delineated, in every shape, except that of a soldier. One is armed with a pot of porter, instead of a firelock, and another appears terrified at a flash in the pan. The tall and the short, grey beards and youngers, are blended in this fantastic medley, and you may see the ferocious cheese-monger, the cavalier cobbler, the intrepid dustman, and the magnanimous tailor, "all clad in arms," and breathing death and destruction....to the expected sirloin, or the coming tankard.

SIR RICHARD STEELE, who had seen actual service, and behaved with great gallantry at the head of a company, cherished for these holiday soldiers that contempt, which every veteran feels for a mimic hero. While he was conducting the most airy of his papers, an incident occurred in the city, which gave a loose to all his mirth. One of those mockeries of military splendour, called a training, or a muster, was exhibited, by the Artillery company, a band of harmless citizens, who understood eating, drinking, sleeping, or any thing, but sieges and battles. Steele, who, both as a soldier and a wit, could not avoid adverting to the ridiculous imbecility of such a clumsy pageant, amused himself by transcribing from one of the daily papers, the original plan of these military operations. This, together with his remarks, it will be pleasant to read, and the philosophic observer will readily perceive, that it is no caricature of the visage of the citizen soldier.

"An exercise at arms of the Artillery company, to be performed on Wednesday, June 29, 1703, under the command of Sir Joseph Wolfe, Knt. and Alderman, General; Charles Hopson, Esquire, present Sheriff, Lieutenant-General; Captain Richard Synge, Major, &c. &c.

"The body marched from the artillery ground, through Moor lane gate, Coleman street, Lothbury, Broad street, Finch lane, Cornhill, Cheapside, St. Martins, St. Anne's lane, halt the pikes under the wall, in Noble street, draw up the firelocks, facing the Goldsmith's hall, make ready and face to the left, and fire, and so ditto three times, beat to arms, and march round the hall, as up Lad lane, Gutter lane, Honey lane, and so wheel to the right, and make your salute to my lord, and so down St. Anne's lane, up Aldersgate street, Barbican, and draw up in Red-Cross street, the right at St. Paul's alley, in the rear. March off lieutenant-general with half the body up Beech lane: he sends a division up King's head court, and takes post in it, and marches two divisions round into Red Lion market to defend that pass, and succour the division in King's head court, but keeps in White cross street, facing Beech lane, the rest of the body ready drawn up. Then the general marches up Beech lane, is attacked, but forces the division in the court, into the market, and enters with three divisions, while he presses the lieutenant-general's main body; and at the same time, the three divisions, force those of the revolvers out of the market and so all the lieutenant-general's body retreats into Chiswell street, and lodges two divisions in Grub street; and as the general marches on, they fall on his flank, but soon made to give way; but having a retreating place in Red Lion court, but could not hold it, being put to flight through St. Paul's alley, are pursued by the general's grenadiers, while he marches up, and attacks their main body, but are opposed again by a party of men, that lay in Black Raven court; but they are forced also to retire soon in the utmost confusion, and at the same time, those brave divisions in St. Paul's alley, ply their rear with grenadoes, that, with precipitation, they take to the rout along Bunhill row: so the general marches into the artillery ground, and being drawn up, finds the revolting party to have found entrance, and makes a show, as if for a battle, and both armies soon engage in form, and fire by platoons."

On this military narrative, my sarcastic predecessor remarks, that for its style and invention, it might instruct generals and historians, both in fighting a battle, and describing it, when it is over. These elegant expressions, ditto, and so, but soon, but having, but could not, but are, but they, finds the party to have found, &c. do certainly give great life and spirit to the relation.

Indeed I am extremely concerned for the lieutenant-general, who, by his overthrow and defeat, is made a deplorable instance of the fortune of war, and vicissitudes of human affairs. He alas! has lost in Beech lane and Chiswell street, all the glory he lately gained, in and about Holborn and St. Giles's. The art of sub-dividing first, and dividing afterwards, is new and surprising; and, according to this method, the troops are disposed in King's head court, and Red Lion market: nor is the conduct of these leaders less conspicuous in their choice of the ground or field of battle. Happy was it that the greatest part of the achievements of this day was to be performed near Grub street, that there might not be wanting a sufficient number of faithful historians, who being eye-witnesses of these wonders should impartially transmit them to posterity. But it can never be enough regretted, that we are left in the dark, as to the name and title of that extraordinary hero, who commanded the divisions in St. Paul's alley, especially because those divisions are justly stiled brave, and accordingly were to push the enemy along Bunhill row, and thereby occasion a general battle. But Pallas appeared in the form of a shower of rain, and prevented the slaughter and desolation, which were threatened by these extraordinary preparations.

Hi motus animorum, atque hæc certamina tanta
Pulveris exigui jactu compressa quiescunt.

I have often thought, that in this, our charming country, whose veriest follies we are instructed by every patriot to admire, merely because they are American, that there is some little room for a good humoured pleasantry of this kind. In celebration of one of the most glorious of our militia puppet-shows, the Grub street historian might, with the simplicity of the frank Froissart, or "such an honest chronicleer as Griffith," narrate in this wise.

This hot morning was ushered in by no cooling or courteous breeze or gentle zephyr, but in rather a boisterous stile, by the firing of cannon, and the ringing of bells. Joy sat in the countenance of every one, who either expected to make a good dinner, or to make any money by selling one. About twelve o'clock, the Presbyterian True Blue company, under the command of lieutenant Gander, paraded before Oliver's dock, and fired divers volleys over the stump of the tree of liberty, which, with grief we are constrained to say it, appeared a little decayed. The company then went through the various evolutions, with astonishing exactness, considering that from the heat, enthusiasm, and libations of the day, many of them could scarcely hold up their heads and arms. They then marched and counter-marched to their own satisfaction, and the great delight of the ladies in the windows and balconies, and of divers small boys, who had climbed "yea to chimney tops," to witness this sublime spectacle, so worthy of freemen.

After parading through the principal streets, and looking valiantly at the spectators, the company halted in Cornhill, and lieutenant Gander, flourishing his sword, addressed his heroic followers, and adverted to the feelings, manners and principles, which gave birth to militia Virtue. Though, like other infants, she was small at first, she had now grown a strapping wench, and could defy the world. This speech was vehemently applauded. The sun shone brighter than usual, the skies had on a full suit of blue and gold, the air of narrow streets grew as elastic as whalebone, and all Cornhill was changed into Olympus. 'Prentice boys mounted undauntedly the breach of the counter, and shop-keepers grew heroes at the sound.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BULOW.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Bad execution of the laws.... Three instances of murder left unpunished by the corruption of the judges.... The lawyers....—parlours and meets with no punishment.... Judicial proceedings not sufficiently public.... Three American citizens forcibly sent away from New-York in the night, on board an English ship of war.

The execution of the laws, however, depends upon the prevailing manners; and this is the most important object.... How they are administered in Pennsylvania, I shall shew, merely by repeating here, several examples contained in my letters to Mr. Archenholz, which were published in his Minerva. I have them from a German clergyman of the Calvinist church at Easton in Pennsylvania, a man of information, who assured me he was ready to attest the truth of these transactions, and that I might make them public*. In the neighbourhood of Easton, and district of Northampton in Pennsylvania, a countryman of French origin by the name of Lange, beat his wife to death, while she was big with child, in the most inhuman manner. The neighbours heard her dreadful shrieks. The body after being buried, was dug up again, examined by a jury, and the coroner's verdict returned "wilful murder." The murder was proved, and I believe, even confessed; the countryman was to have been hanged, but received at the gallows a pardon, for it seems, he or his relations had bribed— with a couple of thousand pounds, and the— have the prerogative of pardoning criminals. The murderer now cultivates his own plantation, for he suffered no other punishment.

In this same Easton, a servant maid murdered her new-born child. She threw it into the river, which was frozen over, and covered with snow. The extraordinary circumstance is related that the ice, at the spot, where the child floated, was entirely clear of snow, and transparent. The child was produced before the suspected woman, who denied it. They had recourse to superstition, and told her to lay her hand upon the child, and swear that it was not hers. Hereupon she confessed herself to be the mother and the murderess. She was sent to prison.... but as the father of the child was a man of consequence, who visited her in the prison, where he probably continued his unlawful intercourse with her, she was soon released again, without punishment, and is yet living.

In the same neighbourhood, a countryman treated with the most shocking cruelty a German boy, whom he had purchased for some years from a ship. He not only beat him with a cudgel incessantly, but made the boy eat with the swine from a trough. At length one day seeing the boy sit under a hedge, he threw an ax at his head, and the boy fell dead to the ground. He buried him immediately. This fellow was put into prison, but having money, the judicial court took that from him, and left him his life.... The murderer is at liberty, and in as good repute as another man†.

Such is the justice of Pennsylvania.... What is told of the lawyers is in the same taste.... When you go to a lawyer with your business, he scarcely hears you.... he mutters; appears absent: answers in unmeaning monosyllables, until you squeeze money into his hand. This awakens him. He grows lively.... obliging.... tells you all will go well.... you cannot possibly lose your cause, &c. In court the lawyers on both sides asperse and deride each other, but immediately after, they go to the tavern, drink together embrace like brothers, and laugh without end, at the comedy they have just performed, and at their clients, who believed such a thing to be serious. It is a principal in general practice, to bribe the lawyer of the adverse party, and thereby to gain the cause. But the great art of the lawyers is to delay the progress of the cause from one session to another, and when at length a judgment comes, the property of both parties is usually scarce sufficient to pay the costs.... Vide. the Minerva, for December 1796*.

Criminals ought not indeed, to be hanged and broken upon the wheel; but crimes ought to be somehow punished. This, the liberty of the innocent requires. One would wish besides in a republic, to see offenders punished, without any respect of rank, of wealth, of connections, &c. Frederick II. said, that in the presence of justice, the beggar and the prince were equal.... But the indulgence with which in Pennsylvania, rich and influential criminals are suffered to evade punishment, seems to prove that upon this point the opinions in Pennsylvania, are more aristocratic than were those of Frederick II. I shall only quote from my letters in the Minerva, the example of—

This— was detected in the act of stealing a bank note, from a shop keeper's drawer. It was then soon discovered that he had followed for a long time this vocation. But as he had respectable connections, the shop-keeper was persuaded not to prosecute him, and he was advised to leave Philadelphia. Some however maintained that he still appeared at the play-house as before. I must here add some explanation, for the sake of unlearned persons, who may perhaps have read those letters in the Minerva, of the term prætor, therein used. The judges were called prætors in Rome, not in America. However, I used in this case the particular instead of the general expression, in the hope that none of my readers would be so little versed in ancient learning as not to understand me. The judge, is a superior, the justice an inferior magistrate. It would betray extreme ignorance to confound a justice, with a village bailiff. The constables might better be compared with such an officer, if the townships could be called villages, which properly they cannot. Mr.—

— belonged to the class of prætors in America: he stole, had frequently stolen, and was not punished, because he had respectable connections, because— who had appointed him to his office must not be disgraced, because, as master of ceremonies to the dancing assemblies of the first class, and as a Philadelphian Muscadint, he was much beloved by that class.

The assassin— was indeed, as I heard just before I left America, condemned to perpetual imprisonment; but it was maintained that his father-in-law, — had already saved his life once, when he had prevailed on a mulatto girl, to murder a child she had by him, for which, without the influence of his father-in-law he would have been hanged.

I was also surprised at the want of publicity, in the judicial proceedings. I saw nothing in the news-papers concerning the trial of the above-mentioned—. In England nothing that occurs in the courts of law is kept secret. This silence proceeds from a want of public spirit. That there is no sufficient security against oppression by men in power is proved by the transportation of three men from New-York, in the night to an English ship of war, which was done by command of the—. The— excused himself by saying they had been condemned to the house of correction.... Yet the prosecution had not been decided when I left America. It was further laid to the charge of this— that he had ordered persons, who had behaved rather disrespectfully towards him, to be whipped to death, and that his usual greeting to citizens of the lower class was to call them damned rascals, whenever they had any thing to do with him. The news-papers were full of all this. In Germany, no such tyranny of subordinate magistrates was ever heard of.

CHAPTER XXIX.

With respect to frauds, it is worse in America than in Europe.... Fictitious trade to deceive Europeans.... Cheats in the sale of lands.... Several anecdotes.

When I consider collectively all that I have heard during my residence in America, of a general increasing corruption of morals, and which from the unanimous testimony of all the Europeans there, and even of many Americans themselves, I have not the smallest reason to call in question, I must sincerely regret my declaration at the close of my fourteenth letter to Mr. Archenholz, that in this respect things are in America tout comme chez nous, and request the Europeans, to cover with the mantle of love this over-hasty opinion, and consider it as having resulted from my indulgence for the Americans. All the European nations at present complain of an unusual degree of immorality; they do not give themselves out as virtuous; whereas the Americans say of themselves that they are a people of simple manners, far exalted above the corruption of Europe: that among them still reigns the patriarchal happiness of the golden age, while Europe groans under the pressure of the iron one. European writers have believed them at their word, and the public have repeated all the errors of the writers. I thought therefore I ventured a great deal, in saying, that in respect to morals it was in America, exactly, as with us; but now, after mature consideration I say, it is worse than with us.

With respect to deception it is most certainly worse; for in Europe the laws lay more restraint upon open deceit: it must be skilfully contrived to escape their animadversion; besides this, a certain sentiment of honour keeps back the Europeans from appearing in public with brazen front, as cheats, and the public itself punishes such a transgression with such boundless contempt, as renders the life of its object very unpleasant. Not so in America. The facility which the laws there furnish, of making an advantageous bankruptcy, and then like a phoenix, rising with new commercial splendour from one's ashes, which the public does not punish with contempt, but on the contrary numbers in the class of tricks resulting from worldly wisdom, so that such a man is esteemed just as much as any other; that is, in exact proportion to the wealth he is supposed to possess; and further, the land speculations, of which there is in Europe, no conception; all this gives to swindlers there, much more room for action than in

* Mr. Becker, now minister of the Calvinistic church at Lancaster, in Pennsylvania. He was a clergyman at Bremen, before he went to America.

† Mr. Becker, in his sermons, which deserve to be known in Germany, as they are descriptive of manners, holds up to the Americans, their corruption in very forcible language.

* I could have added here an infinite number of anecdotes more, but these as proofs of character, are enough, and more than enough.

† The pedantic Americomanes, will here remark with great self complacency, that there are no Muscadins, except in Paris.... It is a real satisfaction to have such weak antagonists.

Europe. As therefore fraud, considered as a violation of the right of property is detrimental to civil liberty, and as the craving of other men's property, on account of the facilities and the numerous seductive temptations, arising from local circumstances, to become master of it, finds infinitely more subsistence in America than in our quarter of the world; it is clear that nothing stands there in the way to prevent the full enjoyment of such a liberty, so much as fraud, or swindling. I do not mean that all the Americans are swindlers; Heaven forbid that I should be guilty of such madness! There are honest men in all countries: I know among the Americans some of that description, and a state where no remnant of virtue should subsist must perish....No....I only say, that in America the enjoyment of civil liberty and happiness is prevented by nothing so much as by a miserable swindling or cheating; and as in Europe the demon of ambition keeps us in chains, so the rights of citizens are violated in America by the satan of fraud.

What possible deception is there, which the French fugitives do not charge upon the Americans in whom they have trusted? They affirm that the American masters of vessels gave the pirates of Bermuda, secret information, in what part of their ships they had concealed their most precious effects, so that the privateersmen found them immediately, and then shared the plunder with the Americans. I cannot however examine into the truth of this accusation. But the difficulty which European merchants meet with to recover their debts in America is notorious. The vain boasting of American commercial houses*, and their enormous commissions are very well known. That trade flourishes notwithstanding this, must be imputed to extraordinary external circumstances, and principally to the war; besides which, it would be found upon close examination, that the principal commercial houses are Europeans, so that it may generally be adopted as a rule, that a foreigner will do better in America, by transacting business only with Europeans, than with Americans. The frauds of the land speculators are well known; especially as there is in Germany no scarcity of sufferers by such deceptions. It is amply proved that naked rocks are sold for good land, and false maps of them exhibited to foreigners. The Indians are shamefully cheated out of their lands; for they are first made drunk, and then their lands are bought of them. As soon as they become sober, the Indians repent their bad bargain, and hence arise most of the wars, though they are likewise often provoked to hostilities by the murders committed by the people dwelling on their borders. In Georgia the land of the Choc-taw Indians used to be sold even without their consent, until the legislature of the state put an end to this scandal, whereby a most deadly hatred between the sellers of property belonging to others, and their adversaries, was kindled, which occasioned assassinations, and had very nearly kindled a civil war. In Baltimore, there were a great number of fictitious sales made between the owners of house lots, which raised them to an enormous price: the chief object of this was, to overreach Europeans, who were unacquainted with their real value. Such fictitious sales, for the same laudable purpose are doubtless very frequent. A friend of mine, of Vienna, by the name of Joubert, went with a cargo of Modena brandy from Leghorn to Philadelphia; unfortunately the brandy was in bottles, and shortly before his arrival congress had declared all brandy that should be imported in bottles, liable to confiscation. Mr. Joubert went from Savannah, where he had arrived with his brandy, and where it was immediately confiscated, to Philadelphia, presented a petition to congress, in which he proved, that it was impossible for him to have known at Leghorn the law, which had been made shortly before his arrival, and prayed for permission to carry away his brandy again. The congress referred him to the judges, in Savannah. Joubert returned to that place; the judges had already drank up his brandy, and my friend was ruined.

I have had above, occasion to mention that the speculator— and — reciprocally revile each other in the news-papers, because the latter maintains that the former owes him eleven hundred thousand dollars, which the former denies. Count — had a bill of exchange upon — the colossal American land trader; — persuaded him to take instead of the bill, a note of hand; but afterwards when the note fell due, he would not pay it. Count — then wrote to Europe to the drawer of the bill, Mr. Parish, at Hamburg, who gave orders to other houses in Philadelphia to pay the bill, if — would not or could not pay it. Hereupon, — at length was induced — to pay the principal and interest to — after he had been obliged to wait more than a year.

Mr. — who is above named, now and then refuses to make payments, even when able to make them. The Americans, who entertain a servile respect for their reputed rich speculators, after receiving a refusal, withdraw with a profound obeisance from this gentleman's anti-chamber; but an European emigrant from St. Domingo, who had intrusted the remnant which he had saved of his property, to — because he had been told that — employed the money of other persons, and gave a good interest for it, forced himself with a pair of loaded pistols into the cabinet of the speculator, put one of them to his ribs, and asked him in an earnest tone, whether he chose to make instant payment, or to be shot? — in a fright called to a servant, and ordered him to go to — and say Mr. — requested him to send him immediately ten thousand dollars....The mouth of the pistol, which was ready cocked, remained all the while close at — side. The ten thousand dollars came, and were paid. And when all was over, Mr. — exclaimed "to what a danger you exposed yourself!" the Frenchman answered, "and you exposed yourself to the danger of being shot! and if every man whom you do not pay, were to treat you as I have done, you would soon be a man of honour." — however, supports many poor people, and exerts himself to be useful to the public, by endeavouring to set on foot, manufactures, such for instance as a glass house, not far from Philadelphia. He listens to every projector, and generally maintains about half a dozen of them. He had also some connection with the celebrated count Benjowsky....He was a school-master....His genius for speculation brought him to his elevation.

LEVITY.

[A finer specimen of the most facetious irony can scarcely be found, than this mock criticism.]

FROM THE MICROCOSM.

Res geste regumque, ducumque, et tristia bella,
Quo scribi possint numero, monstravit Homerus. HOR.

By Homer taught, the modern poet sings,
In Epic strains, of heroes, wars, and kings. FRAN.

There are certain forms and etiquettes in life, which, though the neglect of them does not amount to the commission of a crime, or the violation of a duty, yet so established by example, and sanctioned by custom, as to pass into statutes, equally acknowledged by society, and almost equally binding to individuals, with the laws of the land, or the precepts of morality. A man guilty of breaking these, though he cannot be transported for a felon, or indicted for treasonable practices, is yet, in the high court of custom, branded as a flagrant offender against decorum, as notorious for an unprecedented infringement on propriety.

There is no race of men on whom these laws are more severe than authors; and no species of authors more subject to them, than Periodical Essayists. Homer having prescribed the form, or, to use a more modern praise, set the fashion of Epic Poems, whoever presumes to deviate from his plan, must not hope to participate his dignity: and whatever method, The Spectator, The Guardian, and others, who first adopted this species of writing, have pursued in their undertakings, is set down as a rule for the conduct of their followers; which, whoever is bold enough to transgress, is accused of a deviation from the original design, and a breach of established regulation.

It has hitherto been customary for all periodical writers, to take some opportunity, in the course of their labours, to display their critical abilities, either by making observations on some popular author, and work of known character, or by bringing forth the performances of hidden merit, and throwing light on genius in obscurity. To the critiques of The Spectator, Shakespeare, and more particularly, Milton, are indebted, for no inconsiderable share of the reputation, which they now so universally enjoy; and by his means were the ruder graces, and more simple beauty of Cherry Chase held up to public view, and recommended to general admiration.

I should probably be accused of swerving from the imitation of so great an example, were not I to take occasion to shew that I too am not entirely destitute of abilities of this kind; but that by possessing a decent share of critical discernment, and critical jargon, I am capable of becoming a very tolerable commentator. For the proof of which, I shall rather prefer calling the attention of my readers to an object, as yet untreated of by any of my immediate predecessors, than venture to throw in my observations on any work which has before passed the ordeal of frequent examination. And this I shall do for two reasons; partly, because were I to choose a field, how fertile soever, of which many others had before me been reaping the fruits, mine would be at best but the gleanings of criticism; and partly, from a more interested view, from a selfish desire of accumulated praise; since, by making a work, as yet almost wholly unknown, the subject of my consideration, I shall acquire the reputation of taste, as well as judgment;....of judiciousness in selection, as well as justness in observation;....of propriety in choosing the object, as well as skill in using the language, of commentary.

The Epic Poem on which I shall ground my present critique, has for its chief characteristics, brevity and simplicity. The author,....whose name I lament that I am, in some degree, prevented from consecrating to immortal fame, by not knowing what it is....the author, I say, has not branched his poem into excessences of episode, or prolixities of digression; it is neither variegated with diversity of unmeaning similitudes, nor glaring with the varnish of unnatural metaphor. The whole is plain and uniform; so much so indeed, that I should hardly be surprised if some morose readers were to conjecture, that the poet had been thus simple rather from necessity than choice; that he had been restrained not so much by chastity of judgment, as sterility of imagination.

* The adventures of the merchant, Delius, in America, furnish the best proof of this: to the great mortification of the Americans who will foam with rage, that they make their appearance, nearly about the same time with my book, and may thus probably lead the public to conclude that they, the Americans lie, and that Delius and myself speak the truth,

Nay, some there may be perhaps, who will dispute his claim to the title of an Epic Poet; and will endeavour to degrade him even to the rank of a ballad-monger. But I, as his commentator, will contend for the dignity of my author and will plainly demonstrate his poem to be an Epic Poem, agreeable to the example of all poets, and the consent of all critics heretofore.

First, it is universally agreed, that an Epic Poem should have three component parts; a beginning, a middle, and an end;...secondly, it is allowed, that it should have one grand action, or main design, to the forwarding of which, all the parts of it should directly or indirectly tend; and that this design should be in some measure consonant with, and conducive to, the purposes of morality;...and thirdly, it is indisputably settled, that it should have a Hero. I trust that in none of these points the poem before us will be found deficient. There are other inferior properties, which I shall consider in due order.

Not to keep our readers longer in suspense, the subject of the poem is "The Reformation of the Knave of Hearts." It is not improbable, that some may object to me that a Knave is an unworthy Hero of an Epic Poem; that a hero ought to be all that is great and good. The objection is frivolous. The greatest work of this kind that the world has ever produced, has The "Devil" for its Hero: and supported as my author is by so great a precedent, I contend that his Hero is a very decent Hero; and especially as he has the advantage of Milton's, by reforming at the end, is evidently entitled to a competent share of celebrity.

I shall now proceed to the more immediate examination of the poem in its different parts. The beginning, say the critics, ought to be plain and simple; neither embellished with the flowers of poetry: nor turgid with pomposity of diction. In this how exactly does our author conform to the established opinion! he begins thus,

"The queen of Hearts
"She made some Tarts"....

Can any thing be more clear! more natural! more agreeable to the true spirit of simplicity! Here are no tropes,...no figurative expressions,...not even so much as an invocation to the muse. He does not detain his readers by any needless circumlocution; by unnecessarily informing them, what he is going to sing; or still more unnecessarily enumerating what he is not going to sing: but according to the precepts of Horace,

.....in medias res,
Non secus ac notas, auditorem rapit,....

That is, he at once introduces us, and sets us on the most easy and familiar footing imaginable, with her Majesty of Hearts, and interests us deeply in her domestic concerns. But to proceed,

"The Queen of Hearts
"She made some Tarts,
"All on a summer's day."

Here indeed the prospect brightens, and we are led to expect some liveliness of imagery, some warmth of poetical colouring;... but here is no such thing....There is no task more difficult to a poet, than that of Rejection. Ovid, among the ancients, and Dryden, among the moderns, were perhaps the most remarkable for the want of it. The latter from the haste in which he generally produced his compositions, seldom paid much attention to the "limæ labor," "the labour of correction," and seldom therefore rejected the assistance of any idea that presented itself. Ovid, not content with catching the leading features of any scene or character indulged himself in a thousand minute details of description, a thousand puerile prettinesses, which were in themselves uninteresting, and took off greatly from the effect of the whole; as the numberless suckers, and straggling branches of a fruit-tree, if permitted to shoot out unrestrained, while they are themselves barren and useless, diminish considerably the vigour of the parent stock. Ovid had more genius, but less judgment than Virgil; Dryden more imagination, but less correctness than Pope; had they not been deficient in these points, the former would certainly have equalled, the latter infinitely outshone the merits of his countryman....Our Author was undoubtedly possessed of that power which they wanted; and was cautious not to indulge too far the sallies of a lively imagination. Omitting therefore any mention of...sultry Sirius,...silvan shade,...sequestered glade,...verdant hills,...purling rills,...mossy mountains,...gurgling fountains,... &c. &c....he simply tells us that it was "All on a Summer's Day." For my own part, I confess that I find myself rather flattered than disappointed; and consider the poet as rather paying a compliment to the abilities of his readers, than baffling their expectations. It is certainly a great pleasure to see a picture well painted; but it is a much greater to paint it well oneself. This therefore I look upon as a stroke of excellent management in the poet. Here every reader is at liberty to gratify his own taste; to design for himself just what sort of "Summer's Day" he likes best; to choose his own scenery; to dispose his lights and shades as he pleases; to solace himself with a rivulet, or a horse-pond,...a shower, or a sun-beam, ...a grove, or a kitchen garden, according to his fancy. How much more considerate this, than if the poet had, from an affected accuracy of description, thrown us into an unmannerly perspiration by the heat of the atmosphere; forced us into a landscape of his own planning, with perhaps a paltry good-for-nothing zephyr or two, and a limited quantity of wood and water....All this Ovid would undoubtedly have done. Nay, to use the expression of a learned brother-commentator, "quovis pigro decertem" "I would lay any wager," that he would have gone so far as to tell us what the tarts were made of; and perhaps wandered into an episode on the art of preserving cherries. But our poet, above such considerations, leaves every reader to choose his own ingredients, and sweeten them to his own liking; wisely foreseeing, no doubt, that the more palatable each had rendered them to his own taste, the more he would be affected at their approaching loss.

I cannot leave this line without remarking, that one of the Scribleri, a descendant of the famous Martinus, has expressed his suspicions of the text being corrupted here, and proposes, instead of "All on" reading "Alone," alledging, in favour of this alteration, the effect of solitude in raising the passions. But Hiccius Doctius, a High Dutch commentator, one nevertheless well versed in British literature, in a note of his usual length and learning, has confuted the arguments of Scriblerus. In support of the present reading, he quotes a passage from a poem written about the same period with our author's, by the celebrated Johannes Pastor, entitled "An Elegiac epistle to the Turnkey of Newgate," wherein the gentleman declares, that rather indeed in compliance with an old custom, than to gratify any particular wish of his own, he is going

".....All hanged for to be
"Upon that fatal Tyburn tree."....

Now as nothing throws greater light on an author, than the concurrence of a contemporary writer, I am inclined to be of Hiccius' opinion, and to consider the "All" as an elegant expletive, or, as he more aptly phrases it "elegans expletivum." The passage, therefore must stand thus,

"The Queen of Hearts
"She made some tarts
"All on a Summers Day."

* More commonly known, I believe, by the appellation of Jack Shepherd.

And thus ends the first part, or beginning; which is simple and unembellished; opens the subject in a natural and easy manner; excites, but does not too far gratify our curiosity: for a reader of accurate observation may easily discover, that the Hero of the Poem has not, as yet, made his appearance.

I could not continue my examination at present through the whole of this poem, without far exceeding the limits of a single paper. I have therefore divided it into two; but shall not delay the publication of the second to another week.... as that, besides breaking the connection of criticism, would materially injure the unities of the Poem.

..... Servetur ad inum,
Qualis ab incepto processerit, et sibi constet.
HORA CE.
From his first entrance, to the closing scene,
Let him one equal character maintain.

FRANCIS.

Having thus gone through the first part, or beginning of the poem, we may naturally enough, proceed to the consideration of the second.

The second part, or middle, is the proper place for bustle and busines; for incident and adventure.

"The Knave of Hearts
"He stole those tarts."

Here attention is awakened; and our whole souls are intent upon the first appearance of the Hero. Some readers may perhaps be offended at his making his entre in so disadvantageous a character as that of a thief. To this I plead precedent.

The Hero of the Iliad, as I observed in a former paper, is made to lament very pathetically, ...that "life is not like all other possessions, to be acquired by theft."....A reflection, in my opinion, evidently shewing, that, if he did refrain from the practice of this ingenious art, it was not from want of an inclination that way. We may remember too, that in Virgil's poem, almost the first light in which the pious Aeneas appears to us, is a deer-stealer; nor is it much excuse for him, that the deer were wandering without keepers; for however he might, from this circumstance, have been unable to ascertain whose property they were; he might, I think, have been pretty well assured that they were not his.

Having thus acquitted our Hero of misconduct, by the example of his betters I proceed to what I think the master-stroke of the poet.

"The Knave of Hearts
"He stole those Tarts,
"And...took them... quite away!!"

Here, whoever has an ear for harmony, and a heart for feeling, must be touched! There is a desponding melancholy in the run of the last line! an air of tender regret in the addition of "quite away!" a something so expressive of irrecoverable loss! so forcibly intimating the "Ah nunquam reditura!" "They never can return!" in short, such an union of sound and sense, as we rarely, if ever meet with in any author, ancient or modern. Our feelings are all alive...but the poet, wisely dreading that our sympathy with the injured Queen might alienate our affections from his hero, contrives immediately to awaken our fears for him, by telling us, that

"The King of Hearts
"Call'd for those Tarts,"....

We are all conscious of the fault of our hero, and all tremble with him, for the punishment which the enraged monarch may inflict;

"And beat the Knave.... full sore!"

The fatal blow is struck! We cannot but rejoice that guilt is justly punished, though we sympathize with the guilty object of punishment. Here Scriblerus, who, by the bye, is very fond of making unnecessary alterations, proposes reading "Score instead of "sore" meaning thereby to particularize, that the beating bestowed by this monarch, consisted of twenty stripes. But this proceeds from his ignorance of the genius of our language; which does not admit of such an expression as "full score," but would require the insertion of the particle "a," which cannot be, on account of the metre. And this is another great artifice of the poet: by leaving the quantity of beating indeterminate, he gives every reader the liberty to administer it, in exact proportion to the sum of indignation which he may have conceived against his hero; that by thus amply satisfying their resentment, they may be the more easily reconciled to him afterwards.

"The King of Hearts
"Call'd for those Tarts,
"And beat the Knave full sore!"

Here ends the second part, or middle of the poem; in which we see the character, and exploits of the hero, pourtrayed with the hand of a master.

Nothing now remains to be examined, but the third part, or end. In the end, it is a rule pretty well established, that the work should draw towards a conclusion, which our author manages thus.

"The Knave of Hearts
"Brought back those Tarts."

Here every thing is at length settled; the theft is compensated; the tarts restored to their right owner; and Poetical Justice, in every respect, strictly, and impartially administered.

We may observe, that there is nothing in which our poet has better succeeded, than in keeping up an unremitted attention in his readers to the main instruments, the machinery of his poem, viz. The Tarts; inasmuch, that the aforementioned Scriblerus has sagely observed, that "he can't tell, but he doesn't know, but the tarts "may be reckoned the heroes of the poem." Scriblerus, though a man of learning, and frequently right in his opinion, has here certainly hazarded a rash conjecture. His arguments are overthrown entirely by his great opponent, Hicrius, who concludes, by triumphantly asking, "Had the tarts been eaten, how could the poet "have compensated for the loss of his heroes?"

We are now come to the denouement, the setting all to rights: and our poet, in the management of his moral, is certainly superior to his great ancient predecessors. The moral of their fables, if any they have, is so interwoven with the main body of their work, that in endeavouring to unravel it, we should tear the whole. Our author has very properly preserved his whole and entire for the end of his poem, where he compleats his main design, the reformation of his hero, thus,

"And vow'd he'd steal no more."

Having in the course of his work, shewn the bad effects arising from theft, he evidently means this last moral reflection, to operate with his readers as a gentle and polite dissuasive from stealing.

"The Knave of Hearts
"Brought back those Tarts,
"And vow'd he'd steal no more!"

Thus have I industriously gone through the several parts of this wonderful work; and clearly proved it, in every one of these parts, and in all of them together, to be a due and proper Epic Poem; and to have as good a right to that title, from its adherence to prescribed rules, as any of the celebrated master-pieces of antiquity. And here I cannot help again lamenting, that, by not knowing the name of the author, I am unable to twine our laurels together; and to transmit to posterity the mingled praises of genius, and judgment: of the poet, and his commentator.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

(FROM LITERARY LEISURE.)

I presume it is in literature, as in all other modes of amusement and employment which occupy the time and talents of the various actors on this great theatre of human life, the important personages who represent the kings and heroes of the drama, look down with contempt on those petty actors who personate servants and messengers; while he, whose most exalted business is to deliver a letter with a respectful bow, despises most cordially the whole gang of scene-shifters and candle-snuffers.

In other departments of life the same gradations prevail as amongst "the abstract and brief chronicles of the time."...A merchant, whose vessels are forwarded to their destined ports by every wind that blows, who sees on his table the produce of the Eastern and Western Indies, and who can jocosely boast of his farms in either hemisphere, casts a supercilious eye on the industrious trader, who subsists by retaining these valuable commodities:...he, in turn, thinks commerce degraded by those petty dealers who preside over a chandler's shop; while the chandler's shop-keeper contemns the travelling pedlar, whose whole possessions are contained in a portable pack.

Thus it is, one universal chain of subordination pervades the whole of society, and the connecting links are not more easily distinguishable in the gradations from a monkey to Sir Isaac Newton, than in every particular class and order into which the human species is reducible. Authors, no doubt, preserve the same proportionable distinctions; and the important compiler of a folio scoffs at the wittling, whose labours can be comprised in an octavo or duodecimo; while he, who arrives at the dignity of a bound book, however small, derides the fugitive efforts of a periodical writer. All orders of men, however, are ingenious at finding their own inferiors. Thus even a diurnal or weekly essayist may fancy himself superior to the nurseling of the muses, who ventures an occasional sonnet into a Magazine, or who sends an unfledged elegy to flutter in a newspaper.

There is, however, a class of writers, for whom it would be difficult to find an appropriate station...men who occasionally display in small compositions, every talent requisite to adorn the sublimest...who are capable of involving an apparently clear subject in metaphorical obscurity, or of adorning a barren one with all the graces of poetry...some who, in the compass of twelve or fourteen lines, display a copious command of words, and a perfect knowledge of the beauties of language;...others who, satisfied with the intrinsic merit of the subject of their labours, content themselves with displaying its utility in specific terms of elegant and affecting simplicity. I have myself bestowed infinite attention on the compositions of this class of authors. To describe half the merits I have discovered in them, would fill a folio of no common size. Let not, therefore, these my worthy brethren suppose, that because my essays, small as they are, are more bulky than their's, I rashly imagine myself their superior. No! no! I am too good a judge of intellectual merit...I know wit is not to be appreciated by weight or bulk; and there is often more talent displayed in a composition of four or five lines, than in the most ponderous volume industry ever compiled. It is to rescue this class of writers from unmerited neglect that I now draw my quill;...and though I may not enumerate many of those productions which have so often afforded me delight and instruction, let not those who are overlooked, attribute that circumstance to my blindness to their merits, but rather let them with me, candidly lament the narrow limits of my paper, which will not allow of my extending my commendations.

In those diurnal repositories of intelligence, politics, wit, scandal, and erudition, which form the delight of a true-born Englishman, which give the highest zest to his morning meal, and enable him to decide on the character of his mind for the ensuing day, by the account they give of the complexion of public affairs, there is usually a certain number of columns set apart for the valuable essays I allude to, which are, in general, perused only by a set of readers who look less for the wit, humour, sarcasm, or learning, than for the solid information they contain. Nay, it is often uttered as a reproach to a pains-taking reader of a newspaper, that he studied every advertisement in it. Henceforth beware, ye shallow critics, how ye dart the arrows of ridicule at a study of so much importance. The advertisements! do they not contain the most interesting intelligence of the whole paper? May not every man and every woman find means to satisfy every want, every wish they may form and many they would never otherwise have thought of forming, if they will but peruse the advertisements? Are not bachelors there invited to the possession of most admirable wives? Are not spinsters courted to accept of unobjectionable men for husbands? Are not the peculiar qualifications requisite for a friend most accurately described in one of them, by a profound philosopher, who would not trust his own judgment in the selection of so important an acquisition, but who, making known to mankind at large the peculiar temper and qualities which would secure his friendship, waited with exemplary patience till the man whom the cap fitted, came, and sought the invaluable treasure. I doubt not but this admirable plan met with the desired success, and was amply rewarded. I have not been able to discover whether the advertiser was recompensed for his exertions; but by the cessation of the advertisement, after having for some time courted the attention of the public by the word friendship in large letters, I presume it was at length crowned with fruition.

I think I recollect but one instance in well-attested history, of any thing similar to this laudable attempt; and in that instance the event was equal to the merit of the means. I allude to the wise method taken by the king's son; of chusing for his wife that lady whose foot would go into the little glass slipper of which he was enamoured. No doubt the proclamation, by which he invited all the females of his dominions to try to obtain the crown by submitting to the appointed test, must have been worded like the advertisement I have pointed at. I am sorry I have not a copy of it at hand, that I might present my readers with a specimen of so useful a composition. But there are others with which I can gratify their curiosity; one in particular, which ought to be more universally circulated than any common newspaper can be capable of doing: and I trust these lucubrations of mine will give to the author that celebrity he so justly deserves.

The piece I am going to lay before my readers is, I will just premise, founded on the most philanthropical and patriotic principles; and I have ever observed that those two admirable qualities, when genuine, do ever go hand in hand, and are the usual concomitants of distinguished talents and deep research. But I will expatiate no longer, but instantly proceed to the advertisement itself.

SAFE WALKING IN FROSTY WEATHER.

"In consequence of many accidents that have happened, by persons falling in walking in frosty weather, J. Cooke, of Exeter, saddler, has studied a safe remedy, by reviving and improving the American creeper, to be applied underneath ladies' or gentlemen's shoes with a buckle and strap...

The creeper has two branches of iron to catch, and prevent entire sliding: they have been tried by ladies and gentlemen who have walked miles at ease with them, and they are recommended by the faculty. The price is only 2s. 6d. a pair....nothing adequate to the expense of a broken leg!....and as the thermometer stands low, the frosty weather may continue....Should his majesty's troops want them, they shall be rendered at 1s. 6d. a pair to them.

"N. B. As J. Cooke makes his business his study, he can employ his workmen in the slackest season by some invention of improvement for the public good. Any article for the spring, summer, autumn, or winter, can be had at his shop as modern as at any saddler's in London, as he deals with the very same linings, curriers, and saddle-tree-makers as they do; and if the same oil is afforded, his lamp can burn as well as their's.... He intends sending their majesties and the royal family these creepers, and, not forgetting the salvation of this kingdom, to the right honourable prime minister, to support him in all weathers.... as his ways and means are just."

Not the most superficial reader can peruse the foregoing composition, without being struck with the various good and benevolent qualities of the heart displayed by J. Cooke; his general philanthropy and attention to the good of the public, awakened by witnessing many melancholy accidents occasioned by walking in frosty weather. He could not hope so to reform mankind as to confine them to their houses during the continuance of the frost, particularly, as it appeared, from the state of the thermometer, likely to endure a considerable time; he therefore humanely studied for a safe remedy, and appears, so great is the force of example, to have communicated the fervour of his benevolent zeal even to the faculty.

Inimical to their interests as must have been the recommendation of these American creepers, they have laudably conspired with J. Cook to induce the public to adopt them; for I cannot, in this instance, submit to the opinion of Aunt Priscilla, that this apparent candour of the faculty is, in fact, no commendation at all of this invention of J. Cooke's, since she cannot suppose that any set of men can be so liberal as to advise the adoption of methods which would effectually deprive them of so beneficial a branch of practice, as arises from fractured limbs and broken skulls, occasioned by falling in frosty weather.

The force of argument with which Mr. Cooke recommends his creepers, is at once clear to every comprehension, and demonstrated with mathematical precision. The inadequacy of the expense attending the first purchase of these useful articles, to that arising from a broken leg, the merest tyro in arithmetic can calculate. The loyalty and public spirit he evinces in sending them to the royal family and to the right honourable prime minister, can never be too warmly extolled; but it now remains for me to praise the language and style of this small composition. It is a perfect example of the middle style, not rising to the ponderous sublimity of Johnson, nor sinking into the familiar vulgarity which debases many modern writings; not disclaiming the aid of metaphor to illustrate and adorn his subject, yet not fetching such ornament from any obscure or distant topics; but, as his essay was intended to meet the eye, and speak to the understanding of his countrymen of all descriptions, adopting the domestic, yet expressive allusion to a lamp.

Nor does Mr. Cooke, with the false modesty of many modern writers, fastidiously conceal his acquaintance with that book, to deserve whose expressions is the highest of all praise. I cannot indeed but approve of the propriety with which he applies to the prime minister, one of the few phrases from that book, which can with any justice be used in a public sense; but, happily, this is the concluding sentence of Mr. Cooke's advertisement. He felt, no doubt, with the nice discrimination of an author, that he could rise no higher in the scale of sublimity, and he had the judgment to avoid an anti-climax.

To one other performance of this kind I beg next to call the attention of my readers; though, from the singular modesty with which it is introduced, it scarcely arrests the eye in the same manner as more splendid advertisements. It does, however, sufficiently partake of their nature to be pronounced to belong to that class of writings; and I shall not scruple to declare it one of their brightest specimens, though simply called

"Any person nicely sensible, irritable, hypochondrical, hysterical;....or who, again, is dyspeptic, hepatic, splenetic, gouty, paralytic, rheumatic, of an evil habit of body, scorbutic, asthmatic, dropsical, corpulent, bloated, yellow, flabby,....or otherwise, thin, dry, and rigid; who (harassed with spasms, cramps, wind, hiccups, belchings, acidity, distracting dreams, depressing thoughts, and sleepless nights) is uneasy, anxious, low, wandering, dissatisfied; who without being able to present an adequate cause or reason, fears fever of the nerves, and derangement of their functions; and who, thence, dreads to become excors, orbus, and expes, may, with the utmost confidence and freedom, relate his (or her) case, in detail, to Mr. Rymer, surgeon and apothecary, at Reigate, Surrey, for advice, and (Deo lubente et juvante) relief. Letters may be sent, post free....See Mr. Rymer's tract, price 1s. upon indigestion, hypochondriacism, gout, &c. sold by Evans, Paternoster-Row; at No. 29, Haymarket; No. 87, Fleet-street; and No. 63, Bishopsgate-street within; where may be had, by the same author, 'Physiological Conjectures relative to certain Functions of the Animal Economy,' price one shilling."

All compositions, of whatever size and extent, usually bear upon the face of them one prevailing characteristic. As that of Mr. Cooke's advertisement was philanthropy and patriotism, no one can hesitate in pronouncing this to bear the stamp of peculiar modesty. I own I am myself more immediately struck with traits of moral character than with indications of talent; and therefore perhaps it is that I am more delighted with the singular humility of Mr. Rymer's address, than with his unequalled display of erudition.

In the first place, not to dwell on the delicacy with which he contents himself to hint to his countrymen the service he may do them, rather than to compel their attention by those traps so easily seen through, how guarded is the tenor of his expressions! The afflicted may apply to him for advice, and....for relief; they may apply, but he makes no pompous promises of acquiescence. He does not even boast of his talents. He also kindly permits those who are willing to become his patients, to send their letters post-free; and for the certainty of this privilege, refers them to his "Tract on Indigestion, Hypochondriacism, &c." He does not even tell them that the above-mentioned Tract will confirm their opinion of his medical knowledge....he merely introduces the mention of it, to prove that letters may be sent post-free.

The title of his other Tract is another instance of his singular modesty. He calls it "Physiological Conjectures." This is indeed candour. Many modern infidels have endeavoured to decry the system of medicine for its pretended infallibility. Mr. Rymer here overturns that opposition from its foundation, by styling his opinions conjectures; but charmed as I am with the author's modesty, candour, and docility, I must not omit to notice the blaze of erudition with which he dazzles his readers. The catalogue of diseases is so learnedly written, that it cannot but enchant the sapient, and astonish the unknowing. The elegant conciseness and laconic energy of the diction are wonderful, and prove his intimate acquaintance with his own language, while his quotations sufficiently evince his familiarity with the Latin. Of Greek he avoided making any display....he is not a man to affect parade. I cannot forbear remarking that he has, through the whole of this most perfect little essay, made the most uncommon selection of well-adapted terms. He has also judiciously classed and divided his disorders, and heightened the effect of his diction by the use of contrast. He has most accurately and impressively described the alarming and uneasy symptoms which afflict so many patients, who are ill without being "able to present an adequate cause or reason;" and has furnished them with specific expressions, by which, hereafter, they may more fully state what it is they fear.

If any ill-natured critic should observe, that he ought not to have used Latin words for this purpose, since many honest English patients may by this means be prevented from understanding their own alarms, I can only say that I doubt not but Mr. Rymer had good reason for what he did; and I would advise him to adopt the well-known answer of the philosopher to the man who inquired what he had got hidden under his cloak...."I carry it there," replied the sage, "that you may not know!"

THE FARRAGO.* FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

*His secura quies, et necia fullere vita
Dives opum variorum; hic latia otia fundis,
Spelunca, vinique lacus, hic frigida Tempe
Mugitusque bovm, mollesque sub arbore somni.*

VIRE. GEORGICORVM, LIB. II.

Here easy quiet, a secure retreat,
A harmless life, that knows not how to cheat,
With home-bred plenty the rich owner bless,
And rural pleasures crown his happiness.
Unvex'd with quarrels, undisturbed with noise
THE COUNTRY KING, his peaceful realm enjoys:
Cool grots and living lakes, the flowery pride
Of meads and streams, that through the valley glide;
And shady groves, that easy sleep invite,
And, after toilsome days, a sweet repose at night,
DRYDEN.

Here peace is thine, and life, that knows no change,
And various wealth in Nature's boundless range,
The grot, the living fount, the umbrageous glade,
And sleep on banks of moss beneath the shade.
SOMERSET.

The courtly reader of these essays, will readily acknowledge, that they have not....a torn air. Sequestered in a hamlet from "the busy hum of men," and knowing but little of the world, except from the map over my chimney, I allude chiefly to rural events, and the scenes of my speculations are naturally laid in the country. This is a formidable objection to the Farrago, among those "in populous city pent," who can relish no description so well as of streets and alleys. I sometimes regret for the sake of modish readers, that I have receded so far from the sea-shore as to be incapable of narrating the vicissitudes of fashion, the length of a shoe-string, or breadth of a bonnet. But the good natured will attribute my silence on these momentous topics no less to my situation, than to my choice. It is natural for a hermit to talk much of his cell, and for the water drinker, who, in the words of Waller....

Rarely has the use
Of the grape's surprising juice, to harrangue in praise of brooks, and to deplore the mischief of wine. Instead of the rustling of silks, my rustical ears hear only the rustling of leaves, and the distant waterfall. A robin, whistling under my window, wake me at the dawn, instead of a serenade from the theatrical band; and at the twilight hour, while city beaux are hurrying to hear the Syrens at a concert "utter dulcet breath," the uniform moan of the night-raven composes my solitary music.

* Written originally in the country, but never before published.

One evening, last week, conformably to my usual custom, I drew my lamp to my bedside, and read, with rapture, that inimitable ode of Horace, in which he so poetically paints the landscape of Italy, and the innoxious pleasures of the rural life. I slept and dreamed of Arcadia. My social robin caroled at the dawn. I rose and read Rousseau. There is so much of the enthusiasm of genius, in all the works of the citizen of Geneva, that his volumes are seldom closed, till the tremor of my nerves becomes insupportable. His eloquent letter in Liloisa, descriptive of his enchanting country, on the banks of the lake of Lausanne, I continued to peruse, till the sun, firing the tops of some old oaks in front of my window, warned me to walk before his beams should become oppressive. With spirits, light as air, I ascended the mountain, that overhangs the village in which I reside, and leaning against a rock, whose side had been chiseled by time, and fashioned into a fantastic chair, I contemplated the magic of Nature. The prospect comprised all, which constitutes the perfection of landscape. Wood and water, broken and cultivated surface, "hills umbered by shade, and vallies gleaming with the sun." The spiral smoke rising from the peasants' chimneys, the river of Connecticut winding slowly to the ocean, the slender birches on the adverse bank, surveying their fair forms reflected in the water, and the whole country, in the bold phrase of Thomson, "unbounded, tossing in a flood of corn," formed a scene, of which those who breathe the polluted air of cities have no conception.

While busied in these rural contemplations, I had forgotten that the coffee, prepared by my maid Dorcas, was probably cold, as the usual breakfast hour had glided away. I, therefore, searched around for some cottage, where my solitary six-pence would purchase a bowl of milk, and a seat at the door. After walking over an acre or two of compacted brakes, which, in Fancy's eye, appeared ranged in battalia, to oppose me, a winding path, fringed on each side by a strip of vivid green sward, conducted me to "a low roofed peasant's nest." A couple of flaxen headed little boys run rapidly to the door, and I had approached so near, that I could distinctly hear them warn their father of a strange gentleman's approach, who, in their simple phrase, "looked a little crazy." The proprietor of the rural tenement, at whose entrance I stood, advanced to meet and welcome me. He was an old man. His rough hand, which grasped mine, had held the plough for fifty summers, and there was a warmth in the cordial shake, which ensued, worth more than all the ceremonious civility of those, who hold... a fan. I "sat in the sun, at his door," and heard the narrative of the farmer's life. From habit, as well as principle, agriculture was his profession. "The day," continued the honest ploughman, "that I was twenty-one, I married that little, brown woman, whom you see yonder, spinning in the shade, and settled in a hut, on this mountain. I remember the parson of the parish once said, in a sermon, that every man should be the builder of his own fortune. My only implements have been the ax and the plough; so you must not wonder, young gentleman, at the lowliness of my dwelling. When I went out to my first day's work, I remember, that, I slept more soundly, under an old log, which partly sheltered me from the night dew, than ever you could, on down. For I see, by the paleness of your cheeks, and the languor of your air, that you are wasted by cares, which consume, and that, amidst the blandishments of cities, and the roses of the feast, you have chased the fairies of pleasure, and drank wine, instead of milk. But, on these hills, Health and Husbandry are joint tenants with me and mine. I labour through the week, and independency crowns my toil. On Sundays, I read a few books, which a brother, who died at college, bequeathed me; and in one of them, which, it seems, was composed many years ago, in old Rome, I learn, that, even the misers of those days would gladly exchange their gold and care, for such a hut, as mine. You see, continued he, leading me to a gushing spring, that my wine flows from nature's press, pure as the air we breathe. Half the dishes I taste, are filled from the beds in that garden, and, in the words of the farmer's ditty, "my ploughing, my sowing, my reaping and mowing," are the spice by which those dishes are seasoned.

To this simple narrative I listened with rapture, and wished that false philosophy had never induced me to barter sylvan for city cares. After cordially thanking the aged peasant for his hospitality, and repeating that, when I could extricate myself from the chains of care, I would again repose myself in his hermitage, and hear lessons from its benignant proprietor, the sun growing fiery, I wiped the dew from my forehead, and a tear of regret from my cheek, and pensively quitted the mountain.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

Nothing is more common than the disappointment felt and expressed by those, who are eager to be introduced to an Author. Expectation having been highly raised, it is almost certain it will be mocked. He, whose writings have pleased, disgusts us by his talk, and men are astonished to find him, who is so correct in his pages, so careless in his life. The admirer of a fine stile is vexed that an author should descend to common topics and the ordinary phrase. The moralist grieves that any thing issues from the author's mouth but the proverbs of Solomon. Some are chagrined that he is sullen, and others are offended by his loquacity. The ladies do not find him so handsome as was expected, and the coxcombs discover that he is unfashionably dressed! On the difference between an author's talents in his closet and in company, let us hear a sensible writer.

I have seen men remarkably lively and well informed in conversation appear to great disadvantage on committing their thoughts to paper; and others who write learnedly, elegantly, politely, and acutely, so dull and apparently so weak in conversation, as to be considered as unpleasant and uninteresting companions. I have observed this so often, as to be led to think, what may appear paradoxical, that a genius for writing and a genius for talking are different in their nature.

It appears to me that superficial men talk most fluently, and, in mixed companies, most agreeably. They are usually gay and cheerful, for their spirits are not exhausted by deep thought, nor drawn from things before them by absence. But gaiety and cheerfulness give them, in the convivial hour, a grace which the profound scholar, who utters his thoughts with gravity and hesitation can seldom display.

A man of a superficial mind and little genius has no diffidence arising from those delicacies and sensibilities, which often cruelly distress men of real ability. What he thinks, or has read, or heard he utters with the confidence of an oracle: ignorant of objections, and fearless of mistake. His confidence gives him credit. The company is always disposed to listen with attention when any man speaks with the assurance of undoubting conviction. Attention gives him additional spirits, and he begins to claim the greatest share of conversation as his right, and at length, overpowers with volubility and emphasis the silent or gentle diffidence of modest merit.

Ignorant and superficial admirers finding a voluble speaker just calculated for the meridian of their understandings are highly delighted with him as a companion, and cry him up as a prodigy of parts and abilities.

Their voices uniting in his favour, procure him, perhaps, some professional, or official employment, in which composition may be necessary. He writes; and the wonder is no more. How are the mighty fallen! Quantum mutatus!

Applauded by a few, he ventures to publish. A fatal venture! For he, who appeared in conversation a giant, becomes, when approached in the closet, a pigmy or a Lilliputian.

I wish to prevent the hasty formation of the idea of a man's intellectual talents or genius solely from his pleasantness or vivacity as a companion. Constant experience proves it to be a fallacious criterion. Men of great thoughts, solid judgment, and well digested learning are able indeed to speak to great advantage on great occasions; but they are not sufficiently interested in trifling, or ordinary company; and without pride, or any intention to slight, naturally retreat from nonsense or levity to the pleasant indulgence of their own contemplations; therefore, they say but little in such company, and that little often from civility rather than because they are struck with what passes, or impelled to speak by the interesting nature of the question, or the manner in which it is discussed. In the meantime, a feather will tickle and excite a fool.

It is wrong therefore, I conclude to form a decisive opinion of a man's professional abilities, from what appears in common conversation. The only true criterion is the exercise of those abilities in some act of his profession. I judge of the companion in company, but of the lawyer's abilities at the bar or from his written opinion; of the clergyman's from the pulpit or the press; of the physician's from the repeated success of his actual practice; judge of the merchant from his punctuality and payments, from his behaviour on the mart, and not from his volubility at the coffee-house.

It is an erroneous judgment, which is often formed of children, as well as men, when those are supposed to have the best parts, who talk most. Excessive garrulity is certainly incompatible with solid thinking, and is the mark of that volatile and superficial turn, which, dwelling upon the surfaces of things, never penetrates deeply enough to make any valuable discoveries. But, as no rule is without exceptions, some great thinkers, it must be confessed, have also been great talkers.

No man can unite in himself every excellence. He, who excels as a pleasant and lively companion, may be deficient in judgment, in accuracy, in a power of attention and labour; and he, who excels in these, may want the versatility, the gaiety, the cheerfulness, which are necessary to render the communication of ideas in a mixed society, agreeable. Men associate in the convivial hour of leisure, from their professional or commercial employment, more for the sake of passing their time with ease, and even mirth, than of being improved, or lessened by the sage remarks of austere philosophy.

Addison, who could write so agreeably on all subjects, was not an entertaining companion, unless the circle was select. Johnson loved company, because he found himself attended to in it, as an oracle of taste and wisdom; but he could not be said to possess companionable agreement. His character ensured him respect, previously to his speaking, and what he said, justified it; for it was original and solid; his authoritative tone and manner compelled acquiescence, even if conviction was not produced; but after all, he was not what the world calls a pleasant companion. Some of his contemporaries of far inferior merit, and more circumscribed reputation, diffused joy and information wherever they went, and were beloved, at the same time that they were admired. They have also written books, but their books are not to be compared to Johnson's. Their books were forgotten or despised, even while their conversation was sought and enjoyed by all ranks of people.

But, as universal excellence is desirable, it seems right, that men should labour to supply every defect, and, therefore, I wish writers to cultivate the art and habits of conversation, and talkers, on the other hand, to obtain the solidity and accuracy of writers; and thus the advantage derived to hearers and readers will be augmented."

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,
[About three years since, in the course of a journey up the lakes, I had the pleasure, at Detroit, of becoming acquainted with a gentleman, who had travelled much among the different Indian nations, and understood the languages of several of them: from him I received an account, of which the following is a copy. I think it very curious, and worthy of preservation in your entertaining miscellany.]

According to your request, sir, of yesterday, I send you the song of a Chippeway Indian, composed on leaving his mistress, to go against a large party of the Ottagamies, that had attacked his nation. What his fate was I am unable to inform you.

I send you also a bad translation, in which much of the strength of the original is lost. I would have sent it in plain prose, in which I could have done it more justice, but your observation, that "a song in one language, ought to be a song in another," induces me to give it you in its present form. The Indian songs, however, have neither the rhythm of the English, French, &c. nor the measure of the Greek and Latin poetry: but their language is strong and impressive. They are dictated by uncultured nature, and are well calculated to call into action the passions of mankind in a rude state, as the images, with which, like the poetry of the Orientals, they abound, are mostly familiar to the senses. Their language, like the characters they use to write in, may be called hieroglyphical; of this, you see instances in the speeches, made by their chiefs, at the different treaties with the whites. They speak, for example, of the tree of peace, the chain of friendship, the hatchet of war; and, in like manner, when they declare war, a messenger is sent to their enemies, who, perhaps, without saying a word, delivers them a hatchet or tomahawk, painted red, with the symbol of the nation (as a tortoise, buck, &c.) marked on it. When they sue for peace, a band of wampum is sent.

The pronunciation and length of their words, render it difficult to confine them to any measure; but still a choice is much attended to, in the formation of their songs, which are mostly epic, and few possessed of the tenderness of the following.

I remain, &c,

Mohegon pichebo teskenekaw Matenah, makawalah nepish, saumaganosh! temante metoka, caulachee nepish.

Tauncendah mittah natchemowee, edawlah wawkeec, neremosa Matenah, natchewah Mohegon, Matenah nepish.

Natchewah mawah, temaune sauokee, endaulah! commawin nautagetchemegaugh, towah makawatah, tawawmissec.

Katcheh! nepish Matenah, tomatewatsaw Mohegon; topawah matakeeneh, topawah sauokee topawah.

Katchekee Mohegon maneto petontec, Mateneh maneto semakawingosh, wakaw watsaw, tapin kooli saumaganosh.

TRANSLATION.

See, Matenah, Mohegon flies
At glory's ardent call,
Where, gash'd with wounds, the warrior dies,
Yet triumphs in his fall.

And if decreed my life to give,
To keep our nation free,
My Matenah, my charmer, live
For him, who died for thee!

Ah! live to hear thy lover's name
Prais'd for his patriot fire,
And join the glorious song of fame,
His warlike deeds inspire.

So, when those eyes are clos'd in night,
Shall great Mohegon prove,
Renew'd the scenes of dear delight,
Which taught him here to love.

Katchekee* shall his shade convey,
With thine to make it blest,
Where, far beyond the western ray,
The brave forever rest.

SELECTED POETRY.

[The following, gleaned from an old magazine, is a good description of the pensive pleasures of a lonely enthusiast.]

While busy mortals crowd around
The city, court and throne,
Intent to see, and to be seen,
To know and to be known;
I turn away, content I turn
To sweet domestic bowers,
And ponder how I best may spend
My life's few fleeting hours.
The twinkling twilight oft I trace,
Sometimes the dusky dawn,
My steps unseen by human race,
I love to be alone.

Yet sure my thoughtful musing mind
The social transport knows,
Round many a friend these opening arms
With extacy would close.
Sure I could leave my couch by night,
To serve my greatest foe;
And quit the brightest hour of joy,
To wipe the tear of woe.
'Tis giddy, trifling, vain parade
My heart and mind disown,
The endless buzz, by folly made;
I love to be alone.

Yet not averse, when duty calls,
I leave my quiet sphere,
And mingle in the walks of men,
The walks of men are dear.
I love the intellectual feast,
Shar'd with the good and wise,
Nor less the little temperate meal
Simplicity supplies.
I freely join the rustic throng,
Licentious scenes unknown,
With children play; but ere 'tis long,
I wish to be alone.

But oh! while sorrow's mingled cries
Through earth's fair vales resound,
The ear of pensive fancy tries
To catch the piercing sound;
Her wishful eye surveys the shores,
Where sable lovers part;
His trembling limbs fell iron tears,
Keen anguish breaks her heart.
Oh! could I aid this injur'd race,
I'd seek their flaming zone,
The white and sable tyrants face,
Nor wish to be alone.

* Katchekee is the name of a spirit, who, they believe, conveys the warriors, who fall in the defence of their nation, to a place of perpetual happiness; where the sky is constantly unclouded, and where, under the shade of spreading trees, they taste delights, which, in their former state, they were too weak to bear. The Supreme Spirit they call Katche-maneto, i. e. Governor of souls.

And oh! for sweet sincerity
The pensive muse shall guide;
I feel the lonely lot of man
Has happiness denied.
Unblest is he that wanders o'er
The varied paths of time,
Without a kind and gentle maid,
Companion of his prime;
Good natur'd, gentle, kind and fair...
Were such a maid my own,
Better with her my lot to share,
Than live and die alone.

[The suavity of the subsequent stanzas will sooth the ear of the poet, and the gallant may repeat them to himself.]

FROM HAFEZ, THE PERSIAN POET.

SOFTLY.

Disguised last night I rush'd from home,
To seek the palace of my soul;
I reached by silent steps the dome,
And to her chamber softly stole.

On a gay, various couch reclin'd,
In sweet repose I saw the maid;
My breast, like aspens to the wind,
To love's alarms softly play'd.

Two fingers then to half expanse,
I trembling op'd with fear oppress'd;
With these I pull'd her veil askance,
Then softly drew her to my breast.

"Who art thou wretch?" my angel cry'd,
Whispering I said, thy slave, thy swain;
But hush my love, forbear to chide,
Speak softly, lest some hear the strain.

Trembling with love, with hope and fear,
At length her ruby lips I press'd;
Sweet kisses oft...mellifluous...dear,
Softly I snatch'd...was softly blest.

"O, let me" now inflamed I said,
My idol clasp within these arms;
"Remove the light," deep sigh'd the maid,
Come, softly, come, prevent alarms.

Now by her side, with bliss I glow'd,
Swift flew the night in am'rous play;
At length the morning's herald crow'd,
When softly thence I bent my way.

EPIGRAM.

ON MR....THE WINE MERCHANT.
His cursed compounds while Balderdash vends,
And brews his dear poisons for all his dear friends,
No wonder they never can get him to dine;
He's afraid they'd oblige him to drink his own wine!

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXIX.

In bowers of laurel, trimly dight,
We will outwear the silent night;
While Flora busy is to spread
Her richest treasure on our bed.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

.....Here be all the pleasures,
That Fancy can beget on youthful thoughts,
When the fresh blood grows lively, and returns,
Brisk as the April buds, in primrose season.
MILTON'S CONUS.

It has been a common custom among my predecessors in this department of composition, to relieve the dryness, or the sameness of prose, by an occasional article of poetry. In this manner, many minor poems of celebrated authors, have been, without much parade, ushered into life; and I cannot help thinking, that a paper, thus variegated, will be considered, by the lovers of miscellany, as having fully answered the end of its being. In grave and scientific works, a departure from system offends; but in the lucubrations of the desultory essayist, men look for varied hues, and fantastic combination. For comfort and for use, the quaker simplicity of drab broad cloth, is chosen, but to please the giddy eye, and to add to holiday splendour, we spangle our drapery, and call on Iris for her most vivid colours.

In the twenty-first number of this year's Port Folio, there occurs a prose version of a Persian madrigal in an extract from the works of sir William Jones. The Editor expressed his hope, that P. D. a classical correspondent, would decorate this Persian beauty, with poetical ornaments. As this expectation was not realized, a new and volunteer translator has appeared; and, without farther preface, we introduce him to our readers. As he makes his bow gracefully, and expresses himself in the fluent diction of a well-bred scholar, we are confident, that he will meet a polite and gracious reception.

MR. SAUNTER,

As your correspondent "P. D." has not complied with your request, and the wishes of your readers, I send you a versification of one of your Persian translations; which, if I remember right, is part of an ode of Hafiz. I would have attempted the others, but that I have too much diffidence to adventure far in a path, that has been trodden by sir William Jones, and professor Carlyle.

Accompanying this, are two others, from the book of Solomon; which, however, rather appear to have been written by a fine, lively, and amorous girl, who, like Sappho, complains of her colour being too deep a shade.

My intention was, merely to point out, by putting them into the same measure, the similarity between the poetry of the Persians, and that of Solomon. We find both frequently speaking in the female character; and very similar to some of the stanzas of the latter, is the following, from the Oriental Collections, No. 3, page 204. "My soul longs to clasp my beloved in my arms! I will put on my ornaments; I will prepare the bed, and the garlands of flowers." The stanzas of both have little, or no connection; so that, you may, in general, take any one from the rest, or alter its position, without injury. The imagery, too, of both, is much the same; though indeed, Solomon has some figures, wilder than any I have seen, in the translations from the Persian.

When I turned to "Solomon's Songs," I must confess, it was with somewhat of an inclination to versify them all; but that vanity, which induced me to think myself equal to such a task, was instantaneously annihilated, on finding the fair one's eyes compared to "the fish-pools of Heshbon, by the gate of Bath-rabbim;" and her nose to the tower of Lebanon, which looketh towards Damascus." This is a sublimity, to which I am perfectly conscious of being unable to soar; I have, therefore, left it to those of happier genius, and contented myself with selecting a few of the simplest stanzas from the first and second songs.

FROM THE PERSIAN.

The rose can never boast its sweet,
Without the cheek of her I love;
Nor without wine, the cool retreat,
Where gush the fountains in the grove.

Nor walk along the fragrant bower,
Nor in the garden gives delight;
If in the calm and pensive hour,
We miss the minstrel of the night.

The cypress, dancing in the breeze,
And flowers, by gentle Zephyr blown,
Cannot, without her presence, please,
Whose cheeks are like the tulip's down.

Nor does the presence of a maid,
Whose lips each balmy sweet possess,
In whom is either rose display'd,
Delight, without the sweet caress.

Sweet is the place, where roses grow,
And sweet is wine, within the grove;
But yet, less sweet the roses glow,
And wine, without the maid I love.

Not all the pictures art can form,
Not all, that Fancy can devise,
So much this am'rous bosom warm,
As rosy cheeks, and radiant eyes.

FROM THE FIRST SONG OF SOLOMON*.

O, clasp me in thy close embrace,
And press those balmy lips to mine!

* Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth: for thy love is sweeter than wine.
I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon.

Thy love, dear youth of matchless grace,
Thy love is sweeter, far, than wine!

Though oe'r my slender form the sun
Has all his fiercest radiance thrown,
What youth my proffer'd love would shun?
What maid my beauty will not own?

Tell me, beloved of my soul,
Where thou thy gentle flocks dost feed,
Where rest'st at noon....nor let me stroll
To those, that thy companions lead.

More sweet than myrrh, when zephyrs spread
Its perfumes, as they, wanton, fly;
O, quickly come! and let thy head
All night, upon my bosom lie.

What youth shall e'er to thee compare?
Whose charms shall vie with thine, my love?
Thy skin excels the lily fair,
Thine eyes, the mildness of the dove.

O come then! come, in all thy charms,
By thousand softest wishes led;
O come! and clasp me in thy arms,
Where, green and mossy is our bed!

FROM THE SECOND SONG OF SOLOMON*

What music was it to my ear,
When thus did my beloved say,
Awake! arise, my charming fair!
Arise, my love, and come away!

For, lo! the wintry clouds are past,
The tempests all away are flown,
The chilling winds no longer last,
The rain is over, too, and gone.

All nature now incites to love;
The flowers display their gayest hue,
The songsters warble in the grove....
Hark, how the am'rous turtles coo!

Now, while the budding figs appear,
And round the grape, rich perfumes play,
O haste! arise, my charming fair!
Arise, my love, and come away!

Tell me, O thou, whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one, that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?

A bundle of myrrh is my beloved unto me; he shall lie all night betwixt my breasts.

Behold thou art fair, my love; behold thou art fair; thou hast dove's eyes.

Behold, thou art fair, my beloved; yea, pleasant: also our bed is green.

* My beloved spake, and said unto me, rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away:

For lo! the winter is past, the rain is over and gone.

The flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.

The fig-tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines, with the tender grape, give a good smell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

IN AMERICA.

CHAPTER XXX.

More murders committed in six months, than throughout the Prussian dominions, in three years.... Two children murdered in one week, at Philadelphia.... Incestuous offspring of a father by his daughter.... Frequency of the venereal disease... Report of a senatorial temple of wantonness; not however to be warranted.

During six winter months which I passed in Philadelphia, I heard of more murders, committed in that space of time, within the United States, than happen in three years, throughout the Prussian dominions, although they contain nearly two millions more inhabitants. In the state of New-York, a judge was murdered upon the high-way, by persons who had disguised themselves as Indians. In one of the southern states, a father killed his own son. A baker's boy threw a new-born child, which he had found in the street into an heated oven, in order to appropriate to himself an hundred guineas, which, probably the mother, wishing to remain unknown had left with the child, to induce the finder to take care of this fruit of a false step. In the last week before my departure from Philadelphia the discovery of two dead children, one in a privy; the other upon a dung-hill, was a general subject of conversation.... The woman who murdered one of them was taken up; but was discharged again. The frequency of infanticide in America, the more forcibly proves a dreadful pitch of corruption, because neither the laws nor the prevailing opinions punish with infamy a girl, for bringing into the world a child unlawfully begotten. If I had taken pains to hunt up such anecdotes, I should perhaps have many more to relate. What I have told, is however unfortunately for the honour of human nature too much, and I have noticed only transactions generally known, detailed in all the newspapers, and never contradicted by any one.

Several German clergymen in Pennsylvania, have published their sermons there.... They describe the moral condition of the country people in a shocking point of light. You read in these discourses of nothing but adultery, perjury, harlotry, theft, drunkenness, brawling &c. Not far from Lancaster, it was said a countryman had children by his daughter. The venereal distemper is likewise very common in the country, as all the physicians and surgeons, who have a great practice there, unanimously assured me.

The murder of infants, and the number of exposed children, give no favourable idea of the continence of the unmarried women. The married ones, at least of the higher classes are said to be tolerably regular, and cuckoldom is not very frequent. Yet others again maintained that there were in Philadelphia, bawds, who for an adequate sum of money, knew how to procure women of reputation. But perhaps this was slander. I remarked however a general report in circulation that a temple of wantonness had been built upon speculation, where the fathers of the land, in congress, might relax a little from their numerous cares for the public good. I only had the outside of the house pointed out to me. It is in New-street; but farther distant from the river Delaware than fourth street. A thing of this kind cannot be closely inquired into, but such a thing ought not even to be said; for if there be no reason whatever to doubt the moral purity of the senators in a republic, no such reports will be circulated. Livy does not tell us that Cato the censor or Regulus, Fabricius or Cincinnatus, were suspected of visiting such houses. Caesar and Pompey frequented them; but in their time the republic was at its last gasp, and they were no republicans.

The part of a republican is in this world rather difficult to perform. Among royalists, people are not upon the subject of morals quite so scrupulous; they do not give themselves out for models of virtue. With the idea of a republican is connected that of severer morals, of an heroic contempt of all selfish interest, and of a mind steeled against all the fascinations of the senses when duty forbids their indulgence. The Americans, therefore, from the period of their independence have assumed a difficult part; but they perform it desperately ill, and they are as it appears to me, republicans with royalist manners.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

..... Labor omnia vincit, Improbis.....

VIRGIL.

Industry in youth is a duty we owe our parents; our country, ourselves, and, above all, our beneficent Creator. Idleness is the mother of vice, activity of virtue; from that originate the calamities and misfortunes of human life; from this its blessings and delights. How wonderful is it then, that the majority of mankind should trifle away their time so prodigally, in frivolous pursuits; and rather than use a little exertion, suffer continual inquietude!

Inertia has spent the early part of her days in fashionable pleasures and amusements; and now, at forty, reclines in an easy chair, a ponderous mass of useless matter, tortured with the constant dread of catching cold. The least damp gives her death, and she has been killed a thousand times, with a breath of pure air. Her tongue is the only active part of her; which is engaged alternately in preaching and scolding. She exhorts those around her to the practice of virtues, which she has long possessed unseen unknown, "for no person yet, herself excepted, has had the penetration to discover her latent good properties." But candour must confess, Inertia is productive of some advantages. The tender minds of her children are not tormented with study; 'tis enough for them to administer to the numberless wants of their almanac. A cook finds employment, the pharmacist is enriched, quacks encouraged, and physicians daily visit their debilitated patient, while careful Coniux finds, incessant toil essential, to support his amiable valetudinary wife.

The fate of Vertumans is more tragical. He was a young man whose prolific mind led his friends to expect an exuberant harvest from his ripening talents; but alas! virtue and excellence are not the natural productions of any soil. His volatile mind grew weary of restraint. "I will not, said he, cramp my spirits with books and business, now is the time for enjoyment." Then mixing with the multitude; dissipation enervated his intellects, the tyrant passions uncontrolled set up their principalities and waging war, anarchy seized the presidency. His patrimonial estate was squandered; he was deserted by his associates; harassed by creditors and the contending powers within, premature old age came on, and bewailing his mispent time, he made his miserable exit, leaving behind a striking example of the fatal consequences of inert-licentious youth.

Exercise improves the faculties, promotes health, and gives energy to the whole system; and if we are ambitious of arriving at the summit of that eminence, to which indefatigable industry alone is capable of elevating us; can we commence the work too early! Our evil propensities must all be eradicated, and stubborn self subdued before we can proceed with any degree of facility. Then is it not more eligible to pluck them up, before they become too deeply rooted? The opinion, that we are at liberty in wild and varying adolescence "to play the fool" with time, is a mistaken and dangerous one. Agricola might with equal propriety say, when nature animates her vegetable dominions, and moistens the earth with refrigerant showers, "I will take my ease through the spring and summer, my corn may be planted in autumn," and suffer his fences to lie neglected, and his meadows open to the invasion of neighbouring cattle. What would be the result of his shameful indulgence? His fields might produce a luxuriant crop of weeds; but would they afford him sustenance through the hibernal season? No, verily, he must perish with hunger during the winter. So the mind uncultivated, and destitute; loaded with the infirmities of age and intemperance, and with no other support than rank, vice, and overgrown folly, must totter beneath the load, and fall with the first blast of cold adversity.

Very different is the decline of a well spent life, where the venerable "tenant of clay," can look with approbation on the manual and mental toils of his youth, and see a farm improved.... walks extended.... prospects cleared.... trees planted by his own hand, offering their umbrage to shield him from the fervid sun, and a garden exalting the senses with its odours; while his frugal dome contains a worthy partner in his felicity, surrounded by a family of well taught active offsprings. With a mind thus stored, a man cannot be unhappy. He "May quit a cottage or a throne,

May leave the world and dwell alone
Within his spacious mind."

Contemplation never tires, nor do reflections consume; death is divested of his terrors, and he slides into eternity with a placidity, never to be felt by the slothful and impious.

Rise, sons and daughters of Columbia, from the allurements of inglorious ease, and pursue in due season the path of virtue, which conducts to happiness. Let none hesitate at the magnitude of the enterprise. Labour will remove every obstruction, and the reward of perseverance is immense and infallible. Can any loiter in so momentous an undertaking? The wise I know will press forward, amongst whom, I humbly hope, will not be last, she who, with expanded heart, signs herself.

RURALINA.

(FROM LITERARY LEISURE.)

I shall not scruple to devote this paper to a consideration of the proper employment of time; nor will it deter me from undertaking the subject, that it has been frequently considered before: that which is important to all, can never be thought of too often, and we fail more frequently for want of reflecting on, than of knowing our duties.

There can be no subject of more consequence to every individual, than the proper disposal of that portion of time allotted to us, since whatever our depraved fancies look upon as valuable, and whatever is really and intrinsically so, alike depend upon it. It is strange, that of a life which we all pretend to value, and which is so perpetually escaping from us, any one should suffer a single hour to pass by unmarked by some useful exertion; it is still more surprising that any one should voluntarily submit to the cruel punishment of total inaction. The utmost malice of the most inveterate enemy could not invent a severer torment than the stupid inactivity to which some persons devote themselves. To pass whole days in watching the slow lapse of time, and rejoicing at the end of every hour, is indeed natural to those who languish under the pressure of severe bodily or mental calamity; but that those who enjoy health and liberty, should so groan under the heavy burden of time, not only claims our pity, but our wonder! If those who feel their hours thus oppressive, would but seek employment, and pursue it steadily,....if they would but resolve that either mind or body should be usefully and actively employed, they would find the intolerable weight of existence lessened! The hours would no longer heavily lag in their flight, nor would the temporary death of sleep, nor the eternal sleep of death, be any longer looked to for relief.

Can any one of these languid beings, who waste whole hours in inaction, and fancy they have been thinking, mention one useful reflection, one salutary resolution, as the fruits of their long indolence? A mere reverie, that flits across the speculum of the brain, and leaves no trace behind it, merits not to be dignified with the name of thought.

In constant and actual employment alone can we seek for unwearied cheerfulness....that delightful sunshine of the soul. Those who, from situation, are privileged....and those who from disposition are prone to be indolent, are those who are most subject to causeless dejection of spirits. No fancied uneasiness can stand against useful activity, and even real distress will lose much of its poignancy, if some profitable and interesting occupation be steadily pursued....by profitable I mean that which is ultimately so, which tends to improve, to fortify the heart....to enlarge, to enlighten the understanding.

"The time of life is short!
"To spend that little basely, were too long!
"Tho' life did ride upon a dial's point,
"Still ending at th' arrival of the hour!"

SHAKESPEARE.

Every one who has leisure, and who means to be happy, either has, or must adopt some favourite hobby-horse with which to amuse that leisure. Without some pursuit, which from its pleasantness engages the mind, that very leisure would be the most insupportable burden! It were to be wished that the favourite pursuits of every one were of a nature to strengthen the good dispositions of the soul, to extend its capacities, and to improve its moral character. The gradual effect of an habitual pursuit is so indubitable, that it behoves every one to lead their fancy to select that which will best contribute to some virtuous end.

That the amusement of leisure hours should be innocent, is perhaps hardly sufficient: If it be frivolous,....if it tend to lead the mind away from the due consideration of its relative duties,....if it be of an enervating kind, however innocent every particular act may appear, the general complexion of character produced by its frequent recurrence, is not innocent. The end, therefore, should always be kept in view; this should be the grand criterion, and by the end, be always understood the final end with respect to our future hopes and prospects....not the mere termination or aim of each particular pursuit. It is, indeed, a maxim, that has often been prostituted to the worst of purposes, that the end will sanctify the means; and so it will, if properly apprehended: for if the true end be the main object, no means will be either acceptable or convenient, except such as are in themselves laudable and virtuous.

"Procrastination is the thief of time."

YOUNG.

And few faults, more certainly, though imperceptibly, destroy the energy of character than procrastination. Every one undoubtedly, in those moments of reflection which must occur to all, must have formed many good resolutions; but the execution of them being postponed to a more convenient season, is too often postponed forever! and those good and virtuous motions in the soul leave us more guilty when disobeyed or disregarded.

That which it is right to do, it is right to do now! Begin therefore to-day, lest thou be prevented to-morrow!

Why, if the present time have not all the fitness required, should the future time be more advantageous? Why wait for any era from which to date the beginning of reformation? Is not every era auspicious on which so good a work is begun? Will not other avocations arise? Will not other projects be formed, and prove equally abortive? It were well if in a morning, during those cool moments we most of us enjoy before we quit the pillow, before the cares and inquietudes of the world perplex our thoughts, while the mind is calm and active, and the heart glowing with gratitude under the consciousness of renewed existence, it were well, I say, if we were then to arrange a plan of moral conduct for the day....if frequently too, in the course of that day, we were to ask our own hearts what report the hour last elapsed would carry of us to heaven!....and if at night, when again returned to the couch, of rest, while we thankfully acknowledge the protection and safety we have experienced, we were to examine how we have fulfilled our intentions, taking into consideration the real value of time, and the incalculable importance to our individual welfare of a proper distribution and employment of it, we should then blush to have passed a day unmarked by some vigorous or laudable exertion....we should shrink from the contemplation of many precious hours wasted in inactivity....hours which will return no more, and which, having thus elapsed without notice, swell to a bulk that would surprize and alarm us, could we behold at one view the portion of time thus thrown away.

"On all-important time, thro' every age,
"Tho' much, and warm, the wise have urg'd, the man
"Is yet unborn, who duly weighs an hour!"

YOUNG.

Mr. Shenstone has among his "Observations," a sentiment dazzling at first view, but, on mature consideration, its intrinsic value seems but trifling....His words are...."It is a miserable thing to be sensible of the value of one's time, and yet to be restrained by circumstances from making the proper use of it."

To try the value of this axiom, let us inquire what is the proper use of time? Is it not that which arises from actual circumstances? and is there any possible circumstance which does not afford some opportunity of laudable moral occupation? If we ask ourselves these questions without prejudice, we shall not hesitate about the answers; but, in general, if we are prevented from pursuing our favourite or our intended employment, we are apt to think we are hindered from making a proper use of time. A man ought not to lament in society that he is interrupted in some pursuit which requires solitude and thought,....nor if he be in solitude, should he regret being precluded from the exercise of the social virtues: nay, when, by some casual accident, an intended plan even of moral excellence is impeded, does not that very obstacle itself give room for the exertion of patience and forbearance? The appropriate employment of every moment is that duty which the circumstances of the moment demand; and even if called away by some impertinent visitors from the contemplation of virtue, or the exertion of talent, a man may be not less laudably, though less agreeably, employed in the practice of that familiar benevolence which diffuses good-humour and pleasantry, nor less usefully engaged for his own private advantage in repressing the sallies of impatience, or the inroads of ill-humour.

Shenstone was of a querulous, irritable nature. He thought every moment ill employed that was not given to his Muse, to gardening, or to sentiment. People, in general, have their favourite pursuits, from which they are equally reluctant to be drawn; but if we divest ourselves of prejudice and partiality, we shall discard Shenstone's, attractive tinsel, and conclude with the nobler poet, that

"Who does the best his circumstance allows,
"Does well!....acts nobly!....Angels could no more!"

YOUNG.

Every day, if rightly employed, undoubtedly affords some useful reflections; and were these noted down, it would be amusing, at some future period to recal the occurrences, by the observations they had produced: but it would also be far more useful than amusing, by shewing the improvement, the increased maturity, or the perfect stability of our judgment. Were we to preserve a register, not merely of bare facts, but of the thoughts and feelings of our minds upon them, how accurately should we be enabled to trace the rise or the demolition of some prejudice....to mark by what gradations our opinions attained their present form, and to detect the almost imperceptible shades by which, in a series of years, our characters receive a totally different hue! In a record such as this, a blank day would be to us a reproach! The due improvement of time ought to be the great aim of life; and there can be no better means pursued for so desirable an end, than extracting from every incident some moral or mental advantage. Surely, of the scanty portion of time allotted to those beings who ought to aim at perfection, no part should be suffered to elapse, without some trace worthy of remembrance.

A general habit of activity best enables us, who are the mere creatures of habit, to make this due improvement of our best possession. Mental activity as far surpasses that which is merely corporeal, as the works of genius exceed the manufacture of art. Yet they rather assist, than impede each other; but never should mere personal industry lay claim to that praise which is due to its more excellent counterpart. Far be it from me to rob activity of its just reward; it is not in the power of any declaimer to deprive it of that which its own exertion alone secures, for happiness and contentment are ever the prize of activity; but while the body, while the hands are strenuously employed, the mind may remain indolent.

Many persons reckon that day well spent, in which they have forwarded or concluded any busy undertaking, and perhaps it has been so; but mere personal industry, except where subsistence depends on it, is rather innocent than meritorious. The woman who, from her fortune, is exempted from the necessity of incessant needle-work, is surely far better employed in rendering her house agreeable, and her society happy, than in working her finger to the bone under the pretence of industry, while her mind, intent upon her needle's point, sinks into a most deplorable apathy towards all exertion of agreeable or engaging talents. Was Shenstone so well employed while he was fretting at the waste of time when chased from his pen by casual visitors and while framing elegant aphorisms expressive of his regret, as if he had resolutely conquered the rising peevishness within him, and seen his guests with a determination to please and be pleased? Great virtues and heroic exertions seldom fall in our way; but the due employment of every moment is in every body's power; nor will any pursuit, any occupation, tend more decidedly to our final advantage, than the continued practice of those social and familiar exertions which every minute demands.

Time is a possession, of which the enormous value has never perhaps, been accurately computed. If every moment were uniformly employed to the best advantage, it would be difficult to ascertain to what degree of perfection human nature might attain, even during a moderate life. Some few instances of wonderful application have proved that human faculties are capable of almost infinite extension; but dazzling as are abilities of every kind, and fascinating as is their pursuit, in which perfection is not only more visibly approached, but with more immediate gratification to the pursuer, let it be remembered that the moral and religious use of time alone will ultimately benefit us.

Let us beware, then, of confounding our prejudices or partialities with our duties, and of thinking, like Shenstone, all time misemployed, that is not devoted to our favourite hobby-horse.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEE.

My excessive love of biography often urges me to postpone every other study and engagement, to indulge myself in contemplating the lives of the learned. I find my industry more stimulated, and my emulation more quickened, by particular lives, than by general history. The one is a single portrait in a strong light. The other is the rapid succession of figures, multiplied, or confused, as in Chinese shades, or a magic lantern.

While I content myself with the annual perusal of Gibbon's history, I pore almost every week over the record of his studies, and the history of his life; and I care not so much to discover on what hour Prynne, the Puritan, stood in the pillory, or when the scoundrel, Bradshaw, settled his scheme of regicide, as to learn that Edmund Burke was an early riser, and yet conversed late with Mrs. Woffington; and that, to an accidental fall from a pear-tree, which happened while sir William Jones was at school, we are indebted for the industry of his literary habits, and for the variegated entertainment, afforded by his works.

Southey has translated from the Spanish of George de Montemayor, the following stanzas. They are eminently beautiful.

Here, on the cold clear Ezla's breezy side,
My hand amid her ringlets wont to rove,
She proffer'd now the lock, and now denied,
With all the baby playfulness of love.
Here the false maid, with many an artful tear,
Made me each rising thought of doubt discover,
And vow'd and wept, till Hope had ceas'd to fear;
Ah me! beguiling, like a child, her lover.

One evening, on the river's pleasant strand,
The maid, too well-beloved, sat with me,
And with her finger trac'd upon the sand
Death for Diana...not inconstancy!
And Love beheld us, from his secret stand;
And mark'd his triumph, laughing to behold me
To see me trust a writing, trac'd in sand,
To see me CREDIT WHAT A WOMAN TOLD ME.

I am in doubt whether a happier conceit in the amatory stile of writing, can be found than the following. In the whole collection of the epigrams of MARTIAL, I do not remember to have discovered a finer turn, or a neater point.

Fair and young, thou bloomest now,
And I full many a year have told,
But read the heart, and not the brin,
Thou shalt not find my Love is old.

My Love's a child, and thou canst say
How much his little age may be;
For he was born the very day,
That first I set my eyes on thee.

The French are generally distinguished for the warmth and elegance of their compliments to feminine beauty and merit. But they are sometimes bitter and contemptuous, even when woman is their theme. The following Epigram upon a slattern, is a point.

EPIGRAM.

D. ANNE LA NOIRE

Anne se fisoit a croire
Que se lavant dans cette eau
Blanche y deviendrait sa peau
Mais sa peau rendit l'eau noire.

IMITATED.

Ann, in yon transparent laver,
Though to wash your face you seem;
Trust me, tis a vain endeavour....
You but soil the limpid stream.

In the Windsor Forest, a striking specimen occurs of Mr. Pope's fondness for that family, memorable for its misfortunes, its genius, its energy, and its giving birth to an Augustan age of literature.

Here Ceres' gifts in waving prospect stand,
And nodding, tempt the joyful reaper's hand;
Rich Industry sits smiling on the plains,
And PEACE AND PLENTY TELL A STUART reigns.

Gilpin, in one of his picturesque essays, has introduced the following description of a cormorant. Of this bird of prey, one would hardly suppose it possible to say any thing, striking or elegant. But let us attend to the art of the author, and observe how highly the pencil of genius can colour even the meanest objects.

The cormorant is not without beauty. His eager, steady, determined flight; his plunging into the waters; his wild look, as if conscious of guilt; his bustle on being alarmed, shaking the moisture from his feathers, and dashing about, till he get fairly disengaged, are all amusing circumstances in his history. But he is a merciless villain; supposed by naturalists, to be furnished with a greater variety of predatory arts, than any bird, that inhabits the water. When the tide retires he wings his ardent flight, with strong pinions and outstretched neck, along the shores of the deserted river; with all the channels and currents of which, he is better acquainted than the mariner, with his chart. Here he commits infinite spoil. Or, if he find his prey less plentiful in the shallows, he is at no loss in deeper water. He dives to the bottom, and visits the eel in her retirement; of all others, his favourite morsel. In vain the fowler eyes him from the bank, and takes his stand behind the bush. The cormorant, quicker sighted, knows his danger, and parries it with a glance of his eye. If he choose not to trust his pinions, in a moment, he is under water, rises again, in some distant part, instantly sinks a second time, and eludes the possibility of taking aim. If a random shot should reach him, unless it carry a weight of metal; his sides are so well cased, and his muscular frame so robust, that he escapes mischief. If the weather suit, he fishes dexterously at sea. When he has filled his maw, he retires to the ledge of some projecting rock, where he listens to the surges below, in doting contemplation, till hunger again waken his powers of rapine.

In the Town Talk of sir Richard Steele, he has preserved the song of Amintor and the Nightingale, by Leonard Welsted esquire, a gay writer, unjustly calumniated by Pope, and, perhaps, somewhat extravagantly extolled by Steele, who calls him "a noble genius;" and declares of the following ballad, that the scene, the persons, the time, and all the circumstances, contribute to make this as proper a subject for a song, as can be imagined. The delicacy of the thought and phrase, and the sweetness of the numbers, are circumstances, that conspire to make it most exquisitely agreeable. All this, is, indeed, rather above the merit of Mr. Welsted; but, perhaps, the reader will be curious to examine what so ingenious and noted a writer, as Steele, has thus praised.

As in a blooming jasmine bower,
Where Envy's eye could ne'er disclose 'em,
Enjoying ages in an hour,
Amintor lay in Chloe's bosom.

A nightingale renewed her song,
In such a sad, complaining measure,
In notes, at once, so sweet and strong
The enchanting grove was fill'd with pleasure.

O! lovely songstress, said the swain,
Thy idle melody give over;
To me, alas! thou singst in vain,
To me, a panting, wishing lover.

Thy sweet complainings now dismiss,
Thou heavenly, yet unkind intruder;
Nor rob me of a gentler bliss,
To give me in its place, a ruder.

When I am sunk in Chloe's arms,
The softest moment love possesses;
E'en Philomel has lost her charms,
And Harmony itself displeases!

Bright Chloe all my powers employs,
And all beside is fond delusion;
While she alone completes my joys,
Variety is but confusion.

EPISTOLARY.

[The ensuing letter, from the pen of Dr. FRANKLIN, has been communicated by a friend, from whom we expect, occasionally, more communications of a similar nature, written during the revolution, and illustrative of that event. The curious cannot fail of being gratified in the perusal of a correspondence, which will probably reflect much light upon many of the obscurer events of a interesting epoch.

ORIGINAL LETTER FROM DR. FRANKLIN TO MONSIEUR DUMAS.

Philadelphia December 9, 1775.

DEAR SIR,

I received your several favours, of May 18, June 30, and July 8, by Messrs. Vaillant and Pochard; whom, if I could serve upon your recommendation, it would give me great pleasure. Their total want of English is at present an obstruction to their getting any employment among us; but I hope they will soon obtain some knowledge of it. This is a good country for artificers or farmers, but gentlemen, of mere science in les belles lettres, cannot so easily subsist here, there being little demand for their assistance among an industrious people, who, as yet, have not much leisure for studies of that kind.

I am much obliged by the kind present you have made us of your edition of Vattel. It came to us in good season, when the circumstances of a rising state make it necessary frequently to consult the law of nations. Accordingly, that copy which I kept, (after depositing one in our own public library here, and sending the other to the college of Massachusetts Bay, as you directed) has been continually in the hands of the members of our congress, now sitting, who are much pleased with your notes and preface, and have entertained a high and just esteem for their author. Your manuscript Jdee sur le gouvernement et la royauté, is also well relished, and may, in time, have its effect. I thank you, likewise, for the other smaller pieces, which accompanied Vattel. Le court exposé de ce qui s'est passé entre la cour Br. et les colonies, &c. being a very concise and clear statement of facts, will be reprinted here, for the use of our new friends in Canada. The translations of the proceedings of our congress are very acceptable. I send you herewith what of them has been farther published here, together with a few newspapers, containing accounts of some of the successes providence has favoured us with. We are threatened from England with a very powerful force, to come next year against us. We are making all the provision in our power here to oppose that force, and we hope we shall be able to defend ourselves. But as the events of war are always uncertain, possibly, after another campaign, we may find it necessary to ask aid of some foreign power. It gives us great pleasure to learn from you, that toute l'Europe nous souhaite le plus heureux succès pour le maintien de nos libertés. But we wish to know whether any one of them, from principles of humanity, is disposed magnanimously to step in for the relief of an oppressed people, or whether if, as it seems likely to happen, we should be obliged to break off all connection with Britain, and declare ourselves an independent people, there is any state or power in Europe, who would be willing to enter into an alliance with us for the benefit of our commerce, which amounted, before the war, to near seven millions sterling per annum, and must continually increase, as our people increase most rapidly. Confiding, my dear friend, in your good will to us and our cause, and in your sagacity and abilities for business, the committee of congress, appointed for the purpose of establishing and conducting a correspondence with our friends in Europe, of which committee I have the honour to be a member, have directed me to request of you, that as you are situated at the Hague, where ambassadors from all the courts reside, you would make use of the opportunity that situation affords you, of discovering, if possible, the disposition of the several courts with respect to such assistance or alliance, if we should apply for the one, or propose the other. As it may possibly be necessary, in particular instances, that you should, for this purpose, confer directly with some great ministers, and show them this letter as your credential, we only recommend it to your discretion, that you proceed therein with such caution, as to keep the same from the knowledge of the English ambassador, and prevent any public appearance, at present, of your being employed in any such business, as thereby, we imagine, many inconveniences may be avoided, and your means of rendering us service, increased.

That you may be better able to answer some questions, which will probably be put to you, concerning our present situation, we inform you....that the whole continent is very firmly united....the party for the measures of the British ministry being very small, and much dispersed....that we have had on foot, the last campaign, an army of near twenty-five thousand men, wherewith we have been able, not only to block up the king's army in Boston, but to spare considerable detachments for the invasion of Canada, where we have met with great success, as the printed papers sent herewith will inform you, and have now reason to expect that whole province may be soon in our possession....that we purpose greatly to increase our force for the ensuing year; and thereby we hope, with the assistance of well disciplined militia, to be able to defend our coast, notwithstanding its great extent....that we have already a small squadron of armed vessels, to protect our coasting trade, who have had some success in taking several of the enemy's cruisers, and some of their transport vessels, and store ships. This little naval force we are about to augment, and expect it may be more considerable, in the next summer.

We have hitherto applied to no foreign power. We are using the utmost industry in endeavouring to make salt-petre, and with daily increasing success. Our artificers are also every where busy in fabricating small arms, casting cannon, &c. Yet both arms and ammunition are much wanted. Any merchants, who would venture to send ships, laden with those articles, might make great profit; such is the demand in every colony, and such generous prices are and will be given; of which, and of the manner of conducting such a voyage, the bearer, Mr. Story, can more fully inform you. And whoever brings in those articles, is allowed to carry off the value in provisions, to our West Indies, where they will probably fetch a very high price, the general exportation from North America being stopped. This you will see more particularly in a printed resolution of the congress.

We are in great want of good engineers, and wish you could engage and send us two able ones, in time for the next campaign, one acquainted with field service, sieges, &c. and the other with fortifying of sea-ports. They will, if well recommended, be made very welcome, and have honourable appointments, besides the expenses of their voyage hither, in which Mr. Story can also advise them. As what we now request of you, besides taking up your time, may put you to some expense, we send you, for the present, enclosed, a bill for one hundred pounds sterling, to defray such expenses, and desire you to be assured that your services will be considered, and honourably rewarded by the congress.

We desire, also, that you would take the trouble of receiving from Arthur Lee esquire, agent for the congress in England, such letters as may be sent by him to your care, and of forwarding them to us with your dispatches. When you have occasion to write to him to inform him of any thing, which it may be of importance that our friends there should be acquainted with, please to send your letters to him, under cover, directed to Mr. Alderman Lee, merchant, on Tower Hill, London: and do not send it by post, but by some trusty skipper, or other prudent person, who will deliver it with his own hand. And when you send to us, if you have not a direct safe opportunity, we recommend sending by way of St. Eustatia, to the care of Messrs. Robert and Cornelius Stevenson, merchants there, who will forward your dispatches to me.

With sincere and great esteem and respect,

I am, Sir,

your most obedient, humble servant.

THE FARRAGO.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

"One, who had gain'd a princely store
By cheating master, king, and poor,
Dared cry aloud "the land must sink
For all its fraud," and whom d'ye think
The sermonizing rascal child?
.....A glower, that sold lamb for kid."

MANDEVILLE.

Among the high privileges, which we digressive writers enjoy, may be reckoned that, which Don Quixote gave his horse, to choose a path, and pursue it at pleasure. In another point there is an affinity between us and that errant steed, so renowned in the volumes of Cervantic chivalry. When we begin an excursion, the Lord only knows how it will be prosecuted, or where it will end. Whim and caprice being commonly our guides, and those personages never keeping in their almanac a list of stages, we are sometimes most sadly benighted. As this is my day for similitudes, I stop not here; having so modestly compared myself and other ramblers to a quadruped, I will descend still lower into "the valley of humiliation" and liken them to an insect, which is a spider. Though their stock is confessedly small, they have the art of drawing out a most extended texture. Thus an essayist, conscious of the scantiness of his stores, handles a topic, as a farmer's wife manages her annual pound of tohea, in such a manner, as to make it last.

When I began my second speculation with some general remarks on the utility of an alliance, between application and genius; I little thought that I should quit my sober task, and commence character painter. When fancy handed me a pencil, and bade me sketch a likeness of Meander, I had no design to ransack his room, or transcribe his dairy; and lastly, when the journal was published, I tremblingly thought I had said too much, and dreaded lest my readers should complain, that they were surfeited by the Farrago. But they, who are even tinged with the metaphysical doctrine of ideas flowing in a train, will not be confounded, though they see one speculation rising from another, when I narrate the following incident. A friend who had attentively gazed at the portrait of Meander, saw me the day after its exhibition. So, Mr. Delincator, cries he, must you become a dauber in caricature? One so fond of the zigzag walk in life, as you, is hardly entitled to ridicule deviation in another. I blushed; and the suffusion, like Corporal Trim's bow, spoke as plainly as a blush could speak, "my man of remark, you are perfectly sage in your opinion." This trivial circumstance led me to reflect, first on my own inconsistency, and next on that of others. By exposing the rambles of genius, I virtually made proclamation for dissipation to depart, but she taxed me with issuing contradictory orders, and pertinently asked how she could go into exile, when I insisted on her keeping me company? I then looked on my neighbours. Their characters were similar to mine, and they wore not the uniform of regularity more than myself. Celia, who murders reputations, as "butcher felleth ox" pronounced, t'other day at a tea-table, a most bitter invective against scandal, though five minutes before, she had invented a tale of calumny against her friend. Vafer censorially cautions a young gallant to beware an indulgence of the licentious passion, but forgets, while reading his lecture, that he once was amorous, that he solicited the virgin and the wife, and that, unsatisfied with the ordinary mysteries of intrigue, he elaborately refined on the system of seduction. Vinoso, whose face is as red-lettered as the court calendar, and who makes his Virginia fence at nine in the morning, applauds a very heavy excise on distilled spirits, and zealously damns every drunkard in the nation. Bobbin the haberdasher, who in vending a row of pins, defrauds the heedless customer of four, and who, when furnishing a chamber maid with a set of apron strings, pilfers from her a portion of the tape, exclaims against a vintner for adulterating his liquors, and wittily wonders, that he can adopt the christian scheme so far, as to baptize, even his wine. Messalina, whose chastity is valiant as a holiday captain, because no enemy is at hand, and who produced a lovely pair of twins six month before marriage, frowns at the forwardness of young flirts; and a decayed maiden, "far gone in her wane, Sir," who has been but twenty these ten years, and who has more wrinkles in her forehead, than dimples on her chin, even she scoffs the vestal sisterhood, and turns up her nose at the staleness of antiquated virginity.

In literature as well as in life, we may recognize this propensity. Authors are noted for inconsistency. Instances might be selected from almost every writer in our language. Pope, in conjunction with Arbuthnot and Swift, composed a satirical treatise, the design of which, was to lash his poetical brethren for attempting to soar, when their wings only served them to sink. Yet Pope, after some fine panegyric verses upon Lord Mansfield, fell from a noble height of poetry to the very bottom of the bathos, by concluding his eulogy with the following feeble lines,

Graced as thou art with all the power of words,
So known, so honoured in the house of lords.

Surely this was as risible a couplet of anticlimax, as the distich the bard ridicules, by merely quoting it.

Thou Dalhoussey, the great God of war,
Lieutenant-colonel to the earl of Mar.

In the works of Swift, who omits no opportunity of damning dullness, may be found some compositions where the disappointed reader, instead of being dazzled with the gleam of fancy, sorrowing sees nothing, but the vapid insipidity of a poet laureate's ode, and eagerly inquires if it be upon record, that Swift ever studied the sing song of Cibber. Knox, a classic writer, censures in one of his essays, the bombastic style; yet, were his own effusions arraigned in the court of criticism, they would, sometimes be found guilty of turgidity. This critic, who heated in the glowing forge of zeal, gives Gibbon to the Devil, and his writings to Lethe, condemns that elegant historian for superabundance of epithet, though a reader of Knox would suppose that the favourite page of this schoolmaster's grammar was that, which contained the declension and variation of adjectives. Dr. Beattie, in the warmth of his wishes to promote social benevolent affections, almost hates the man who does not practice philanthropy. Rocked in the cradle of the kirk, and implicitly believing all that the nurse and priest had taught him, this zealot declaims in terms so acrimonious against the sceptics of the age, that one is led to think his "milk of human kindness," had become sour by the means he employed to preserve it.

Juvenal, the ancient satyrast, in one of his virulent attacks on the reigning Roman follies, avers that the most profligate of the senate were invariably strenuous advocates for a revival and execution of the obsolete rigid laws against debauchery. The indignant poet declares that if such glaring inconsistencies continue, none could be astonished should Clodius commence railing against libertines, and Cataline be first to impeach a conspirator. Were a name-sake of this bard to arise, I should tremble for the sect of modern *inconsistent*s. He might brandish the lance of satire against such characters, with more justice, though perhaps with less dexterity, than his classic predecessor. The field of foibles and follies is so fully ripe, that some one should put in the sickle. In this field appears, and will again appear, a labourer, who though awkward, may be useful, and who will be "worthy of his hire;" if he cut up nothing but tares.

BIOGRAPHY.

Peter Charron, author of a famous book "On Wisdom," was the son of a bookseller at Paris, where he was born in 1541. He was educated for the law, which he studied at Orleans and Bourges, taking his doctor's degree in the latter university. He was admitted an advocate in the parliament of Paris; but after attending the bar five or six years, he found it was impossible for him to make his way without stooping to court the favour of attorneys and solicitors. In disgust he renounced his profession, and applying himself to the study of divinity, he took priest's orders, and became a celebrated preacher. Such was the reputation he acquired, that several bishops desired to engage him as theological canon of their churches; and he successively occupied this post in several cathedrals of the kingdom. Queen Margaret nominated him her preacher in ordinary; and he was in the retinue of cardinal d'Armagnac, legate at Avignon. After an absence of many years from Paris, he returned thither in 1588, with the intention, in consequence of a vow, of entering among the Carthusians in that city. The prior of the Chartreux, however, refused to admit him, as being too old to adopt their discipline; and for a similar reason, the prior of the Celestines also rejected his application. Three casuists, thereupon, pronounced him absolved from his vow, whence he resolved to remain in the character of a secular priest. He resumed his function of a preacher; and coming to Bourdeaux, he there contracted a very intimate friendship with the celebrated Michael Montagne, whose philosophical sentiments he deeply imbibed. Such was their mutual affection, that Montagne by his will gave Charron the privilege (a high one in the esteem of a Gascon) of bearing his arms; and Charron made Montagne's brother-in-law his residuary legatee. In 1594 Charron published his work, intitled "The three Truths;" a piece strictly orthodox and professional, since its purpose was to maintain, 1. that there is a God and a true religion; 2. that of all religions the christian is the only true; 3. that among christian communions, the Roman-catholic is the only true church. It accordingly obtained for him from the bishop of Cahors the dignity of grand-vicar, and a theological canonship; and in 1595 he was deputed to the general assembly of the clergy, and made secretary to that body. In 1602 he printed a volume of "Christian Discourses;" and in 1601 appeared the first edition of his "Treatise on Wisdom." He went to Paris in 1603, in order to print a second edition of this work, and died there suddenly in the street. Charron was a man of unblemished character, and, as far as can be judged, sincere in the belief of the religion he professed. Yet his book on wisdom has caused him to be ranked among the most dangerous of freethinkers; and the Jesuit Garasse does not scruple to bestow upon him the most opprobrious epithets. The truth seems to be, that Charron, like many others brought up in systems of faith irreconcilable to reason, was led to consider the two principles as totally opposite to each other; and in order to bow the mind to passive submission to authority, thought it necessary to depreciate as much as possible the conclusions of mere reason. Hence he seems to insinuate, that strength of mind naturally leads to atheism; and asserts, that the immortality of the soul, though almost an universal dogma, is founded on very weak natural arguments. Another sentiment that gave much offence was, that though all religions pretend to have come from heaven by divine inspiration, yet all have been received by human hands and means. In his second edition he thought proper to make the christian religion an exception; yet, in a certain sense, the assertion is universally true. He likewise dwelt more than was thought prudent or decent on the differences that have always subsisted in christianity, and the unparalleled evils to which they have given birth; and he stated with more strength and fairness than some approved, the arguments used against revelation. On these accounts, when the second edition came to be printed, great opposition to it was made by theologians; and it was only through the interest of the president Jeannin that the impression was allowed, after some of the most obnoxious passages were softened. Many of the moral observations in this book are original and ingenious, yet the picture given of human nature and society is upon the whole gloomy. In character, however, Charron was gay and cheerful, with a smiling countenance, and ready conversation. He has met with very respectable defenders, and his liberty of philosophising has been thought creditable to himself and the age. In some places he has been too close a copyist of Montagne, whose Essays may certainly be considered as the parent of the "Treatise on Wisdom."

FESTOON OF FASHION.

The ancient and the Oriental nations all delighted in perfumes. Horace bids his attendant "sparge roses;" and Hafiz, in many an ode, calls for odours, as well as for wine and beauty. Of one of the most delightful of the Turkish perfumes a learned London barber thus speaks.

Davidson's elegant perfume, or extract of roses, is now generally used in the most fashionable circles. The genuine otto, or odour of roses, has long been admired for its exquisite fragrance; but its great scarcity and high price have prevented a more general use of that elegant perfume. Messrs. Davidson have, however, removed these difficulties, by producing an extract, exactly of the same flavour, and at a very reasonable price, which is esteemed the finest and most fashionable perfume, now in use, both for retaining its scent, and yielding the most delicious fragrance. A few drops, on artificial flowers, the handkerchief, &c. will be sufficient to use at a time.

Suwarrow boots are quite exploded at Paris. A sort of Spanish boot, similar to those, worn on the stage, appears to be "the thing and the go."

Madame Recamier, the wife of the rich banker, at Paris, whose house is the head-quarters of the beau monde, and one of the most beautiful of women, has promised some of her friends, in London, to appear there soon, dressed in the highest Parisian style.

The London ladies of vestal reputation, are extremely unwilling to repair to Paris, they are so sorely afraid of being tainted in their reputation; by breathing the infectious air of that corrupt capital.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

We learn, with much pleasure, that the Oration of John Q. Adams, Esq. has reached, at this early period, a second edition; that it is very generally considered as far above the common character of fugitive pamphlets. This is the just reward of a writer who strives to emulate the classic authors. Let us hear no more of that plan of study, which should exclude the ancients. Mr. Adams writes with spirit, sense, and melody, because he has translated SALLUST, and meditated TACITUS.

DREAMS, FROM A PARIS PAPER.

A poet of the day dreamed that he had written an excellent comedy, and that sylphs had administered incense to him in salvers of gold. He said to himself, "I have driven Moliere from the stage." He awoke amidst the hisses of the pit.

A Parisian husband fell asleep on the pillow of Hymen. He dreamed that his wife was faithful and constant. He was awakened by an officer, who informed him that his chaste Penelope had divorced him, and that she was about to marry his valet.

A coachman fell asleep upon his coach-box, and awakened upon a chair of state. Every body congratulated him on having awakened to so much good fortune, and the coachman would not believe that he had been asleep.

A washerwoman, in the Rue St. Honore, while asleep, fell from the fourth story of a house into an English curricule, and received no injury.

A lacquey fell asleep behind a carriage, and when he awoke he was in the inside of it! Numbers have lately fallen asleep in a garret and awakened in a drawing room!

A young warrior dreamed upon the banks of the Nile that, guided by his fortune, he should traverse the ocean, covered with hostile fleets....that he should rescue a whole people from the yoke of folly and frenzy, and that with his own hand he should plant the olive of peace, which in two years should spread its shade over all Europe.....He awoke, amidst the acclamations of the Universe astonished that this was not a dream!

We observe that the first number of the present year of "The Gentleman's Magazine," contains the initial number of a new periodical work, called "The Projector," it is elaborately written, and tho' the themes of the essayist are singularly hackneyed, yet genius still discovers new paths, and traces them successfully.

In the Monthly Review, a journal, notoriously conducted by those, who are dissatisfied with almost every thing in church and state, we are surprized to find a candid judgment upon Mr. WINDHAM's late exertion in the British senate. How transcendent must be the talents of a statesman, who can thus extort reluctant praise from obstinate foes.

"This protest against the peace is very spirited, and perfectly in unison with the sentiments of the right honourable gentleman during the war. It appears to be correctly given; and those, who cannot yield to the despondency, which it endeavours to excite on the prospect of peace, must at least allow that it proves him to be an able orator.

We are extremely impatient to receive Mr. Gifford's new translation of Juvenal, of which we are promised one of the earliest copies. No poet is so well qualified to render into vigorous and elegant English, the stern severity of Juvenal's indignant verse. We are peculiarly solicitous to remark in what manner Mr. G. will render the third, the sixth, the seventh, and the tenth satires. We rejoice that to Mr. Gifford is reserved this privilege,

"In virtue's cause once more exert thy rage,
Thy satire point, and animate thy page"

A commentator, says a late critic, may be described as a dealer in obscurity, and a haberdasher of difficulties.

A late novelist, speaking of a mere household animal, says, she was "one of those useful women, who seem to be sent into the world, for the express purpose of making puddings and of producing children to eat them."

Mudge in a sermon, describing innovation, degenerated into anarchy, has compared it to a dead animal in a state of putrefaction, when instead of one noble creature as it was, when life held it together, there are ten thousand little, nauseous reptiles growing out of it, every one crawling in a path of its own.

Furetiere, in his dictionary, has these verses at the word marriage.

"Boire et manger, coucher ensemble
C'est mariage, ce me semble."

Which somebody has very well translated.

Meat drink and bed in concert taken
Is marriage, or I'm much mistaken.

In an old volume, entitled "Historical Rarities" is the following quaint epitaph on the Maid of Orleans.

Here lies Joan of Arc: the which
Some count Saint, and some count Witch;
Some count Man, and something more,
Some count Maid, and some a Whore.
But reader be content to stay
Thy censure till the judgment day,
Then shalt thou know, and not before
Whether Saint, Witch, Man, Maid, or Whore.

At the first representation of the "Gamester" the critics were much divided in their opinion, respecting the fate of Beverly. This gave rise to an Epigram.

In a coffee-house ring, where the chat ran on plays
A clergyman spoke of the Gamester with praise,
I could wish, says the parson, poor Beverly's life
Had been saved; for the sake of the sister and wife,
How quoth a physician; should Beverly live?
That Lewson escap'd I can hardly forgive,
With errors like these, can a scholar be bamm'd,
I speak from the Greek Sir, the play should be damn'd.

Thus each in his way was his duty fulfilling
The divine was for saving, the doctor for killing.

Oppression, says Edmund Burke, makes wise men mad; but the distemper is still the madness of the wise, which is better than the sobriety of fools.

The London editors, alluding to the late exertions of a celebrated statesman, declare;

It was to the effect of a speech of Mr. Windham, that we owed the vigorous measures, which brought about the conclusion of peace. His speech of Monday evening was uncommonly brilliant and acute; it reminded us of former days, when the talents of both parties used to be displayed in opposition to each other. In the present case, all that we can expect to result from it, is, that it may put the nation on its guard, and shew the world the finesse and duplicity, which the French have exercised, pending the treaty.

Mr. Burke thus contemptuously speaks of the republic of Algiers.

I know something of the constitution and composition of this very extraordinary republic. It has a constitution, I admit, similar to the present tumultuous military tyranny of France, by which an handful of obscure ruffians domineer over a fertile country, and a brave people. For the composition, too, I admit, the Algerine community resembles that of France, being formed out of the very scum, scandal, disgrace and pest of Turkish Asia. The grand seignior, to disburden the country, suffers the dey to recruit in his dominions, the corps of janissaries, or asaphs, which form the directory, and council of elders, one and indivisible.

A Bond street lounge being told that the captain Pacha had killed all the beys; exclaimed damn him, why did he let the duns escape.

In the absence of Talleyrand, his deputies twice a week, entertain the foreign ministers, with tea. Such entertainment is proper enough for those, who wish to keep Europe in hot water.

Mr. Thynne married a young lady of fourteen, when he himself was only sixteen, and immediately sat out upon his travels, leaving his bride in England. During his residence on the continent, he formed a very strong attachment to a lady of family and fortune, who lived with him as his wife; and the young lady, to whom he was actually married, attracted the attention of the celebrated count Koenigsmark, at whose instigation, as it was suspected, Mr. Thynne was shot, in his own coach, in Pall mall. Upon which occasion, the following epigrammatical epitaph was written.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL.

[The elegance of the enclosed piece of French poetry, no less than the singularity of its rhyme, forcibly arrested my attention on accidentally turning over the leaves of the Baron de Pollnitz's Memoirs. I could not refrain from attempting an English imitation of them...you will of course perceive it to be the rhyming of a tyro in verse.... but, if you please you may honour it with a place in the Port Folio; at least, I wish the French to appear, and it may perhaps induce some of your correspondents to offer a better English dress.]

A LETTER FROM A GENTLEMAN, RETIRED FROM THE WORLD, TO HIS FRIEND FROM THE 2ND VOL. P. 223 OF THE BARON OF POLLNITZ'S MEMOIRS.

Je vois regner sur ce rivage
L'innocence et la liberté.
Que d'objets dans ce paysage,
Malgré leur contrariété,
M'étonnent par leur assemblage!

Abondante frugalité,
Autorité sans esclavage,
Richesses sans libertinage,
Charges, Noblesse, sans fierté,
Determine ma volonté
Bienfaisante Divinité
Ajoutez y votre suffrage.

* It is firmly believed that, notwithstanding all the delightful and deceptive things, said in favour of pure democracy, so far from its diffusing equal blessings to all, it is the most summary mode, which a Cataline could employ, to depress the high, and exalt the mean; to plunder quiet opulence, and enrich restless and unprincipled poverty. TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Our elegant correspondent "O," in the Lounger, is very cordially thanked for his mellifluous translations from a Persian chieftain, and from a Jewish Prince. We pronounce the literary diffidence of our correspondents wholly without foundation. He has the abundant powers of a legitimate writer, and we intreat him to versify the other odes from the Persic, and as much as he pleases from Solomon, the Lover and the Sage.

"H. E." will oblige us, by imparting some of his sensible reflections.

From the describer of the "Bull feasts in Spain," we expect further extracts of his journal.

"ASMODEO" will oblige us by communicating in the essay form his prose effusions, that they may receive, what they justly deserve, a liberal place in the Lounger.

No indifference to "N." has occasioned the delay of his translation. We wish that he would address us frequently.

We suppose that our correspondent "M." will find, in retirement, new reasons for writing. Soft air, tranquil hours, and embowering trees are propitious to poetry. Why is HARLEY silent?

S. C. has forgotten his history of the British Cabinet.

Upon this shore how beauteous reigns
Sweet innocence with liberty!
What num'rous objects on these plains,
Spite of their contrariety
Together mingling, meet my eyes,
Exciting wonder and surprize.

Here wealth is lodg'd in frugal hands,
Laws rule, but not o'er slavish bands;
Abundance breeds not luxury,
Nor birth, nor place, contumely.
My choice is made: this favour'd spot
Be mine to enjoy, and may my lot,
By heaven's approval here be cast
And I resign'd here breathe my last.

Train'd in adversity's hard school,
I freely join the village throng is, indeed, almost a worn out imposture, and men, in many countries, in the year 1802, wonder by what servility of abasement, by what abuse of reason, and contempt of experience, they can bear to see their families plundered, and themselves degraded, while a handful of coarse ruffians domineer over a fertile country, and a brave people.

[Note, by the Editor.]

Le volontaire apprentissage
D'une tardive obscurité:
Aussi bien de mon plus bel âge
J'aperçois l'instabilité:

J'ai déjà de compte arrêté,
Quarante fois vu le feuillage,
Par le zephyr ressuscité.
Du printemps j'ai mal profité:
J'enai regret; et de l'été
Je veux faire un meilleur usage.

J'apporte dans mon hermitage
Un coeur dès longtemps rebuté,
Du prompt et funeste esclavage,
Fruit de la folle vanité.
Païsan, sans rusticité,
Hermit sans patelinage.
Mon but est la tranquillité.
Je veux pour unique partage
La paix d'un coeur qui se dégage
Des filets de la volupté.

L'in corruptible probité,
De mes aïeux noble héritage,
A'la cour ne m'a point quitté.
Libre et franc, sans être sauvage,
Du courtisan fourbe et volage
L'exemple ne m'a point gâté.

L'infatigable activité
Reste d'un untile naufrage.
Mes études, mon jardinage,
Un repas sans art appâté.
Dûne Epouse économe et sage,
La belle humeur, le bon ménage,
Vont faire ma félicité.

C'est dans ce port, qu'ensuréte
Ma Barque ne craint point l'orage.
Qu'un autre à son tour emporté,
Au gré de sa cupidité
Sur le sein de l'humide plage,
Des vents ose affronter la rage:
Je ris de sa témérité,
Et lui souhaite un bon voyage,
Je réserve ma fermeté
Pour un plus important passage;
Et je m'approche avec courage
Des portes de l'éternité.

Je sais que la mortalité
Du genre humain est l'appanage:
Pourquoi seul serois je excepté?
La vie est un pèlerinage:
De son cours la rapidité
Loin de m'alarmer me soulage.
De sa fin quand je l'envisage
L'infallible nécessité
Ne me sauroit faire d'outrage.

Brûlez de l'or empaqueté,
Il n'en perit que l'enbaloge:
C'est tout. Un si léger dommage
Devroit il être regretté?

Nor fear to meet the dreaded rule
Of dull obscurity, for long
I've learnt to know how quickly fly
The hours of youth; how soon must die
Our proudest hopes, and each delight,
Be lost in time's unsparing night.

Now forty times the leaves I've seen
By zephyrs wav'd in fresh'ning green.
Days of my spring, ye are gone to waste!
Lamented days! since you are past,
Midst summer's heats I must repent,
And make amends for time mispent.

To my retirement I bring
A heart which long has been the prey,
And felt the sharp and biting sting
Of foolish, fatal, vanity.
A rustic....yet I'm not a clown,
A hermit....yet I've charity,
I seek not glory or renown,
My only aim....tranquillity.
I only want that peaceful mind,
Which all must prize, yet few can find,
Which all who leave the dreary maze
Of vice, will find in virtue's ways.

I owe to honest ancestry
A name unsullied with disgrace,
And midst a court's debauchery
Preserv'd the honour of my race,
Ingenuous, frank and yet polite,
The greedy courtier's wiles in vain
Spread their examples in my sight;
They rais'd my pity and disdain.

I know the faults of early youth,
And henceforth shall with industry,
Strain ev'ry nerve to dwell with truth
In peace and calm felicity:
With elegance and letter'd ease,
My garden and my little field,
My table deck'd in neatest style,
A frugal wife's enchanting smile....
What blessings will not these all yield!
Hear, Heaven! my prayer.....Oh grant me these!

When once I've reached this happy mark,
I'll smile in fond security
Nor e'er again my little bark
Trust to the waves of vanity.
Let others, smit with thirst of gold,
Presumptuous plough the surgy sea,
And risk their all in ventures bold,
I laugh at their temerity.
I wish them well....but I reserve
My firmness for that trying hour,
When the great God I humbly serve,
Shall in his majesty and power,
Eternity's wide door unbar
And call me from this world of care.

I know that all mankind must die....
Yes....all must fall....and why not I?
Then why dismay'd at this last stage
Of our terrestrial pilgrimage?
Time's rapid course will comfort lend,
And even its necessary end,
Ev'n death in vain the soul assails,
Here breaks its power, its might here fails.

Into the fiery furnace blast
A box of gold we vainly cast....
The box alone's consum'd....the pure
And precious metal lies secure,
And unalloy'd defies the flame,
Whose raging leaves it still the same.
Then since so slight the loss in death we meet,
Why with regret its coming should we greet?

SELECTED POETRY.

TO HIM I MOST ESTEEM.

Yon little cot, so neat and white,
By woodbines half conceal'd from sight,
Where the old elm excludes the light,
Of Phœbus' noontide beam.
With wealth enough to keep us free,
From the cold gripe of poverty,
Would more than palace be to me
With him I most esteem.
Or was you lofty mansion mine,
Where art and nature, both combine.
To make it elegantly fine,
What joy in the extreme,
(Possessed of all that's rich and rare,
With boundless wealth, and free from care,)
T'would be an envied lot to share
With him I most esteem.
But whit'ned cot, nor woodbine bower,
Nor lofty dome, nor hall, nor tower;
Nor boundless wealth, possess the power,
To cheer life's languid dream.
Nor joy, nor peace could they impart,
Unless I knew the blissful art,
To win and ever hold the heart
Of him I most esteem.

FROM MOORE'S TRANSLATION OF THE ODES OF ANACREON,

The Phrygian rock, that braves the storm,
Was once a weeping matron's form
And Progne, hapless, frantic maid,
Is now a swallow in the shade.
Oh! that a mirror's form were mine,
To sparkle with that smile divine;
And like my heart I then should be,
Reflecting thee, and only thee!
Or were I, love, the robe which flows
O'er every charm that secret glows,
In many a lucid fold to swim,
And cling and grow to every limb!
Oh! could I, as the streamlet's wave,
Thy warmly-mellowing beauties lave,
Or float as perfume on thy hair,
And breathe my soul in fragrance there!
I wish I were the zone, that lies
Warm to thy breast, and feels its sighs;
Or like those envious pearls that shew
So faintly round that neck of snow,
Yes....I would be a happy gem,
Like them to hang, to fade like them:
What more would thy Anacreon be?
Oh! any thing that touches thee.
Nay, sandals for those airy feet...
Thus to be press'd by thee were sweet!

A Dutchman's breeches in full taste
Two opposite extremes divide
Buttons, like platters, at the waist
And studs, like peas, along the side
Each site presents in emblem true
A genuine Dutchman's constant trim

The little what you'd get by him.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXX.

The Persian poet Cálédása, in one of his charming compositions has the following stanza, "The intoxicated bee shines and murmurs in the fresh blown Mellica, like him who gives breath to a white conch."....A critic to whom Cálédása repeated this verse, observed that the comparison was not exact, since the bee sits on the blossom itself and does not murmur at the end of the tube, like him, who blows a conch. "I was aware of that," said the poet "and therefore, described the bee as intoxicated: a drunken musician would blow the shell at the wrong end." There was more than wit in this answer: It is a just rebuke; for poetry delights in general images, and is so far from being a perfect imitation, that a scrupulous exactness of descriptions and similes, by leaving nothing for the imagination to supply, never fails to diminish or destroy the pleasure of every reader, who has an imagination to be gratified.

SIR WILLIAM JONES.

My love of the oriental style, and my respect for the most venerable of volumes urge me immediately to publish the following letter.

MR. SAUNTER,

In your last speculation, you have introduced to the public two elegant articles of poetry. I allude to the versification of a prose translation by Sir William Jones from the poesy of the Arabians, and to a metrical version from the Song of Solomon.

These elegant efforts of no unwilling muse would have passed with silent approbation, had not the author, unfortunately, talked some where of the wildness of Solomon's figures, and of the incomprehensible sublimity of that passage, in which the eyes of the fair-one are compared to "the fish pool of Heshbon, by the gate of Bathrabbim, and her nose to the tower of Lebanon, which looketh toward Damascus."

From the pen of so ingenious a writer I was grieved to discern this common cavil, unworthy of the acumen of the Critic, and injurious to the transcendent genius of Solomon.

This sneer at the oriental metaphors is originally derived from the lively petulance of VOLTAIRE. This superficial infidel in his "Philosophical Dictionary" a work deformed not less by innumerable errors of science than by its audacity of scepticism and the effrontery of its blasphemies, has assailed the above expressions, and striven to render them both weak and obscure. With what success let us now examine.

A rhetorical mode of expressing most of the motions of the mind has prevailed from time immemorial in Asia. Among the rudest tribes of the red men of America, we find a violence of hyperbole, and a wildness of metaphor not less memorable. Indeed, it is incident to all men of strong passions and ardent imagination to express themselves in glowing words, often snatched hastily from the vocabulary of exaggeration. The slightest analogy satisfies, and the most remote resemblance is intuitively discerned by the lynx eye of genius. Moreover, the mind of man, as an elegant scholar disciplined in all the learning of the east assures us, sinking under the magnitude of the subject, and struggling to express its emotions has recourse to metaphors and allegories, which it, sometimes, extends beyond the bounds of cool reason, and often to the brink of absurdity. Now let the Song of Solomon be emphatically scanned by the above principles, and I think this charming composition of the Hebrew prince will appear natural and correct, as well as beautiful.

Without contending with the orthodox theologians, respecting the mystical sense, I shall simply consider it, as an epithalamium on the nuptials of Solomon with the princess of Egypt. It is of a style vivid and amatory. The natural language of a solicitous lover to his charming mistress. It describes all the hopes and fears of a tender passion; and the enraptured poet, eager to commemorate every charm of his beloved, in his zeal to omit no encomium, perhaps, renders more than justice to his favourite.

In describing her personal graces, the lover indulges himself in all the luxury of Asiatic images, and amid this glow and medley of metaphors, we come to the celebrated similes, which first provoked the malignant smile and impotent criticism of the brilliant, but noxious Voltaire. The eyes of the Egyptian beauty are compared to the fish-pool of Heshbon, and her nose to the tower of Lebanon, which looketh toward Damascus.

I confess I can discern in these similes nothing more, than an extravagance and eccentricity of expression which may be found in all the poets: which GRAY indulged in the cold cloister of Peter Louse, no less than Solomon or Haliz under the solstitial rays in Asia. HOMER and SHAKESPEARE indulge themselves in a similar licentiousness, in the use of figures; and some of the most brilliant passages in those writers, whom the world has agreed to salute with the epithet of classical, are replete with these wild fancies. When a feature was likened to a tower, nothing more was intended than to associate an idea of its symmetry and dignity; and when the sparkling eyes of beauty were compared to a fish-pool, nothing so readily occurs, as the idea of "liquid lustre," of softness, placidness and brilliancy.

I remember once, in the course of a conversation, into which I was forced by a puny deist, a minor infidel, than whom a more contemptible caviller can scarcely be imagined, that he objected to that passage, in which Solomon exclaims "behold thou art fair my love, thou hast dove's eyes." It was insisted that Solomon was a fool, his song spurious, and scripture a jest, because dove's eyes being of a reddish hue could not illustrate the fine eyes of a woman. But this darkling mole of criticism, this grub of the sacred volume could not perceive that this simile was the aptest which could be employed to express the most gracious benignity.

I confess, Mr. Saunter, though it is not a common custom of my countrymen, I continue to read the bible with an enthusiastic fondness. I hope that my heart will be always affected by its precepts, and I know that my judgment and taste according to their measure, are always satisfied with its style. My zeal to defend its beauties from the slightest touch of criticism has induced me to employ an ardency of phrase, which I hope will not offend your ingenious correspondent. I wish that he would continue his liberal, and I will add, his poetical versions; and, as he appears to possess much of the amicable docility and ingenuousness of youth, he will forgive an old man who cautions him against objecting even to the style of the wisest and brightest of mankind.

I am, sir, yours,
SENEZ.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Fanatic sects.....Shaking quakers....Anecdote of a Methodist preacher....Methodist negro society at Philadelphia.....Quaker meetings....A vain boasting quaker's liberality.....Presbyterians.....Anabaptists.....Moravians....Club of Atheists at Philadelphia.

If any inference can be drawn from cause to effect, the situation of religion among the Americans may easily be inferred from that of morals. True religion is practical morality, observed, because there exists an original moral source, or deity, and in respect of a perpetual existence after this life. It is truth, in the understanding and the mouth; goodness in the will and the actions. There is however, little of this among the Americans. But on the other hand, the universal toleration, as is well known, besides the proper christian churches now extant, such as the Protestants, in the extensive sense of the word, and the Roman-catholics, has drawn to America, all the fanatical sects extant, such as Puritans, Methodists, Moravians, Quakers, Anabaptists, Baptists, Dunkers &c. and given rise to some such there. In the state of New-York for instance, there is a sect calling itself shaking quakers. They assemble together by night, in the open field. If it be severely cold, or if it rain, or snow, so much the better. In that case they always follow in the dark their right hand, which they keep stretched out before them; for in this right hand sits the holy-ghost, and no misfortune can befall one, no error happen, so long as it is thus held before the body. Thus with the right hand stretched out before them, they go through hedges, marshes and ditches, over mountain and valley, amidst horrible yells, constantly forward. Then they whirl themselves round upon one heel with astonishing swiftness; then dance in a round, and proceed in this manner with dreadful howling, the whole night through. All this diverts the holy ghost excessively, and is absolutely necessary for eternal salvation. In the Tennessee country, an old hag travels about with her votaries, and gives herself out for God....She makes proselytes. Whenever an old woman says she is a deliverer, and prophecies, they call it in Connecticut a new-light. Methodist preachers wander all over the country, and wherever a knot of people are assembled they are sure in a trice to have a sermon. They often practice likewise something worse than sermonizing. A methodist preacher for instance, met in the highway, in a wood, a common loose woman. He grew warm; and made proposals, which found a ready ear. He could not part with his prize; and took the wench to a tavern, where he gave her out for his wife. One bed was at the desire of the parson prepared for them both. In the night, the woman was delivered of a child; and lo! it was a mulatto!...The methodists vehemently thunder forth from the pulpit...."I see," they cry out furiously to their hearers, whose faces turn to a cherry brown at the denunciation "I see the jaws of hell already open to devour you all." In Philadelphia there is a methodist society of free negroes; who usually assemble together in the evening. Nothing is more shocking than to see by candle-light, the convulsions of so many horrible black faces, accompanied with hollow groans proceeding from their beating their breasts, and at the same time to hear the thundering fury, of a raving black priest pouring forth with the utmost rage, the words "eternal damnation, endless torments and hell." The quakers on the other hand speak through the nose, and for the greatest part absurdities, which are then laid to the account of the holy ghost. It is even maintained that most of them no longer believe in quakerism. The rich among them, make the most of this world, without troubling themselves any more about the holy ghost; but I have remarked in their meetings undeniable symptoms of remaining fanaticism. They sit hours long, in universal silence, and rock themselves to and fro with their eyes shut. You then hear all at once an internal whining with the mouth shut. One of them then rises, and prates unconnected stuff, while his eyes sparkle with a wild fire, and he throws about his hands in convulsive motions. During the discourse, the rocking to and fro is continued. But it is horrible to hear an old woman, amidst convulsive distortions squeaking nonsense through the nose. Such a creature prophesied in my presence the downfall of the minister Pitt. One of my friends was present, when a woman, rose at a quaker-meeting; and gave utterance to a few words, that bear a double and very indecent meaning in English....This was all that the holy ghost inspired into her; she sat down again; and the assembly appeared much edified.

The quakers are royalists and friends of England, while the methodists on the contrary, are so far republicans, that they pray the lord, in their churches, to destroy all kings....The moderation of the quakers, is the principal cause of their prosperity. In their houses, all is elegance. Their clothing is always of the best materials, but plain in the fashion. They are accused of being extremely self-interested in their trade....And they readily boast of their benevolence....In New-York, a quaker published in the news-papers, that he would give away lands. He found claimants in abundance, but when they came the generous donor was never at home, or if a solicitor of his bounty was admitted to him, his answer was "I am very sorry; but you come too late; I have already given all away."

The presbyterians defend especially the sovereignty of God; that is, they make of the supreme being a despot who without binding himself to his own laws, rewards and punishes whom he pleases. They exclaim from their pulpits; "children, a span long, there are, roasting in hell!" These words were really spoken. It has always been the rage among mankind, to make to themselves a god after their own likeness....Harsh manners, and hypocrisy, allayed, with a dose of selfishness which often degenerates into fraud, form their character. In New-England, severe presbyterianism is yet very common, though it pretty rapidly declines, in proportion as socinianism &c. spreads itself. But as foreigners in New-England complain very much of deceit in their dealings with the natives; as these hypocrites practise their evil arts, concealed behind a pedantic mask of religious rigour, and as fraud and theft are one and the same thing, it may in fact be said, they hold the bible in one hand, while they steal with the other. Such conduct naturally flows from their principles: for if good actions, are only splendid sins displeasing to God; if faith alone is adequate to save; if every one, let him do what he will, is inevitably predestined either to heaven or to hell, the best thing he can do is to steal. The presbyterians are besides almost as hostile to the fine arts as the quakers, those true adversaries of all taste....Both these sects, as also the methodists, cherish a true tartuffian hatred against every thing that can move or exalt the heart. Self-interest is the idol they worship, and gold in truth the sole object of their adoration. From them proceeds the absurd law, with respect to the sunday, which forbids all singing, unless it be of psalms, upon that day, but not, the commission of all sorts of vice. Even in Charleston every person who makes his appearance during church time, in the streets, is taken up, and foisted into some church. In a country of universal toleration it is very extraordinary that even the Jews are obliged to shut their shops upon Sundays.

The anabaptists wear a long beard, which is a sign of the true faith. But I cannot much celebrate their humanity; for one of them accosted me with the following christian wish...."I wish you had a mill-stone fastened round your neck, and were sunk to the bottom of the sea!"....When I asked, being quite frightened, how so!...he answered, "How so! my dear Sir! why all the Germans who now come to America ought to be sunk with a mill-stone about their necks. They deserve nothing better." He was a Pennsylvanian, born of German parents. Young, grown up anabaptist girls, many of whom are very pretty, are baptised near Philadelphia, in the Schuylkill. They undress themselves; the priest takes them before him, and throws them down backwards into the river. This happens both morning and evening, even in cold weather....I have often met them upon their return from this baptismal bath, to the city: they were always remarkably frolicsome. This custom evidently supposes orthodoxy to consist in following literally the usages of the first christians. It would be wrong to class the moravians among the fanatical sects: they have an internal and an external doctrine. The multitude, which among them is only admitted to the porch of the temple may be numbered among the fanatics; but in the holy of holies there is no fanaticism. They believe there, nothing of what they profess to believe: it is considered only as useful means to obtain the favourite objects, which are, the possession of the goods of this world, and the gratification of ambition. No sect more resembles the Jesuits. The same desire to make converts is found among them. They had really succeeded in making some Indian tribes moravians. Whether the savages gained any thing by this, I know not; but the foundation of a second Paraguay in the centre of North-America was laid, when the borderers of Virginia and Pennsylvania most inhumanly butchered all these Indians. Since which no Indians, to my knowledge have been Moravianized. This hypocritical sect would be wonderfully dangerous, if it could once be powerful: but the spirit of our age is not favourable to it, and threatens with destruction all religious systems founded in error.

The moravians however have contributed most to the preservation of the German language in Pennsylvania. Their industry has established several manufactures. In North-Carolina they work in pottery. At Bethlehem, in Pennsylvania, they brew good beer, make combs, embroider, spin, make point, artificial flowers, gloves, &c. With respect to industry, they are very good citizens.

The German Lutheran and Calvinists churches, are with respect to religion, about fifty years behind hand of Germany: Mr., a lutheran clergyman at Philadelphia declared in print, that the yellow-fever was a visitation of God, to punish the admission of a company of stage players at Philadelphia, such a godless crew, never having been before tolerated there. Mr. has too much understanding to believe this; but he knew what sort of people he had to deal with. The parishes choose for their clergymen whom they please. There are preachers in Pennsylvania, who were formerly Prussian corporals. When a man knows no other trade, he commences preacher. One Spangenberg, formerly a Prussian officer of artillery, turned preacher in Pennsylvania. After having carried on the preaching business long enough, he grew weary of it, and demanded of his flock a pension during life. The church-wardens would not consent to this, whereupon he run one of them through the body. He was for cutting down more yet, but was taken up, and sent to jail. The judges wished to save his life under the pretext that he was insane....But he wrote them that they were scoundrels, and he was resolved to die. He was hanged.

I have already observed that socinianism, arianism, deism, and atheism, are constantly gaining proselytes. Mr. Priestly enjoys the triumph whenever he comes to Philadelphia, of preaching to the most numerous congregations. In these sermons he explains to the great instruction and edification of the ladies, the theory of generation. In New-England, deism is constantly spreading, and especially among the persons in authority throughout all the states it makes numerous converts. The American deists and atheists concern themselves very little about the theory of their doctrines, to examine which they are too indolent. Their ordinary maxim in this case is "I dont care." They love these systems because they consider them as allowing a freer scope, and as furnishing a greater variety of means, to their exertions for the gratifications of their favourite passion for the goods of this earth. And as men commonly adore or set up as their God, whatever they love above all things, these people are painted in the truest colours, when we say that a round sum of dollars is the idol of their worship. Most of them love the dollars for the sake of squandering them away again. Pure avarice is seldom seen. Few give themselves out for atheists: and the deists, so called, do not wish to pass for such. There was however a small knot of atheists, who for some time met every Sunday at a tavern in Philadelphia, where they parodied the christian church service, instead of psalms, sung bawdy songs, talked blasphemy, obscenity &c. A German fool, by the name of, sub-director of the of the United States, who possessed however some mechanical genius, (for he is the inventor of a ship, to navigate a river upwards, without sails or oars,) was at the head of this virtuous society. They endeavoured to make proselytes by giving out, that in their society all property was held in common. Most of these bedlamites, however were Frenchmen. One of them proposed to deliver lectures of atheism, at the theatre, upon the days when no play was performed. But his proposal was ridiculed, and he did not put it in execution. Conceive, a Frenchman trying to make converts to atheism by discourses in the English language! The whole atheistical fraternity, were very soon sent to jail for debt, excepting, who had some property....Many of them turned beggars; every one, then, declared all the rest to be rascals, who had never performed their promise of sharing all their property in common; and the charge was on all sides well founded.

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[We perused the pamphlet entitled a "View of the Political Conduct of Aaron Burr, Esquire, Vice President of the United States."]

As citizens of the Union, we should observe with no small concern the symptoms of irreconcilable dissensions between the two highest official characters of the national government, had we reason to believe that their harmony would contribute to the general welfare, and promote the true interests of the country.

But this is not our creed....We have no faith in the infallibility either of the head of the established church, or of his vicerent....We are heretics....We are sectaries....And we hope that good rather than evil will result from the discords which have arisen in the holy church of Jacobinism.

To understand the origin and motives of the publication before us, and all the designs it is intended to promote, a more intimate knowledge of the state of parties in New-York, would be necessary, than we possess....We know, however, that for the purpose of bursting open the doors of public confidence, a coalition of the most heterogeneous materials had there taken place, and we did not expect that the concord of such men as the Clintons, the Livingstons, and the Burrs could long subsist after they had attained the object which alone had linked them together....We are not surprized to find, as by this pamphlet is ascertained, that the source of their present divisions, was in the distribution of the booty among the several door-busters of the band....It was no great question of national interest, of deep and perplexing intricacy....No important principle of internal administration or foreign negotiation, upon which honest and enlightened minds might differ, and differing might see in the magnitude of the object a justification for inflexible perseverance on either side....No question of peace or war with a powerful European nation; no altercation to destroy or to save the constitution or the union of our country, which separated these fast-bound friends....No!....It was the dissention of a doit....Whether Mr. George Clinton junior, or W. P. Van Ness should be palmed upon the citizens of New-York, as a member of assembly?...Whether Mr. Matthew L. Davis or Mr. Bailey, should turn out the federal clerks in the New-York Custom-house....Whether the twenty-four auctioneers in the city should be taken from among the tools of Mr. de Witt Clinton, or those of Mr. Burr?...We say we are not surprized at all this....The character of the party is as strongly marked in the causes of their dissolution, as it has been in the effects of their coalescence.

Who the author of this pamphlet is we know not....From its internal evidence we presume him to be a Clintonian....Mr. Burr is the great and professed object of his attack; and of course he is an assiduous courtier to the sage of Monticello....At the same time all Mr. Burr's friends come in for a share of his malignity: and something more than coolness is observable throughout the work, towards the Livingstons.

The style is below criticism....There are not three sentences of grammar together, in the whole book....The language is coarse and inelegant; with an affected intermixture of foreign phraseology, and unusual expressions....Yet as a party production it bears marks of considerable address....The writer appears to be a man conversant with the manœuvres of his party, long habituated to their intrigues, and hackened in their ways, but very ignorant, very illiterate, and very full of malice against all the world, excepting only the sage of Monticello, and the Clintons of New-York.

We are not, and never were admirers of Mr. Burr....He has long and we believe justly been viewed by the federalists as one of the most powerful men in the opposite party; but they have always considered him as a man of worse than questionable character, for the very qualities with which this pamphleteer now reproaches him....When once reduced by an unfortunate provision of the general constitution and by the perverseness of the opposite party to make an election between two great evils, part of them did indeed consider him as the least; but he never was, and never could be, the man of their choice.

We say they were driven to this election by the perverseness of the opposite party; for what milder name can the conduct of the jacobins deserve, who freely, with their eyes open, and without compulsion gave an equal number of votes to this selfish, intriguing, unprincipled, political trimmer, for the office of president of the Union, as to the sage of Monticello, the admirable man, the frank and easy inhabitant of the charming mansion.

This instance of political profligacy is so glaring and of such an odious complexion that the author of the narrative himself has anticipated the charge, and endeavoured to rescue his party from the imputation....We subjoin as a specimen of the author's style, of his address, and of his ingenuousness, the manner in which he states this serious question.

"The character faithfully drawn of Mr. Burr in the following pages, is so complex, so stript of precise and indelible marks; so mutable, capricious, versatile, unsteady, and unfixed,* one to which no determinate name can be given, and on which no reliance can be placed, that serious questions may arise from it. It appears that from his debut on political life, he has been every thing and nothing: that he has been ascending the ladder of fame and power by means on which no honest man can reflect with satisfaction, and it may be added that all this must have been known to those who raised him to his present eminence in the government; and being conscious that he was no less destitute of a determinate principle than of political consistency, it were criminal to exalt him to an height from which he might hurl destruction upon the people. This it must be admitted, has some weight; it has at least a plausible appearance."

We have said there were not three sentences of grammar together in the whole pamphlet....We request those of our readers whose proficiency in literature has extended to the study of Lowth's Introduction, to examine the sentences they have just read, by his rules, and we assure them that the whole book is written in the same manner.

But how does the narrator answer the serious question?

"I candidly confess I am one of those who were unacquainted with the true character of Mr. Burr, until his singular conduct since the election of Mr. Jefferson, induced me to examine the more early parts of it.".....

* These five epithets to express one idea, go beyond Captain Fluellen's description of Fortune. "And she is painted also with a wheel, to signify to you, which is the moral of it, that she is turning, and inconstant, and variation, and mutabilities." V. Shakespeare Henry V.

....."It will give no offence to the majesty of truth to say, that the PEOPLE, the great mass, were like myself, strangers to the conduct of Mr. Burr. It is doubtless to this ignorance of character that he owes his elevation.—The people cannot wittingly be guilty of a faute de se."

The truth of this statement so far as it respects the people, may be admitted—But the candour of the confession is not so obvious. In paying perpetual and affected homage to the People, the writer follows the example and the precept of his party. In all countries where the people are the dispensers of greatness, the parasites of power cringe and fawn to them, as in monarchies they are the most servile worshipers of the reigning prince. This observation is as old as the age of Aristotle, and it will remain true so long as there shall be kings to flatter and people to delude.

But if the people, whose voice by their electors, carried Mr. Burr to a competition for the first magistracy of the union, were so utterly ignorant of his character, why does not the author of the Narrative tell the whole truth?...Why does he not explain the deceptions, the falsehoods, the impostures by which the people were induced to favour thus highly Mr. Burr?...For this plain reason....that he could not unfold these mysteries without exposing the foul intrigues of his own party; without plucking the mask from the sage of Monticello, as well from the son of president Burr; without detecting the forgery of two counterfeit patriots instead of one, and without convicting the whole jacobinic faction to which he still adheres, of knowing the counterfeits to be of the basest metal, and passing them for sterling gold.

That the author of the View, was ignorant himself of Mr. Burr's character, when friendly to his election as vice president, will hardly be believed by those who see how much he knows of it now.... There is but one transaction exhibited in the pamphlet, tending to fix upon Mr. Burr any charge of a deeper dye, than that of being a political intriguer, willing to be president of the United States if he could....We mean the dispute with Angerstein....This had been a matter of public notoriety for years, in New-York, for it had been a subject of suits both at law and in chancery....As the pamphleteer represents it, the transaction was on the part of Mr. Burr scandalous in the highest degree; but notorious as it was, with what colour of credibility can a New-York republican come and tell the world, that he knew nothing of it when he supported Mr. Burr....If he did not know it, his ignorance was his fault, for he had the means of information in his power, and he was bound in duty to use them....If he did know it, how dares he now hold it up as rendering Mr. Burr unfit for the confidence of the people?

There is no sort of obloquy, which the author of the View is not endeavouring perpetually to cast upon the federal party; yet we remark in this instance, and in many others, that his facts separated from his invidious comments, and impartially considered, not only afford justification to the federalists against his imputations but contrast the conduct of the two parties in a manner very honorable to the federal side and very disgraceful to his friends.

He states that during the contest at Washington for the choice of president, by the house of representatives, some intimation of Mr. Burr's dishonourable conduct, in this affair, reached that place.... That a partial investigation of the fact was there had; "by which party he cannot imperatively (positively) say," but in all probability by the federalists. Copies of the papers in the chancery suit between Angerstein and Burr, were sent for to New-York, and were transmitted by Thomas Smith, a clerk in the chancery there. The narrative strongly insinuates that Smith, who was a partizan of Mr. Burr, falsified the copies of the papers or garbled their contents, so as to conceal the real state of facts.

Our author argues with painful labour to prove that this investigation was made by the federalists, and not by the opposite party: but much of his labour was unnecessary; we readily believe such to have been the fact, for it is perfectly consistent with the character of the two parties; the federalists in the dilemma to which they were reduced of voting for one of two men, alike obnoxious to them, were generally disposed to take Mr. Burr, as the least objectionable of the two: in the process of electioneering, however, surmises were raised that he had been concerned in disgraceful transactions, of a private nature, and the federalists immediately pursued the proper measures to ascertain the fact.... Not so the jacobins.... They had no doubts, which Smith's documents could chase away.... With such a fact staring them in the face, they were perfectly willing, and had strained every nerve to raise Mr. Burr to the second office in the union; and as it was not their purpose then to exalt him to the first, they were perfectly indifferent whether his conduct in the affair with Angerstein had been criminal or innocent.... In the minds of the federalists, the question is he honest? was of important consideration to fix their votes.... To the jacobins, no such odious scrutiny occurred.... The days were come when a formal and avowed departure from that inquiry was to be made.... The moral character of the man, was to them less than the dust of the balance.

Thus the author of the View, together with the rest of his party, are deprived even of their humiliating plea of ignorance, to excuse their support of Mr. Burr.... They cannot be admitted to stultify themselves, by way of salvo for their honesty.... That they are very wise or very well informed, we do not suspect; but that they were unacquainted with the character of Mr. Burr at the last presidential election is not true.... They knew him then as well as they know him now; and they stand responsible to the whole nation, for having employed every influence and every artifice to elevate a man, whom they then believed, and whom they now proclaim to be one of the most unprincipled and profligate men in the union.

FROM THE EVENING POST, STATE OF EUROPEAN POLITICS. FRANCE.

In reviewing the political state of Europe, France obtrudes itself first on our notice, not because it possesses any superior claim to respect, but because its revolutions have been the source of an entire new order of things in Europe; and because from its universal encroachments either by conquest, intrigue, or negotiation, the political concerns of every country in that quarter of the world are more or less affected by or interwoven with its external policy.

The history of human affairs from the beginning of the world, contains nothing to be compared to that of France for the last ten years, as a lesson in one sort of instruction.... as a scourge at once and a warning to mankind. What the wise and learned alone had collected and digested from ancient history, the populace, and the ignorant can now read while they run in those recent events. Those who admired the French revolution as a system of liberty, are now put into the most ridiculous, whimsical, and contemptible situation imaginable.... Their great high priest Bonaparte has left them all completely in the lurch. Their dogmas and favourite opinions he has trampled under foot. Revolution or innovation can no longer be very gravely pointed out as the road to liberty! Patriotism can no more be pressed into the service of democratic fraud. Demagogues will henceforward want even a plausible pretext for their delusions and at first sight be recognized for what they really are and ever have been, tyrants in embryo.... The first consul has entirely torn the mask from democracy, and branded its forehead with infamy forever. France has bled through millions of veins, but she has not bled uselessly. Ages upon ages to come will profit by her losses, her misfortunes, and her crimes; the bloodshed of the last ten years may be considered as put out at enormous interest to save the shedding of blood hereafter.

The right of every nation to choose its government will not be denied by us. The tranquillity and even joy, that has succeeded the elevation of Bonaparte, is some proof that the present government is more palatable to the people of France than the revolutionary despotisms which preceded it. At all events it is not our business here to discuss a subject which belongs to the people of France alone, and on which they have given a decision. Every good man, however must rejoice at the emancipation of that ill-starred country from the merciless tyranny of jacobinism.... Every pious man rejoices at the restoration of christianity. We cannot help thinking that the true believers of Egypt have as great a right as the infidels and jacobins of Europe to complain of the treatment of Bonaparte. They have both been completely gulled. The idol of the jacobins and infidels has seated himself on the altar and the throne.... and the quondam disciple of Mahomet, "the cheeld of circumcession" (as Sir Archy McSarcasm says) has established christianity in France, and even taken the sacramental test.

Whatever may be the internal state of France, her external aspect is extremely formidable. Let it be remembered that in the most feeble periods of the monarchy, when her territory was confined within the limits prescribed by the old treaties, she was held to be an object of continual jealousy, apprehension, and alarm to Europe. Her advantageous local situation, the extent, even then, of her territory, the fertility of her soil, the military talents and enterprize of her people, and their restless and intriguing spirit rendering her, in her most crippled state, dangerous to the independence of Europe. At that time too she was circumscribed by stronger barriers than any that paper and wax could form. The Austrian Netherlands, Holland, Switzerland, and the immense fortresses on the confines of Germany on that side of the Rhine covered the empire, and shut out France from the ports on the North Seas, while Savoy, particularly Turin, Mantua, and the Tyrol covered Italy. Add to this, that the fleets of Spain and Holland were always at hand to be thrown into the scale for the preservation of the balance of power. Such was her state when she could be formidable to Europe: Now mark what is her state when the right of the British ministers, and the wisdom of parliament can contemplate her power not only without fear, but with complacency.

In Europe she may be truly said to possess a far greater part of the continent. The barriers against her encroachments are not only removed but transferred to her own use and behoof.... The Netherlands and the fortresses in Germany, in full sovereignty.... Holland, Spain, Switzerland, Mantua, Turin, and all Italy in provincial dependence.... Her influence over Denmark, Sweden and Prussia is incontestably established. Portugal is in no state to resist her mandates. Every port and post in the Mediterranean, with the exception of Gibraltar, are under her. The fleets of Spain and Holland swell the force of her navy, and the hardy seamen of the latter are added to hers; besides timber of the best kind, sufficient for an unlimited navy, on the banks of the ceded rivers of Germany, is now in her possession.

In addition to her former possessions she has got in the East, Pondicherry, Malé, Cochin, Nagapatnam, the Spice Islands, and the Cape of Good Hope; and in the West, the whole of St Domingo, (worth all the English islands together) Martinico, St Lucie, Guadaloupe, Tobago, Curacao, St. Pierre, Miquelon, Louisiana, Surinam, Demarara, Berbice, Essequibo, Guiana, and the mouth of the River Aurazem.... All these she either has in possession or commands, because she commands the countries to which they belong.

To such an enormous power, wielded by a government which unites in itself all the wild energies of one form of government, and all the arrangement, promptitude, decision, concentration, and wisdom of another, with above a million of men trained and inured to arms, ready at a moment's call for any enterprize, we confess ourselves at a loss to find a counterpoise or resistance in any probable combination in Europe, when France shall have breathed and recruited its strength. The peace has therefore opened for her an easy passage to that perpetual object of her wishes and pursuits "UNIVERSAL EMPIRE."

The only power which can at all be looked up to by Europe as a standard at once to rally round, and a bulwark to resist the encroachments of France, is

ENGLAND.

And we confess, that secure as some statesmen in that country feel, or pretend to feel, we are at a loss to find any just grounds for their confidence. Security has often been destructive of safety, and must be the worst of enemies where it is the offspring of the will more than of reason. To the benevolent politician, who wishes to see established such a balance of power as may preserve the nations of Europe in perfect independence, the present aspect of British affairs bears nothing in it very consolatory or promising. That latent energies and unexpected powers have burst forth in nations, at the moment they have been considered as sunk forever, history produces some proofs; that they may still exist concealed in England we admit: But we will say, that they must be immense to keep pace with the enormous increase of the power of France. Let us, however, examine the subject more closely.

When the force of a nation, whether offensive or defensive, is to be considered with a view to the security it may afford her, it must be taken in a two-fold way; that is to say in its relative as well as intrinsic effect. To speak of it in mathematical terms, it is in the direct ratio of its own strength, and the inverse ratio of that of its adversary. In estimating the power of England, therefore, we must take into consideration that of France, and from a comparison of both, determine on which side the balance lies. In this way the statesmen who in the British parliament defended the peace as advantageous, would find it hard to point out any thing that England has got by the war or by the peace to put into the scale against the enormous increase of power which France has acquired by the war, and still more by the peace. We are aware of the great superiority of British troops and seamen; we recollect that during the contest with this country England fought with success against France, Spain, and Holland, and in the east against Hyder Ally, at the head of an army of half a million of soldiers. But France was then comparatively small; France then wanted "republican energies," she had a mild monarch on the throne, more fitted for peace than war: she had not a Bonaparte, either in the cabinet or the field; she was not as now, an armed nation. Yet with all these advantages on her side, if the contest were reduced to a mere affair of arms, England would have little reason to fly the field. As long as she can support her navy she can wage war with success, and preserve her territorial possessions and her honour; but it is in this very point of her strength she may be most deeply wounded. The peace, which has put all the ports in the Mediterranean, and in Holland, and the Scheldt, &c. into the dominion of Bonaparte, has bestowed along with them the power of stopping the importation of British merchandize into any of those countries. The ships of England may thunder at their ports, and silence their batteries, but not a bale of goods will find its way beyond the reach of their guns. Her commerce will be gradually crippled, her manufactures decay, and the very life and principle of existence of the British navy, will be extinguished. Mr. Windham's opinion that it is through her commerce the arts of France will destroy England, will then be verified. It seems to have been a strange oversight or else a very extraordinary concession of her negotiators, to give up all former treaties, to make no provision for the usual commercial relations, and thereby to leave so much of the vital principle of English independence and security, at the mercy of France. The consequences are already before the world.... British merchandize has been pushed from the shores of France; and Holland, at her invitation no doubt, is following the example. The first consul has led the card of his choice and Holland dare not renege to his suit; "a patient shrug" is all that is left now to the protéges of France.

From the kind of peace establishment proposed in Great Britain, and the language of the ministers as a comment upon it, it should seem as if the peace would not be of long duration. Should the war break out afresh, after France has got possession of all the colonies, Malta, &c. &c. England will have the work of a very long war to recover what she has just ceded, so that France will stand on new and ten-fold advantageous ground. Candor must own that the concessions in the treaty on the part of France, are but a sorry equivalent for such immense and important sacrifices; not to mention the almost exclusive commerce of the world, which was England's the day of the signing of the preliminaries, and which she might have retained by prosecuting the war, but which are now handed over to France. On the other hand, if the peace shall be faithfully and strictly maintained, the natural course of cause and effect must cease, or England sink to the condition of a subordinate state. By negotiation, that is to say, by solicitation mixed with threats, the French government will exact from every state of Europe, commercial regulations, to restrain the trade of England and promote that of France. Manufactures will of course follow commerce, and be encouraged in the latter country, while the manufacturer himself tempted by novelty, by enterprize, by well applied encouragement, and by the cheapness of living, will migrate to France and settle there. Thus the prop of the British navy will be frittered away, and the continental powers of Europe losing the support of England, will dwindle, and at last merge in the GREAT NATION.

Meanwhile the armed truce (for a peace with a war establishment can be considered as nothing better) will exhaust England, and the danger of invasion keep her in perpetual alarm. The whole shores of the British islands from Caithness to Kerry, are continually exposed to French ships; and out of every port, from the Baltic to the Adriatic, squadrons may issue to invade England. Nominally at peace but menaced by invasion, England will undergo all the hazard, the hardships, the expenses, and the ruinous effects of war, without any of those set-offs which actual war would afford to her.

All those advantages on the part of France, will be sedulously improved by Bonaparte; exalted to an usurped throne, his personal safety will call upon him imperiously to keep the public mind engaged; to dazzle the people with conquests; to glorify their national pride with triumph over an old rival; to prove his claim to their loyalty by substantial services, and to stop the mouth of malecontents by brilliant acts of republican magnificence and enlightened benevolent institutions....Already he professes his intention to augment his marine....already he discloses his views to commerce....already he talks of a navigation act for France; and he will, no doubt, strain his mind, capacious of such things, to the accomplishment of the ruin of England, in order to put his adversaries in France to silence. Even the peace itself, on which such reliance is had, may, perhaps, soon turn out (to use the words of a great statesman in England) "to be only a piece of legerdemain to get possession of Malta; to establish France in her new colonies; to re-enter Egypt; to receive back thirty thousand seamen, (prisoners of war in England;) and to put the chief consul in a situation to recommence the war with new and decisive advantages."

MISCELLANY. CHARACTERS.

A SAILOR

Is a pitched piece of reason caulked and tackled, and only studied to dispute with tempests. He is part of his own provision, for he lives ever pickled; a fair wind is the substance of his creed, and fresh water the burden of his prayers. He is naturally ambitious, for he is ever climbing out of sight; as naturally he fears, for he is ever flying: Time and he are every where: ever contending who shall arrive first: he is well winded, for he tires the day, and outruns darkness: his life is like a hawk's, the best part mewed; and if he lives till three coats, is a master: he sees God's wonders in the deep, but so as they rather appear his playfellows, than stirrers of his zeal. Nothing but hunger and hard rocks can convert him, and then but his upper deck neither, for his hold neither fears nor hopes; his sleeps are but reprievals of his dangers, and when he awakes, it is but next stage to dying; his wisdom is the coldest part about him, for it ever points to the north, and it lies lowest, which makes his valour every tide overflow it. In a storm it is disputable whether the noise be more his or the elements', and which will first leave scolding? on which side of the ship he may be saved best: whether his faith be starboard faith or larboard, or the helm at that time not all his hope of heaven! His keel is the emblem of his conscience: till it be split he never repents....then no farther than the land allows him. His language is a new confusion, and all his thoughts new nations: his body and his ship are both one burden: nor is it known who stows most wine or rolls most, only the ship is guided....he has no stern; a barnacle and he are bred together both of one nature, and, it is feared one reason: upon any but a wooden horse he cannot ride, and if the wind blows against him he dare not: he swarms up to his seat as to a sail-yard, and cannot sit unless he bear a flag staff; if ever he be broken to the saddle, it is but a voyage still; for he mistakes the bridal for a bowling, and is ever turning his horse-tail; he can pray but it is by rote, not faith, and when he would he dares not, for his brackish belief hath made that ominous. A rock or a quicksand pluck him before he is ripe, else he is gathered to his friends at Wapping.

A SOLDIER

Is the husbandman of valour; his sword is his plough, which honour and aqua vitæ, two fiery nettled jades, are ever drawing. A younger brother best becomes arms, an elder the thanks for them; every heat makes him a harvest, and discontents abroad are his sowers; he is actively his prince's, but passively his passion's servant: he is often a desirer of learning, which once arrived at proves his strongest armour: he is a lover at all points, and a true defender of the faith of women. More wealth than makes him seem a handsome foe, lightly he covets not....less is below him; he never truly wants but in much having, for then his ease and affluence afflict him. The word peace, though in prayer, makes him start, and God he best considers by his power; hunger and cold rank in the same file with him, and hold him to a man; his honour else, and the desire of doing things beyond him, would blow him greater than the sons of ANACK; his religion is commonly as his cause is, doubtful, and that the best devotion keeps best quarter: he seldom sees gray hairs, some none at all; for where the sword fails, there the flesh gives fire: in charity he goes beyond the clergy, for he loves his greatest enemy best, much drinking. He seems a full student, for he is a great desirer of controversies; he argues sharply, and carries his conclusion in his scabbard. In the first refining of mankind this was the gold, his actions are his ammel*, his ally (for else you cannot work him perfectly) continual duties, heavy and weary marches, lodgings as full of need as cold diseases: no time to argue but to execute. Line him with these, and link him to his squadrons, and he appears a rich chain for princes.

EFFECTS OF THE ATMOSPHERE

UPON

THE ANIMAL SPIRITS.

BY WILLIAM BECKFORD, ESQ.

It is generally allowed that the state of the atmosphere has a very sensible effect upon the human mind; and to this natural barometer is, in a great measure, owing, the rise or depression of the animal spirits. That climate has an influence upon the intellectual, as well as upon the corporeal powers, we are led by observation, and taught by experience, to believe; and this datum cannot fail to be corroborated by those whose curiosity or pursuits have induced them to visit, or to reside in, the different latitudes of our terraqueous globe.

That the rigours of frost and snow benumb, and that the warmth of the sun invigorates, the ideas of those who are born and educated under a more genial sky, the productions of the human intellect, in the different walks of philosophy, of science, and the arts, will bear an incontrovertible as an honorable record: but, as the investigation of this subject would lead to a disquisition, too general and minute, I shall content myself with such observations, as more immediately interest our personal feelings.

If our sensations are to undergo a change, in conformity to the variations of the weather, in a climate like this, in which the sun-shine and the gloom are so successive and inconstant, how irregular must be our elemental enjoyments, and how very precarious their duration? The seasons do not gain upon us with any regular recurrence; and when we look for the month, that should bring us back the promise of fruits and flowers....instead of refreshing dews and salutary rains, we are disappointed by the unexpected continuance of winds and frost. The winter makes an inroad upon the autumn, and not only tyrannizes over, but annihilates the spring; and when we should expect the breezes of the west, and the temperate zephyrs of the south, the biting east continues to blow, to delay the verdure of the advancing year, and to triumph over the hopes of industry and vegetation.

The spirits of some men are entirely graduated by the appearance of the day; a cheerful morning will make them buoyant, a passing cloud rebate their happiness, and a settled gloom involve them in despair. Unconscious of the romantic perceptions of lightning and of thunder, of tempest and of rain; unaroused by the beauties of horror† which bespeak the magnificence of nature, and the attributes of the Deity; they know not those enjoyments, that proceed from melancholy, and are hence deprived of the highest rapture that can be sustained by rational and enlightened minds.

* An old word for enamel.

† Les belles horreurs, a favourite expression of the French

I have known those, whose whole nervous system has been, as it were, untuned by the prognostications of rain, when the gathering clouds appeared to throw a darkness over the understanding, and the whole frame to vibrate at the sounding of the deluge.

Of what rational pleasures, of what rural delights, and of what sublimity of observation must be those individuals deprived, who, unmindful of the opportunities, which, in all seasons of the year, recur, to enable him to ascertain the causes, and to trace the effects, of the varieties of nature, are only anxious to pass these moments of inquiry; and, absorbed in the vacancy of their ideas, detract from that enthusiasm, which was a physical instinct, or is become a habit, in others.

If we read, with complacency, in the harmony of our poets, the fascinating descriptions of a simple and a rural life, every minute of the day, every occupation of the hour, every transition of light and shadow, that irradiates or overcasts the pastoral scene, has, by turns, its different effect, and speaks a language, which, one would suppose, to be common to all; and if they please by reflection, how enchanting must be the reality of their objects?

How often have I observed, under the leafy protection of an oak, the sudden tempest burst around me: how often seen the playful lightning dart among the trees and illuminate with lambent rays the deep recesses of the forest? How often have I listened, with an emotion, arising from the awfulness of repercussion, to the heavy peals, that rumbled over head, and followed, with attentive ear, the hollow cadence, until it became fainter by degrees, and at length died away amidst the hills? How often have I traced the torrents, impetuous in their course, and, undermining the sapling and the shrubs, impel them through the valley, or leave them, in gathered masses, to impede the passage of the road? How often have I attended, with a speechless delight, to the rain-drops, pattering upon the thatch, depending from the eaves, or distilling from the flower?

I cannot easily forget my walks, so frequently interrupted by the coming of the deluge, when exposed upon the heath, and at a distance from protection; nor when sheltered, have I ceased to observe the fretting of the storm, the nutations of the trees, and the drivings of the blast. I have seen the drops disturb the dimples of the lake, or exciting bubbles in the stream, while the moor-hen and the coot have dived amidst the tides, or wantonly disported amidst the sedges and the reeds.

By some men these observations may be considered as idle and useless; as an unnecessary waste of that time, intended for more sedentary and profitable employments; but how futile would be the pursuits of the closet, did not the philosopher enrich his mind with external objects, and cull from the general laboratory of nature, that multiplicity of resources, which refines his moral intellect, at the same time, that it improves his general and experimental inquiry.

If we admire the instinct of the bee, and observe the economy and the wonderful regularity of the political hive, we cannot help being surprised at their incessant labour and perseverance, and, while we dwell with delight upon their domestic cares and occupations, we still know that they are the natural consequences of external selection, and proceeding from the bounties of that general Provider, who has so kindly afforded the materials upon which they work. When these ingenious, as industrious, artificers are obliged, by wind and showers, to refrain from their aerial excursions, yet has their provident foresight directed the means of local employment. Equally sedulous at home, as inquisitive upon the wing, they form an epitome of what should be the practice and imitation of the governments of men, and exhibit a striking example of patience, frugality and order, when opposed to the ruinous contrast of inactivity, dissipation and tumult. It is, however, melancholy to think that their little endeavours are consumed for the profits of the ungrateful; and that they are not only plundered, but sacrificed at the shrine of the voluptuous and unreflecting.

If manual labour is to be suspended by elemental impressions, what would become of those innumerable tribes of population, who are dependent, for the supply of their necessities, upon their laborious and unceasing operations? The languor, resulting from heat, and the rigour proceeding from cold, may certainly incapacitate some particular constitutions from strong and active exertions: but then, are there not many of our artificial wants, that are only supplied by the hands of debility and indolence? And of this latter description, are almost all those luxuries, which are derived from the East.

I cannot envy the feelings, nor adopt the philosophy, of that man, who can only be said to exist, under the impressions of a serene and a cloudless sky; who can only contemplate Nature, under her most graceful appearances, and think her only a subject of observation and delight, when all her beauties are irradiated by the sun-beam, and all her landscapes are made perceptible by a profusion of light. Such transcendent brilliancy would rather appear to me to satiate, than excite enjoyment, as the most refined sweets are more apt to cloy, than provoke the appetite. Besides, the pleasures they afford, are merely ebullitions, and, like the finer wines, evaporate before we can determine upon their flavour, or their spirit. If a sudden cloud shall intervene, to obscure the prospect, fruition is converted into regret, at least, if not into spleen, and the mind becomes gloomy in proportion to the splendours, that are now withdrawn.

After having long sustained an intemperate and intermitting drought, with what anxiety do we behold the gathering cloud, and how much are our languid perceptions relieved by the coolness of the shower? With what delight do we attend to the descent of the rain, made vocal, as it falls by domestic projections, compressed into lakes, or gathered into torrents, by the artificial confinement of cisterns and of troughs? The very gloom seems to throw a reflective complacency, if not a pleasing melancholy across the soul; and, when contemplated through this medium, how little to be dreaded, even amidst their frowns, are the concussions of the opposing elements?

To me, a lowering morning, or a stormy day, affords a species of gratification, I know not how to express. My mind seems imperceptibly to accommodate itself to the appearance of the atmosphere; and, without being depressed, my spirits enjoy a calm....a serenity of action, if I may so express it, which light and sun-shine cannot bestow. No extraordinary darkness overshadows my mind, in consequence of the menace of the surrounding atmosphere; and, accustomed to hurricanes and elementary destruction, I feel not appalled at the rapidity of the lightning, the roarings of the thunder, or the terrors of the tempest.

If the storm shall rage without, yet, if peace shall inhabit within, how little cause have we to deprecate its impression? The perceptions, as the eye through a mirror, may contemplate these external scenes, that vary with the seasons, may bring all nature into one intellectual focus, and select such prospects and situations, as may best answer her purposes and enjoyments, and, being able to discriminate between the imaginary wretched, and those poor objects of creation, who are really and undeservedly so, may pass by the fictions of the one, and relieve the necessities of the other.

RECLUSE.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

Looking over a well conducted miscellany, published some time since, abroad, I found a pretty imitation of WALLER's delightful address to his mistresses, under the names of Amoret and Sacharissa. Of classical poems, imitations and parodies are sufficiently numerous, and often deplorably defective. Every stripling in love, who, of course, turns poet, and weaves a few rhymes, calls them an imitation of SWENSTONE, especially if he can introduce the pastoral vocabulary, sheep, crook and fountain. The Imitation, introduced in this evening's speculation, was written by an eminent person, lately deceased. It was composed we hear upwards of fifty years ago, and has not, till lately, been published. We cannot refrain from stopping an instant, to admire the inimitable delicacy, grace and address of the original. WALLER has been justly surnamed the Courtly.

TO AMORET.

Fair, that you may truly know
What you unto Thyrsis owe,
I will tell you how I do
Sacharissa love, and you.

Joy salutes me, when I set
My blest eyes on Amoret:
But with wonder I am struck,
When I on the other look.
If sweet Amoret complains,
I have sense of all her pains;
But, for Sacharissa I
Do not only grieve, but die.

All that of myself is mine,
Lovely Amoret, is thine;
Sacharissa's captive fain
Would untie his iron chain,
And, those scorching beams to shun,
To thy gentle shadow run.

If the soul had free election,
To dispose of her affection,
I would not thus long have borne
Haughty Sacharissa's scorn.
But 'tis sure, some power above,
Which controuls our wills in love,
If not love, a strong desire,
To create, and spread that fire
In my breast, solicits me,
Beauteous Amoret, for thee.

'Tis amazement, more than love,
Which her radiant eyes do move;
If less splendour wait on thine,
Yet they so benignly shine,
I would turn my dazled sight,
To behold their milder light.
But as hard 'tis to destroy
That high flame, as to enjoy;
Which how easily I may do,
Heaven, as easily seal'd, does know
Amoret's as sweet, and good,
As the most delicious food,
Which, but tasted, does impart
Life and gladness to the heart.

Sacharissa's beauty's wine,
Which to madness doth incline;
Such a liquor, as no brain,
That is mortal, can sustain.

Scarce can I to heaven excuse
The devotion, which I use
Unto that adored dame,
For 'tis not unlike the same,
Which I thither ought to send;
So that, if it could take end,
'T would to heaven itself be due,
To succeed her, and not you;
Who already have of me
All, that's not idolatry,
Which, though not so fierce a flame,
Is longer like to be the same.

Then smile on me, and I will prove,
Wonder is shorter liv'd than Love.

IMITATION.

TO DR. DENNIS.

Jolly Dennis, wouldst thou know
Who's the lass, that wounds me so?
Wouldst thou have me tell thee true?
Dennis, I'm in love with two—
Julia fair, Belinda coy,
All my amorous hours employ.
Julia, more than mortal fair,
Like Diana doth appear,
When, amid the sacred groves,
With the virgin choir, she roves,
Graceful and majestic,
Thus she overtops them all;
Nor her dart more fatal flies,
Than the wounds from Julia's eyes.

Not with charms, so fiercely bright,
Soft Belinda cheers the sight,
Yet, with no less force, impart
Pleasing raptures to the heart.

Julia's charms are like mid day,
Scorch'd by Titan's fiercest ray,
Whose immoderate heat does harm,
Whilst it only means to warm.

But Belinda's beauties, like
Evening mild, our senses strike;
Yet no less they surely move
The beholders' hearts with love.
'Tis not every blooming grace,
That adorns her lovely face,
Nor the nameless beauties, seen
In her amiable mien;
But the charms, which she displays
In whatever she does and says,
And that sweet, engaging air,
So peculiar to the fair,
That, without my knowledge, have Made me more than half her slave.

Julia, amorous, blithe, and gay,
Sports the dancing hours away,
Mirth and jollity attend,
Whereso'er her steps may bend,
Whilst the lightnings of her eyes
Make a thousand hearts her prize,
Yet on me alone dispense
Their benignant influence,
Yes, tho' mighty be the boast
Charming Julia loves me most,
Most of all the rival swains
That possess the fertile plains.

But, tho' gentle, as the pair
Of immortal Doves, that bear
Cytherea, when she flies
In her car adown the skies;
See Belinda, beautiful maid,
Of her tender heart afraid,
Round her, sacred person keep
Guards alas! that never sleep;
Lo, Discretion seated there,
Cold her looks, and grave her air,
And, with downcast looks stands by Ever blushing modesty,
Who, with countenance severe,
Feed my Love and my Despair.

As beneath some fragrant shade
My faint limbs supinely laid,
While Sol's beams intensely beat
I secure me from its heat,
And each aromatic bough
Sheds its sweets on me below,
So methinks with Julia blest
On her bosom I could rest.
But time flies with envious haste,
Halcyon days wont always last;
When the spring of life is o'er,
Sickly Autumn tries its power,
Then, what boots the leafless shade?
Soon its verdant honours fade,
And its store of odorous sweets
Now no more my senses greets,
But loud storms and rains instead
Beat on my defenceless head.

But Belinda I compare
To a mansion large and fair,
Under whose commodious roof
All corroding cares aloof,
Blest with happiness and peace
I could lead a life of ease,

And despise, in plenty bold,
Summer's heat and Winter's cold.

N.

Dr. JOHNSON, in his life of Cowley, tells us that a Coal mine has not often had its Poet, and yet in the stanzas by Cleaveland on so humble a topic, we discover a pleasing fabric of poetry raised. Of the lowly bramble a despised plant, Mr. GILPIN thus elegantly draws the picture.

Of all underwood, I know but one plant that is disagreeable, and that is the bramble. We sometimes see it with effect, crawling along the fragments of a rock, or running among the rubbish of a ruin; though even then, it is a coarse appendage. But as a pendent plant it has no beauty. It does not hang carelessly, twisting round every support, like the hop, and others of the creeping tribe, but forms one stiff, unpliant curve. Nor has it any foliage to recommend it. In other pendent plants, the leaf is generally luxuriant, and hangs loosely in rich festoons; but in the suckers of a bramble the leaf is harsh, shrivelled, and discoloured. In short, it is a plant, which one should almost wish to have totally exterminated from landscape. It has neither beauty in itself, nor harmonizes with any thing around it; and may be characterised, as the most insignificant of all vegetable reptiles.

The name of Little, prefixed to the volume of Poems, whence the following are extracted is a fiction. The real name is Thomas Moore, Esq. of the Middle Temple, whose splendid and perfect translation of Anacreon is at present a reigning topic in the learned circles. He has been charged with copying too closely the voluptuous stile of OVID and CATULLUS, but,

The following stanzas prove that the author can be moral, tender and impressive.

Oh woman, if by simple wile
Thy soul has stray'd from honour's track
Tis mercy only can beguile
By gentle ways the wanderer back.

The stain that on thy virtue lies,
Wash'd by thy tears may yet decay
As clouds that sully morning skies,
May all be wept in showers away.

Go go... be innocent, and live....
The tongues of men may wound thee sore,
But heaven in pity can forgive
And bids thee go and sin no more.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

It is well known that in Egypt, India, and the hotter parts of America, that abound with poisonous serpents, there are certain individuals, who possess the power of entirely disarming these formidable animals, and are able to handle them with perfect impunity, at the very time that any other person, approaching them incautiously, would be fatally convinced of their ability to destroy. This happy exemption is attributed by the people themselves to the preservative effects of certain vegetables, the knowledge of which has hitherto been carefully concealed. Many of the European philosophers have, however, treated the affair as a mere juggle. This state of uncertainty is now, happily for humanity and science, relieved by the most important communication from Don Pedro D'Orbieres Y Vangas, through the medium of Count Rumford, which, if entirely to be depended upon, will entitle the communicator to high rank among the benefactors of mankind. Don Pedro is a native of Santa-Fe, and, in the year 1788, being at Margarita, he met with a slave who possessed the power of charming the most venomous of the American serpents; after the negro had exhibited his skill, he was induced by a reward to promise to discover his secret. The next morning he returned with the leaves of a plant called vejugo du guaco, and having bruised them in the presence of Don Pedro, gave him two large spoonfuls to drink...then making three incisions between the fingers of each hand, he inoculated the Spaniard's with the same juice, and performed a similar operation on each foot, and on each side of the breast, after which he informed him that he was no longer accessible to the poison of serpents. Don Pedro then, after making the negro answerable for any ill consequences, took into his hands, several times, one of the serpents that had been brought by the slave the day before, without receiving the smallest injury from the animal. Encouraged by the first attempt, two domestics, being in like manner prepared by the guaco juice, went into the fields, and soon returned with another kind of serpent equally venomous with the former, without sustaining any hurt; another person, being similarly prepared, and afterwards bitten by a poisonous serpent, received no further injury than a slight local inflammation. Since this period, Don Pedro has repeatedly caught serpents with his own hands with absolute impunity, employing no farther preparation than merely drinking a little of the guaco juice. The plant, whose effects are thus attested, has not yet been admitted into any botanical system, but it is amply described in a memoir by the Spanish gentleman already mentioned, inserted in a weekly paper published at Santa-Fe. It is not of the compound-flowered or syngenesious class. The stamina are five in number, united by their anthers into a cylinder, through which rises the pistil with a deeply divided summit. The corolla is monopetalous, infundibuliform, with five indentations, and of a yellow colour; each oalix contains four florets, and several of these grow together, forming a corymbus: the seeds are broad and featured; the root is fibrous, perennial; the stem straight, cylindrical when young, but when old becomes pentagonal; leaves are heart shaped, opposite, of a dark green mixed with violet, velvety on the upper surface. It grows by the sides of rivulets and in shady places, in the viceroyalty of Santa-Fe.

Sir Frederic Morton Eden, Bart. in a late pamphlet, elegantly and temperately written, thus speaks of the London Porcupine. "I, with pleasure, profess myself a friend to the Porcupine and its principles; and I write with no view to disparage, or bring into disesteem, your exertions in the public cause; but, in that spirit of independency which you have so laudably laboured to raise and cherish in us, I cannot help thinking you have carried, or are in danger of carrying, your dislike of the peace too far; and that, in your anxiety to keep down the exultations and insolence of jacobinism, you run no ordinary risk of exciting a no less dangerous spirit, that of despondency. I am not insensible of your merits in other respects; were this the proper place, I should most willingly compliment you on them, and particularly on the altered and improved language of your paper, in which you have, in good time, substituted British and monarchical urbanity, for American and republican coarseness and vulgarity."

A patent has been granted to Mr. Pott, of Belford, Northumberland, for an artificial leg, which is made of light materials, and has great resemblance to the bony and fleshy parts of the natural leg. By this, the wearer is enabled, to avoid those semi-circular motions, which most artificial legs require: all its motions are perfectly at his command; he has the power of turning inward and outward, and can imitate almost every motion that can be performed by the natural leg. The wearer of Mr. Pott's artificial leg, can, with the utmost ease, sit, kneel, rise, pull on and off, a boot, and even walk several miles, without incurring great fatigue.

THE PARTERRE.

[Charles Cotton has attained high reputation for his 'Travestie of Virgil'; a work inspired by all the powers of laughter and burlesque. The following witty perversion of Homer's sublimity was the ludicrous effusion of a poetical physician, whose premature death forbade him to protract life, by his science, or to gladden it by his humour.]

Parody of that noted passage in Pope's Homer, beginning with

"AURORA NOW, FAIR DAUGHTER OF THE DAWN."

Aurora now began to rise,
And light her flambeau round the skies.
When Jove arose from lousy bed,
And yawn'd, and stretch'd, and scratch'd his head.
His sleepy followers next he call'd,
To them assembled thus he bawl'd:
"Ye half-dress'd lazy dogs! give ear!
And what I say, with patience hear:
If one of you, or man, or boy,
Assist the Greeks, or succour Troy,
Nay, if he only will to do it,
I swear I'll make the rascal rue it:
His martial vigour I shall cool,
And send him homeward like a fool:
Nay, he may think me wond'rous civil,
If I dont hurl him to the devil:
There, held by lock, and bolt, and fetter,
'Till the presumptuous dog grows better;
And plung'd as far beneath hell's centre,
As that from us, to speak at venture.
Let him, who thinks this vain parade
Stand out....I'll thwack the doughty blade.
And, if ye dare to claim controul,
I'll baste the ribs of every soul,
Come on, for form's sake let us try,
Whether be stronger....ye, or I.
Here....see my leg? clap on a chain,
And lug and pull with might and main,
Haul till you're tired, I'll never stir,
Nought can remove the thunderer.
But when I lift my brawny fist,
I knock ye all just where I list.
I take the chain, from off my leg,
And fix it on yon wooden peg.
To 'to'ther end I hang the earth,
And mock your pride with hearty mirth,
'Tis thus I rule such brainless clods,
Nor care a groat for men or Gods!"

He ceas'd, the fools were sadly scar'd,
And not a single whoreson dar'd,
To contradict or make reply;
While Jove with laughing shook the sky.
But, when his godship ceas'd his laughter,
Pallas, his dearest baseborn daughter,
Came driving in, all wet with tears,
Her flaming locks about her ears,
With one shoe on, and one bare foot,
And but one ragged petticoat,
And sniv'ling cry'd...."well....well....we'll yield
To leave the Grecians on the field,
And, when the rogues are maul'd and die,
Let us with due devotion cry,
For, faith, they'll fall in shoals, like mice,
Unless you let us give advice."
At this the surly god relented,
And of his purpose half repented;
Flew to the slut with eager pace,
And warmly kiss'd her dirty face,
Call'd her his dearest baseborn honey;
Then bade his lackey saddle poney;
In haste the lad his signal took,
While all heavens craggy timber's shook,
And instantly with wond'rous speed,
Produc'd a rawbon'd founder'd steed.
Unshod, uncomb'd, with rotten rein,
Coarse shaggy sides, and tangled main.

Jove mounted with his spur and boot,
And in his stirrup stuck his foot.
The nag put on in haste to fly,
And cut his capers round the sky.
Pluto, as usual ev'ry sunday,
Had just set down to taste his 'gundy,
When, hearing some unusual clatter,
He rose, and overset the platter.
But, being hind'ed in retreat,
The gushing porridge scal'd his feet.
He roar'd....a thousand devils stept in,
And strove amain to keep out Neptune,
For Pluto fear'd, lest in the fright,
His dark designs would come to light;
And Jove would see in luckless hour,
How far he stretch'd his lawless pow'r.

Such are the troubles, such the cares,
When Gods neglect their own affairs,
And, meddling in our mortal matters,
Tear all the world to rags and tatters.

[I have just read Mr. Mulligan's account of our club in your paper, and I must tell you, that I don't think it at all right for Mr. Mulligan to have given any hint about my being put in the watch-house; for he knows very well, so he does, that I could tell of a worse place he has been in, and for a longer time too: not that I care much about such reports, for I am pretty well used to them, but that I think he might have asked my leave first, and not try to get off, as he does now, by saying, that nobody knew it was me he meant, since he did not mention my name.

As I think I may as well be in print as Mr. Mulligan (for I look upon myself to be as good a man as he by night or by day), I take the liberty of writing you this bit of a letter; and since I don't know what more to say, I'll just send you our club-song, which was written by Mr. Fagan, who is a great dab at those things, and has made a great many more.

I know that this was written by Mr. Fagan, though Teddy Conner says, they can't make any songs in America, and that all they do make, were first made in Ireland.

So no more at present from

Yours, &c.

DEMOCRATICO—REPUBLICAN SONG.

Come hither my lads, push the whiskey about,
As you're true, let it circulate quicker;
For when we are drunk, and our courage is stout,
Thus we'll chorus, inspir'd by our liquor:

Let anarchy rule! let confusion increase!
And extending to each distant region,
May the horrors of war scare the goddess of peace!
And a downfall to law and religion!

Like the viper, of which in the fable we read,
That was hurt by the file it had bitten,
When our country we'd stab, ourselves only bleed;
On that cask was the excise-law written.

Let anarchy rule! &c.

And scarce had our scuffle 'bout that been subdued,
When our rulers, to tighten our tether,
Decreed it sedition to swear by their G....
That we thought them all rascals together!

Let anarchy rule! &c.

When hither, escap'd from both gallows and goal,
Of the democrats myriads were flocking,
Lest when they arriv'd they'd at government rail,
If shut fast the doors 'gainst them....how shocking!

Let anarchy rule! &c.

Since we've had our hands on the reins of the state,
In spite of all federal reproaches,
Poor virtue displac'd, we've turn'd out at the gate,
And all vices have rode in their coaches.

Let anarchy rule! &c.

Poor 'Virtue (that thing which the preachers oft praise)

While they get most power who most knave it,
We're sure in our presence will ne'er shew its face;
So....let Adams and federalists have it!

Let anarchy rule! let confusion increase!

And extending to each distant region,
May the horrors of war scare the goddess of peace!

And a downfall to law and religion!

SELECTED POETRY.

[The authority of COLERIDGE will be respected as a poet. He has observed that the following song, simple, deeply pathetic and even sublime, may, without exaggerated praise, be pronounced the most exquisite performance in our language. It was written by Mr. LOGAN, a Scotch divine and historian. As its popularity is by no means equal to its merits, we reprint it, confident that to be admired universally, it needs only be known.]

SONG.

THE BRAES OF YARROW.

Thy braes were bonny, Yarrow stream!
When first on them I met my lover:
Thy braes how dreary, Yarrow stream!
When now thy waves his body cover!
Forever now, O Yarrow stream!
Thou art to me a stream of sorrow;
For never on thy banks shall I
Behold my love, the flower of Yarrow!

He promised me a milk-white steed
To bear me to his father's bowers;
He promised me a little page
To squire me to his father's towers;
He promised me a wedding-ring....
The wedding-day was fix'd to-morrow!
Now he is wedded to his grave....
Alas! his watery grave in Yarrow.

Sweet were his words when last we met;
My passion I us freely told him!
Clasp'd in his arms, I little thought
That I should never more behold him!
Scarce was he gone, I saw his ghost!
It vanish'd with a shriek of sorrow....
Thrice did the water-wraith * ascend,
And gave a doleful groan thro' Yarrow!

His mother from the window look'd
With all the longings of a mother;
His little sister weeping walk'd
The green-wood path to meet her brother.
They sought him East, they sought him West,
They sought him all the forest thorough;
They only saw the cloud of night,
They only heard the roar of Yarrow!

No longer from the window look,
Thou hast no son, thou tender mother!
No longer walk, thou lovely maid!
Alas! thou hast no more a brother.
No longer seek him East or West,
And search no more the forest thorough;
For wandering in the night so dark,
He fell a lifeless corse in Yarrow!

Logos ridiculos vendo. PLUATUS.

A couple of wags, at Cambridge University, having, as it seems, escaped from what JUNIUS has called "the learned dulness of declamation, in the following airy frolic of genius, exhibit a sort of shop-bill of their wares. The idea is not novel, but I think my facetious correspondents have followed it up, always with levity, and sometimes with wit.

TRISTRAM DACTYL & IGNATIUS COMMA,

FORMERLY JOURNEYMEN IN THE SHOP OF VERBAL

AND TROCHEE,

GIVE NOTICE

That they have commenced business, under the firm of Dactyl & Comma, and have opened a warehouse of wit, at No. 2, Poet's Corner, Cambridge, where, beside the usual assortment of Epigrams, Anagrams, and other Grams, they have for sale Puns and Witticisms, with, or without points; Odes of all measures from one to fifty-nine syllables. One ditto double twisted, strong enough to lift up the voice on the fourth of July. One to Jefferson and Liberty, a little faded and will be sold a great pennyworth. One to a Swine, in the manner of Robert Southey. One to a Sheep, sacrilegiously slaughtered by the arm of Aristocracy, written in the most approved bleating style by Charles Lamb, Esq. One to a dead Negro, choaked in a rice swamp, by one of the President's house-maids; and one to a Cuckoo, composed on the fourth of March.

They likewise import, or make tools, for shaping all kinds of prose and verse into any form. Hammers to beat out an idea, and rasps to file away the asperities of any composition.

Also, a pair of Poetical Jackboots, with spurs complete, which will suit any calf whatever. N. B. The tops of the aforesaid boots are slightly defaced, by pressing the sides of an unruly Pegasus. A Della Cruscan Mantle made by Anna Matilda entirely of cast off epithets, lined with "the moon's translucent rays" and the pockets well stuffed with "withering anguish" and "treasured tears." A Patent Play-mill, carried by Steam: it boulds tragedy, comedy, or farce, from one to eleven acts; prologues and epilogues ground gratis. A two foot Rule to measure poetry, with notches for Hexameter, Alexandrine, or any other metre.

Moulds for Tales and Ballads, after the manner of M. G. Lewis, and high Poetical Thrones for Vegetable Kings, "Quadruped Kings," "Birdings," and Insect Kings, not forgetting "the Oyster King".... Ghosts, goblins, apparitions, spirits, robbers, banditti, assassins and other amusing personages may be had at the shortest warning. Speaking trumpets to wake spirits from "the vasty deep." Ready made caverns and dungeons, replete with horror.

Hooks and eyes for coupling marvellous marriages arising from a concatenation of curious names. Example, married at Stillwater, Mr. Bass to Miss Bait, a witty correspondent observes, &c. A portable loom for weaving paragraphs, addresses to readers and correspondents, &c. recommended to all editors of newspapers.

Whetstones for sharpening the edge of dull jests. Razors for satyrists. Lancets for lampooners, and sheet lead for the Aurora.

Poetical spirit from first to sixth proof.

Wooden steel-traps to catch Irish bulls. Crutches for lame poets, journeying to Parnassus. Toasts for infuriated man, recovering his long lost liberty; and harangues for militia officers gratis. Sattin speeches of the most transparent texture, and letters of compliment and condolence for the use of the post-master general.

N. B. At the above warehouse Mr. Gallatin may be always supplied with the purest English and arithmetical calculations of any length or complexity. Swords and spears for the secretary at war.

N. B. Both a little rusty and blunted.

Town meeting speeches, either loud or murmuring. Long winded farmers for the service of the attorney general. Everlasting essays for the National Intelligencer. A felt hat to cover the baldness of the New-York "Citizen," and hemp for the lengthy rope-walk of "old South." All federalists, and all republicans, all Genevans and all Algerines are cordially invited to the above warehouse. Men of any "sect" may be sure of the most marked attention from their humble servants,

DACTYL & COMMA.

N. B. They constantly supply orations, with "feelings, manners, and principles;" they draft descriptions of duels in the most vivid style, with or without red ink. They compose challenges in a style of the most polished politeness, and they have a curious shew glass to set off seconds to the best advantage.

To pursue their own allusion, I fear my volatile correspondents will not keep open shop till they have realized a competency. Dr. Radcliffe once said to a merry mason, "here is money, you dog, you are a wit, therefore you must be poor." However, I hope they may not prove bankrupt, and, whenever I am in want of their wares, I shall certainly saunter into such a shop.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

IN AMERICA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BULOW.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Drunkenness very common at the southward....Yellow fever....Diet of the Americans....Want of hospitality of the Philadelphians....Tea-parties....Public dinners. Luxury in the article of furniture. Luxury among the women....Want of moral sensibility. Buildings. Horse races.

We are at this day sufficiently informed of what we ought to do, and what to omit; but in order to induce us to act conformably to this knowledge, a rational religion seems to be a necessary requisite.

Practical morality is therefore in America, as we have now seen, perfectly upon a level with the state of religion; and what I have further to say, concerning the manners of that country, will be altogether correspondent with it. In the southern states, especially Georgia and South-Carolina, a fine gentleman, so called, is regularly every evening so drunk, as to be unable to walk, and lays therefore in the streets. In the streets of Savannah, you stumble at every step, over the body of a beastly drunken gentleman of liberal education, upon which you hear people say "never mind; the gentleman is a little in liquor." The women are deserted by their husbands, who all run after the negro wenches. Gaming is very much in practice in all the southern states. But on the other hand there is much more hospitality towards foreigners than in Pennsylvania. Among the country people in all the southern states, provisions are very scanty and bad, so that a traveller finds but wretched entertainment. There is no bread, but in its stead a sort of cake is made of Indian meal, which is not very nourishing. In the sea-ports there are many licentious houses, full of victims from New-England, especially from Rhode-Island, because in those northern regions the girls have a fresher colour. Whereas every countenance at the southward is deformed by a sickly, yellow paleness of complexion. The Yellow Fever prevails much oftener at the southward than in Philadelphia. The conduct of the inhabitants of Philadelphia, during the Yellow Fever, such as children forsaking their parents, &c. I have not quoted as characteristic, because the same thing, upon similar occasions has been done, and would again be done in Europe. A French physician in Philadelphia, who has written upon the subject ascribes this horrible distemper partly to the bad water of the city, which, as he asserts, filtrates through the church yards. It is remarkable that this distemper appeared at the same time with the increased depravity of manners. Without having recourse to an immediate judgment of God, this circumstance may easily be accounted for. We can readily conceive that envy, hatred, and the whole tribe of evil passions, must impart an unusual acrimony to the bile, and this disorder is a putrid bilious fever. It is not properly infectious, and can be caught by infection only when the seeds of the distemper, are beforehand lurking in the body. The diet of the Americans likewise contributes much towards it, for under a climate which in summer and autumn, grows every year hotter, they eat more flesh than the English. They are true cannibals. The French, who eat more vegetables, and drink less spiritous liquors, were in a great measure exempt from this dreadful disease. Devouring immense quantities of flesh, the Americans call living rich. Their drink is for the most part brandy and water, and Madeira-wine, so called, which is, however, made in their own country, or at least strongly adulterated with brandy. French wines are not strong enough for them. Their way of living is adapted to a cold climate, and that of their country has been very much changed by cultivation. The Philadelphians have no great reputation for hospitality. An Englishman who had arrived there with many letters of recommendation, burnt them all, because they procured him every where no other benefit than a glass of brandy and water. In Boston and New-York they are more civil to strangers.

The tea-parties were invented by avarice, in order to see company cheap. They give on the other hand occasion for the display of some silver furniture, which flatters the owner's vanity. The behaviour of the company at these parties is very stiff. A deadly weariness hangs upon all present. They yawn, they drink warm water, they eat, for the most part, bread smeared with butter. The rule is to drink only two cups. After tea they drink a glass of Madeira-wine. All this is carried round by servants, mostly negro boys, who commonly make their appearance bare-footed. At a sociable tea-party you sit round a table, and have various articles handed you, to eat, such as cold meat, fish, &c. If these tea-parties were not so stiff, they would be a very good invention to see company at home without much expense. There are not many clubs extant, and none at all for political purposes. But on the other hand, there are many public dinners set on foot, at which every person present, pays four or five dollars for the eatables alone. The drink amounts much higher. They drink toasts, as in England, and give sentiments. This is an excellent custom. For twelve persons upon such occasions you may always reckon sixty bottles of Madeira-wine; judge in what a condition the people return home. In general the Americans make it a point of honour, to spend a great deal at taverns: hence tavern-keeping would be a very profitable business, if there were not so much toying upon credit, and the payment did not so often fail. A bad custom for moderate persons at the taverns is, that all the liquor drank is paid in equal proportion by every guest, whether he drink or not. The greatest expense is for furniture, which must all be made of mahogany. Travellers have been astonished to find handsome carpets, and mahogany tables and desks, &c. in log-houses, or rather huts. Among the German peasants you meet no such incongruities, and they are almost the only people of that class who possess any property. The free trade of English goods, and the facility of purchasing upon credit, are the causes of this corrupt luxury, which keeps the farmer dependent upon the country shop-keeper, him upon the merchant in the sea-ports, and him upon the merchant of London, Bristol, &c. and consequently forms a chain of dependence from the American woods to the counting houses of London, which must in substance if not in form subject the American people soon or late, or rather has already subjected them again to the English. Nothing but a radical revolution can put an end to this evil. That the female sex, to the great satisfaction of the English, is addicted to luxury in dress, is understood of course. In a colonial state, such an impudent female luxury as prevails in the sea-ports of North-America, must draw after it the most pernicious consequences. Luxury in North-America always turns upon objects of vanity; never to the productions of the fine arts. The Americans in respect to their sense of the beautiful, may be compared to the mathematician, who after reading a fine tragedy, I believe of Corneille, exclaimed, "What does that prove?" only with this difference, that they enquire, not as mathematicians, what it proves; but as shop-keepers and tradesmen, what is it good for? can it be eaten or drank? A glass of grog or of cold punch, is worth more to them than the most beautiful picture or statue. They are fond of going to the Theatre, but it is to see, and to eat. Between the act, they go, in Philadelphia, to a neighbouring town, to take regular meals, and even during the representation, to be fashionable, it is necessary to eat something. The Theatre at Philadelphia is a very handsome building, well lighted, and the company consists of the better sort of English performers. For there are among them no Americans. They entertain indeed an extreme contempt for the profession of an actor. In music, they hold Scotch jigs, reels, and hornpipes to be the ne plus ultra of perfection. An Italian came to Philadelphia with some copies in plaister of Paris, of some excellent statues; but he could sell none of them, and went away again. A handsome statue, of Dr. Franklin, in white marble, made in Italy, by order of Mr. Bingham, a rich inhabitant of Philadelphia, and member of the senate of the United States, stands in a niche, before the entrance into the library at Philadelphia. The Americans say they are yet too young a people for the fine arts; but they are old enough it seems, for mere sensual luxury. The fine arts, by ennobling and exalting the soul, would counteract their coarse sensuality, and their mean, usurious spirit, and at least in the absence of simplicity would serve as a palliative. The American architecture falls into the gothic style, when they are left to their own ideas. I have seen for instance upon many new houses at Philadelphia, round turrets, like the towers upon the old robber castles in Europe. Among the new houses at Philadelphia, the most fantastic caricature shapes are found. There are, however, in that city, many neat houses, and country seats in a very good taste, in its neighbourhood; but all closely copied after the English taste. The presbyterian church at Philadelphia, in Market street, has a very handsome portal of six Corinthian pillars. St. Paul's church at New-York has likewise a handsome portal of porphyry pillars. The steeple of the episcopal church in Philadelphia is in a very good taste. It bears the greatest resemblance to the dome of the parochial church at Berlin. In the country the American fashion of building has something characteristic; they place a row of wooden posts, covered with a roof before the house where they can sit sheltered from rain or sunshine. This is very pleasant. There is no where any want of materials for building. They have stone every where; and even some quarries of marble; in the cities, however, they almost always use bricks for building. Horse races are a favourite popular amusement. They are held every year in April and in October at Germantown, six English miles distant from Philadelphia.

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In our last observations upon the "View of the political conduct of Mr. Burr," we attempted to prove that the excuse offered by the writer, for himself and his party, to escape the odious imputation of having imposed upon the union a vice president whom they knew to be a vicious and depraved political character, was lame and groundless. In following the author through his biographical sketch of Mr. Burr's career previous to his election for his present station, we find our opinion fully confirmed by his own statements. He tells us that selfishness and cupidity were always known to be the primary regulators of all Mr. Burr's movements. That he began his course as a public man in the year 1789; with the federal party. That he soon quitted them, instigated by his envy of general Hamilton's superior influence, and by the prevalence of the antifederalists in the state politics. And that these have always been considered, as his motives. That in 1791, he was elected a federal senator, merely because it was known, his personal enmity to Hamilton would make him oppose his measures of finance. That it was generally believed Washington would never confer an office upon him; because he knew his character. That in 1793, when he wished to be held up for the office of governor, he obtained only six out of forty votes at a meeting of influential members of the party; and these six were supposed to be victims of his intrigue. That in 1797, he was suspected of having tampered with some of the federal party in the state legislature, to get support as a candidate for the vice presidency. That in 1798, as a member of the same state legislature, his conduct "furnished abundant reason to suspect the purity of his views, and the sincerity of his political professions." That in 1799 he continued to furnish great and repeated causes of distrust and suspicion. That selfishness really was, and was generally known to be the sole impulse under which he acted upon every public question. And that in the year 1800, his exertions to secure the preponderance of his party, at the state elections, were well understood to be dictated solely by the expectation that they would support him in his views to the office of vice president.

We do not mean to adopt the opinions of an inveterate and invidious enemy of Mr. Burr, respecting the motives by which he has been influenced in his political progress. We are aware that the facts previous to the last election alleged by this writer, may, in almost every instance be ascribed to pure and honourable, as well as to base and disgraceful purposes. In a free country, where parties run high, moderation is one of the first virtues of a statesman, though by the raging spirit of party, it will often be mistaken for indecision and versatility. We hope Mr. Burr's motives were good; but we know that his character has generally been considered by the federalists as unsafe and dubious to say the least, and he never has had their voluntary support. The inference which we think unavoidable from the pamphlet under consideration, is, that the opposite party have always viewed him in the same light, but that no depravity of character, could be any objection against a candidate, to them so long as it suited their views to promote him.

In May 1800, it seems, Mr. Burr repaired to Philadelphia, and at a meeting of certain members of congress, was fixed upon as a candidate for the place of vice president, in which office, "after some affected squeamishness, he consented to serve."

From this moment, until the final issue of the presidential election, the pamphlet unfolds a scene of intrigue, of artifice and of duplicity on the part of Mr. Burr, first to obtain an equal number of votes with Mr. Jefferson, and afterwards to carry the election as president against him, which we recommend to the most serious attention of our fellow-citizens. We are far from giving credit to the whole story. We have the strongest reason for believing that the insinuations respecting Dr. Smith of New-Jersey and Mr. Reeve of Connecticut are totally destitute of foundation, and we presume much of the remainder is equally groundless; yet after every allowance for possible mistakes and probable misrepresentations on the part of the author, when we reckon up the journeyings undertaken, the expresses and agents employed, the expenses incurred, and the artifices used by Mr. Burr "in the fond chace of still escaping power," it is impossible to avoid a sentiment of compassion for the state in which his mind must have been, mingled with a sigh for the condition of our country, at this discovery of the manner how our important elections are already managed.

The persons implicated in these transactions, either as the instruments, or as the dupes of Mr. Burr are stated to be

1. Mr. Timothy Greene an attorney of New-York, sent as Mr. Burr's agent to canvass votes for him in South-Carolina. This mission was successful. The electors in South-Carolina, before they were chosen, were all pledged to vote for Jefferson and Burr.

2. Mr. John Swartwout, now marshal of New-York District. He was the medium of communication between Mr. Greene and Mr. Burr.

3. Mr. Abraham Bishop sent to Lancaster, to canvass the votes of Pennsylvania, for Mr. Burr. The pamphlet says he was the dupe of Mr. Burr's intrigue without perceiving it.

4. Mr. Pierpont Edwards, the uncle of Mr. Burr.

5. 6. 7. 8. William P. Van Ness, Matthew L. Davis, Thomas Smith, the clerk in chancery, and a young man by the name of Monfort...All of New-York.

9. Mr. Alston, the son-in-law of Mr. Burr. He is charged with having published in the South-Carolina papers, under the signature of a "Rice Planter," an extravagant eulogy on Mr. Burr, containing "misrepresentations to deceive persons at a distance, which must appear as the offspring of the most inordinate vanity, or the most unprincipled ambition."

And several other persons whose names are reserved.

We have before observed that the pamphlet discovers, or rather betrays something more than coolness towards the Livingston family. Yet we believe the author was disposed to conceal this temper for the present. On the first transient perusal, it is scarcely perceptible, for a sort of formal and affected respect for them is attempted to be maintained. The chancellor is often mentioned; and once spoken of as a learned candidate for the office of Governor. But the writer takes care to remind the public that the "deafness of chancellor Livingston rendered him unfit to preside over a deliberative assembly."

We know not how far Mr. Edward Livingston is concerned in the following CAPITAL denunciation, which the author of the View pronounces to be no less authentic than astonishing.

"Mr. Burr, while in the city of New-York, carried on a negotiation with the heads of the federal party at Washington, with a view to his election as president of the United States. A person was authorized by them to confer with him on the subject, who accordingly did so. Mr. Burr assented to the propositions of the negotiator and referred him to his confidential friend to complete the negotiation. Mr. Burr stated that after the first vote was taken in the house of representatives, New-York and Tennessee would give into (in, to) the federalists!!!"

But we are told, p. 61....That Mr. Burr "had some secret reason for believing that New-York would be one of the states which would yield to his views after one or two votes in the house of representatives.".....That as the state of New-York "was represented in the federal house of representatives by six republicans and four federalists, by gaining two of the former to his side the state would have been for him...."That "Mr. Burr's 'play thing, William P. Van Ness,' wrote a letter to Mr. Edward Livingston at Washington, then a member of congress for the city of New-York, stating it as the sense of the republican party, that after some trials in the house of representatives, Mr. Jefferson should be given up for Mr. Burr!" And finally "That while the house was going through the process of election, Mr. Edward Livingston was suspected (by Mr. Jefferson's friends) but on what account was not stated."

We say we do not know how far Mr. Edward Livingston is concerned in the capital denunciation above quoted. But after collecting and comparing these passages from different parts of the pamphlet, we have no doubt, as to what the writer wishes us to believe.

As this pamphlet is intended to exhibit only one side of the transactions to which it alludes, and as the author is ever ready to prostrate himself with due servility to the name of Jefferson, we were surprized at the coolness with which he relates the following.

While Matthew L. Davis, had hopes of obtaining the naval office at New-York, "he openly insinuated that the election of Mr. Jefferson was the result of a compromise, which he stated to be of the following nature.

"Mr. Linn had alternately voted with the federalists and republicans, General Bailey voted against the republican party in the house of representatives on the question for making appropriation to carry into effect the British treaty. This he (Davis) believed, was the only time he (Bailey) had abandoned the republicans. It was, however, enough to shew that he was not always to be relied on. Mr. Edward Livingston, too, was suspected; but on what account was not stated. Apprehensive, said Davis, that the firmness of these men would yield to the stubbornness of the federalists, a proposition was made to them by a confidential friend of Mr. Jefferson, to this effect; if you, Mr. Linn, will continue to vote for Mr. Jefferson, you shall be appointed supervisor of the District of New-Jersey: if you Mr. Livingston, will do the same, you shall be District attorney of New-York; and if you, General Bailey, will also continue to vote for Mr. Jefferson, you shall be Naval-Officer of the Custom-House of New-York." Accordingly, said the little disappointed applicant, "Mr. Livingston has been appointed, and so has Mr. Linn; and the naval-office, it appears, is reserved for general Bailey. But why, Mr. Davis, is not Mr. Bailey appointed? Because I AM strongly recommended by Mr. Burr for that office, and Mr. Jefferson is afraid of offending him! These remarks came originally from Mr. Burr: Davis was only the open and licensed retailer of them."

The pamphleteer, in a note on this passage, remarks that Mr. Bayard, in his speech on the abolition of the judiciary law, alluded to the same circumstances: but knows not whether he got these unfounded notions from Mr. Burr. He advances not a syllable to disprove the facts.

We call upon every honest and independent citizen, to reflect upon these facts. If the virtue and happiness of the American people depend upon any one thing more than all others, it is upon the purity of their elections. If it be possible for Americans to behold with indifference the secret history of the last presidential election, which is bursting out from the very centre of its corruptions, and blazing forth in every direction, they may boast of their republicanism and their liberty as they will, the curse of Jugurtha's prophecy will soon befall them. "Farewell thou venal city! doomed to destruction, the instant when thou shalt find a purchaser."

N. B. Since the above was written, we have seen the letter of Dr. Smith of New-Jersey, to the editor of the New-York Evening Post. It fully confirms our statement, that the insinuations in the "View," respecting him are totally without foundation.

MISCELLANY.

FROM LITERARY LEISURE.

"Tir'd Nature's sweet restorer! Balmly sleep!"

YOUNG.

Authors of all ages have agreed in dignifying sleep with the engaging name of the friend of the wretched! Poets have concurred to bestow on it the most delightful epithets! The miserable have implored its succour, and the weary have sought the blessings it confers! The ancients were so convinced of its benignant influence on the human race, that they deified it; and Sanco Panca exclaims...."Blessings on the man that invented sleep! It wraps a man round like a warm blanket!"

After these concurring testimonies of all ages and species in favour of this periodical image of death, bold must be the man who should presume to suspect that fiction has more to do in the business than truth....who should dare to hint that sleep, far from being the universal benefactor of mankind, the grand panacea for all human evils, is in fact deprecated by innumerable personages, and utterly defied by many more than Macbeth or Crononothologos. When a man sedulously employs all his waking hours in the diligent increase of either knowledge or wealth, and finds them insufficient to satisfy his thirst....when a lady passes every moment either in the contemplation of her charms, or in receiving the incense of innumerable lovers....when the mind is perpetually agitated by the interesting freaks of Fortune at the gaming-table...or when any other pursuit of equal magnitude (if such there be!) engrosses the whole of life, I can conceive that sleep may be an unwelcome intruder.

But it is not merely those who are thus importantly occupied, who condemn and defy the inroads of that soft deluder! Many, who, as philosophical observers might imagine, do nothing but sleep, feel it an insult to be suspected of giving way to so opprobrious a weakness. The shifts and subterfuges to which many well-disposed dreamers have recourse to prove themselves awake, at the very moment when their companions have been disturbed by their snoring, resemble the ingenious evasions by which accused culprits endeavour to establish the plea of an alibi. I have seen a man taxed with being asleep, rouse himself indignantly from a dream, which perhaps had placed him on a throne, and assume an air of jocularly, to prove how well he had been attending to the conversation, which had been for some time employed on a very melancholy subject.

Numbers of people, too, assume a consequence to themselves from no other circumstance but that of "enjoying" (as I have heard it expressed) "very bad nights' rest in general;" and though they affect to envy the happy forgetfulness of those who sleep soundly the night through, they well know they would not relinquish the superiority of broken slumbers for all the advantages of undisturbed repose; while the sound sleeper listens with envy to the history of the night's adventures, sighs over every recounted blast of wind or shower of rain which had escaped his notice, and is ready to hang himself if a thunder-storm has taken place while he was locked in the embrace of slumber!

This extreme objection to sleep extends itself in a very great degree, over the whole female world. A lady would as soon be praised for devouring a whole shoulder of mutton, as congratulated on a night passed in sound repose! Nay, the idea is very prevalent indeed among the fair sex; for I remember my mother's maid-servant used to complain that "she had no comfort of her bed," and explained the circumstance by saying that she went to sleep the moment she laid down, and never woke again till it was full time to rise. I was partly led into these reflections by the conversation of a young lady, who called the other morning on my cousin Dulcibella. I was sitting writing at the table, and Bella, who knows I would at any time lose the thread of my ideas for the sake of listening to any traits of character, told her, when she saw her embarrassed, not to mind me, for I was writing, and should not hear her.

The young lady began by complaining heavily of her unhappy situation. Bella was not wanting in assurances of sympathy, nor in requests of fuller confidence; and though it was some time ere the young lady could disclose the cause of her disquiet, yet at length the soothing endeavours of Bella, added to the natural wish, an oppressed heart feels to unburden itself to a friend, induced her to acknowledge, that indeed her misery was very great.

"To be sure, my dearest Bella," said the weeping fair one, "I seem to enjoy all I could wish.... money, admiration, gaiety, some beauty, and more than one faithful lover; yet I am indeed miserable!"

"But why, sweet Maria," said Bella, "tell me why?"

"Oh my dear creature," replied Maria, "I am so very sound a sleeper, that I am quite distressed! It is that circumstance which prevents my obtaining that languid elegant complexion I dote on; besides, it seems as if I had no feeling! I read the most delightful Novels, and though my mind is full of the distresses of the heroine, I sleep as soundly as if I did not sympathize in them! Nay even when Mr. Dashly behaved so ill to me the other day, though I wept sincerely and bitterly about it, yet I cried myself to sleep like a child! and then my aunt, who knows my infirmity, is always rallying me about it."

"That is cruel," observed Bella.

"It is indeed," replied Maria. "Do you know she tells me I may try as much as I please, but I never shall resemble any of my favourite heroines while I sleep so well. Now, Heaven knows, my mind is well stored with all their virtues, and I am continually exercising myself in real action, by fancying very interesting scenes, and determining how I ought to conduct myself, but my aunt is very right: I cannot, for the life of me, keep my eyes open five minutes after I lay my head on my pillow."

"But how does your aunt know this to be the fact?" asked Dulcibella.

"Oh," replied Maria, "I am unfortunately her bedfellow; and such a number of proofs, has she to bring of my unfortunate drowsiness, that I really blush whenever she opens her lips on the subject. Then it is so provoking to hear her envy me, for the very heaviness she laughs at, when I would give my ears but to be able to catch her napping."

"To be sure," said Dulcibella, "there is something vastly engaging in that delicacy of feeling which keeps the eyes awake to weep, through the whole of a long winter's night, which strews the pillow of down with thorns, and deprives its elegant possessor of the vulgar comforts of oblivion."

"Oh my dear Dulcibella," replied Maria, "how charmingly you express yourself! I dare say you are not oppressed by this nocturnal invader as I am."

"No indeed," answered my cousin, "I rarely sleep above an hour in a night, and that only at intervals; if the least thing presses on my mind, I cannot close my eyes."

"Ah," cried the petulant Maria, "how provoking! This is the way with every body but me, and I am sure it is not for want of feeling, for at this moment I could shed tears by pain; but so invincible is the power of sleep, that though I had my little cousin Fanny to sleep with me, when she had the hooping-cough, I never awoke even with her fits of coughing."

"Drink strong green tea," said Dulcibella.

"I do, I do, my dear creature," answered Maria, "but it never answers."

"Commit a murder!" exclaimed I, unawares.

This inadvertency, by convincing Maria that I was attending to the conversation, put an end to her lamentation, and the two young ladies quitted the room together, leaving me to reflect on the strange perversion of taste and intellect which could lead authors and moralists in all ages to bestow their commendation on a power so deprecated. Nay, there are many other possessions enumerated as blessings by that mistaken race of men that are equally objected to, by those who are gifted with them. How many men and women furnish themselves with additional eyes, not from any defect in their own visual organs, but because it is vulgar to see too well. Undoubtedly, in fashionable life, it is often convenient not to see very plain; but this is almost a solitary instance, in which convenience is allowed to regulate fashion. Then again, health is a blessing equally opprobrious with sleep; and many more instances might be enumerated, if the minds of my readers were not capable of recalling them in an instant I will not even instance memory, a talent in which all the world are ambitiously defective. Here, indeed, is another sacrifice to convenience; it is so possible to remember just what is agreeable, to have forgotten every thing and every body but what reflects honour on ourselves, and the self-accusation of a treacherous memory affords so many little loopholes to vanity, that it is a subterfuge very pardonable.

THE FARRAGO. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

"There is no talent so useful towards rising in the world, or which puts men more out of the reach of fortune, than that quality, generally possessed by the duller sort of men, and, in common speech, called Discretion."

DEAN SWIFT.

A cloudy atmosphere and a fit of the spleen having confederated, and locked up all the powers of my invention and memory, I sallied out of my chamber, and sought for a key to liberate them, that they might furnish a Farrago.

I was proceeding, thrice gentle reader, to tell thee a story of "a king of Bohemia and seven castles," in the Shandean style, which rejects Aristotle's modes, and Dr. Wall's figures, and the figures of Franklin's arithmetic, and, in short, all figures.... but figures rhetorical; when, whom should I meet, in my flowery path, but one of "their worship and reverences," who, austere bending his brow, cried out, with a true critic's yell, "How now, madcap, whither do you wander? You are metaphor mad.... the devil's in you. You are on the very verge of absurdity. None of your flights, in the name of Locke and Leibnitz, but talk like a man of this world. Why what a curvetting palfrey, more restive than any in romance, is that same imagination, on whose neck you have thrown the reins. Do dismount my frantic friend, and stride some sober beast from our stable; or if, obstinately attached to your hobby, you will ride on, at least procure a martingale, and then your vicious jade will pace all gently, like a blind horse at a funeral, as the curate of Coventry saith."

This alderman's advice so damped my volatile spirits, that were hurrying me, as usual, "to Thebes, to Athens" or the Lord knows where, that, after taking two or three pensive turns through the street, I returned to my desk, and, with chastised feelings, immediately wrote the following

ESSAY ON WORLDLY PRUDENCE.

When we meditate the history of man, or nations, we find individuals opulent, and communities powerful, if the cold maxims of rigid prudence are punctiliously observed. On the other hand, when the eccentric, impatient of the boundaries, which this Frow virtue has marked out, presume to wander, at the beckon of passion, or fancy, then poverty, distress, and contempt from the world, form only a small part of the catalogue of inevitable consequences. Dryden, Otway, Savage, Shenstone, Goldsmith, Chatterton, Burns, the younger Lyttleton, and Rousseau, were men of sublimated imagination, children of impulse, contemners of authority. They despised the perfect law of prudence; and, gentiles of genius, were a law unto themselves. Rejecting the steady light, which the planets of prudence would shed on their way, they chose to follow the meteor of fancy, whose aspect was brilliant, though its guidance was delusive. What baleful consequences have ensued from this ill-starred preference! Did not the want of prudence compel Dryden to huddle together the discordant scenes of rhyming tragedy, to become a conveyer in a cook-seller's shop, and to leave his classical versions unfinished, that obscenity, exchanged for an obvius, might be ready at the period of stipulation? Was not Otway choaked by a biscuit, greedily swallowed to appease importunate hunger, because he chose poetically to paint an orphan's distress, rather than by Cheapside industry to relieve his own? Did not titled Tyrconnel turn Savage out of doors, for not retiring to bed at midnight, and, amid the fervours of poetry and wine, for "madly chaunting his joy," at unseasonable hours? Did not ruder beings, than the nymphs and dryads haunt the garden of Shenstone; and were not his bowers blighted, and his days embittered, because he loved rural elegance, a fantastic mistress, rather than the frugal crone, Economy, that domestic animal? Did not imprudence exile Goldsmith to Flanders and to France, to propose tame theses at Leyden, and to fiddle to the peasants of Provence? Did not Chatterton indignantly swallow arsenic, because he would not obsequiously bow to a patron, and because he would turn over the volumes of the ancient time, rather than "the tape tied trash" of an attorney? Did not Burns, by a hasty marriage, postpone his interest to his affection, and from excess of social ardour, and the unbridled love of fame hurry from safe obscurity to the perilous metropolis, where the bowl of pleasure debilitated the finer energies, and abridged the life of the improvident bard? Was not the junior lord Lyttleton, the gallant and the gay, shunned by every woman in Worcestershire, as if, to quote his own expression, "he had been Tarquin himself, because he was an imprudent lover?" Yes, he who was "all charm," who could thunder, with vehement eloquence, against a proud and imposing ministry, and "witch the world," by the brilliancy of effusions, most careless and confidential, has been bespattered from obloquy's foulest kennel; a theme for sobbing Puritans, and for bridling prudes, because he chose for his motto

"Indulge; and to thy genius freely give,

"For not to live at ease, is not to live."

Lastly, to conclude this melancholy description of "the follies of the wise," Rousseau, who, though justly censurable for many faults, must be allowed to possess much of the inspiration of genius; having attempted to teach man in "Emilius," govern him, in the "social compact," and enchant him in "Eloise," has been persecuted for eccentricity of conduct, and paradox of expression. He was banished from his natal canton, his book was burned by a common hangman, and, perhaps, misconstrued, in an archiepiscopal mandate; the sanity of his intellects has been doubted by Burke; a positive preceptor is sure that he was a madman; and the genius of Geneva has been canned at Tunbridge, by the Reverend Vicessimus Knox.

Let us turn aside, O ye careless ones, from such "a stone of stumbling," and a "rock of offence," as indiscretion, and strive to attain the Dutch virtues. No longer dream of the vale of Vacluse, or rove through the classic groves of Tuscany; expatiate no more over French or Italian lawns, but hasten to the dykes of Holland. Plunge into the Scheldt, or the Maise, and, like the souls of the fabled ancients, recent from the lake of Lethe, ye will rise and leave behind, not only memory, but imagination, passion, genius, and all which to imprudence appertains. Like Hollanders be prudent, and, like Hollanders, you will be rich. Remember the arts, by which, the Dutch merchant, or the American speculator

..... "Encrease their store
From six in the hundred, to six hundred more."

Remember that at Japan, where the paganism of the natives demands, as a preliminary to traffic, the abjuration of our religion, that a Dutchman cheerfully tramples on the cross, and renounces christianity for cinnamon and cloves. Remember that, when the Netherlands, impatient of the Spanish yoke, implored Elizabeth to rescue them from the tyranny of the prince of Parma, the prudent mynheers were willing to sell, at an advanced price, gunpowder for the use of that very artillery, which was to be employed against themselves! remember that your fat-headed, leathern-eared, cold-hearted American speculator, the greatest scoundrel in the universe, is one of the most circumspect and cunning of mankind. He has the wary caution of the cat, and prowls as providently, as the Hyena. Remember, therefore, whether you are at Amboyna, or in America, to cut the throat of the dearest friend, if, by such a gallant deed, you can keep your purse strings whole. This is worldly prudence, this the Vrouw virtue, whom as she trudges along, each wondering worldling bids the poet admire. What, though to your keen eyes, she appears like an old marketwoman, counting the cents she has received in exchange of eggs, still this is she, by whose blessing the Hollanders once immured in the bank of Amsterdam half the coins of Europe. If, therefore, like them you would be rich, beware of enthusiasm, renounce indiscretion, burn your "books of curious science," tamper not with poetry, go to Rotterdam or Batavia, "and get ten tun of gold."

A SPECIMEN OF ALLITERATION.

Parkplace, Nov. 20, 1797.

Sir,

Perceiving your desire to know how I passed my time in Pembrokeshire, I here present you with an account of my proceedings, in a progress I lately made to a gentleman's house, purely to procure a plan of it.

I proceeded in a party of pleasure, with Mr. Pratt, of Pickton-castle, Mr. Powel, of Penally, and Mr. Pugh, of Purley, to go and dine with Mr. Pritchard, of Postmain, which was readily agreed to, and soon put in practice. However, I thought it a proper precaution to post away a person privately to Mr. Pritchard's, that he might provide for us, and we proceeded after him. The town, where Mr. Pritchard lives, is a poor, pitiful paltry place, though his house is in the prettiest part of it, and is a prince's palace to the rest. His parlour is of a lofty pitch, and full of pictures of the prime pencils; he hath a pompous portico, or pavillion, prettily paved, leading to the parterre; from hence you have a prodigious prospect, particularly pointing towards Percilly-hill, where he propagates a parcel of Portuguese and Polish poultry. The name of his house is Prawfenden, which puzzled me most plaguily to pronounce properly. He received us very politely, and presented us with a plentiful dinner. At the upper end of the table was a pike, with fried perch and plaice; at the lower end, pickled pork, pease, and parsnips; in the middle a pidgeon pye, with puff paste; on the one side a potatoe pudding, and on the other side pig's pettytoes. The second course was a dish of pheasants, with poults, and plovers, and a plate of preserved pine and pippins; another with pickled podd pepper; another with prawns; another with pargamon, for a provocative, with a pyramid of pears, peaches, plumbs, pippins, pine-apples, and pistachios. After dinner there was a profusion of port and punch, which proved too powerful for poor Mr. Peter, the parson of the parish; for it pleased his palate, and he poured it down by pints, which made him prate in a pedantic, pragmatical manner. This displeased Mr. Price the Parliament-man, a profound politician; but he persisted, and made a prolix preamble, which proved his principles prejudiced and partial against the present people in power. Mr. Price, who is a potent party-man, called him a popish parson, and said he prayed privately in his heart for popery; and that he was a presumptuous priest for preaching such stuff publicly. The parson puffed his pipe passively for some time, because Mr. Price was his patron; but at length losing all patience, he plucked off Mr. Price's perriwig, and was preparing to push it with the point of the poker, into the fire; upon which Mr. Price, perceiving a pewter pot in the passage, presented the parson with the contents in his phiz, and gave him a pat on the pate, the percussion of which prostrated him plump on the pavement, and raised a protuberance on his pericranium. This put a period to our proceedings, and patched up a peace; for the parson was in a piteous plight, and had prudence enough to be prevailed upon to cry peccata, with a parce, precor, and in a plaintive posture to petition for pardon. Mr. Price who was proud of his performance, pulled him out of the puddle, and protested he was sorry for what had passed in his passion, which was partly owing to the provocation given him from some of his preposterous propositions, which he prayed him never to presume to advance again in his presence. Mr. Pugh, who practises physic, prescribed phlebotomy and a poultice to the parson, but he preferred wetted brown paper to any plaster, and then placed himself in a proper position, that the power of the fire might penetrate his posteriors and dry his purple plush breeches. The pother was succeeded by politics,....as Mr. Paltney, the patriot's patent for the peerage, the kings of Poland, Prussia, Prague, and the Palatine, panders, and partizans, Portsmouth parades, and the presumption of the privateers, who pick up prizes almost in our very ports, and places and pensions, pains and penalties. Next came on plays and poetry, the picture of Mr. Pope perched on a prostitute, the price of the pit, pantomimes, prudes, the small-pox, and the primate of Ireland, and printers, and preferments, pick-pockets, and pointers, and the pranks of that prig the poet laureat's progeny, though his papa is the perfect pattern of paternal piety. To be brief, I prophesy you think I am prolix. We parted at last, but had great difficulty in procuring a passage from Mr. Pritchard, for he had placed a padlock on the stable-door, on purpose to prevent us, and pretended his servant was gone out with the key; but finding us peremptory, the key was produced, and we were permitted to go. We pricked our palfrics a good pace, although it was as dark as pitch, which put me in pain, because I was purblind, lest we should ride plump against the posts which are prefixed to keep horse passengers from going the path that is pitched with pebbles.

Mr. Price, who was our pilot, had a very providential escape, for his pad fell a prancing, and would not pass one step farther, which provoked him much, for he piques himself on his horsemanship. I proposed to him to dismount, which he did, and peeping and peering about, found he was on the point of a perpendicular precipice, from which he might probably have fallen, had not his horse plunged in that particular manner. This put us all into a palpitation, and we plodded on the rest of the progression pian piano, as the Italians say, or pazz a pazz as the French phrase has it. I shall postpone several other particulars till I have the pleasure of passing a day with you at Putney, which shall be as soon as possible.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

PEREGRINE PIPKIN.

To Mr. PETER PETTIWARD, at Putney,

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEE.

In the prosecution of literary labour, scholars differ widely in their choice of means. Some idly toy with books, and others waste the midnight taper, and their own slender forms in ceaseless disquisition. In our eagerness to enlarge the empire of the mind, care must be taken, not to violate the rights of the body. The following directions may be of use to mitigate the ardour of intemperate study, and to correct the ills of a scholar's life.

Whoever labours under the mania of excessive study will, I think, find effectual cure in reading Tissot on the diseases incident to literary persons. Tissot, however, appears to me to have exaggerated his descriptions so as to render them truly terrifying, and sufficient to deter most men from the common and moderate employments of a literary life. I mention it only as my opinion, that he has exaggerated his descriptions; and I think so, because I have known many persons devoted to letters, who enjoyed remarkably good health, and were instances of singular longevity. They probably had sense enough to take precautions against the effects of great application, and to relieve their labour by air and exercise. But Tissot's book may yet be very useful, as it cannot but deter the rational student from excessive application: the evils of which he enumerates so copiously, and paints so formidably, that a man who duly regards his happiness might fall into a bibliophobia from reading it, and fly from a library with as much horror as a mad-dog from a pond.

A moderate application is sufficient for the attainment of all necessary and useful knowledge; and the excessive attachment, which some men display is chiefly in trifling pursuits. Not satisfied with the great and essential objects, pursuits. Not satisfied with the great and essential objects, which answer every purpose of real utility, they pursue their inquiries into matters of mere curiosity, with no other intention, however, they may plausibly disguise it, than their own amusement. But time, health, and life, are too precious to be sacrificed to the pleasure of gratifying mere curiosity.

No man comes into the world, without many obligations of the moral and social kind. No man can, consistently with his duty, suffer himself to be engrossed with contemplation. Some sort of social activity is necessary, in the most retired scenes, and in professions and modes of life, the most distant from commercial, and political employment.

Few stand so insulated, as not to be nearly connected with others, by friendship or kindred; besides the general connection with all men, which arises from a participation of the same nature. But how can he, who is immured in his closet, or abstracted by perpetual absence from the busy scene before him, attend to the claims, which others may justly make on his active beneficence? He will feel as little inclination as ability to serve them. Every call upon his exertions in their favour, will be considered as an importunate interruption, to be checked by a morose reprimand, rather than listened to with humane condescension. He may, indeed, labour in the recesses of his study; but as his labour terminates in his private gratification, as it produces no external fruits, as it prevents him from taking an active part in society, it is a labour, which entitles him to no esteem. He is, in truth, to be numbered among the most selfish of mankind, as he sacrifices all his social duties to the pursuits of his own solitary pleasure.

Prudence has taken care, that such conduct should bring upon itself its own punishment. For this gloomy, reclusive, selfish mode of living never fails to produce dejection of spirits, and the top of that health and vigour which are necessary to sweeten all enjoyments. Languid, enervated, and feeble, the student who follows his pursuit with unreasonable and excessive ardour, exhibits, when he comes from the shade of his retirement, into the sunshine of active life, a phantom, pallid as a ghost, and silent as a statue, and excites, in some, horror, and in others, ridicule.

That golden mean, therefore, so celebrated by all the sages of the world, in the active world, must be observed with no less reverence in the contenplative. For man being a compound of mind and body, departs no less from nature and wisdom, when he devotes himself wholly to the mind, than when he attaches himself exclusively to the body. Till we have shuffled off this mortal evil, we must pay great attention to our animal nature, in order to preserve in its due vigour, the energy of the intellectual.

The University of Oxford, I view with admiring eyes. I deeply deplore that I had not the high privilege of being educated in a seminary, where learning and loyalty are united. I like the political principles of this seat of learning. I venerate its classical discipline. I admire the brilliant characters, whose powers have been awakened in this haunt of all the muses, and I copy with pleasure the following just encomium.

I was educated, says BISHOP LOWTH, in the UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD. I enjoyed all the advantages public and private, which that famous seat of learning, so largely affords. I spent many years in that illustrious society, in a well regulated course of useful discipline and studies, and in the agreeable and improving commerce of gentlemen, and of scholars; in a society, where emulation, without envy, ambition without jealousy, contention without animosity, incited industry and awakened genius; where a liberal pursuit of knowledge, and a genuine freedom of thought, was raised, encouraged, and pushed forward by example, by commendation, and by authority.

THE DRAMA.

COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

The Comic Opera of Love in a Village attracted an elegant and overflowing house here last night, before the rising of the curtain. A variety of circumstances contributed to give it more than ordinary eclat. At the head of these, we must place Mrs. Billington's first appearance in the character of Rosetta. Much as every one admired her late representation of Clara, all must have regretted the comparatively narrow limits to which it was confined. Rosetta is a more prominent part, without overburdening the performer. This piece has also the farther advantage of a greater diversity of music, the melodies being a compilation from various masters, among whom Arne stands the most conspicuous. It consequently afforded an ample opportunity of displaying the varied excellence of this incomparable woman...If in Gentle youth, ah tell me why, she poured forth all those sweet and delicate tones that vibrate to the heart, and put its sensibilities in motion; so in Shun, ye fair, each gay seducer, she had room for that flowing swell and rapid flight of notes in the bravura stile, which astonish by the difficulty of the execution. In most of the other songs these two characters are blended, and hence we have a treat to every taste; and every palate. The poetry of each never exceeds a few lines; and thus the performer has room for displaying every advantage of embellishment without the fatigue of repetition. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, we may pronounce Mrs. Billington's Rosetta far superior in attraction to any character in which she has lately appeared. The Traveller benighted, and one or two others belonging to the part, have been generally considered the foremost in beauty, but every air last night was a chef d'œuvre, and each received particular admiration only as it became last in succession. The air of How blest a maid whose bosom, can alone be urged as an exception to this rule, as it was the only one encored; but this does not justify the inference which would be drawn in ordinary cases. An encore, which is considered a favour to others, is a mark of cruelty to Mrs. Billington. Accordingly the audience have adopted a more significant mode of testifying their disapprobation of any attempt to impose an additional labour. Instead of hissing, a cry of "shame, shame," was raised upon these occasions. She was equally happy in the department of sense and sound. Never was the coquettish scene with Justice Woodcock acted with more exquisite humour, chasteness, and vivacity. Any attempt at an adequate description of it would, we fear, subject us to the censure of hyperbole. To represent her as a sweetly smiling Venus, adorned with all the loves and the graces might be considered by many as an exaggeration, and yet we may safely appeal to every eye that beheld her last night whether it would be a flattering likeness.

It cannot be expected, that in the neighbourhood of such a constellation, the Lucinda of Mrs. Akins should shine with extraordinary lustre. Her talents, however were far from suffering an eclipse, and received a considerable share of approbation. The Air, We women like weak Indians trade was executed with peculiar taste and delicacy.

Loud and prolonged plaudits greeted the debut of Mr. Munden in the character of Justice Woodcock....There were two distinct bursts of acclamation. He received them with the profound respect and gratitude due to so marked a testimony of the general joy excited by his recovery. His confidence in his own penetration, of which he becomes the dupe, and the spirit of contradiction to his sister Deborah, both of which render him blind to the love affair between Eustace and his daughter, were given with great truth and discrimination....His personification of the old loving dotard in the scene with Rosetta was a piece of excellent humour, of the chastest yet richest description. Extreme situations of the comic kind, like this scene, are the more difficult from the danger of running into the caricature. Mr. Munden charged the character sufficiently for the ludicrous in dress, look, manner, and action, without subjecting himself in any point to the imputation of extravagance.

Inledon was in excellent voice; and, in Young Meadows, had all the advantage of a variety of beautiful Airs, adapted to his best style of execution; as also, a part in which, as an actor, he has been always considered particularly successful. The Airs, Oh! how shall I in language weak...In vain I every art essay...and O! had I been by fate decreed, pouring their plaintive melodies through his fine deep and harmonious voice, sung into every heart, and excited a congenial feeling. They were followed with loud applauses, and are finely contrasted with the duet, in the brovura stile in the last act between him and Rosetta, which was executed with admirable taste and more embellishment than any of his previous songs properly admit. Mr. Knight, in Hodge, had also a character of the rustic class, in which he has displayed such uniform excellencies; his humour was perfectly natural, and his performance in every respect equal to his best essays in the same line. Mr. Johnstone in Hawthorn, and Mr. Hill in Eustace, contributed largely to the support of the vocal department, and Mrs. Martyr in Mudge, Mrs. Davenport in Deborah, and Mr. Waddy in Sir Win. Meadows, sustained their several parts with the greatest success.

The statue dance closed the first act with eclat. We never saw it executed with more humour: Mr. Simmons, in the character of the female cook, kept the house in a roar with his clumsy capers....No piece could be better got up, or maintained throughout in a more uniform style of excellence.

FESTOON OF FASHION. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

It has been frequently suggested by the wits of old time, that the trivial events of domestic life, related in the pompous style of the diurnal historians would increase merriment, if they did not enlarge knowledge. Arthur Murphy has given us a hint, and we will endeavour to pursue it.

On Wednesday last, Miss Giggie had her ears bored, for the first time, to the great joy of all her female friends.

On Sunday last, a bottle of Noyau, belonging to a lady, not many miles from Market Street, fell from the top of a chest of drawers, and broke its neck. This has almost broken the heart of its fair owner.

The same day a fire broke out in Barnaby Blood's cigar, and entirely consumed the same.

Yesterday evening, a duck was seen to walk by the side of the river, and after some time threw herself in. The reason why she committed this rash action is not yet known.

Letters from Irish town advise that a contagious distemper rages there with the utmost virulence. Several new cases occur daily, and all the faculty are positive that the disease is of domestic origin.

They write from South Street, that on Tuesday evening, a young man of a very sober family passed through that quarter incog.

The last accounts from Cherry Alley and Artillery Lane, report that the war is carried on there with the greatest gallantry on both sides. Considerable loss has been sustained, and it is thought many overtures will be made before the close of the campaign.

TEA TABLE TALK.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Well says Doris to me, as soon as Giggie's prattle allowed me to attend, while you are engaged in plodding over your worm-eaten volumes of the last age, I was last night, after my party had retired, delightfully engaged in the perusal of a certain fashionable register. It contained the new titles of various Patches, and directions how they should be placed. Pray publish them at large, for the common benefit of the belles.

The impassionate at the corner of the eye
The gay upon a dimple
The gallant on the middle of the cheek,
The kissing at the corner of the mouth,
The dashing upon the nose,
The coquette upon the lips,
The languishing under the left eye,
The secret upon a pimple.

Lucetta says that Miss Varnish employs Spanish wool to bolster up her beauty, and Miss V. declares of Lucetta that the price of carmine is enhanced, since Lucetta protested against painting. Which of these charmers can poor Lysander believe? In the picture shop of delusive beauty how numerous are optical deceptions. The poor youth is confounded by the various colours of his mistress and he sometimes sees a rain-bow on the same cheek.

LEVITY.

PHYSIC VERSUS MUSIC.

The lady of a country apothecary, who, although she did not know gamut from the ace of spades; yet, from having picked up some technical phrases, was reckoned by the other ladies of the neighbourhood, to be a prodigious musical cognoscenti, and was constantly shewing her taste, by inviting thrumming and squalling evening parties, to the no small disquiet of her husband, Mr. Lenitive, who thought not any compositions so good as those of his own drugs, nor any strains so harmonious, as those produced by his pestle and mortar; and, after labouring all day for the "publico bono," was not in a humour to relish, but rather inclined to be surfeited by, such discordant bars to his domestic rest; he, therefore, concerted a plan with his journeyman, to put a final close to these meetings: accordingly, one evening lately, after Mrs. Lenitive had assembled her guests, and administered the usual dose of toasted muffins and superbendum of decoction of souchong, he led her diffident and blushing daughter to the piano-forte; but, alas! poor Miss Lenitive had not got half through Go to the Devil and shake yourself, which mama was, with her usual sapience, passing off to the scientific auditors for a valuable manuscript piece of the dear delightful Viotti, when honest Label, true to his master's prescriptions, began to play his part in the room below, and so placed his brazen instrument, wherein were valerian, and other ingredients equally odoriferous, in a state of ebullition, that the fumes ascended in alt; and so impressive was the effect of his performance upon olfactory faculties, as to produce the most unpleasant consequences....Poor dear Mrs. Lenitive, who was always tremblingly alive to, and distrust at the bare idea of any thing that smelled of the shop, made an abrupt cadence into hysterics, and the party separated presto e agitato, in the confusion....several of the old ladies left their youthful wigs behind them, and are likely to receive the visits of the apothecary, and four nervous draughts a day for some weeks to come. It is feared that it will be a long time before Mrs. Lenitive will recover the shock her feelings have sustained by this vulgar accident; the only symptom in her favour is, that she takes every thing but Physic.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

G. M. Woodward, the facetious author of Ec-centric Excursions, Olio of Good Breeding, &c. has lately published in London The Musical Mania, for 1802, illustrated by six characteristic plates, with metrical elucidations and a Bravura, dedicated to Mrs. Billington. A production of this class from such a Momus, as this Mr. Woodward, must cause all our risible muscles to "keep moving."

R. Duppa, a gentleman of exquisite taste in the fine arts is publishing a collection of "Heads from the Fresco paintings of Raphael in the Vatican" and one of his majesty's engravers is copying, we understand, from the cartoons at Hampton Court. Messrs Rivingtons advertise The Poetical Register and Repository of Fugitive Poetry for 1801, intended to comprize all those pieces of Fugitive Poetry, worthy of preservation, which are to be found in the various periodical publications; original contributions from literary characters; selections from scarce English poets, with Biographical notes of their authors, concise criticisms on the principal poetic and dramatic productions with a complete catalogue, notices of works designed for the press, and biographical sketches of celebrated poets, who died in the course of the last year. The original department of this work will be supported by several writers of poetical eminence.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

On the question proposed by our correspondent, Z. "How is the phrase, patronage of literature to be interpreted in this country," the Editor feels a sort of gloomy unwillingness to enter. His friend Z. will excuse him for avoiding a topic equally unpleasant and unedifying. It seems to have been agreed among the ancients, though their authority is of very little worth in this country, that the reign of an Augustus and the liberality of a Mæcenæ were vital to the existence of men of letters. JUVENAL says expressly in one of the most sensible of his satires, that the whole hope of learning reposes on CÆSAR alone. But this might be a piece of court flattery, and therefore justly derided by every republican banterer. Let us hear for a moment the opinion of an ancient poet as it is expressed by the numerous of his translators.

Henceforward let no poet
CÆSAR will give, if the

But, if from other hands than his, you think
To find supply 'tis loss of pen and ink;
Let flames on your unlucky papers prey,
Or moths through written pages eat their way.
The muse's ground is barren desert all
If no support from CÆSAR's bounty fall,
The rest is empty praise, an ivy crown
Or the lean statue of a star'd renown.

FROM BOURDEAUX.

"Bonaparte is momentarily expected to visit this city, and the greatest preparations are making to receive him with every mark of honour and respect. He is elected Consul for life;....and the Sovereign Pontiff of the Catholic Church has pronounced him the greatest man that ever existed excepting the Saviour of the World."

MISS WILLIAMS.

Miss Helen Maria Williams continues conversations at Paris, in a great style....every other evening a number of literati and distinguished characters meet in her library, where tea and refreshments are presented from eight, to eleven o'clock, and where the merits of works newly offered to the public, are discussed....Authors recite their introductory poems, or their jeu d'esprits, and seem to augur, from the reception their productions meet with amongst these chosen few, their future success with the public. Miss Williams professes herself of no political party; and to judge from the heterogeneous mixture which she assembles, it seems but justice to believe her. The constant visits of Kosciusko, the famous abbe Gregoire, and other republican chieftains, might induce a cursory observer to believe she was not much attached to monarchical principles, if the presence of an English peer lord Mountcashel, of lord King, of many Neapolitan nobles, and other foreigners of distinction did not in some degree justify Miss Williams's assertion.

A Lady well known in the Gay World for the artificial beauty she adopts, was lately determined to appear in disguise, and she actually effected her

In the neighbourhood of Ostia, near Rome, there has lately been dug a most noble statue of Achilles, nine and a half Roman palms in height, and in perfect preservation. The hero holds a metal lance in his right hand, and the paragonium in his left; the helmet on his head is surmounted with a large plume of feathers resembling that of the celebrated statue of Villa Borghese, which, however, is not of equal workmanship. This work, which certainly is one of the finest that Greece has produced, does not exhibit the name of the artist: the inscription notice marti engraven on one of the legs, proves that it had been consecrated to the God of war.

Mr. Rusher, of Banbury, will soon make public his improvements in typography. These improvements are described as likely to render printing more uniform and beautiful. The type will occupy less space, without being less legible, and will be particularly advantageous in those cases where it is desirable to combine economy with a full faced letter. It is calculated that the expense of printed books will, by the new mode, be diminished one fourth.

A gentleman from France, informs us, that as far as his observation extended, the French people were unanimously in favour of electing Bonaparte for life, and investing him with sovereign power and authority...They were entirely sick of revolutionary expedients, and loose inefficient government....So they can but enjoy the fruits of their industry; and be secure from the tyranny of mob leaders, they care not who guides the vessel of State; or who makes or administers the laws. The common people, under the monarchy, knew they were the happiest on earth, and they sigh for the return of old times.

An indignant political writer, speaking of the new and dangerous power, acquired by the French in Louisiana, thus justly describes a large portion of our unprincipled republicans. "The inhabitants of Kentucky and Tennessee have very little attachment to their eastern brethren. Their interests are totally separate. They are, indeed, the rivals of the latter, and can be expected to make no sacrifices for the preservation of union. All the protection they want is occasionally against the Indians, which would be much more effectually afforded by the legions of France than by their own distant, and, in a military point of view, feeble government. As to patriotism, he must be very little acquainted with their history, who expects to find it among them. Not one of them, who are arrived at years of maturity, was born upon the spot. They are entirely composed of emigrants; all speculators, or agricultural adventurers: men who understand soil indeed extremely well, but who know nothing of country; who, like the late Duke of Bedford of glorious memory, can distinguish "with a learned spirit," all the various qualities of land and gravel, and loam, and marle, and chalk, and lime, and mud, and dung, but who have no more idea of national honour and independence, who think no more about their ancestors, or their posterity, than the gamblers of Change Alley, or the framers of the treaty of Amiens.

So early as the year 1797, a Belgian wit wished to perpetuate the memory of the French revolution by painting from the following illustrative symbols from fabulous and modern history.

The Revolution,	By the Box of Pandora
French Liberty	Saturn devouring his Children
National Convention	Tygers fighting
French Constitution	The Chaos of Ovid
French Equality	Circe transforming the companions of Ulysses
French Religion	Artemise in Mourning
The French people	Clouds driven by the Wind
The present Prospect	Snow before the Sun
The Future	The head of Medusa.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. DACTYL AND COMMA.

TO AN OLD FRUIT WOMAN.

Poor hag, what time the earliest sun beams shed
Their splendid lustre round thy wretched head,
Each morn I see thee quit thy low-thatched stall
And take along with thee thy little all,
The table, chair, of fruits the varied stores,
Which bounteous nature at this season pours.
There near yon church, which shoots its spire on high

Thou sit'st to lure the traveller passing by,
Thy ale inviting, foaming in the glass,
Calls to thy table many a thirsty lass,
Who stops to sip, and bending forward shows,
A bosom fairer, than the Alpine snows;
While amorous swains, in wonder view the maid,
And gaze enamour'd, at the charms display'd;
Her loose thin robe plays fluttering to the breeze,
And fancy pictures what no optic sees.

Say as you see the fair trip lightly by
Hear the gay titter, and the love lorn sigh,
Do they not call those feelings to thy breast,
Which sported there, while once by friends
caress'd;

When innocence glow'd blooming in thy face,
Thy mind was virtue and thy form was grace.
I knew thee well, where broad Potomack pours
His dimpling flood along the verdant shores,
In early youth through all the virgin train,
None danced so feath'ly o'er the enamell'd plain;
When thy soft voice tuned the gay notes of love,
The melting strains an anchorite would move;
Who view'd thy charms, or heard thy voice, was fired;

Each belle was envious, and each beau admired....
Alas, how changed! o'er thy once beauteous face
The marks of guilt and misery I trace;
Seduced to sin, then by the wretch betray'd,
Thy virtue gone, the once fond lover fled....
Scorn'd now by those, who once your friendship prized,

Cast on the world, abandoned and despised;
What were thy feelings at that mournful day,
When from your home you came in tears away,
When thy stern father spurned thee from his door,
And bade his child behold his face no more;
That sire, who once in fond caresses pressed
His much loved daughter to his feeling breast.
I saw him late upon his dying bed,
The shades of death were hovering round his head,
"I had a child," he cried "the loveliest maid
That ere upon Potomack's meadows stray'd;
I know not now, if through the earth she strays
Or, chill'd by cruelty, has closed her days....
From Virtue's path by my unkindness hurl'd,
Perhaps she roams an outcast on the world;
But, oh! my friend, if ere you chance to see
This long lost girl, oh! tell her this from me,
Tell her, her sire repents, tell her in death,
For her in prayers he spent his latest breath;
Remorse thou viper of the soul" he cried
"Tell her likewise"....He press'd my hand and died....

And could a father thus his daughter spurn?
To virtue doom her never to return?
Small was thy crime compared to that which moves

A sire to sacrifice the child he loves.

Poor wretch forlorn I see thee turn thy eyes
In sullen misery to the pitying skies....
"Then shall I rest in peace at last, for there,
No father scorns his suppliant daughter's prayer;
No female whispers cruel slander's raise,
No friends desert no lover there betrays."

SELECTED POETRY.

ODE 21ST. OF ANACREON, TRANSLATED BY
T. MOORE, ESQ.

Observe when mother earth is dry,
She drinks the droppings of the sky;
And then the dewy cordial gives
To ev'ry thirsty plant that lives.
The vapours, which at evening weep,
Are beverage to the swelling deep!
And when the rosy sun appears,
He drinks the ocean's misty tears.
The moon too quaffs her pale stream
Of lustre, from the solar beam....
Then, hence with all your sober thinking!
Since Nature's holy law is drinking;
I'll make the laws of Nature mine.
And pledge the universe in wine.

APOLLO TO A MAN OF GENIUS, ON HIS BEING SATIRIZED BY A WITLING.

Whether he's worth your spleen or not,
You've ask'd me to determine:
I wish my friend a nobler lot,
Than that of trampling vermin.

A blockhead can't be worth our care,
Unless that we'd befriend him:
As you've some common sense to spare
I'll pay, what you may lend him.

BROKEN CHINA, A FALL.

Soon as the sun began to peep,
And gild the morning skies,
Young Doris from disorder'd sleep
Unveil'd her radiant eyes.

A guardian sylph, the wanton sprite
That waited on her still,
Had teas'd her all the tedious night
With visionary ill.

Some shock of fate is surely nigh,
Exclaim'd the timorous maid;
What do these horrid dreams imply?
My Cupid can't be dead?

She call'd her Cupid by his name,
In dread of some mishap;
Wagging his tail her Cupid came,
And jump'd into her lap.

And now the best of brittle ware
Her sumptuous table grac'd,
The gentle emblems of the fair,
In beauteous order plac'd.

The kettle boil'd, and all prepar'd
To give the moring treat,
When Dick, the country beau appear'd,
And bowing, took his seat.

Well, chatting on of that and this,
The maid reversed her cup,
And, tempted by the forfeit kiss
The bumpkin turn'd it up.

With transport he demands the prize;
Right fairly it was won!
With many a frown the fair denies,
Fond baits to draw him on!

A man must prove himself polite,
In such a case as this;
So, Richard strives with all his might
To force the forfeit kiss.

But as he strove....O dire to tell!
And yet with grief I must,
The table turn'd, the china fell,
A heap of painted dust.

O fatal purport of my dream!
The fair afflicted cried,
Occasioned, I confess my shame,
By childishness and pride.

For in a kiss....or two....or three,
No mischief could be found;
Then, had I been more frank and free,
My china had been sound.

TO THE AUTHOR OF A COLLECTION OF POEMS, PUR-PORTING TO BE WRITTEN BY NOBODY.

Advance to fame....advance reveal'd!
Let conscious worth be bold:
Why have you lain so long conceal'd,
And hid Peruvian gold?

Dan Phœbus did with joy discern
Your genius brought to light,
And many a somebody should learn,
From nobody to write.

EPIGRAMS.

ON THE APPROACHING NUPTIALS OF A YOUNG LADY
WITH A MR. GREY.

[Found in a very ancient manuscript.]
With all that blooming sweetness in thy face,
With beauty, radiant as the god of day,
With active limbs, shape, elegance and grace,
With all these tests of youth....thou'lt soon be Grey.

[On seeing the lady of Sir John DAY, and her cousin Miss Orchard, pass through Birmingham, in December, on their way to London.]

While nipping frosts with deadly bite,
Our choicest fruits consume;
Behold to feast, at least, our sight,
An ORCHARD, in full bloom.

And what is passing strange besides,
With equal truth we say,
That, just preceding Christmas tide,
Came smiling LADY DAY.

The CAPRICIOUS

Old Noll, as city prattlers tell,
Was always known to promise well;
Appoint your time to ask him home,
"He'll come, indeed, he'll surely come,"
Engaged at six, "he'll come at seven,
And chat away until eleven".
Now all seems fair and fix'd, but yet
How soon the old one can forget
His word, and teach his friends to know,
He'll never come if promis'd to;
When next you wish false Noll to see,
And bind him to your company;
Bid Betty tell him "not at home,"
Or charge him strictly not to come;
He who ne'er calls, when most desir'd,
Eccentric comes, when least requir'd.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Anti-democratic gradations of rank. Anti-republican sentiments and opinions. National phlegm....Green creoles. Gougers. Indifference for the sciences. Jefferson....Bartram....The Americans bear little resemblance to the English.

Various gradations of rank may be observed in America, as well as in Germany. The first class, as they call themselves, consists of the land speculators, the principal public officers, and in general, those who live the most expensively. They look down with the greatest contempt upon the second class. The respect of the Americans for money is very great. They submit with great humility to this contempt. This first class are full of the most ridiculous vanity. Their fashion of having arms painted upon their carriages is peculiarly laughable. This class is altogether anti republican, and at heart, devoted to the English constitution, which they would be glad to see introduced in America. This aristocratic order, attempted to give the title of "his Highness," to the president of the United States, in order to familiarize the people with monarchical ideas. What this class most desire, would be to have a son of the king of England, king of America, in which case, they would be the lords. The French revolution is a very unpleasant dash across their account; and therefore they bear a most raging hatred to the French nation. At present their policy consists in connecting themselves again as closely as possible with England, and we see that in this they have been hitherto tolerably successful. The second class again cannot bear, in their company any one belonging to the third, which consists of the tradesmen, whom they call mechanics. These classes are all discriminated by the degree of expense in their living, or their apparent wealth. The Americans have inherited from the English a detestable expression which fixes the worth of a man, solely in the quantum of money, which he is supposed to possess. They say very gravely "such a man is worth ten," or "he is worth twenty thousand pounds." They have another expression which seems to have been dictated by the same spirit; they call a republic "a common-wealth," a word tantamount to "the general riches, estate, or property." We see by this, very clearly that they consider liberty, as consisting singly and alone in the protection, acquisition, and enjoyment of property; that they can imagine no higher object of human society, and that they would certainly stare at the man, without understanding him, who should tell them, that the object of society, is no other, than the utmost possible cultivation and perfection of all the faculties of man. When they mean to confer their highest eulogium upon a nation, they say it is "a money making country," they usually boast of their own in those terms, hence it is evident that they view money making as the highest purpose of life. They appear to look upon the essence of a free state, as consisting in the smallness of the sacrifices necessary for the public good. They generally deem it folly, to hazard ones blood and treasure for the national honour. They cannot bear the French nation, for being so devoted to its national honour. The comparison is too humiliating for them. Nothing excited among them so deep an horror as the operation of a forced loan. Such a thing would be utterly impracticable in America. Others may, if they please, admire such self-interested republicans as in my opinion, are the Anglo-Americans; I for my part, with good leave, will for the present, be dispensed from sharing this admiration. They do themselves justice in calling their state a common-wealth and not a republic. The Greeks and Romans, and the modern French, they call republicans. "All these," say they "are military states whose citizens in a foolish quest of glory sacrificed themselves for the public good." They cannot endure any of them. They might add, that if the Athenians had been wise, they would have submitted themselves to Xerxes, and never have ventured the battles of Salamis and Plataea. The Americans indeed, as we have seen, in their war for independence had already submitted themselves to the English, excepting only two thousand men, with whom general Washington effected the surprise at Trenton, and among this little band, most of the soldiers were native Europeans. General Washington, who well knows his countrymen, says in letters to his friends which the Americans pretend to be forgeries, but which he has never disavowed, and which are altogether worthy of him, "our want of virtue makes me despair of a successful issue to our undertaking." He wrote this at the beginning of the war.

An extraordinary phlegmatic turn, is observable in so many individuals, that it seems in fact to be an effect of the climate. I have often had time to repeat in English, a German phrase to the Pennsylvanian Germans before they would draw out in a sluggish tone their answer. I believed indeed they had not understood me, as their German is not proper German, but they assured me to the contrary. This slowness of conception seems to proceed from an obstructed circulation of the blood, and the same cause produces the numerous instances of insanity, which are at the same time usually accompanied with epileptic fits. The New-Englanders are equally phlegmatic. I made acquaintance on a journey with a person from that country, who in his most animated exertions for conversation, could bring out about two words in a minute. Nothing appeared to him so ridiculous as warmth. He was, however, a man of some understanding, and sighed to think how much his country was in want of able men. He went even so far as to wish, that some such goods might be imported from Europe.

They are not fond, at least in Pennsylvania, of seeing Europeans come among them, unless it be such as, are obliged to sell themselves, and whom they can employ at hard labour. They are mortified again, when an European returns home, because this seems to indicate, that all among them is not so admirable, and that they themselves have been found not so extremely amiable, as they believe themselves, and as writers, blinded by prejudice have told them, they were. Egotism is never to be satisfied.

Young Americans are for the most part, excessively silly company, the well educated and travelled persons excepted. The French call such inexperienced uneducated boys, green creoles, (des créoles verts,) as in German we usually say of such a person, "he is not yet dry behind the ears." These green creoles believe that their country is a paradise, and every other a hell. This is natural: for they have been told so, and have seen nothing. Of Germany in particular they have the absurdest ideas. They enquire, for instance, whether there are stone houses in Germany, and whether a house as big, as that of Robert Morris, is to be met with there? Whether any corn grows in France, seeing that the French import some from America? whether people sometimes eat roast-meat in Germany, or nothing but potatoes, as in Ireland; and other like stupid absurdities. These green creoles are peculiarly insupportable, by their attempts to play the rake, for which they are not properly organized. They mutually laugh at one another's wretched nonsense, and think to assume thereby the reputation of a witty society. I was prevented from sleeping, a whole night through, at an inn, by one of these ingenious green creolising companies. I paid particular attention to what they said; and heard nothing, which among persons of any taste, could have excited the smallest sensation. Yet they laughed immoderately, and continually until broad day, when these green creoles disappeared.

These green creoles are in truth very tiresome company, but they are harmless; on the other hand, the sect of the gougers, is much more dangerous. This academy of eye-pluckers, does not extend itself to the northward of the river Potomac. These fellows are much in the habit, by the pressure of the thumb, to pluck a man's eye out of his head. They are especially dangerous to travellers whom they think they observe to be well educated. They are at first civil; then without cause grow insolent, and if you resent this, your eyes are gone, in an instant. None but a true green creole, could understand here in a literal sense, the expressions of "sect" and "academy," which I have used. I only mean by them a set of people, who have used themselves expressly to the practice of this hellish art, who mutually instruct one another in it, who properly make a trade of it, and seek their greatest pleasure in it. Eye-plucking is in Virginia practised even by the gentlemen. They challenge one another to it, as others do, to fight with pistols; notwithstanding this, they are not properly gougers, or eye-pluckers, as every fencer is not a fencing-master. I beg those of my readers, who know how to read, to forgive this explanation, it is made only for a certain sect, which can understand nothing, but what is expressed in a plain literal sense; this sect is that of the Americanes!

It appears always to be the national opinion of the Americans, that with the exception of reading, writing, cyphering, and, for surveyors, a few rules of geometry and trigonometry, the sciences are of no great utility. The New-Englanders have more respect for them, but even their regard is confined to the knowledge, immediately useful to the farmer, the merchant, &c. such as may chiefly be collected in the "young man's companion." The Germans in Pennsylvania, however, are above all the rest, enemies to literature. The only German books sold among them, and at a profit of 70 per cent. are song books imported from Frankfort, on the Mayn. Besides, the barbarians who speak German in Pennsylvania have brought the language into such extreme discredit, that Americans born even of German parents, if they have any education, are ashamed to speak it—Such a country offers no good refuge to German men of letters, and the schoolmaster Reiche, a man well known in Germany, died there in wretched poverty. America possesses some men of science, yet living, at the head of whom stands Mr. Jefferson of Virginia, known by an ingenious book in opposition to Buffon. Bartram, who has published a bombastic, though in a botanical point of view, not a contemptible description of his travels in Florida likewise lives, not far from Philadelphia. Mr. Muhlenberg, minister of the German Lutheran church at Lancaster in Pennsylvania, is esteemed the first botanist in America.

The Americans bear very little resemblance to the English. Their form of stature is altogether different. The English are a much handsomer nation. There are indeed, strong, nervous men, to be met with in America, but they are generally the first generation from European parents. Upon these, the climate has not produced its full effect. The Americans of the second or third generation, are tall, but surprisingly thin, and weak in the bones. I have seen persons of fifty, so extremely thin, as to have a ridiculous half-grown appearance, though, at the same time, considerably tall. They are further, active, but feeble. Their flesh is soft and flabby, or as the French expresses it flasque. This is very detrimental to the fair sex; for in this respect, I once saw in company a person who observed of a lady then present, that she must have been very handsome in her youth, but thereupon was informed that the lady, was not yet eighteen. There are very handsome faces, but they are ephemeral flowers. Fair female complexions are uncommon. Handsome heads of hair not very frequent. The bosom for the most part is flat, and flabby, the shoulders round and arched, and the back crooked. This is at least generally the case in Philadelphia. Blooming colours are seldom seen. In New-England, fresher colours, and in general a greater share of beauty is prevalent.

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

To form a just estimate of Mr. Burr's political conduct, since his elevation to the Vice-Presidency, it is of no small importance to ascertain, how far he has approved and promoted, or censured and opposed the system of removals from office, on the sole ground of political opinions. The immediate operation of this system, as it has been carried into effect, we are not disposed to comment upon. The American people, throughout the union have witnessed it. They are neither callous to the feelings of humanity, nor deaf to the voice of Justice. They have sense to see, and sensibility to feel, amply sufficient for this occasion. Their judgment we believe is made up in this case, and we leave it with them to pronounce it. Neither shall we here descant upon the more remote consequences of this new principle introduced into the administration of our government: upon its tendencies to whet the edge of civil dissensions, to embitter the cup of social life, to add ten-fold venom to the stings of faction, to corrupt and degrade the morals of our citizens, and to make war instead of peace, the fundamental principle of mutual relation between man and man. These consequences have not yet had time to unfold themselves. But they are imminent; they are inevitable. The nation will feel them in the spasms of internal convulsion, and will know where to fix the responsibility of its first introduction.

If we believe the writer of the "View," Mr. Burr's conduct upon this subject has been doubly exceptionable. He has at once been culpable in recommending forcibly the new system, and in pretending to disapprove it. This charge is direct, and explicit, nor can we disguise the impression that it has some colour of evidence to support it. The eloquent writer of the pamphlet signed Lucius Junius Brutus, had already suggested suspicions of the same nature, and since the publication of the "View," Mr. Duane, who is understood to be in the peculiar confidence of the President, and who in these party-bickerings at New-York, has hitherto professed a sort of stately neutrality, declares in the most formal terms, that all the removals of national officers in that state were made by the advice of Mr. Burr, and all the new officers appointed at his recommendation; excepting only the naval-officer. He adds that Mr. Burr was very desirous that this place should be bestowed upon Mr. M. L. Davis, and expressed much dissatisfaction, upon being disappointed of this wish. Thus far his statement corroborates that of the pamphleteer, and in this instance, being in some sort official, it is entitled to more credit, than the representations of Mr. Duane generally deserve.

Another measure of the present administration which will furnish one of the most decisive features of its character, for the animadversion of posterity, has been the repeal of the judiciary law, for the sake of removing from office, contrary to the letter and the spirit of the constitution, sixteen individual judges. From the conduct of the Vice-President, in senate, upon that occasion, the men who have the real liberties of this country sincerely at heart, did see cause to hope that he would eventually defeat that shameless violation of the most precious principles of freedom. In him they thought they perceived some "compunctious visitings of Nature" in favour of his solemn oath, and his country's rights. At the moment when the arm of infuriated faction was raised to aim a vital stab at public justice, and the rule of equal laws, they saw the murderous hand for one moment suspended! A ray of light glimmered across the deadly gloom of that cruel hour. The genius of American liberty, prostrate at the feet of Mr. Burr, like Arthur at the feet of Hubert, was imploring for mercy; the irons destined to put out his eyes were heated—Mr. Burr relented, and gave them time to cool. The pure and genuine patriots throughout the union, had one moment of soothing hope. They cherished the belief, that the malice of the burning coal was gone; that "The breath of heaven had blown his spirit out,

"And strew'd repentant ashes o'er his head."

This hope was but a pleasing illusion. Faction in frenzy, gnashed his teeth; called in all his scattering forces—Rudely thrust aside the interposing shield, and without even averting his face, consummated the crime, in the blood of his helpless victim. The guardian angel of our union, shriek'd at the deed, and wing'd his flight to purer worlds. The independence of our judiciary is no more.

We believe the day will come, when Mr. Burr will himself consider his conduct on this occasion among the most meritorious actions of his life. We believe the day will come, when full justice will be given him for it in the public opinion. But we wish it were in his power to prove that he had always been averse to the sacrifice of the judicial department. What says the author of the View?

"Mr. Burr was in the first ebullition of his patriotism, so decidedly for the measure, that no time in his opinion ought to be lost. An extra session ought to be called to abolish the system before it could be put in operation. Such was the tinkling, and high sounding professions of the man. Let us now look at the event."

He then goes on to show, that the act was perpetrated without the aid of Mr. Burr! and argues that his real intention, in referring the repeal to a select committee, by his casting vote, was to defeat the bill itself. We are willing for the honour of Mr. Burr to believe this; and we think that nothing but a formal avowal of his intention was wanting, to make it the fairest of his titles to the esteem of his country. Yet without that formal avowal, and on the supposition that Mr. Burr had previously been so urgent for this wicked prostration of principle as he is represented, we must consider it as an equivocal act, the real character and motives of which can only be explained by the future conduct of the Vice-President.

These are the only objects of a public nature, in the course of Mr. Burr's career in his present office, upon which the writer of the pamphlet can cast a colour of reproach. For it is indeed requiring too much of us, to say we must believe Mr. Burr averse to the proposed amendment of the constitution directing separate and specific votes for the offices of President and Vice-President, because he trembled upon reading the bill introduced in the senate for that purpose. It is exacting too severe a tax upon our credulity, to contend that Mr. Burr is a traitor to his country, for having toasted "an union of all honest men," in a company of federalists on the anniversary of Washington's birth-day. These accusations, trivial in their nature, and lame in their evidence, prove much more forcibly the malice of their author than the guilt of their object.

The remainder of the pamphlet relates to Mr. Burr's transactions in the state of New-York, first as a member of the convention which assembled in October 1801, for the purpose of altering the state constitution; and afterwards at the spring elections for members of Congress and of the state legislature. Here it was that the long dissembled and smothered animosities, between his party and that of the Clinton family blazed out. The coalition between them had never been cordial, and by its nature could not be durable. The first public question upon which they met in formal opposition, was upon the numbers to which the senate of New-York should be reduced. There had been some thoughts among the united faction, to abolish the senate because it "had become a perfect aristocracy," and was "unpopular."....But Mr. De Witt Clinton was a member of the body, and had then no prospect of being so soon translated to the senate of the union. To keep open the senate, was therefore an object to him, and to other Clintons, who must all be provided for some how or other. Mr. Burr too had his friends to prompt, for which purpose a senate was a convenient machine. Such, as may be collected from the pamphlet, were the only motives which guided these pretended republicans in their final determination to spare one of the vital members of a free government. But for the private personal views of De Witt Clinton and Aaron Burr, the senate of New-York, would have been sacrificed without a struggle. In agreeing, however, to preserve this aristocratic institution, they determined to reduce its numbers. What necessity there could be for curtailing the numbers of a legislative branch, consisting only of 43 persons, it is not easy to perceive. But the diminution of expense was a bait for the multitude; and the weakening of aristocratic influence, was an argument suited to the intellect of the faction. Burr was for pushing it to its utmost excess; for cutting down the senate to 15 or 18, fixing at last, however, upon 24. His secret object in this was to render the body more easily manageable by himself; and to deprive De Witt Clinton, of the chance of getting re-elected, at least for some years. The Clinton's saw the absurdity of the argument that the influence of an aristocratic assembly is proportioned, to its numbers; but they dared not meet the popular, though paltry consideration, of saving a few annual hundreds of dollars. They were content therefore to clip away the numbers of the senate, just so much as should leave De Witt Clinton's expectations of reelection unimpaired; and their standard number was 32. Such was the issue upon which the party first divided. Mr. Burr at first carried his point in the convention. But the next day George Clinton, jun. rallied the troops of the family, and bore away the palm of victory from the Vice-President.

From this time the discord between these virtuous republicans became irreconcilable; and at the spring elections, though acting with apparent unanimity they were in fact manœuvring with the utmost activity against each other. In this party management the Clinton's had the advantage, and excluded every one of Mr. Burr's friends from the nomination list, which they confined altogether to themselves, and their adherents. The same George Clinton, jun. who had triumphed over Mr. Burr in the convention, was now brought forward again, as one of their candidates. Upon which, Mr. Swartwout, the marshall of the district, and the ardent friend of Mr. Burr, could no longer contain his boiling resentments. He declared the expulsion of George Clinton's name from the list, was his ultimatum, and without it hostilities should instantly commence. The Clintonians were intimidated. They consented to strike out the obnoxious name; but the man and his family would not abide by the bargain. They endeavoured to carry him against the final agreement of their own committee of nominations, but failed of success. The furies of rival ambition and mutual disappointment were all let loose, and the voice of the Clinton's, seizing instantly the trumpet, proclaimed to all the world, that Mr. Burr is, and was, and was always known to be a base, and selfish hypocrite, a treacherous political impostor!

Since the publication of our first remarks upon this pamphlet, evidence from various quarters has arisen to prove, what we believed upon the first perusal; that it teems with a multitude of misrepresentations. The author's historical chain is composed of here and there one solitary link of facts, connected together by five or six of his own rancorous suspicions: the chances of truth in such a narrative are small.... As a statement of facts therefore this work is entitled to very little credit; but as a document of the views, the principles, the moral and political character of the party which now governs the American Union, of the means by which they burst open the doors of public honours and confidence, and of the causes which now lead them to drag one another before the tribunal of the public, as the vilest of malefactors, it is an historical voucher of no trivial importance. This consideration alone has induced us to bestow so much notice upon a work, which, as a literary performance, is worthy of such a cause. We presume it is from the same pen, which has so laboriously vindicated, in Cheetham's newspaper, the use of the third person plural, We.

It has been above remarked, that the editor of the Aurora, who, as the President's confidential friend and publisher, so happily styles himself the "Organ of the popular will," has hitherto maintained a sort of neutrality, between the rivals of New-York. This neutrality, however, is not partial to Mr. Burr. With him, Mr. Duane has dealt very roundly; and told him, without ceremony, "that if the motives for the suppression of Wood's history were not "satisfactorily explained to the public, his (Burr's) standing with the republican interest was gone." The Vice-President of the United States, must have thought this language somewhat extraordinary, addressed to him by William Duane, unless he considered him as the organ of another will: as the Talthybius of the American Atreides.

The declaration of war, therefore, between the first and second officer of the union is not yet formal; and the following passage in the last page of the "View" must be looked upon as premature.

"Mr. Burr is sensible, that, previous to the adjournment of Congress, the republican members had given him up! and it only remains for the people to confirm the opinion of EVERY BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT, concerning his political conduct. He no longer enjoys the confidence of the government! He is no longer viewed as a man attached and belonging to the republican party."

We believe it, however, impossible for these two eminent personages cordially to coalesce again, for some years. Mr. Burr's reluctance at being placed in the chair of the union, appeared to be so very faint; in renouncing the competition for the tempting prize he cast so many "longing, lingering looks behind;" his scruples were so willing to be overcome, his resistance so anxious to be subdued, that they will not easily coincide with the stubbornness of the President's virtues, in behalf of the "man of the people." Some other candidate for the Vice-Presidency must be selected by the "cabinet council of the national elections." But we think Mr. De Witt Clinton's candidate, will not yet be likely to succeed. In comparing the first presidential election under the federal constitution with the last, we think the people of the United States have made no small proficiency in the bathos of government, or art of political sinking: but we must confess they have many gradations deeper to descend, before they can reach the level of De Witt Clinton.

PARLIAMENTARY ELOQUENCE.

[It is not the habit of the Editor to read attentively, or to copy frequently, the speeches of the opposition in Great-Britain. The following speech of Mr. Sheridan is preserved, not for its rectitude of reasoning, or the correctness of its politics, but because it is a lively specimen of brilliant wit, and because it contains a compliment to a great statesman, whose mighty talents thus challenge the respect of one of the keenest of his political foes.]

SHERIDAN'S SPEECH,

ON THE DEFINITIVE TREATY.

IN THE BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, MAY 14.

"Sir, at this late hour, (about 2 o'clock) it is with extreme reluctance I rise to address the house, and to trespass upon your time and patience. I shall not be singular to-night in the professions I make you of avoiding details; but sir, in one respect, my conduct will differ from any other gentleman's who has addressed you. I will keep my word—(A laugh.)—If I feel repugnance to rise at so late an hour, I feel equally strange with respect to the unpopularity, which I fear I must experience. It is natural to every person to have pleasure in voting in a majority, though to that pleasure, I believe, I have long been a stranger—Among the strange things we are continually witnessing, is the strange division of parties at present in this house. Sir, I have heard it said, that there are about twelve or thirteen different parties among us! Nay, some carry the number much farther. Now I scarcely expect a single vote with me beyond that little circle of a constitutional party, who have, for the last ten years been the objects of so much unqualified abuse; but those men who have so often been held up to public opprobrium, are the very same whose every prediction has been fulfilled, and every fear realized. The discussion of this necessary but disgraceful treaty of peace to night, is a confirmation of the propriety of their political conduct during the whole course of the war.—My friends must feel poignant shame and deep humiliation at the situation to which by these terms the country is reduced, but which they have laboured steadily to avert. Those who oppose this peace have been arraigned as aiming at a censure on the issue of the negotiations, and on the ministers themselves. And certainly, sir, their object is to condemn the peace and cast a slur on the abilities of his majesty's ministers. But, in this conduct of theirs, they have, at least, the merit of being consistent. I support the peace, because I feel confident no better terms, considering all circumstances could be got. Their predecessors had taken care of that. They had left them no choice, but between an expensive, bloody, and fruitless war, and perilous and hollow peace. They have chosen the best of the alternatives. Now, says the minister, they who oppose me depress the country. I thank these new oppositionists for their manly firmness, in coming forward, and opposing upon their own principles, this degrading treaty. Let the people of this country be fully aware of all the circumstances of the peace. They have done their duty then, in thus publicly discussing them. But a right hon. gentleman—not here this evening—an ex-minister too—suspects something more. If he has not altered his opinions since yesterday, he suspects their motives. They, says he, disapprove the treaty, and attack administration, because they wish to drive out ministers, and succeed to their places, and for that purpose, they have formed a confederacy. Truly, sir, a heavy charge; but I must declare, that they have never veiled their opinions. Some of them especially have at all times been very open. And I conceive that it would be high injustice to suspect them upon slight grounds of a dirty cabal to turn out the present ministers. Says the hon. gentleman, upon their principles, they would never have made peace. Why so, we have always said! It is now therefore confirmed, that a leading part of the late ministry acted upon such principles. But the right hon. gent. (Mr. Dundas) yesterday denounced their foul ambition, and their design to trip up the heels of their successors! Another great discovery is now made—These person's principles were such as rendered a peace impossible, and yet the very men who say so, have been thanking them all, as the saviours of the country!!! Can the Rt. hon. gentleman account for his inconsistency? I should think not; and yet he looks so confidently, I almost think he could. He thought I was cheering him, as if I did not suppose him a constant supporter of the war, and he assures the house "he was a steady friend to it!" But he has now found out that it was necessary to stop. I say, why not have stopped a little sooner? Why not before you were so much exhausted? For instance, when Bonaparte made you an offer? Now, however, he finds the necessity of peace. But is this such a peace as will give us real repose? Consider your debt and taxes, and the necessity which seems to be at length coming upon us of keeping up a peace establishment unknown in this country. It is lamentable to see you all split into miserable parties, when your great enemy is uniting every possible means of extending his power? You are squabbling about the measuring of ribbands and tapes and the paltry revenues of Malta, when much greater objects are before you! the events of every day seem to call more and more for the expression of that public feeling, that the time will come when French encroachments and oppositions must cease, and when the voice of this country must be clearly raised against their atrocious and tyrannical conduct? the Rt. hon. gent. says "we have preserved our honour!" Honour depends more on the manner of doing a thing than on the thing itself. We had a great armament at the time of negotiation, but I don't hear that it carried any one whatever! This, say they is a peace in which we relinquish nothing, and gain much! Will any man of common sense undertake to prove that? I defy him to name the single object, ever varying, ever shifting, unrelinquished. What did we go to war for? Why, to prevent French aggrandizement. Have we done that? No. Then we were to rescue Holland! Is that accomplished or relinquished? No, Brabant was a sine qua non! Is it gained? No. Then come security and indemnity! Are they obtained? No—The late minister told us that the example of a Jacobin government in Europe, founded on the ruins of the Holy Altar, and the tomb of a martyred monarch, was a spectacle so dreadful and infectious to Christendom, that we could never be safe while it existed, and could do nothing short of our very last effort for its destruction. Now, Sir let us see what we have got. But what have we laid out for all these fine words which at last gave way to security and indemnity? Why, near 200,000 lives and 500 millions of money? And we have gotten Ceylon and Trinidad. I should propose, that, as we have given to our heroes titles from the places where there laurels were won, our St. Vincents, Nelsons of the Nile, &c. so we should name Ceylon, Security Island, and call Trinidad the Isle of Indemnity!!! Now if we look at the state of Europe, we find the Noble Lord opposite, has a most curious and convenient epithet, which he applies to what is rather a disagreeable object to him (Lord Hawkesbury)! He talks of its being in an uncomfortable—Was it?—Oh no!—unsatisfactory state.—Germany, Holland, Italy, they are all in an unsatisfactory state; and so I suppose is Switzerland, which now seems likely to undergo a division among her powerful neighbours. That innocent and virtuous, suffering, venerable country is now I suppose in an unsatisfactory state! But Great-Britain is all this time far from languor. She is in an unsatisfactory state. However, a grave and learned gentleman, (Master of the Rolls) tells us for our comfort, that notwithstanding all that has happened, here we all are debating and doing business in all the old forms and customs of the House! Pray now could not this have happened, supposing we had never gone to war? I think that he should have made that out before he congratulated us so warmly upon our present debate “under all the old forms of the house!” The Minister too, goes on according to old forms: he has his majorities according to custom. Prussia can go on too in its old forms! Is this armed repose, this hollow peace, then, the fruit of our long and glorious war! A great deal too has been said to be gained by the disposition of France to lay aside Jacobinism. But the grand consolation of all is in looking to Bonaparte as the extirpator of Jacobinism. The learned gentleman however states to this house, that it is the nature of Jacobinism, if driven from any country, always to look with pride and ambition to a settlement in the place where it had birth, and to fix itself there. So now, this “child and champion of Jacobinism,” as she was styled, is to become a parasite. The child of sin is to destroy his mother! As this Jacobinism is by the late minister stated to be a vice, never to be eradicated from the bosom when it has once been implanted, all Europe will doubtless look to this great consul for its destruction. Indeed he seems very desirous of extending his care to his neighbours! Suppose you make him king of Europe at once, and he will soon extirpate all the Jacobinism that infects it! My alarms begin when the alarms of some persons cease. The great question about the dangers of the French revolution were always upon the degree of the danger to be apprehended. Some danger was always allowed: but to suppose the people of this country so miserably infatuated as to fall in love with dirt, and blood, and guillotines, with all the atrocious deformities of the system of Robespierre, and that now when France is “covered with glory” though certainly without liberty, or any thing that much resembles it, there should be nothing to dazzle or captivate, is out of my comprehension. If there be in this country men of dangerous ambition, Bonaparte is the man to hold out to them, by his ambitious and successful conduct, an example! An example however much stronger than any thing that could attract the people in the exhibitions of riot and murder, unsociality and ferocity of manners! But they say—He has begged pardon of God and man by his piety and penitence! No—he has restored bishops with the salaries of curates, and made them all spies and informers in his favour by a solemn oath! He has made his own use of them all. How has he acted to Switzerland? How to us? Why by condescending to receive our humiliating submission of every thing you had acquired by the powers of your army and navy! I must trust to our valour to defend us against his armies; and I pray heaven to protect us against the effects of his penitence and piety! I must confess, that nothing has been stated against this peace unaccompanied by proofs.—I had rather given to France Malta, and taken the Cape, than have made this absurd arrangement! If the late secretary for the war department were here—who is perhaps (looking at Mr. Pitt) by proxy—he might have made a whimsical charge against the present ministers. He (Mr. Dundas) said, that “the minister who should give up the Cape would deserve to lose his head!!!” There sits the minister however, with his head safe upon his shoulders. I have almost a mind to attack him on the authority of Mr. Dundas! Malta would have been a great acquisition to us, and therein I agree with the war secretary. It would have stood, with the British standard flying in the centre of the Mediterranean, “like a great seamount saving those that eye it!” Ministers affirm the emperor of Russia would not take care of Malta. If they will tell me so upon their honor, I will believe them—otherwise, upon my honor, I won't believe any body that says so. That did not appear to be Paul's idea of it. Perhaps he was mad! There was, however, some method in his madness: but, sir, there's a message that Bonaparte has sent to his tribunate concerning some Russian soldiers who are to go and take good care of the republic of the Seven Islands, and they may, probably be intended for Alexandria, and may be connected with some plan against Turkey. Sir, if any thing in the shape of a statesman will say in this house, that he looks at that power, “at which the world turns pale,” without apprehension, as the ministers seem to tell us to night, I must say he has a prodigious stock of courage, or no skill at all in politics! But let France have colonies! Oh, yes! Let her have a good trade that she may be afraid of war, says the learned member! that's the way to make her love peace. He has had, to be sure, a sort of military education. He has been abroad and is rather rough company; but if you put him behind the counter a little, he will mend exceedingly! When I was reading the treaty, I thought all the names of foreign places, viz. Pondicherry, Chander-nagore, Cochin, Martinico, &c. all cessions. Not they: they are all so many traps and holes to catch this silly fellow in, and make a merchant of him! I really think the best way upon this principle would be this: Let the merchants of London open a public subscription, and set him up at once! I hear a great deal respecting a certain statue about to be erected to the right honourable gentleman (Mr. Pitt) now in my eye, at a great expence. Send all that money over to the first consul, and give him what you talk of so much, capital, to begin trade with. I hope the right honourable gentleman over the way, will, like the first consul, refuse a statue for the present, and postpone it as work for posterity. There is no harm, however, in marking out the place. The right honourable gentleman is musing, perhaps, on what square or place, he will choose for its erection. I recommend the bank of England. Now for the materials. Not gold: no, no; he has not left enough of it—I should, however, propose Papier Mache and old bank notes!—Ministers recommend us to make France commercial, for the sake of peaceful habits; and then tell us how impossible it is for her to increase in trade or commerce for want of the necessary credit and capital. There my prospect was damped! I was going now to India, but I remember I promised to avoid detail. I must keep my word. There was some northern logic here last night; something specious—a kind of northern lights—pretty enough to look at, but not very useful, about our possessions having a better security in India, without than with our enemies' recognition of our rights. This I confess I cannot understand. The right honourable gentleman asks whether they would have been justified in breaking off the treaty? That's a question between him and those who like the preliminaries: but it is otherwise with those who like neither. The secretary of war (Mr. Yorke) has said, Bonaparte will look at us with a “Soldier's Eye.” I think he will with that of a Statesman! Now the city militia and some other corps, are disbanded; it is not exactly a spectacle for a soldier's eye. One cannot walk along the streets without hearing doubts expressed of the nature and security of the peace! And the next enquiry is, “pray who is the minister now?” Is there an interior and exterior prime minister? one who appears to the world and another secret, irresponsible, directing minister! Certainly in several respects I have given my testimony in behalf of the present ministers. In nothing more than for making the best peace, perhaps, they could after their predecessor had left them in such a deplorable situation! But the present ministers continue to identify themselves with the former. They have ministerially supported a refusal to enquire into the state of the country, just as they were about to take the government they have passed an indemnity bill, and since that a security bill, in a resolution of thanks, and these are the only indemnity and security acquired!!!—The ex-ministers are quite separate and distinct, and yet they and the ministers are all honourable friends! What is the meaning of this mysterious connection? Why don't the minister defend his peace on the only good grounds of defence?—Does he hold that situation only to make peace, and leave it for his predecessors? No minister of this country ever condescended to act under such an incomprehensible connection, and to receive such equivocal support! Part of the cause is clear. If the late minister attacks the treaty, the present would turn round and say—“You brought me into a situation of necessity—You compelled me to sign a disgraceful treaty—You were arrogant, and I have put up with indignity—Bonaparte, by his minister Otto, would laugh at me!—This work is yours!—You placed me in this dilemma!” The minister takes no strong ground of defence: I won't say he dare not take it. There he sits to receive the attack of the new confederacy, who are not great in numbers, but in talents. The ex-minister is mounted on a kind of hill fort to fire down on the assailants, but the garrison is all manned with deserters from the principles of the war! I should like to support the present minister on fair ground; but what is he! A sort of outside passenger—or rather a man leading the horses round the corner, while the reins and whip, and all are in the hands of the coachman on the box! [look at Mr. P's. elevated seat three or four benches above that of the treasury.] Why not have a union of the two ministers, or at least some intelligible connection? When the ex-minister quitted office, almost all the subordinate ministers kept their places! How was it that the whole family did not move together? Had he only one covered waggon to carry away friends and goods? Or has he left directions behind him that they may know where to call? I remember a fable of Aristophanes: it is translated from Greek into decent English—I mention this for the country gentlemen. It is of a man that sat so long on a seat (about as long, perhaps, as the ex-minister did on the treasury bench), that he grew to it. When Hercules pulled him off he left all the sitting part of the man behind him! The house can make the allusion. This is not a noble, manly kind of coalition between these gentlemen.—Of that ex-minister I would just say, that no man admires his splendid talents more than I do. If ever there was a man formed and fitted by nature to benefit his country, and give it lustre, he is such a man. He has no low, little, mean, petty vices. He has too much good sense, taste, and talents, to set his mind upon ribbands, stars, titles, and other appendages and idols of rank. He is of a nature not at all suited to be the creature or tool of any court. (Mr Pitt bowed repeatedly.) But while I thus say of him no more than I think his character and great talents deserve, I must tell him how grossly he has misapplied them in the politics of this country. I must tell him again how he has augmented the national debt, and of the lives lost in the war. I must tell him he has done more against the privilege of the people, increased more the power of the crown, and injured more the constitution of this country, than any minister I can mention.....Of the resignation of the late ministry, I don't believe one word of what is said about Catholic Emancipation. I could as soon believe it was because they had discovered the longitude. If they did go out on that ground they were certainly at liberty so to do. But after they quitted their situations they circulated a paper in Ireland, attributing the failure of an indispensable measure to resistance in a certain quarter, and that quarter was their sovereign, and directing the Irish catholics to look to them for hope of relief. If this was short of high treason, how far short of it I cannot define. If, however, that measure was necessary to carrying on hostilities, we have certainly done right so far in making this peace. Mr. Sheridan concluded a speech, which, alternately convulsed the house with laughter, and impressed it with eloquence, by reading an amendment to be submitted to the house, charging the defective terms of the peace on the conduct of the late ministry, and expressing the painful sensation of the house at the sacrifices made.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

I have a very sincere respect for the character of an instructor of youth, and nothing, in my opinion, would more promote the substantial glory of the country, than a wide diffusion of classical literature, under the direction of men, eminent for their learning, and venerable for their piety, who should enjoy the amplest accommodations, and acquire an independent income in palaces, dedicated to wisdom, ACCORDING TO THE PRACTICE OF OUR ANCESTORS. The following wise remarks will, we hope, occasion some to reflect upon the rights of masters, and that learning is soon "trodden under the hoofs of a swinish multitude, when the persons and fortunes of preceptors are treated with contempt.

"On croit sottement, qu'il est plus honorable de conduire in qualite de capitaine une troupe d'ouvriers, ou de paysans, qu'on nomme soldats, que de commander a de jeunes seigneurs, et de leur former le cœur, et l'esprit."

CARACCIOLI.

As nothing contributes more to the encouragement, and increase of excellence in a profession, than the honour bestowed upon it, and the esteem in which it is held by the world; it is an useful and laudable effort, which some benevolent writers have made to raise some employments of great importance to society, from the contempt into which they have unfortunately fallen.

Every one is ready to allow the importance of education, yet few entertain a due respect for the profession, which is to administer it. The world is governed by names, and with the word pedagogue, has been ludicrously associated the idea of a pedant, a mere plodder, a petty tyrant and a gerund grinder.

But as the profession is not only in the very first degree useful to society, but attended with peculiar hardships and difficulties, it deserves the recompense and alleviation of public esteem.

The schoolmaster's employment has been compared to the punishment, inflicted on the Danaides, and on Sysiphus. His labour knows no end; for, supposing one set of scholars at one time to be attentive and improve, yet they are succeeded soon after by new scholars, and the whole work is to be recommenced.

He languishes over the repetition of rules and precepts,* which have nothing amusing to his fancy, or improving to his understanding. He goes his round, like the mill-horse, and his ears ring with cases, declensions, conjugations; Propria quæ moribus; As in præsentis; hic, hæc, hoc; and di, do, dum.

He is conversant with those, who continue in his company unwillingly, and are impatient to be gone, with the petulant, the peevish, the idle, the inattentive, the ungrateful and the refractory.†

He inhales dust and impure air, and his ears are seldom relieved from noise. His patience and temper are continually put to trial: he bears about him an instrument of torture, and is frequently obliged to inflict punishment with the reluctant severity of an executioner.

If he spare the rod he must be often busied in reprimanding, admonishing, remonstrating and advising those who hate him for his pains; and, if they cannot have other revenge, delight in giving uneasiness, by teasing the temper of their best friend, their foster father. Few occupations exercise the temper, or tend more to spoil it, than that of a conscientious schoolmaster.

He is liable to hourly insult and affronting behaviour from the senior boys, who resent with rancorous virulence the exercise of that discipline on themselves, which they at the same time have sense enough to know, is no more than the master's duty compels him to enforce.

He is exposed to continual misrepresentation. The tongue of every boy in his school, however silly or malicious, has a tale to tell, concerning his supposed mistakes, his mismanagement, his severity, his partiality, his parsimony. Himself and his family are painted to the father and mother and to all company, in the blackest colours, which malice can invent, and inexperience conceive.

The master is blamed for the faults of nature. A boy is stupid or idle and learns nothing. He is removed in wrath; the master loses his scholar and the emoluments attending him; but that is not sufficient, he loses something of his peace and character: for the boy is removed by those, who must allege some fault to justify the removal. They cannot bear that an imputation should fall on the boy, and therefore, the load of censure, aggravated by a thousand falsehoods, is laid on the master.

GESNER.

† Quam ingratus labor, totos dies versari inter pueros, inter invitos plerumque, et substrictis veluti auriculis loram, quæ se carcere emittat, expectantes; inter petulantes, morosos, pigros, reluctantes disciplinæ!

GESNER.

If he ventures to vindicate himself, he is under the necessity of throwing blame on the boy, which his generosity will not permit; or if a regard to himself and justice compels him to speak, the offence already given is aggravated beyond all bounds, and both the boy and his friends become implacable enemies and bitter slanderers for life.*

These are only a few among the many evils, which attend a profession highly useful and even necessary to the existence of society. It will be urged that in some cases there are the alleviations of lucre; and it must be confessed that the world is not so bad, as not to furnish many boys of a docile and amiable disposition, and many parents, who are grateful and candid. But, still there are few employments attended with more irksome labour, more liable to ill usage, and less well rewarded by those, whom it most essentially serves, than that of the schoolmaster.

In some cases it is said to be lucrative; but it should be remembered, that the lucre, when it is considerable, usually arises from the boarding and lodging of pupils in the master's house, and not from the business of instruction and the labour of a school. And where the pupils are lodged and boarded in the superintendent's house, his trouble is tenfold greater, and the ill usage to which he is exposed, not to be described by language.

The caprice and ill humour of many boys is such as never can be satisfied. As, on the one hand, they know little of the true nature of things, so, on the other they are prone to judge of all they see with precipitancy....As they have not yet felt the ill usage of the world, so they want that sort of sympathy for others, which experience only can teach. They censure all, who are concerned with them, and happen to displease them without judgment and without mercy. They delight in doing mischief and injuries for diversion; and consequently, the superintendent of a number of boys in his own house, has an office something like that of a keeper of a mad-house, or a gaol, or a collection of wild beasts, but much more unthankful.

Yet ingenious and learned men, sometimes submit to this task voluntarily. It is upon the principle of choosing the least of two evils; for it is better than to starve, and to involve a family in all the evils of indigence.

Want is the scorn of every wealthy fool,
And wit in rage is turn'd to ridicule.

DRYDEN'S JUVENAL.

Necessity forces them to submit to the yoke, and when their shoulders have become galled till they are callous, they bear it with a patient insensibility.

If there were no perverseness, obstinacy, ingratitude and stupidity, the task, to a benevolent heart might be delightful. There is something truly agreeable in assisting the efforts of a youthful mind, which is at once ingenious and ingenuous. And certainly many virtues may be advantageously exercised in bearing with ill usage, and doing good to those, who hate and despise you.

It is a fine opportunity of serving human nature and one's country, and I admire the philanthropy of those, who from so pure a motive are influenced to undergo labours so severe, contumelies so insulting, slanders so unjust, ingratitude so base. I fear the number is small.

* "Illud in primis ægre ferebam, si cum boni me viri officio functum esse putarem, expostulatum venirent necura et questum injuriam illi, quorum in e libris optime consulisse, mihi constabat."

JOURNAL.

The greater part submit to the labour, with the common stimulus of human exertion, the hope of gain; and, when it is considered that parents purchase not only ease and exemption from the toil of instruction, and the trouble of their children's ill humour, not only accomplishments useful and ornamental, but also food, accommodations, and habitation for their offspring, the gain of the masters should not be considered as earned too easily. If the masters acquit themselves well in an undertaking so arduous, they are justly entitled not only to profit, but to honour. If I should be asked, to what purpose are these observations on the ill treatment of schoolmasters; I should answer that they are intended to vindicate from contempt, an order of men at once useful and oppressed; to induce parents to become more candid and considerate in their behaviour to them, and to persuade masters themselves, actuated by a due sense of their own value in society, to scorn that meanness, submission, and obsequiousness, which invites and almost justifies contempt.

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[The following is abridged from an English essay. It appears to be a very tolerable quiz upon histrionic bombast.]

PLAY-BILL EXTRAORDINARY,

FOR THE BENEFIT OF SYLVESTER DAGGERWOOD.

On Monday, &c.

Will be revived a favourite play, called

THE MOUNTAINEERS;

Containing an assemblage of all the beauties
Of Desperation, Execration, Detestation, Perturbation, Humiliation and Ostentation.

Between the first and second act,

MRS. DAGGERWOOD,

Positively for that night only,

Will attempt a recital

OF COLLINS'S ODE TO THE PASSIONS;

In which she will introduce the admired

Rondeau of Bow, wow, wow;

Accompanied on the bladder and string,

By MR. DAGGERWOOD;

After which

DON JUAN, OR THE LIBERTINE DESTROYED,
With entire new dresses, decorations, sinkings
and flyings;

The piece composed of Mirth and Sorrow, Joy and Horror, with Rage and Despair, most pleasingly blended.

IN THIS PANTOMIME WILL BE INTRODUCED

A Pictresque view of a Shipwreck, a Superb
Banquet; interspersed with eating and drinking.
A dreary cave most beautifully decorated with Skulls, Skeletons, Bones, and Monuments.

A Horn pipe, in the character of a Skeleton, by MASTER APOLLO DAGGERWOOD.

The whole to conclude with a pleasing view of the Infernal Regions.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL.

SUR,

I se Yorkshire....but don't ye be thinking that any left-handed Irish principles brought me away from ould England....No:....I love my county, as they say i'th' west, fro' th' botham o' me crop....But I thought Mr. Pitt was rather tightish about taxes, and so determined to come to Merica, which at our barber's shop they used to call the land o' true freedom....Now I've gotten here, I dont know how it is, but I dont feel mysel a bit better off....I could sleep as sound and as free fro' fear o' thieves in Yorkshire as I can here, and I think what wi' house-rent and what wi' one devilment or t'other,

I have as much money, to pay as if I wur at Luom paying Billy's taxes, and as all goes to the king, Cod bless him, and to th' honour o' th' nation, I think I was a fool ever to grudge them.

But there is one thing that puzzles me strangely in this here liberty country, and as I've always tho't you, Master Oldschool (no offence, Sur, I huope) a cutish kind of a chap, I tho't it was best to apply to you for a sort of reason for it, ye see....
They say your government is all for th' good o' th' people; now, I'm an ignorant fellow, but I cannot, for the soul o' me, see what good all this shuffing and cutting for plans can do....Now there's B—r, and there's J—n, and there's C—n, and there's the Devil doesn't know who, all confoundedly lied on, if they hav'nt done more dirty work to get themselves made great men, than ever a member of parliament among them all....Pray, Sur, do try to tell me what they mean by it.

I am,

Yorkshire but honest,

JEREMIAH ROYDS.

New-York, July 10th. 1802.

N. B. I've had this sometime by me, without thinking o'th' Post Office: there's something queerish about bank bills, and notes, and letters, and so on, in your Merican post offices. I huope you'll get this seafe.

THE DRAMA.

[At Drury Lane, late in the spring, a new musical entertainment was brought forward entitled Urania; or The Illumine. It unites so many good qualities, that we feel ourselves called upon for more particular notice than is usually taken of little pieces of this class. The principal characters were thus represented:]

An Armenian,	- Mr. Powell.
Manfred, Prince of Colona,	Mr. C. Kemble.
Conrad, Count of Porta,	Mr. Holland.
Inquisitor,	Mr. Maddocks.
Charles, an Inkeeper,	Mr. Palmer.
Pietro, Manfred's Valet,	Mr. Bannister, jun.
Rodrigo, a Gardner,	Mr. Suett.
Urania, Princess of Tarentum,	Miss De Camp.
Jaqueline, Carlos' Daughter,	Mrs. Bland.

The scene is laid at Tarentum, to which city the Prince of Cologne comes, at the express injunction of his father, to seek its Princess in marriage. The young Prince is quite dejected; his mind is filled with the idea of a spiritual world, of immortal intelligences, of ethereal spirits, and supernatural agents, and there is no room in his heart for a being of a gross corporeal substance. The Princess of Tarentum, who had by chance seen and admired him, is apprised of this weakness, and from the plan which she adopts, in concert with his father, who had followed him to Tarentum, arises the interest of the piece. The father assumes the disguise of an Armenian magician, and is introduced to his son on the moment of his arrival, and before he has seen the Princess. The magician promises every thing that could gratify his infatuation; but requires as the price that he shall renounce his father; the Prince, though a faithful disciple, spurns the terms with indignation, and the father, having thus put his filial affection sufficiently to the test, leaves him with threats of vengeance. He accordingly strikes the side of the room with his magic wand, and the Princess Urania presents herself in the clouds with a celesttial globe revolving at her side. The Prince immediately supposes her to be an ethereal being, and pays his adoration to her as such. The magician retires, and she descends in a cloud, and addresses the Prince, who is filled with love, rapture, and astonishment; she renews the proposal of the magician to the Prince, to renounce his father as the price of her love; but his filial duty still remains unshaken—she then leaves him, with an assurance that she will put his affection to some other test. He is accordingly arrested by the officers of the inquisition, upon a charge of holding converse with evil spirits, particularly one of the name of Urania.—The Princess having changed her dress, presents herself in a veil, and proposes, as the price of his liberty, that he shall renounce the spirit with whom he is in love; he swears he will not; though Urania were no spirit, but a corporeal being like himself. The Princess then throws aside her veil; he recognises his Urania, and feels his love as ardent as when he thought her an ethereal essence.—She gives him her hand, and to complete his happiness, the Armenian con-juror throws off his disguise, and reveals that father who had received such proofs of filial affection.—Such is the substance of this little piece, which in a moral view is very instructive, and full of the purest precepts. The plot is extremely well managed, and the interest preserved to the last moment; for though of the simplest texture, the denouement is kept farther from anticipation than in many pieces of the greatest complexity.

These two qualities would suffice for a refutation of that common-place apology for imbecility, adopted by those who assert that neither plot nor interest are necessary in a piece of this kind, which is legitimately nothing more than “a vehicle for the music,” no matter how incongruous may be the scenes, or unconnected the incidents. These, however, are not its only merits—it has still greater claims to superiority in its machinery and embellishments, which are original, poetical, and characteristic. That the prince should think he was discoursing with a celestial being, in the person of Urania, may be considered an improbable incident, but nobody who saw Miss De Camp will think it so extravagant as the most specious of Don Quixote's delusions. The doctrine of the loves of the plants, and other visionary systems, are also naturally introduced in the sentiment, and happily ridiculed. Among the latter, paper credit is slightly alluded to. The phrase, that a bank note is only a “visionary credit,” was particularly noticed, and drew down three distinct plaudits. Of the poetry we have subjoined a specimen. The first song by Jaqueline, is very pretty, and received an encore.

The piece is the production of the hon. Mr.
Spencer; the music is composed by the author's brother and Mr. Kelly. The song to which we have alluded, and the finale, which are both beautiful, are the composition of the latter gentleman.
The piece went off with great éclat, and was announced with applause for future representation.

SONG.—URANIA.

Sung behind the scenes.

The star-beam of thy natal hour,
Ascendant guides thy way,
A spell beyond the wizard's power,
My charmed steps obey!

If no false light thy search allures
The talisman to miss,
This visionary day ensures
An age of future bliss!

SONG.—JAQUELINEA.

(Composed by MR. KELLY.)

Nature with swiftness arm'd the horse,
She gave the royal lion force,
His destined prey to seize on:
To guide the swiftness of the horse,
To tame the royal lion's force,
She gifted man with reason!

Poor woman! what
Was then our lot?
Submission, truth, and duty—
Our gifts were small,
To balance all
Some god invented beauty.

For empire reason make a stand,
But long has beauty's conquering hand
In due subjection kept her;
To rule the world let reason boast,
She only fills a viceroy's post,
'Tis beauty holds the sceptre!

LONDON FEMALE FASHIONS, MAY 22.

Silver nets for the head are coming into vogue; white and gold have an elegant effect. Diamond crescents, in a turban a-la-Turc are much admired; they are emblematical of the chastity of the fair wearers. The hair worn off one eye-brow, a-la-Recamier, seems to obtain some partisans. For full dress robes of white Persian, covered with silver nets, sleeves a-la-Minerva, fastened up with diamond loops, a silver gauze petticoat, festooned up on one side; and a few dashing belles seem to sport beneath, trowsers of white satin or silver muslin, the edges fringed with silver, appearing below the petticoat.

Shoes for full-dress are sometimes discarded, and a superb sandal, in the style of the ancients, laced up with silver or variegated cords, are often substituted.

For walking a new species of hat will be adopted, consisting of straw, large, turned up at each side, the crown rather long, and to be worn without ribbon or any ornament: They are very becoming.

White Persian short pelices, trimmed with broad white lace, are extremely elegant; some prefer lilac or buff.

Lace is generally worn, it is introduced into all parts of the dress; the petticoats, pocket-holes, sleeves, scarfs, and even the parasols, are trimmed with it. The prevailing colours are lilac, pale pink, and straw.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We recommend "Juvenis" to the Aurora-Office. His poetry is sufficiently tuneful for the columns of that paper. Pope says "may every Bavius have his Bufo still," and nothing is so dull, but what the dull readers of that dull paper can applaud.

Happy the soil, where bards, like mushrooms, rise,
And ask no culture, but what Dysis supplies;
Happier the bards, who, write whatever they will,
Find gentle readers to admire them still.

Our political weapons of warfare are brightening. We shall shortly recommence the combat with the champions of democracy. Neither weariness, nor timidity has checked the Editor for a moment from expressing his sentiments with perfect freedom, concerning the politics of his country. He is not of a temper to surrender up even a prejudice, at the beckon of popularity. The cause of his temporary silence was a persuasion, that at a late juncture, the most energetic exertion would be worse than fruitless. But in a forest of the deepest shade, a dauntless wayfarer does not repose that he may be run over by all the vermin of the wood, but that he may recover strength to tempt new paths, to pierce through the thickets, and regain the day.

S, we hope, will reflect on the following lines from the favorite GIFFORD.

O thou, that deign'st my letter'd cares to share,
Thou know'st when chance, tho' this indeed be rare,
With random gleams of wit has grac'd my lays,
Thou know'st too well how I have relish'd praise.
Not mine the soul, that pants not after fame....
Ambitious of a poet's envied name,
I haunt the sacred fount, athirst to prove,
The grateful influence of the stream I love.

Say, wilt thou from thy duties pause awhile,
To view my humble labours with a smile?
THOU WILT: for still 'tis thy delight to praise,
And still thy fond applause has crown'd my lays.

"ASMODEO" on any subject, discussed in whatever style is sure to have applauding readers. We shall shortly tempt his charming Muse with new themes.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

Moliere, it is often observed, used to read his comedies to an old woman, who had no advantages of education, that he might judge, by the manner in which she was affected, how his wit and humour would be received by the public. It is believed that clergymen might read their sermons to some aged matron, or the parish clerk, and derive equal advantage from observing the effects, which they should produce.

It is not easy to spread a passion for servitude among the people, but in all evils of the opposite kind our natural inclinations are flattered. In the case of despotism, there is the fædum crimen servitutis; in the last, the falsa species libertatis; and accordingly, as the historian says promis auribus accipitur.

Mr. Burke once said he would abandon his best friends, and join with his worst enemies, to oppose either the means or the end of democracy; and to resist all violent exertions of the spirit of innovation, so distant from all principles of true and safe reformation; a spirit well calculated to overturn states, but perfectly unfit to amend them.

It has been the desperate scheme of some political projectors to raise soldiers against their officers; servants against their masters; tradesmen against their customers; artificers against their employers; tenants against their landlords; and children against their parents. Such a scheme as this is not an enemy to servitude, but to society.

Instead of lying as dead in a sort of trance, or exposed, as in an epileptic fit, to the pity or the derision of the world, for wild, ridiculous, convulsive movements, impotent to every purpose but that of dashing out her brains against the pavement, America should rise, and redeem herself from plebeian slavery.

My lord BACON, who was at least as wise as John Hancock, or the marquis de la Fayette, tells us, that what is settled by custom, though it be not good, yet at least it is fit, and those things, which have long gone together, are as it were, confederate within themselves; whereas, new things piece not well, for though they help, by their utility, yet they trouble by their inconformity. It were good, therefore, that men in their innovations would follow the example of time itself, which, indeed innovate h greatly, but quietly, and by degrees scarcely to be perceived; for otherwise whatsoever is new is unlooked for, and though it mends some, it impairs others....He, that is holpen, takes it for a fortune, and thanks the time; and he that is hurt, for a wrong, and imputeth it to the author. It is good not to try experiments in states, except the necessity be urgent, or the utility evident, and well to beware that it be the reformation that draweth on the change, and not the desire of change that pretendeth the reformation; and, lastly, that the novelty, though it be not rejected, yet be held for a suspect; and, as the scripture saith, "That we make a stand upon the ANCIENT WAY," and then look about us and discover what is the straight and right way, and so to walk in it.

A new comedy, entitled "Fashionable Friends," and supposed to be the production of a man of rank, has attracted the attention of the London critics. The play has not been universally admired, but the following song merits a rescue from oblivion.

SONG,

Composed by Mr. Kelly, and sung by Mrs. Jordan, in the comedy of Fashionable Friends.

In the rough blast heaves the billow,
In the light air waves the willow;
Ev'ry thing of moving kind
Varies with the veering wind;
What have I to do with thee,
Dull, unjoyous Constancy?

Sombre tale and satire witty,
Sprightly glee and doleful ditty;
Measure d sighs and roundelay,
Welcome all, but do not stay;
For what have I to do with thee,
Dull, unjoyous Constancy?

Lieutenant Colonel Tarlton has left on record in the history of his campaigns in America, the following instance of the martial prowess of a militia president. "As soon as one hundred cavalry had passed the water, Lieutenant Colonel Tarlton directed them to charge into the town, to continue the confusion of the Americans, and to apprehend, if possible, the governor and assembly. Seven members of Assembly were secured; a Brigadier General Scott, and several officers and men, were killed, wounded, or taken. The attempt to secure Mr. Jefferson, [the governor] was ineffectual: he discovered the British dragoons from his house, which stands on the point of a mountain, before they could approach him, and he provided for his personal liberty by a precipitate retreat." (P. 297.)

Bonaparte, says the Centinel, is now exhibiting one of the most brilliant displays of his penetration and policy....By act of oblivion, he is inviting into France all the ex-nobles, clergy, men of science, virtue and wealth, who emigrated during the reign of jacobinism and vandalism: and at the same time is transporting to Louisiana and Madagascar all the democratic insurgents in his dominions. The first consul well knows, that the former will support every well administered government; and that the latter are fit subjects for no other governments.

CROMWELL, after playing the game of republicanism, and cheating the deluded people, exercised all the powers of an absolute prince. In England, however, the delusion of democracy did not continue long, and the people themselves indignantly threw open the national doors to receive their lawful sovereign, and their "very noble and approved good" government.

It is reported, says a London paper, that Mr. WINDHAM will relinquish Norwich, and offer himself for the University of Oxford, in the room of Sir W. Dolben.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL.

SIR,

[I have often thought that the adoption of some of the figural ballad measures in translations or imitations of Anacreon, would be an improvement upon the usual mode of transcribing the beauties of that lively old bon vivant, into our language. The frequent recurrence of lines of eight syllables tires by repetition, and indeed, as it is generally managed, is too solemn for the purpose. The line of seven syllables, appears to me much more lively, and better adapted to the Anacreontic. Perhaps one of the happiest translations of Anacreon occurs in Cunningham, beginning,

Why did I with love engage, &c.

and continued through the piece in the pure, seven syllable line. Every one will allow that the manner, the manner and the measure of Anacreon, all point out to the judicious translator the necessity of a light, airy and delicate versification. This is abundantly supplied in our numerous and beautiful lyric measures exquisitely suited to amatory and Læchanallian subjects. I have ventured to send you two specimens of the manner which I have thus endeavoured to recommend. I doubt whether the execution is equal to the design. In my next I intend to give you some observations on the translations of Anacreon, by Fawkes and Addison. Moore's translation which you mention in your Port Folio, I have seen nothing of, excepting the ode inserted in your 30th No. It is a beautiful composition, but in my humble opinion too heavy for an Anacreontic. Jenyns's translation or rather imitation of the same ode, though disgraced with some lowness of expression, appears to be much more in the manner of the merry old Greek. If I am ever remiss in my correspondence with you, I beg you to attribute it to its true cause. I have a business to attend to, and we must take care of the roast beef and plumb pudding, whatever is the fate of the epic poem or the Pindaric ode. With the sincerest respect I remain

Yours

ANACREON, ODE 4.

IMITATED.

Upon a soft carpet of latus outspread,
When myrtles their branches entwine,
I'll lean mid the richest of fragrance my head,
And quaff the pure juice of the vine.

Gay Cupid shall hand me the bumper of joy,
Which sparkles so sweet in my eye;
No tincture of sorrow my bliss shall annoy,
Nor clog the swift hours as they fly:

Ah! swift as the chariot, whose speed in the race,
The laurel of conquest obtains,
So flies winged time over life's destin'd space,
And moulders to dust our remains.

Then alas! what avails it to deck the dull tomb,
Or pour vain libations of wine?
Can garlands, can wines, can the richest perfume
Make the grave it's cold captives resign?

While life is allow'd me those sweets I'll employ,
Which some for their funeral prepare;
Haste! bring me the bumper full brimming with joy,
And call me the mirth loving fair.

For ere I'm compell'd to the regions below,
To dance with gay ghosts in the grove,
'Tis my purpose on earth every pleasure to know,
Of charming Lydus and love.

ANACREON, ODE 28.

IMITATED.

Peerless painter, take thy pallet.
Snatch the rainbow's richest hue;
Lo! a nymph demands thy pencil,
Brighter never artist drew.

But alas! shouldst thou behold her,
Rob'd in youthful beauty's pride,
Thou wouldst gaze:....Thy trembling fingers
Could no more the pencil guide.

Listen then while my endeavours
Sketch the fair one's every charm,
Let their undiminish'd lustre
All the kindling canvas warm.

First her shining jetty ringlets....
Here exert the nicest care,
Let them if thine art can reach it,
Fill with od'rous sweets the air.

Spotless as the polished ivory
Her smooth forehead next pourtray
Down to where the dusky eyebrows
Their contrasting shades display.

'Neath the nearly meeting arches
Let two sparkling orbs be seen,
Give them love's bewitching languish,
Give them wisdom's placid mien.

On her cheek let blooming roses
Mingle with the lily's white,
And her lips of rich persuasion
To the rapturous kiss invite.

Fluttering round on purple pinions,
Loves and graces hover near,
When her chin's expressive dimple,
And her snowy neck appear.

Swelling to the touch of rapture,
Bursting on the ravish'd sight,
Paint the beauties of her bosom,
Living throne of dear delight!

Let a robe of richest purple,
Half conceal the lovely whole....
Lo! she lives....her gentle accents,
Soon shall vibrate on my soul.

THE SEASONS OF LOVE.

When Spring's blooming flowrets enamel the vale,
Just peeping as fearful their charms to display,
If the cold breathing frost should their beauties assail,
Or the thick rising vapour obscure the young day;

Behold how they shrink, how they fold from the blast,
How soon the short season of verdure is o'er,
While the lovers of nature survey the wild waste,
And with deep hearing sighs the din ravage deplore.

Thus when the first whispers of love in the breast
With timid and trembling emotions we hear,
By one killing frown are our wishes suppress,
For the soft spring of love is like that of the year.

When Summer's full glories abundantly rise,
And luxuriantly round us their fragrance bestow,
When nought but serenity smiles thro' the skies,
And nothing but extasy greets us below;

How bright is the season of hope and of joy;
No longer the frosts of fell winter we dread,
Our thoughts the fair visions of fancy employ,
And care on the wings of the vapour is fled;

Thus beauty consenting can soften the heart,
The dull can enliven, the timid can cheer,
To all the most pleasing sensations impart,
For the summer of love is like that of the year.

When Autumn's ripe fruits bend the thick laden boughs,
And her treasures profusely are scattered around,

When every warm bosom with rapture o'erflows,
And loud songs of joy thro' the vallies resound.

How sweet o'er the meads or the woodlands to stray,

At moon-silver'd eve or the red peep of morn,
Pomona's extensive domains to survey,
Or the wide waving fields yellowed over with corn;

Thus pleasure still crowns soft affection's retreat,
Contentment and every mild virtue are there,
While life's sweet endearments in unison meet,
For the autumn of love is like that of the year.

When Winter but thou shalt not ruffle my
song,

Thy storms and thy tempests are nothing to me,
To the lyre of gay Venus blythe numbers belong,
The laureat of love has no business with thee.

Tho' short my experience of hymen's blest reign,
Yet still will I own his beneficent power,
Nor shall the chill Winter of age ever chain,
The numbers that hail my bright nuptial hour.

Still, still I'll confess in the joy-breathing lay,
That with him smiling peace and soft pleasure appear

And, whatever the rake may licentiously say,
No winter has love to his bountiful year.

SELECTED POETRY.

[Mr. MAURICE, who treads closely in the footsteps of Sir William Jones, delights in the poetry of the Earl. He has rendered the following in a manner, which his learned predecessor would not blush to acknowledge.]

ODE TO THE MOON....BY AN ARABIAN LOVER.

[Addressed to Stella.]

Cynthia, fair regent of yon azure space,
Seize the bright reins, and chase the lingering gloom;

Darkling I haste to Stella's lov'd embrace,
Whose lips are roses and whose breath perfumes.

As through the boundless wilderness I rove,
Beneath this robe no murd'rous falchion gleams,
To stain with blood this unpolluted grove,
And blot the brightness of thy virgin beams.

Ah no! where dwells thy influence, mighty love,
No savage thoughts, like these, the breast invade,

Thou canst to pity the wild Arab move,
And wrest from his fierce grasp the uplifted blade.

This bosom beats not with impure alarms,
But burns with fires, as bright, as chaste as thine;

I pant to fold her in my bridal arms,
Loose her light vest and call perfection mine.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

IN AMERICA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BULOW.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE RESULT.

The result of these inquiries, therefore, is, that the Americans are exactly the production of their origin, of their country, and of the circumstances in which they have been placed; that they are neither regenerated, nor yet that simple, innocent, virtuous, republican people, for which they have, in Europe, been taken; and that they may be most truly represented, by comparing them to a young man, unnerved and corrupted by sensual luxury, who has brought upon himself a premature old age, and to whom no palliatives, nothing but medicines, radically effective, can restore fresh vital powers to enter, renovated, upon a new career, and under a better order of things....I now proceed to the second part of my work.

PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER I.

THE LAND....THE CLIMATE.

Air, water, and earth, are the general elements, by which, and through which, all things, in their endless variety, exist. Air is an active, water a mediate, and earth a passive power. We shall first make the air of North-America, the object of our consideration. Several learned men have maintained that America is the coldest quarter of the earth. But America seems not to be so cold as the north-easterly half of Asia. Siberia and Tartary, according to all accounts, are, under the same latitudes, colder than North-America. In the eastern parts of Asia, no corn grows, so low as the 41st degree, which in America, may be found, as low as the 48th. Thus much, however, is ascertained, that America is incomparably colder than Europe, and the western part of Asia, under the same degrees of northern latitude. The difference has been estimated at 10, at 12, and at 14 degrees, by persons who did not consider, that the American climate, on account of its peculiarities, does under no one parallel, exactly correspond with that of the old world, in any other.

Various causes have been assigned for this superior degree of cold. It has always been imputed to the cold northwesterly winds; and that of those winds, to the continued extent of the continent to the north pole, whereas the ancient hemisphere is at the northward surrounded by water. So says Doctor Schöpf and others. Captain Carver, supposes the north-west wind, to come first from the southwest, and then to blow against the stream of the Mississippi; he then drives it over the great Canadian lakes, towards the northwest, and to the southeast, following the course of the rivers. His theory is, that the direction of the winds is fixed by the rivers; but he should have proved, that the winds always follow, or blow opposite to the course of the rivers; according to his system, only one of the two suppositions can be true. He should not have assumed alternately, the one and the other, accordingly as he thought them convenient, for the explanation of certain phenomena. Imlay says, the air is in winter, warmer over water, than over land covered with woods, and that the colder heavier stream of air, by means of its elasticity removes to where the warmth has made the air lighter by attenuation. And this seems in fact pretty well adapted to the nature of things. An Englishman endeavours to explain the greater cold, by the proportionate smallness of the new hemisphere, and because it is surrounded by the sea. Islands, says he, are always colder than continents. We have seen just above, that the cold was derived from the extension of the continent towards the north. These theories are contradictory. Others look for the cold, to the great Canadian lakes; others to the great quantities of fresh water generally; others to the Allegany mountains. The account which appears to me the most probable of all, is that of an American, by the name of Williams I believe, published in an English Magazine.

He says this....The gulf stream on the north American coast, comes from the gulf of Mexico, where the air, and consequently the water, is at all seasons of the year considerably warm. This warm sea water, flows along, close to the American eastern coast, and parallel with it, towards the north-east. The air, over this warm stream of sea water, must in winter be considerably warmer, and of course thinner and lighter than that which hangs over a large country covered with wood. This colder, and of course heavier air, owing to the constant propensity towards an equilibrium, blows to the south-east, towards the sea. And as towards the north-west, the air must always be colder, being in a higher latitude, hence arises a general pressure, and draught of the atmosphere from north-west, to south-east. Hence, the cold north-west winds, which at least in the middle and southern United States, are the sole causes of snow and ice.

But proceeds this author, the sun's beams are reflected only by flat surfaces, and from this reflection of the sun beams, proceeds warmth. Now, the more a land is cleared of wood, and cultivated, the more level, and mirror-like will be its surface; and of course, the more will the ground be heated; consequently cultivation must entirely change the climate of North-America, and make it warmer. The cultivation has indeed already produced a considerable alteration. Ships, which during winter, were formerly kept for weeks together away from the coast, by north-west winds, are now detained for scarcely so many days.

This appears to me the best account, that has hitherto been given, to explain the American climate. If cultivation has produced so many great changes of climate in Europe, the same effects may be expected in America. It was in fact, in the days of Tacitus, as cold in Germany, as it is at present in the northern part of Sweden; and Germany has been removed by cultivation, at least ten degrees to the southward. That Horace speaks of ice and snow in Rome, is well known; nothing of the kind is now seen there. In the time of Dioclesian, I think it was, the Adriatic sea, was mostly covered with ice. What an astonishing alteration has the European climate undergone since that period! What a melancholy picture has Ovid given us of the shores of the Black-sea! How soft and charming is the climate of the same place at present! If cultivation then, can so much improve a climate, why were any other causes of the severer cold of America sought for, than the extensive forests which cover the ground? The circumstance, that in the time of Horace, the olive-tree flourished in the southern part of Italy, seems indeed to cast a doubt upon this great alteration in the climate of Europe; but without taking into the account, the volcanic heat of the earth, in the south of Italy, which may perhaps qualify it for the production of tender plants, by making the air warmer than it would otherwise have been, it is by no means ascertained, that the olive tree would not thrive very well in the two Carolinas; especially as even to the northward of Charleston, the orange-tree grows, though to be sure, it often freezes too. We are, therefore, authorised to expect from the general cultivation of North-America, the same effects upon the temperature of the air, as have been produced by it in Europe; and the climate of North-America, with respect to its temperature, is constituted exactly, as a country covered with wood naturally must be, so that there seems to be no reason to wonder at it, or to rack one's brain about pre-supposed unknown causes of this phenomenon which is susceptible of so simple an explanation.

It is clear that when trees cover the ground, the rays of the sun cannot reach, and of course cannot warm it. The vapours from this cold ground must chill the air, and even after the trees are cleared away, the plough must break up, several times, the bosom of the soil before it can be thoroughly warmed. Consequently the improvement of the climate cannot be perceptible until after a series of years, and even until the woods are wholly cleared away.

POLITICS.

POLITICAL SATIRE.

[The New-York Evening Post is so liberally filled with the essays of the politician, and the advertisements of the merchant, that much room cannot always be found for the gay and humorous cast of writing. The following will be admired, and the Editor is more solicitous to preserve it, because he had thought Dr. Arbuthnot's "Art of Political Lying" had superseded every thing else on the subject. The author of the subsequent letter need not shrink from a comparison.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING POST.

SIR,

Your exertions in defence of the cause you espouse are laudable in the execution as well as the design, and I hope they will be successful: Your hostility to the enemies of the constitution is spirited; but there may be too much even of a good thing; or in other words, "too much of one thing is good for nothing." I praise you so far because I am a patriot; but I am angry with you as I am a friend to the arts. A notable editor generously invites you to add to your editorial code an art (taken no doubt from the "ARTS ET METIÈRES" in French) which he professes that he and his associates have practised, with some success and great credit. But you decline the invitation for no other reason, that I can see, but because it comes from an enemy of the constitution—"Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes." "You are one of those," as Jago says, "who will not serve God if the Devil bids you."—Therein, sir, you are wrong; as I will demonstrate.

The ingenious gentleman to whom I allude, tells you that you have yet to learn many of the arts of an able Editor; so far you have no cause to blush, for to my certain knowledge, nine in ten of the editors every where are in the same predicament. But then to put out of doubt what the art is, to which he particularly alludes, he adds to his precept a practical trope taken from the rhetoric of the Aurora. In short, he tells you plainly that you are deficient in the art of mendacity—vulgarly called lying. Your best friends are compelled to admit the charge: but you are not too old, or too obstinate to improve. Are you aware how much may be said in defence, and even in praise of lying?.... For its moral innocence, nay, for its moral excellence we have high authority....no less than that of the greatest moralist, philosopher, and orator, of antiquity; Cicero in his oration for an eminent liar of his day, called Quintus Ligarius, justifies it, and even goes so far as to say, "Semper honestum est pro salute mendacium."—Which may be thus translated—"It is always right to tell a lie when it answers your purpose." This liberty of speech the christian religion invaded, it is true; but what of that!—In the new code which has supplanted christianity, there is not so much as one letter of an ordinance unfavourable to lying. So that while the old heathenism and the new, are in its favour, its only interdictor, christianity, is gone to sleep.

Of innumerable instances of the utility of lying my limits will allow me to mention but a few: Troy, that old city, was laid in ashes: How? By a lie. A pauper, whose whole ways and means consisted in the art of lying—a Lazar, a foreigner, named Sinon, took refuge there, was protected, and betrayed it by a lie. If that meritorious beggar had not told that lie, that old city, might at this day be in existence; a downright insult to the rights of man, as all old establishments must be. To come nearer to our own times—Was not the celebrity of the Brussels Gazette built upon its prolific power in the fabrication of lies?—Do not we know that the French monarchy gained more victories by that one art, in that one paper, than by all its fleets and armies put together? Here let me ask you, sir, what should prevent us from availing ourselves of the succedaneous aid of a few Gazettes on the super-Brussalite principles laid down by the citizen, in lieu of the expensive armies and navies which our frugal president has disbanded, to his own great popularity, and the safety of—our purses? During the French revolution, the art did immense service to the sway of its successive rulers. A lie by implication respecting British affairs in Egypt made no small ingredient in the preliminary articles of the treaty at Paris. And surely I need not add, that if it were not for lying, the people of America would not to this day have thought of the financial skill of Mons. Gallatin, or of the wisdom and spirit of Mr. Jefferson.

Independent of the moral excellence and practical utility of the art of lying, it is recommended by the theory and practice of the laws of which it forms a constituent part. The best laws in Europe, I mean those of England, exhibit demonstrative evidence that it has been found incompetent to the greatest legislative wisdom to get at justice but through the medium of a falsehood. A fiction as Brutus calls it, or in plain language, a lie, is the ground-work of some actions at law. An action in ejectment, for instance, is a figned action.

For many others, let John Doe and Richard Roe be pledges for the truth of my assertion.

There is moreover a consideration of no little though I confess of inferior importance to those I have enumerated. I mean the improvement which eloquence, and particularly newspaper eloquence derives from a happy knack in the art of lying. What are all rhetorical figures but lies? hyperbole being what they call a thumper. What is invention but facility in making lies? What is poetry but the science of systematic lying—of couching falsehoods in fascinating sweet words?—Homer now, whose character after the lapse of many centuries blazes with increased lustre; what created that character?—Why only his being the most ingenious liar under heaven. Virgil, though allowed to be the more sweet, elegant, and correct of the two, is held to be inferior, even by the pious Fenelon, only because he was but a mere nincompoop at lying compared with Homer.

If you should be obstinate in your rejection of the art of lying, upon the proud, churlish consideration that your cause does not want such aid; and if, in contradiction to the advice of the kind Citizen and myself, you will persevere in making your periods in prosaic, matter-of-fact course you have hitherto preserved; be not active against the art; but take the matter up as a question of feeling—Virgil considers the art of lying to be an adjunct to misery—He says

—si miserum Fortuna Sinonem,
Finxit, vanum etiam mendacemque improba fingit.

Which my schoolmaster has translated into American, thus,

A fugitive, bereft of pence,
In lying finds his best defence.

I apprehend, sir, you have not dipped deep enough in the book of fortune, to acquire a taste for lying from those motives. Yet you ought, like many others, to take for granted that which you have not read, upon the ipse dixit of him that has. With such men 'tis true, you can have no sympathy; but there is principle which stands in the place of sympathy—exercise it in this—recollect that the art, to a share of which those gentlemen so generously invite you is their all—their whole stock in trade, and that if you take that from them you "not enrich yourself, but make them poor indeed"—recollect the exclamation of poor fat Jack Falstaff when robbing the carriers.

"Young men must live."

And let them live. Do not like the dog in the manger surlily bark them away from that which, though to you bitter as Coloquintida, to them is food. Consider that nothing dejects a trader so much as the interruption of his profits—and that by injuring them in unadvised haste, you may stop their career before they have accomplished the great purpose for which they seem to be designed. Cease therefore to interrupt them—let them proceed—and I will stake my life upon it, that, in a few months the arts of an able Editor, which they have so prosperously practised and so generously invited you to share in, will be clearly understood by every man in America, who is not shut out from the truth by a corrupt heart or a muddy understanding. Join me then in exhorting them to proceed, and in the words of an antiquated epigram vamped up for the occasion, say,

Lie on Duane, lie on for pay,
And Cheatham thou lie too,
More against truth you cannot say:
Than truth can say 'gainst you.

If you are immovable, others are not. So pray give this a place in your paper, pro bono publico, and you will find me a friend to

THE ARTS OF AN ABLE EDITOR.

MISCELLANY.

(From the Loiterer.)

PEREUNT ET IMPUTANTUR.

As I was going the other morning to Dr. Hornsby's lectures I saw an acquaintance of mine lounging against the college-gate, and gazing about with that vacant look, which generally indicates that a man does not know what to do with himself. I therefore offered to take him with me, and added by way of inducement, that the lecture was remarkably entertaining. He thanked me for my good intention, said he should like it above all things, but that at present he was very busy, and really had not time. I was, I confess, rather surprised at this answer, considering the character of the speaker, but I said nothing, for every man is the best judge of his own concerns....My astonishment, however, was not a little increased, when on returning about two hours afterwards, I saw the very same person in the very same place, and nearly in the same attitude; and where, I found on inquiring, he had remained ever since I left him. I was at first a little inclined to laugh at my friend's method of making the most of his time, but when I came to set down, and think the matter over coolly, I found, or fancied I found, so many instances of the same conduct, amongst those whom age and experience might have better taught the value of days and hours, that his folly was lost amidst the follies of a thousand others, and his behaviour no longer appeared extraordinary, because no longer singular....There is most certainly no apology, for not doing what we do not choose to do, so often made use of by one half of the world, or so readily admitted by the other, as this very complaint of want of time.... And yet, perhaps, none was ever more void of foundation.

That there are indeed certain descriptions of people in the world, who find their time more than equal to the necessary duties of their station in life, cannot be denied; but it unfortunately happens that from these quarters we hear no complaints of this kind, and that they who are ever loudest on the subject of time, usually make the least use of it....Thus for example, I will readily allow that foreign ambassadors and their secretaries, compilers of newspapers and their runners, ministers to great monarchs, and waiting-maids to great beauties; nay, and even great beauties themselves, have always business enough to employ both their heads, hands, and time, and may occasionally find all three insufficient for their purpose. But how an honest English country gentleman, or a young member of this university (who are exempted from the troublesome duties which attend the above mentioned ranks) can with any degree of reason complain that their time is not sufficient for any thing they have to do, I own I am at a loss to guess.

But what makes the matter more extraordinary, is the extremely irregular and inconsistent effect which the want of time has on their actions, and how very different it operates at different periods—I perfectly remember a country squire, who, though seldom in bed at day-light, and who, in the space of thirty years was not once known to be too late at the finding a fox; was yet always so hurried on Sunday morning, that he never, poor man! could find time to go to church; and I have been told that there are to be found young men in Oxford, who are just in the same predicament. For all such reasons I am decidedly of opinion, that so far from not having time enough, our greatest misfortune in this world is the having too much, that our business is to make it as short as we can, and that he who does this best—best answers the end of his creation. Nor let this assertion, if a little bold, be deemed rash; since I have the opinion of a very clever man, and the practice of half the world in my favour.—For if mankind do not think of time as I do, why are many amusements so eagerly pursued which have little besides the destroying it to recommend them?—And if Mr. Soame Jennings was not of the same opinion, why should he have taken so much pains in his celebrated Disquisition, to prove that there is no such thing as time at all? Could he have made good this assertion, great would have been the happiness of mankind, and proportionably great their eputation of an author.—But, alas! Mr. Jennings's arguments are more ingenious than solid, and rather plausible than convincing; and many of my unhappy countrymen still find to their cost, that time is no imaginary foe, but a real enemy, whom it requires all their invention, and all their perseverance to get the better of.—It has been observed, however, that human industry and human invention redouble their efforts, and act with increased powers in proportion to the difficulties which are thrown in their way:—and we accordingly find that they, whose situation most expose them to that sort of ennui, which arises from having more time than employment, have ever been remarkable for a greater variety of those resources, which are properly enough said to kill time.—Hence the ingenious devices which have been practised by those hapless beings whom a grand monarch, in his paternal goodness, thinks proper to furnish with a chambre garni in some solitary dungeon, and support at his own royal expense with bread and water.—Hence too, the scarce less ingenious inventions, those time-destroying amusements, which are so much in use among those warlike youths, whom a sense of honour, and thirst of military glory, impels to carry a pair of colours from one market town to another, for the good of their country. But whatever can be said in favour of any of the above-mentioned personages, and their inventions, I am of opinion they all fall exceedingly short of some of the members of the University, who are greatly their superiors in the art of killing time. And that my partiality may not here be supposed to have got the better of my judgment, I shall bring an instance or two to prove that the pre-eminence I contend for, is founded on real precedents, and supported by historic facts.

Every one is doubtless acquainted with the fray which happened in the reign of Richard the Second, between the Pope's legate and some Oxford men. I do not mean to enter into the particulars of the story (which for obvious reasons is better forgot than remembered) but shall only observe that the row (and a fine row it certainly was) took its rise from a number of scholars who were lounging in the legate's kitchen, and looking on whilst his holiness's dinner was preparing. This, though rather an extraordinary amusement, shews that lounging was at least as fashionable in the fourteenth as in the eighteenth century. But the next proof I shall bring is still more weighty and convincing, as it is drawn from no less respectable authority than the Statute Book of the University. For if there was not an innate love of lounging in all Oxford men, why should a law have been enacted forbidding them, under very severe penalties, to loiter away their time in sitting on Pennyless Bench? which (as some of my readers may not be acquainted with Oxford) it is necessary to say stood exactly opposite to the city conduit, on each side of which the butchers' shambles appeared in beautiful perspective, and must consequently have been a comfortable situation.—To trace the various modes of killing time down to the present day, would open a field much too large for the compass of my paper. The History of Ancient Lounging would be a work nearly as voluminous as the History of Ancient Poetry. I shall therefore only observe, that as we have not yet degenerated from our predecessors, so we have every reason to hope that our posterity will act up to the example set them by their fathers, and that the art of killing time will continue to be practised till time itself be no more! And to convince the world I am not too sanguine in my expectations, I shall close this number with a weekly journal of a modern Oxford man, which, though I do not vouch for its being genuine, is as much so as many of those found in the works of my ingenious ancestors, Mr. Isaac Bickerstaff, or the man with the short face.

DIARY OF A MODERN OXFORD MAN.

Sunday.

Waked by eight o'clock by the scout, to tell me the bell was going for prayers....wonder those scoundrels are suffered to make such a noise....tried to get to sleep again, but could not....sat up and read Hoyle in bed....ten, got up and breakfasted....Charles Racket called to ask me to ride....agreed to stay till the president was gone to church....half after eleven, rode out, going down the High-street saw Will Sagely going to St. Mary's....can't think what people go to church for....Twelve to two, rode round Bullington-green, met Careless and a new freshman of Trinity....engaged them to dine with me....two to three, lounged at the stable, made the freshman ride over the bail, talked to him about horses: see he knows nothing about the matter....went home and dressed....three to eight, dinner and wine....remarkable pleasant evening....sold Racket's blind horse for him to Careless's friend for fifty guineas....certainly break his neck....eight to ten, coffee-house, and lounged in the High-street....Stranger went home to study; am afraid he's a bad one....engaged to hunt tomorrow and dine with Racket....twelve, supped and went to bed early, in order to get up tomorrow.

Monday.

Racket rowed me up at seven o'clock....sleepy and queer, but forced to get up to make breakfast for him....eight to five in the afternoon, hunting....famous run, and killed near Bicester....number of tumbles....freshman out on Racket's blind horse....got the devil of a fall into a ditch....horse upon him....but don't know whether he was killed or not....Five, dressed and went to dine with Racket....Dean had crossed his name, and no dinner could be got....went to the Angel and dined....famous evening till eleven, when the proctors came and told us to go home to our colleges....went directly the contrary way....eleven to one, went down into St. Thomas's and fought a ruff....one, dragged home by somebody, the Lord knows whom, and put to bed.

Tuesday.

Very bruised and sore, did not get up till twelve....found an imposition on my table....meant to give it the hair-dresser....drank six dishes of tea....did not know what to do with myself, so wrote to my father for money....Half after one, put on my boots to ride for an hour....met Careless at the stable....rode together....asked me to dine with him and meet Jack Sedley, who is just returned from France....two to three, returned home and dressed....four to seven, dinner and wine....Jack very pleasant....told some good stories....says the French women have thick legs....no hunting to be got, and very little wine....won't go there in a hurry....seven, went to the stable and then looked in at the coffee-house....very few drunken men, and nothing going forwards....agreed to play Sedley at billiards....Walker's table engaged, and forced to go to the Blue Posts....lost two guineas....thought I could have beat him, but the dog has been practising in France....ten, supper at Careless's....bought Sedley's mare for thirty guineas....thinks he knows nothing of a horse, and believe I have done him....Drank a little punch, and went to bed at twelve.

Wednesday.

Hunted with the duke of B....very long run, rode the new mare, found her sinking, so pulled up in time, and swore I had a shoe lost....to sell her directly....buy no more horses of Sedley....knows more than I thought he did....Four, returned home, and as I was dressing to dine with Sedley, received a note from some country neighbours of my father's to desire me to dine at the Cross....obliged to send an excuse to Sedley....wanted to put on my cap and gown;....cap broke and gown not to be found, forced to borrow....half after four to ten, at the Cross with my lions....very loving evening indeed....ten, found it too bad, so got up and told them it was against the rules of the University to be out later.

Thursday.

Breakfasted at the Cross, and walked all the morning about Oxford with my lions....terrible fit work....lions very troublesome....asked an hundred and fifty silly questions about every thing they saw....Wanted me to explain the Latin inscriptions on the monuments in Christ-church chapel!....Wanted to know how we spent our time!....forced to invent answers as well as I could....Four, forced to give them a dinner, and what was worse to sit with them till six, when I told them I was engaged for the rest of the evening, and sent them about their business....seven, dropped in at Careless's rooms, found him with a large party, all pretty much cut, thought it was a good time to sell him Sedley's mare, but he was not quite drunk enough....made a bet with him that I trotted my poney from Benson to Oxford within the hour....sure of winning, for I did it the other day in fifty minutes.

Friday.

Got up early and rode the poney a foot pace over to Benson to breakfast....Old Shrub breaks fast....told him of the bet, and shewed him the poney;....shook his head and looked cunning when he heard of it....good sign....after breakfast rode the race, and won easy, but could not get any money; forced to take Careless's draught; dare say 'tis not worth two-pence; great fool to bet with him....Twelve till three, lounged at the stable, and cut my black horse's tail....eat soup at Sadler's....walked down the High-street....met Racket, who wanted me to dine with him, but could not because I was engaged to Sagely....three, dinner at Sagely's....very bad....dined, in a cold hall, and could get nothing to eat....wine new....a bad fire....tea-kettle put on at five o'clock....played at whist for six-pences, and no bets....thought I should have gone to sleep....terrible work dining with a studious man....eleven, went to bed out of spirits.

Saturday.

Ten, breakfast—attempted to read the Loiterer, but it was too stupid; flung it down and took up Bardlet's Farriery—had not read two pages before a Dun came, told him I should have some money soon—would not be gone—offered him brandy—was sulky, would not have any—saw he was going to be savage, so kicked him down stairs to prevent his being impertinent.—Thought perhaps I might have more of them, so went to lounge at the stables—poney got a bad cough, and the black horse thrown out two splints; went back to my room in an ill humour—found a letter from my father, no money, and a great deal of advice—wants to know how my last quarter's allowance went—how the devil should I know?—he knows I keep no accounts—Do think fathers are the greatest Bores in nature.—Very low spirited and flat all the morning—some thoughts of reforming, but luckily Careless came in to beg me to meet our party at his rooms, so altered my mind, dined with him, and by nine in the evening was very happy.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

The papers have announced that a certain critic of Mr. GIBBON, and a grammarian who had the hardihood to oppose Bishop Lowth, and fairly kick the subjunctive mood down stairs, is about to publish a Dictionary of the American vulgar tongue. We deem it, therefore, our duty as good patriots, and as fond lovers of provincial idiom, and colloquial meanness, and, in short, of every thing, hostile to English sense, and English stile, to furnish this great lexicographer with all the barbarous words and phrases which we can procure. We add a short specimen of our vulgar vocabulary, fortified by numerous classical authorities. We hope, in process of time, to add to our collection, and every one who is laudably anxious to debase his diction; to degrade the language of literature, to the low level of vulgar life; and to deride the study and imitation of the ancients, will do well to profit by our labours.

1. The meaning of this beautiful expression when translated into English, is, he is very cheerful.

2. A very general substitute for disingenuous.

3. Gurned a corruption of grinned.

4. Rowen. I was sadly puzzled, when this strange word first entered my ear, in my boyhood, which was passed in New-England. I was told by the learned among the baymakers, that it signified the second crop, or cutting. I have hunted with many a "black letter dog" in a vain chase after this fantastic word, and verily believe that I was in pursuit of a phantom. The elegant scholar will find the legitimate word in the sixth chapter of Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield. "In the morning early, I called out my whole family to help at saving an after-growth of hay," &c.

5. On the side bill. This is what, in the schools, would be expressively termed the cart before the horse. An English author of some little reputation for learning and genius, says, in his tractate upon education, addressed to Samuel Hartlib, "we shall conduct you to a bill side," &c. But what is the name of MILTON opposed to American authority?

6. I snore. Of profaner exclamations this is a pious substitute, by the "swains, an I meaner sort of folk" in New-England, who are afraid to adventure on a bolder wing of expletive. I snore is less flagitious, than I swear; and farther, when you hear a yanke, with his eyes open, aver that he swears, it may serve to give you an idea of our invention, wit, and humour.

7. Truck trade. This is nothing more than barter.

8. Dickering. Both the splendour and sense of this fascinating word claim more than a transient memorial. In the gibberish of Connecticut horse jockies, an order of men distinguished for pure morality, Dickering signifies all that

LEVITY.

ADVICE TO A YOUNG OFFICER OF THE MILITIA.

DEAR TOM,

I am informed by colonel Maraud, that you have obtained a commission in his battalion. I know not, as yet, whether to congratulate or condole with you on your promotion; for I have not yet weighed the disadvantages and advantages of it, so as to give a decided opinion upon the subject. However, as it is, no doubt, very agreeable to yourself, I would not be thought to dissuade you from the career of glory which probably your stars have marked out for you; but, on the contrary, presuming on my superiority in point of age, and my long experience in the service you have embraced, I trouble you with this letter, to let you partly into the nature of that service, and to offer you some advice respecting those parts of it, which to a young man are most important, and may seem most arduous.

The grand divisions of your duty are:

First, To handle the bottle with a good grace.

Secondly, To intrigue with the girls without any grace.

Honest conversation, preliminary to the sale of a horse, where the parties very laudably strive in a sort of gladiatorial combat of lying, cheating, and overreaching. It is unlucky that this mellifluous word does not begin with an A. It would deserve the first place in the lexicon of the vulgar. It is the "red lattice" phrase of fools to express the deeds of knaves.

9. Engagedness. Colonialist discourses abound with words of this description. Mr. William GODWIN, who was for a short time a dissenting minister, in his "Caleb Williams," a book of exquisite morality, delights to employ words of this harmonious termination. Example. "Mr. Tyrrel discovered no contemptible sagacity and quick-wittedness," Vol. I. See also St. Leon, passim, for more examples of the same "verba ardentia," employed to astonish the lovers of romance, not less than they once confounded the whining hearer, when the Reverend Mr. Godwin was in the noviciate of his religious exercises.

10. Of and about. This is a very pleasing circumlocution. This loving pair of synonymies grin at each other, like the two kings of Brentford.

11. Caucus. No research has penetrated through "the vast inane" of the seven fold obscurity of this rare expression.

12. Three quarter dollars. Having, from my youth, been taught to think liberally of money matters, and not being very profound, either in pure, or mixed mathematics, I am unwilling to dispute with Philadelphia about fractions. But I reverently suppose, when she talks of three quarter dollars, her meaning is good, and if expressed, according to the laws of language, that this phrase signifies three quarters of a dollar.

13. A little bit ago. Meaning, I weat, not long since, or, perhaps, as Mr. W. Godwin would finely express it. "In no long time." See Caleb Williams, a book, which I cannot refrain from recommending to all, who wish to corroborate habits of what Dr. Franklin himself would call New-England curiosity. Moreover, this novel is worth regarding on another account, as it objects to the whole system of human life and manners, and, as for the first time, we hear the upright administration of the English laws, and the purity of British justice called in question. If this be not invention and novelty, why then I have no conception of paradoxes.

* See Shakespeare.

Thirdly, When you leave a place, always to leave something behind you.

Lastly, When you approach a place, to drive every thing before you.

The first of these duties is considerably dangerous, and has been found to add greatly to the horrors of war. But inheriting, as you do, the spirit of a long line of ancestors, whose love of liquor may be traced up to the flood itself, it is impossible that you can shrink from your duty, though you should fall a victim to the fatigues of the day. It will be necessary for you, therefore, to study the whole art of military libation, and be perfect master of the whole manual and vocal exercise, such as twirling a cork, inspecting the crust, calling for a toast, giving a toast, saying more, challenging with pint bumpers, or filling the constable.

On the right performance of this part of your duty depends much of that courage which your country will expect you to exhibit in the day of battle. Why is it that men are given to fighting in their cups, if not from their drinking in fresh draughts of courage, which enables them to defy, as colonel Toper of our regiment used to say, even the devil himself? It is very necessary to acquire a dashing, helter-skelter kind of heroism, which impels a man to fight with no matter whom, when, or where. In all the annals of the art military, I never knew any good done by an army who went to work soberly.

Again, to show how generally the principle of drinking in military affairs is adopted, consider that our language has borrowed a set of phrases from this only. How often, for instance, do we hear gentlemen say, "our courage is out;" when you know this means no more than that the bottle is out? Happy is it, my dear Tom, that we have acquired such skill in the philosophy of the human mind, as to be able to recruit and repair its best passions by mechanical means, and that now-a-days a gentleman may lay in a pipe of fortitude that shall invigorate him and his friends for a twelvemonth.

The second branch of your duty, or your employment (which is just the same thing), is intrigue. As by the laws of war the women are not allowed to follow the regiment, it is very proper that the regiment should follow the women. But intrigue is necessary to you on another and more important account, namely, that it includes in it all the various stratagems, dangers, and manœuvres of war, and particularly is a happy emblem of that very momentous art, the art of besieging. Some towns are to be approached gradually, some to be taken by storm, and some, no doubt, assailed by treachery; for, "tricking in love is all fair."

With respect to the mode of intriguing, I do not know that it is necessary to give you any rules: such as are necessary will readily occur to you. To have as many intrigues upon your hands at a time as possible, and where you have been successful, to make it as public as you can—is one precept. Another is, to enjoin the common men to meddle with no intrigues at their quarters, without giving you notice.

I should pay a poor compliment to your courage, were I to hint that the dangers on this service are considerable. I trust you are a stranger to fear. As to fathers, uncles, brothers and such troublesome fellows, they may be intimidated in various ways; you may easily turn their pitchforks against themselves, and make their horse-ponds a covering for their impertinence.

The third branch of your duty is, "When you leave a place, always leave something behind you." To the performance of this duty you will be induced from gratitude. For, where you have been well treated, it is but natural to think you would wish to make some return. The two presents most commonly made on such occasions are children and debts. How the former may be procured I have already hinted; and as, from their tender years, some not perhaps a month old, and some not born at all, it is impossible you can take them with you, and turn majors into milk nurses, or a battalion into a baby-house, you must of course leave them to those who may be inclined to take care of them from natural affection. Humanity also requires this, for what can be so shocking as to render a mother childless?

No, my dear Tom, leave it to foreign monsters to tear from mothers their innocent offspring. Be it yours to repair the ravages of foreign wars, by cultivating the arts of population, and providing for the necessities of posterity. I beg leave here to allude to the present state of oak in this country: it was lately discovered that that valuable tree was becoming scarce, owing to the narrow notions of some noblemen, who would not plant young trees, because, forsooth (they said), they could not live to see them full grown....narrow and selfish is such an idea! It reminds me of a man who would do nothing for posterity, because posterity had done nothing for him.

No....I trust that, if military propagation continues as it has begun, a regiment may perpetuate its existence, and, all but commissioned officers, exhibit a series of generations as regular as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. I have dwelt so long on this part of the subject, to convince you that, if you think you are doing good to yourself, you are at the same time doing good to your country. I have heard it said, that "He is a patriot who makes a blade of grass grow where grass never grew before." I need not make a parody on this position, to show that children are preferable to clover.

As to the leaving debts, the subject is so well known and understood, that I will not affront your experience by supposing you ignorant of it. In point of fame, however, it is necessary you should leave something of this kind behind you wherever you go; for, if it should happen that history is silent as to your deeds, your memory will not perish, but be recorded in black and white in every town through which you pass. It is not material how one obtains fame. Fame is a variegated animal, full of spots, and stripes, and streaks....and the credit which has been refused to a man in the day of battle, has often been granted in the bill of parcels.

On this subject, permit me, my dear Tom, to digress a little. It sometimes happens that a tradesman will grumble, and sometimes, perhaps, really may suffer; for a vintner, for example, is not paid as an apothecary would fully be, merely by returning the empty bottles. In such cases, why cannot tradesmen take a hint from men of honour, make a bonfire of their books, and proclaim that all their debts are "debts of honour?" In this case, they would have the laws of honour to secure payment, whereas at present they actually affront men of honour by their paltry demands; and, as you read in that admirable system of morality, The School for Scandal, "paying tradesmen is but encouraging them."

It certainly is a most shameful thing that an officer (as yourself, I hope, will one day prove) who has undauntedly braved a battery of cannon, should turn pale at the sight of a bit of paper that would not stop a whistle.

What would you think! How would your gorge rise, if, when you had conducted some dangerous expedition, captured, for instance, a whole detachment of poultry, made a breach in the demi bastion of a tavern, marched without fear and without danger through a meadow of terror inspiring bulls and oxen, or perhaps had conducted a party of ladies through the perils of the Bridgewater canal, with one chance of being buried, and two of being drowned; I say, if, when you returned victorious from these and other like expeditions incident to your profession, you were to have your fear excited, and your laurels blasted by the vile hand of an attorney, egged on to insult you by that discount of human nature called a taylor!....By the dignity of Mars! could you bear it,

....."When you might his quietus make
By a bare boskin?"

I am afraid, my dear Tom, that I have made this letter longer than you will have leisure to read, especially as you are going into a service where you must accomplish actions, and not mind words. I hasten, therefore, to close with remarking, that the fourth great branch of your duty is, "When you approach a place, to drive every thing before you." I shall dwell the less on this subject, as you must be convinced that it is essential to your progress to overcome all obstacles, and inspire a proper terror in all beholders. I would not have you, therefore, to regard such trifles as corn-fields, farmers' yards, broad-wheeled waggon, detachments of gleaners or hop-pickers. The military road has, time out of mind, been a deviation from the highway, though apparently leading to it.

I have now offered you a few hints on some of the most material parts of your service. Time will not permit me to enlarge upon all of them, and you know enough naturally to render that unnecessary. I have said nothing, for instance, on gaming, because you may soon be inoculated in that disorder, if you have it not the natural way. I have likewise said nothing of betting; but, by the way, I would not have you bet upon such things as battles abroad, and sea-fights; for these are generally so artfully misrepresented by both parties, that it becomes as difficult to know who gained the bet, as who gained the battle. No, I would have your bets turn on objects more within you inspection and more important....such as the race of a pair of maggots from a filbert....the colour of your landlady's stockings....two to one that Kate Matlock has twins....three to two that Corporal Filch is hanged before Christmas....five to one you don't produce a man who can repeat the Lord's Prayer, &c. &c. These are not only important in themselves, but equally so as affording materials for rational and improving conversation.

One thing yet remains, which it would be unpardonable to pass by. I suppose you have already been looking for it, and guess I mean "an affair of honour," alias duelling, alias pinking a man. This would require a treatise instead of a letter, and therefore I must be brief, and confine myself principally to one topic....the causes of duelling. Now, as no challenge can be refused, I hope that you will select such causes as may appear dignified and becoming your character, such as the fleetness of a horse or the flightiness of a woman. I mean no disrespect to either of these personages by classing them together, but I am vindicated in my arrangement from a consideration of the causes of above a hundred duels, which have happened in my time, and which puzzle me very much to find where the seat of honour really is. I am not, however, afraid of your personal danger in the affair of duelling: independent of your good temper, I am of opinion that duelling will very soon be banished from the army. It is impossible that gentlemen of the army can continue a fashion which has been polluted by the lowest mechanics, who now talk of their honour as formerly they used to talk of their honesty; who load their pistols oftener than they discharge their debts, and are more ambitious of a character behind Montague-house, than on the Royal Exchange.

I will now take my leave, my dear Tom, wishing you health and happiness, and a glorious retreat to the mansions of peace, when the "dogs of war" shall be again chained; when you shall pare down your spontoon to a walking-stick, shoot nothing but partridges with your fusil, and beat your sword into a carving-knife.

I am, dear Tom, yours sincerely,

CHRISTOPHER CARFONADE,
Late major of the Brentford militia.

THE DRAMA.

A new tragedy, entitled Alfonso, was lately performed on the Covent-Garden Theatre, for the first time. The following are the principal characters.

The piece is the production of Mr. M. G. Lewis, and has been printed and published for some time, for the purpose, as the author avows among other reasons, "of depriving his censurers of the plea of involuntary mistaking." No disposition of that kind appeared in the audience of last night, as we never witnessed one more indulgent, although Mr. Lewis also declares in his preface, that "after the reception of his De Montford, he is not vain enough to expect that Alfonso would meet with a kind one."

Trusting, therefore, that all anticipations unfavourable to himself, or those whom he considers his censurers, grow only out of the partiality of an author for the offspring of his own brain, we shall speak with as much candour of his play, as we have done of his other productions, and....

Nothing extenuate,
Nor set down aught in malice.

The scene lies in Burgos, the capital of Old Castile, and in an adjoining forest. The king, Alfonso, who is a model of perfection, is betrayed by a false charge into the punishment of Orsino, a most deserving nobleman. His Lady flies from court with her only son, who afterwards, under the assumed name of Casario, becomes the favourite of the court. He had early pledged himself to a dying mother to revenge the wrongs of his father. In the prosecution of this purpose, he contrives the banishment of the prince, privately marries the princess Anselosa, who is in love with him, and then lays a plan for blowing up the king in his palace, thus making his way to the throne. From the various obstacles and difficulties which retard and finally defeat this wicked plan, arises the whole interest of the piece. The principal one is the love of Ottilia for Casario. To gratify it, she poisons her husband, and next the princess; but Casario still refusing to make her his wife, she threatens to reveal the conspiracy, and Casario, to prevent the discovery, plunges his poniard in her bosom. The other main incidents are connected with Orsino, who was rescued from the dungeon, in which he was supposed to have died, by the humanity of the princess: he is discovered in his retreat by Casario, who urges him to revenge; but nothing can shake his loyalty, and he resolves to apprise the king of his danger. It is at this point that the scene, always sufficiently active and impressive, reaches its highest degree of interest. Orsino and the princess are apprised of the moment when the mine is to be sprung; but there is scarcely time to reach the palace. She is desired to fly to the vault, and delay the wicked deed, until she shall hear the sound of a bugle, which is to be the signal of the king's removal to a place of safety. All is now anxiety, terror, and suspense. All entreaties are used, and all exhausted; the torch is applied to the train, and the explosion is considered certain, when the sound of the bugle is heard, and the princess passes from a paroxysm of agony into a delirium of joy. This finely wrought scene closes the fourth act, and the green curtain being let down with it through mistake, a great part of the audience thought the play was over. If the moral of the piece did not require some punishment for Casario, it certainly could not have a more complete end, for Orsino had already sufficiently proved his unshaken loyalty. Ottilia had previously expiated her offence, and the original plot was apparently exhausted. A fifth act, however, became necessary, and in it the author has felt the difficulty, indeed we might say the impossibility, of reviving the lively interest which had just expired. To effect it he has recourse, in his published works, to the horrible, in a much greater degree than that exercised in the representation. The poison administered to the princess begins to operate, and she is conducted, in dying agonies, off the stage. A battle next ensues, in which Casario and the king meet in single combat, but are separated by Orsino, who, in rushing between, receives a wound from his son, of which he dies, and Casario concludes the scene, and with it the play, by plunging his sword into his own bosom....The only radical defect in the conduct of the plot is that already alluded to, which, by giving up a great portion of the interest in the fourth act, makes the remaining scenes go off tardily. All the other defects are remediable....in many cases they are such as may be removed, not by the difficult mode of amendment, but by the simple means of omission; of the latter class are the scenes in which the princess gives a description of the death of Ottilia, and Casario another of the manner of her murder. Every one must see how preposterous it is to exhibit the fact to the eye, and afterwards to give a description.

The language possesses many beauties, but is rather redundant. The author also admits that he has here and there, detected some trifling plagiarisms, rather of expression than of sentiment. The plagiarisms of both kinds are not so thinly scattered as he would fain believe. It would be easy, did time and our limits permit, to enumerate a variety of both. This character is so generally prevalent in the piece, that it exhibits very few instances of original thought or incident. With the morality we find no fault, the sentiments are pure and well calculated to improve the mind in the relations of public as well as private duties. Taking it therefore as a whole, with all its capabilities of retrenchment, we do think, that when judiciously compressed, it will rank higher in merit, and maintain a longer existence in public favour, than any immediately modern Tragedy, except Pizarro. The passions which it involves, are made in general to work with unity and effect. They are love, jealousy, ambition, and revenge. Their combination certainly produce many scenes of forceful interest; and where they fail, it is in consequence of pushing the horrible too far. It is in vain to excite terror by adding murder to murder. It is not the act, but the motive of the act, and the circumstances of the sufferer that regulate the impression. Uniform applause attended the piece throughout; in the patriotic passages particularly, it was not only loud, but reiterated. Exclusive of its own merits, it was principally indebted for success to excellent acting. Mr. Cooke, in Orsino, a mixture of the Brutus and the Cato, was very successful, particularly in the scenes with Casario and the king. Mrs. Lichfield gave to Ottilia, a character full of violent love and jealousy, uncommon force and energy....it could not, indeed, be better supported. Mr. H. Johnston, in Casario, Mr. Murray, in Alfonso, and Mrs. H. Johnston, in Amelrosa, were also very happy in their respective parts. Neither prologue nor epilogue had any merit.

The piece was got up with great splendour in decorations, and announced for future representation with loud applauses.

PROLOGUE

TO MR. LEWIS'S ALFONSO,

WRITTEN BY W. ROUGH, ESQ. OF THE INNER TEMPLE,

SPOKEN BY MR. CLAREMONT.

WITH many a fable old, through many an age,
The Muse triumphant grac'd the tragic stage.
Her power declin'd, forlorn she hangs the head,
Cold all her attais, all her vot'ries fled;

Incens'd she views her noblest effort fail,
And tells to listless ears De Montfort's Tale.
And can it be, that British hearts refuse
To feel the sorrows pictur'd by the Muse?
Can they, to whom no sufferer sues in vain,
To ev'ry grief alive, to ev'ry pain,
Can they be found thus tardy to conceive,
That ming'd woe, which, real, they relieve?
No...Nature's gushing impulse never stays
To count each chrysal drop emotion pays.
But whensoever the form of grief appears,
With liberal zeal sets wide the fount of tears:
Till fed with full supplies, without controul,
One master-stream of virtue sways the Soul.
From fancy thus compassion takes its source,
And Truth from habit boasts imparted force.
When ruthless war his thunders hurl'd around,
The laugh might soothe, the sigh, tho' just, might wound.
For reason then, whilst madd'ning passions rag'd,
And un restrain'd, tumultuous conflict wag'd,
Mourn'd o'er the scenes imagination drew,
The grief too probable, the hate too true.
Then that won most, which Judgment most disdain'd,
The Jest, that stole us from the sense that pain'd.

Britons, a fairer hour awaits you now;
Lo! peaceful olive binds each manly brow!
And as the widow's bride, whose sorrows flow,
With chasten'd emphasis and meeker woe,
Dwells on the tablet, which she shunn'd before,
And loves the cherish'd semblance more and more:
So the trac'd griefs, that now no longer harm,
Too near to please us once, again shall charm.

Yes, Britons, peace returns! once more is giv'n
The leisure to be wise, best boon of Heav'n!
Haste! hail the dawning era with delight,
Nor check the swelling transport e'en to night.
What, though our bard, no hallow'd flame inspire.
Weak to prevail, strong only in desire;
What, tho' his breast no breathing rapture move,
Like those that stamp with being, Basil's love!
Still shall your praise the drooping muse restore,
Pledge of success to those who merit more.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The latest advices from the fashionables of London inform us, that a new sect has arisen among the young men of fashion which threatens to banish out of vogue the Bond street Lounger. Neither promenades, hunters, curricles nor boxers can tempt these heretics from the windows, or the couch. Exercise, they assert is the evil principle and repose the first good. Some of them are fire worshippers, others adore flowerpots, and some lie whole mornings together under portable groves, suspended in balconies totally indifferent to the gaping croud and absorbed only in contemplation of themselves. A part of them complain of want of spirits, or tell you they are absent, when you are talking to them; others assert, they are not at home, while they are reading out of Casement.

RECIPE

TO MAKE A MODERN BEAU.

Take any thing....put it into a pair of pantaloons just large enough to contain one dozen; put a binding on the top of the pantaloons (called a vest) and attach to the bosom of the shirt an oval glass case with a wig in it; pare away the skirts of its coat to the width of a hat-band. If the subject is doomed to pass its time in the house, it will require a heavy pair of round toed jack boots, with a tassel before and behind. "Lift it up by the cape of the coat," pull its hair over its face, lay a hat on its forehead, and spectacles on its nose.

N. B. Its hands must, on no occasion, be suffered to escape from the pantaloons pockets, nor the spectacles from its nose.

THE FINE ARTS.

ropean world; and by whom the arts and sciences therein are carried to their greatest perfection. It is sufficient, we think, to confirm our assertion, that we name a Thompson, a West, a Copely, a Brown, and a Fenton. The invaluable volume of inspiration assures us, "a prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and in his own house;" and the distinguished geniuses we have mentioned, with many others, have received the liberal rewards and flattering honours of Europe. —While one of them is created a member of a noble order in Germany, another is exalted to the presidency of the Royal Academy of Arts and Sciences in Great-Britain. They both are entitled by their merit to their pre-eminence.—We have not often met with specimens of the literary talents of president West—and he has been made the subject of ribaldry by that prince of blackguards, Peter Pindar. But we have before us one of his lectures, pronounced the 11th December last, to the Royal Society on delivering the gold and silver medals, to those students who had produced the best painting, architectural design, drawing, and academy figure model.

"In his lecture Mr. West took a cursory view of the Arts, from their origin in Greece, and progress through Italy, till they obtained an establishment in Great-Britain. He did not confine himself to painting, but animadverted also on sculpture, and hence bestowed high eulogiums on Phidias, particularly noticing the celebrated work of that artist on Monte Cavallo, the subject of which, is a young man breaking a horse. Appelles was mentioned with high praise, as one of the great masters of the true sublime in the art, though unhappily none of his works descended with his fame. Leonardo da Vinci, Titian, Michael Angelo, Raphael, and Corregio, received a distinct panegyric, and their appropriate merits were severally noticed.

"It was the main object of the president to inculcate an attention to mind, expression, energy, and truth of character, as the great qualities of the art, and a conviction, that those great qualities could only be attained by the union of philosophy with science, not a mere representative of external form, but an animated, yet correct, appeal to the imagination.

"Passing from this topic, which, however, he enforced by the example of those masters whose fame will be coeval with the arts in all ages, he illustrated the advantage and necessity of patronage. This point naturally led him to a tribute of gratitude to the present king of Great-Britain, who, by his gracious countenance of the arts, had produced the establishment of the Royal Academy.

"After this fervent and respectful homage, the president took occasion to speak in the most encouraging terms, of the progress of the British arts. The excellence attained by the Greeks was the result of many ages, but painting could be only said to have obtained an establishment in that country for a period of half a century; yet it can boast of professors of distinguished merit, and may look with proud defiance on the artists of those countries, which were once the favourite abodes of genius. But much as the arts were indebted, for their present flourishing state in that country, to the illustrious patron, to whom he had offered the tribute of respectful gratitude, he observed, that no individual, however exalted, could give sufficient animation to the powers of genius, unless the great, the affluent, instead of lavishing their possessions on the remains of any former art, gave a liberal encouragement to cotemporary talents. Without such encouragement, he observed, in conclusion, genius must languish, and become as sterile as would nature herself, if deprived of the ocean, whose diffusive streams give life, vigour, and beauty to all by which she was enriched, dignified and adorned." TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"Jaques" passes much of his time in solitude. we hope he will reflect there. "Under the green-wood tree" his keen eyes may discern the fairies of moonlight, and the nymphs and graces.

Ferdinando has been for a long time silent. We hope he will soon open his mouth, and warble a song.

For the translation of a "Greek Ode to astronomy," which was transcribed from a London paper, and sent us in a very obliging manner from New-York, we are grateful to an unknown correspondent, from whom we have frequently received agreeable selections from London papers.

A. has all the strong, and all the graceful features of the scholar's character.

"Shrewd and of a well constructed brain, Keen in pursuit, and vigorous to retain."

The just and well deserved review of the sermons of the Principal of Princeton College claims our attention. It is truly pleasant to the Editor to discover that the discourses of a sound divine and an elegant scholar of his own country have been no less liberally than justly applauded by foreign critics on the highest tribunal.

The Editor sympathizes with his friend who has applied to his ill-starred fortune Dryden's well known lines,

"The lucky have whole days, and those they choose,
The unlucky have but hours, and those they lose."

and though he rarely indulges himself in the use of the querulous and elegiac style, he must apply the too faithful lines of the sensitive Cowper.

But me scarce hoping to attain my rest,
Always from post withheld, always distress'd,
Me howling winds drive devious, tempest toss'd,
Sails ript, seams opening wide, and compass lost;
And day by day some currents thwarting force
Sets me more distant from a prosperous course.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

A gentleman having lately observed in company, that a deceased friend, a lawyer, had left behind him very few effects. I can easily believe it, said a female wit present, he had very few causes.

The naked fashions must raise the spirit of those, who follow them; as it is impossible for a lady to pocket an affront who wears no pocket.

SOLOMON says a virtuous woman is a crown to her husband. By this rule, the most valuable of the sex is worth only five shillings.

In 1775 Dr. Tanner was vice chancellor of the university, and had an opportunity of evincing his attachment to the court, in a way which is supposed to have led to much of his subsequent preferment. The university had voted an address to the king, approving the hostile measures adopted against the colonies, which was, of course, opposed by Jebb, the patriot, and the whig party. One of the members actually refused the key of the place which contained the seal necessary on these occasions. The courtly zeal of Tanner supplied the defect by means of a sledge-hammer, and was, in consequence, soon after received by Lord North with a prebend of Canterbury. He was in the fullest sense of the word a tory, and an enemy to all innovation. As might be expected from such a character, he was liberal and generous, and his money was frequently bestowed in the patronage of learned men and learned publications.

A person was lately indicted at the quarter sessions for pulling the nose of one of his neighbours.

It appearing that little provocation had been given to induce him to commit this rash act, he was reprimanded and severely fined.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Paris to his friend in Philadelphia.

"On the 11th of May, I left Antwerp for Brussels. The country round the latter far exceeds any thing I ever saw. Nothing in the vicinity of Paris is comparable to it, and I think even the beautiful Hill of Richmond, so elegantly described by THOMSON, is not its rival. Country seats resemble palaces; and gardens of thirty and forty acres are very commonly laid out in serpentine walks and intersected by canals in every direction. At the termination of many a long avenue, some fanciful object is erected, a temple, a Chinese bridge, or a summer-house with fountains continually playing. The country through Belgium is a continued garden. It was much ravaged by the war, but has recovered again. I travelled from Brussels to Paris in the Diligence, the only conveyance through France, and I found it by no means so bad as I apprehended. On my route, I passed through Valenciennes, Mons, Cambray, Peconne and Roye, all fortified towns, but have every appearance of poverty. I saw more beggars in one of these towns, in getting out of the Diligence than you ever met in your life. I arrived at this great and wonderful city on the 15th inst. I have been so much occupied with my business, since my arrival, that I have seen, as yet but little. I have been in the garden of the Thuilleries, the Champs Elisees and the Palais Royale; but I have not seen the gallery of paintings and statues in the Thuilleries, nor the famous Venus de Medicis, which is there.

"I have walked over the ground where the horrid massacre of the Swiss guards took place. The recollection of that atrocious deed almost chilled me with horror. The government of France has changed by degrees from a democracy to a complete monarchy. To what but a wild spirit of democracy, which, for some years pervaded this country, can so great a change be attributed? It ought to be a lesson for us in America; for that same democratic furor, which once reigned in France, now rages in America. Not content with the mildest and best government upon earth, the democrats seek to destroy its very basis, viz. its energy, and by doing that the whole will fall.

"Napoléon Buonaparte sera-t-il Consul à vie? is now depending. No doubt HE WILL be Consul for life, if he please. The mode of election is somewhat curious. A book is opened with the project of the department, (observe, in the very face of government) where the voters are to write down their names, yes or no. Few will be bold enough thus to expose themselves, by saying no."

A heavy complaint has been made against the authors of modern romances, full of ghosts, spectres, and murderers. The young ladies are so frightened, as to be afraid to sleep alone.

It is not surprising that the Pope should have an apoplectic fit. His holiness has been afflicted with the falling sickness for many years.

At the funeral of a young lady who died lately at Brighton, the pall was to be supported by four virgins. The sneerers say that by sending couriers to several adjacent towns, the set was, with some difficulty, made up.

A parrot is at present in the possession of lady Brokerton, seventy years of age, which talks as well as ever, and increases in noise, as it does in years. The bird being a female, in some measure lessens the surprise.

Comfort for tragedy writers. "If you did not like my tragedy, why did you not hiss?" "My dear sir, no man can hiss and yawn, at the same time."

The following is copied verbatim from a northern paper, and may serve to give distant nations and a wondering posterity some idea of the July style. "The patriotism of this town, which was reluctantly confined, by the Sabbath, within the pale of religion, burst forth the next morning, with a peal of bells and thunder of ordnance. The earliest dawn offered a brilliant display of our national flag, from our shipping, public houses and places of distinction."

A lady of great wit and spirit, has been heard to declare that she was once completely silenced by a very stupid personage, in the midst of a declamation, and encircled by a large party of literary ladies and gentlemen. She was haranguing upon the preference she should feel for Tom Jones, to Sir Charles Grandison, as a brother, a friend, a lover, or a husband. The silly gentlewoman, in the mere desire of prating, and perfectly unconscious of the great force of what she was going to utter, interrupted the lady orator, with, "ladies and gentlemen, I am reading Tom Jones, but have not finished it. I have just left him in bed with another man's wife."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. DACTYL AND COMMA.

THE DESERTED HOG-STY.

IMITATED FROM GOLDSMITH.

Sic transit gloria mundi.

Where yon lank grass waves o'er the silent way,
And thriving weeds their branching arms display,
Beneath the lofty maple's darkening shade
First stood a dome of firmest pine-planks made,
To beechen posts the obedient ends were joined
The flowery creeper all yon side entwined,
O'er half the fabric, were there seen to rise
An angled roof ascending towards the skies;
Oft on yon wall I've ponder'd as I view'd
The hungry inmates, there enjoy their food;
Heard the sow grunt, the barrow feebly whine,
While their shrill treble all the sucklings join;
When fill'd with food, how oft I've seen them lay,
Bask in the sun and catch his warming ray.
Then, if perchance as snoring loud they laid
They heard approach the sty the kitchen maid,
Heard on the Trough the well known swill-pail
scound,

Or the thick ears of corn fly rattling round;
How quick they started....oft I pondered then,
And oft compared the ways of hogs to men.
So the dull Democrat, his dosing keeps,
And till the leaves and fishes call him, sleeps;
But when he hears approach the long wish'd prize
To the full trough of offices he flies;
Though thousand offices the fool should clog
Still as insatiate as the ravening hog.
There, oft the swinish brood in gambols gay,
Sported the day and slept the night away.
Now all these joys are fled, as late I view'd
The site where once the cumbrous hog-pen stood;
No boar I saw his greedy jaws extend,
No parent sow, her infant pigs defend,
No squeaking pigs with pious whine implore
Their mother sow to yield her milky store;
Thither no more at summer's parting day
Shall the blythe house-maid wind her devious way:
No more the swine rear'd on their legs shall stand,
And ask the flowing beverage from her hand;
No more express their squealing rapture when
Loaded with corn the farmer seeks their pen,
Or when Aurora's crimson light appears,
No more shall whine their matins in our ears.

O Idleness, in thee the cause we trace
Of all the silent sadness of this place;
For had the farmer's yard with wood been stored,
The Sty had stood, and there pigs still had snored.
It was a winter's day, "fast fell the snow,"
And bleakly round the borean blast did blow,
When the stern farmer, so the fates ordain,
Doomed the warm pen no longer should remain,
Doomed the dry planks his kitchen fires should grace,
And the oak trough supply the back log's place;
The swine astonished heard their cheerless fate,
And deep despair in every visage sate.
And first the good old Boar prepared to go,
Leave the warm sty for heaps of drifted snow;
He marched in virtue bold with solemn pace,
While the big tears bedew'd his manly face;
Not for himself he wept, the whining train
Of infant followers, call'd his tears amain.
The Sow in louder plaints expressed her woes,
With sullen grunt the mournful barrow goes;
yet oft he paused and looked with wishful eye,
At the lone hog's trough and deserted sty:
The group of pigs, groped onward, far behind,
And squeaked their anguish to the sighing wind.
Now the rank hog-weed, shades the dark'ned ground,
And baleful night-shade spreads its vines around.

"THE ARTS OF ABLE EDITORS."

LARRY O'SHANAHAN'S KIND INVITATION TO "PATRIOTIC ALIENS." (a)

[To the tune of Ally Croker.]

All you who'd be instructors without having any learning;
All you who would dictate, and judge, without the least discerning;
Who fain would pass for honest men, with gibbets in your faces,
And look so bold, while branded with manifold disgraces,
Come hasten here, and learn from me the Arts of able Editors.
I'll teach you all the Arts of an able Editor.

Altho' from dirt and dung-hills, you like toadstools should have grown up
Or aping of the gentleman, with vanity, are blown up;
Altho' the spawn of jail-birds foul; or e'en the filthy pledges
Of mumping beggars, litter'd under European hedges,
You may thrive here by learning all the Arts of able Editors
So I'll teach you all the Arts of an able Editor.

If from the bogs of county Tip*, or from some British village,
Compell'd to fly for murder, treason, theft, or highway pillage,
Come hither to Columbia's shore, look confident, and hector,
And you'll find a certain great man here, your crony and protector,

If you only will but learn from me the Arts of an Editor,

If you'll learn all the Arts of an able Editor.

(a) "Patriotic Aliens," a late Democratic toast.

* This in English means the county of Tipperary, of which the assize town is Clonmell.

Altho' with peeping through the grates at sign of bag and wattle,† Sir,
Your face has scars of many bars, as if receiv'd in battle, Sir;
Though in each line, (I should say rope) pourtray'd are death and sin, Sir,
Sagacious J——n will find a grace in every grin, Sir,

If you'll only take pains to be his able editors,
If you'll learn all the Arts of an able Editor.

Altho' stag-bail‡ and perjury were written in your looks, Sir,
And though your nose should be squeez'd flat by kissing of the book, Sir,
For a come-off, our patron here, behind won't let you lag, Sir,
But neatly say, "the Bible's nought but lamp-black and old rags" Sir.

If you'll only lie and swear to it like an able editor,
If you'll learn all the Arts of an able Editor.

Come, Dermot, Matt, Mighel,|| and Pat, my jewels make haste over,
To milk and potatoes bid farewell, for here you'll live in clover;
And when you land, cry boldly out, "I'm now good as the best of you,
By Jasus now I'll lie, and swear, and vote like all the rest of you;"

And then you'll get a polish from our able little editors,
Oh! you'll learn all the Arts of an able Editor.

And now dear boys remember well the story of the pitcher,
And while you may, get out o'the way, of that curs'd thing the snitcher.
From foggy European air this safer climate wins ye,
The yellow-fever may be cur'd, but not the hempen-quinzy.††

Come then, receive fraternal hugs from all our able editors,
You'll quickly learn to con by rote, the Arts of able Editors.

Explanation of one thing perhaps you may desire, Sir,
And "what's the arts of editors?" before you move require, Sir;
It is to make the whole you say, beginning, end and middle, Sir,
One burning lie, enough to raise a blister on a griddle, Sir.

So easy is't to learn, you see, the Arts of able Editors,
How easy then to learn, all the Arts of able Editors!

With heart, dear Pat, as black as hat, and front with brand of gibbet,
And some of those sweet qualities old Baili Rolls exhibit;
A head eternally confus'd with foul and noxious vapours,
With lies, impostures, and detraction, daubing daily papers;

Those, and those alone, are all the Arts of able Editors,

Oh! the precious Arts of our able Editors!!!

SELECTED POETRY.

A RECEIPT TO MAKE A GHOST.

ADDRESSED TO A LADY, WHO TOLD THE AUTHOR SHE PRAYED TO SEE A GHOST.

Take a man who adores you....and do but look round,
With those bright sparkling eyes, and he'll quickly be found,
Then receive him at first with good nature and ease
And use all thy ways,....thou hast many....to please;
Let him hang on thy looks, and be blest with that smile,
Which could sorrow herself for a moment beguile.
If he speaks but a word, be all quiet attention,
Affability, meekness, and sweet condescension.
But, when thus thou hast raised him to visions above,
And he figures exstatic the raptures of Love;
Then be sudden, and quickly reverse the behaviour,
Let thy cruelest scorn be considered a favour,
When compar'd with the punishment thou hast in store,
For the wretch who thy charms thus presumes to adore:
Instead of those ways you first thought of to please him,
Invent all the arts to torment and to tease him,
If he speaks to thee now, wonder at his assurance,
And esteem his civilities past all endurance,
If thou can'st, thy agreeable manners forget;
Be this moment a prude, and the next a coquette.
Not the * poppy's mild juice, thou hast made him so mad,
Can restore the sweet sleep, which he yesterday had.
See he sickens and dies, and becomes the dear creature
Thou hast long pray'd to see....without limb, without feature;
And if it be true, what great PLATO once said,
The old Grecian sage, that the souls of the dead,
For the things, which they held here in high admiration,
Still pine, and forsake not their old habitation;
He will still hover round thee a delicate Ghost,
As the dearest of things, which on earth pleas'd him most,
Then be not surprised, if you hear a deep sigh,
And should see Mr. Ghost gliding pensively by;
He will do thee no harm, but he still loves to gaze
On those charms, which have set the whole world in a blaze.

CHAPTER II.

The Earth....Sulphur predominates in it....Theory of the North-West wind.

But, to fix the nature of the climate, that of the earth, or the kind, and mixture of its component parts must largely contribute. The northern part of Asia sufficiently proves this. It is bald, but incomparably colder than North-America. This is ascribed to the nitre, which abounds so much in the soil. In the soil of the Atlantic North-American states, sulphur appears to be predominant. It is said they cannot find saltpetre in sufficient quantity to keep the powder-mills going. Saltpetre, indeed, counteracts corruption, and no climate is so putrefactive as that of North-America. Apples and other fruits rot upon the trees. The sulphur is likewise the cause of the rapid vegetation. But this violent growth seldom allows the fruits to attain a perfect maturity. They rot before hand, and you constantly see upon the trees green fruit, half ripe, and already rotten. Among the native inhabitants, you find the same rapid development of the body, and a premature old age. To this superfluity of sulphur in the soil, may likewise be ascribed those sultry heats which come on so suddenly in the summer, and occasion fainting fits. On this account the American trees grow the quicker, and perish the quicker likewise: they are subject to premature decay, and to the attacks of numerous sorts of vermin. The earth imparts its properties to the plants; the beasts feed upon the plants; and the men upon both beasts and plants: consequently all the bodies must have properties corresponding to those of the constituent part of the earth. The frequent thunder storms prove the abundance of sulphur...That substance now and then falls in rain...The water is often covered with it. There are examples of its taking fire, in fishing by torch-light, as is customary there, and by touching the water with a torch. The frequent fevers, especially among those who dwell near the water, are also, by the physicians, imputed to the sulphureous exhalations.

The greater warmth to the westward of the Allegany mountain, than under the same latitude in the Atlantic part of North-America, may perhaps be occasioned by the extensive natural meadows, bare of wood, the ground of which was therefore accessible to the rays of the sun, and might be warmed by them. Perhaps, however, the soil is there otherwise constituted; it is at least incomparably more fertile.

We are not yet sufficiently acquainted with the general theory of the winds, to ascribe the cold of North-America chiefly to the north-west wind; for it will not answer to suppose it proceeds from the north pole. For this north-west wind does not blow, to the westward of the Allegany mountains, at the same time when it traverses the Atlantic parts. To the westward, winds altogether different prevail, and none of them is so cold as the north-west in Atlantic North-America. If this wind came from the polar lands, it would be at the westward of the mountains, nearer to its source, and of course colder. But all travellers there affirm the contrary. Finally, the west wind is in the middle states at least as cold as the north-west, which proves that the several chains of mountains which are called the Apalachian mountains, and among which the Allegany is the highest summit, by forming the separation of the two oceans, must be considered as the cause of this cold westerly wind....Another circumstance confirms this. The north-east wind brings rain throughout the whole eastern coast....West of the Allegany mountain, it is a clear, dry, and cold wind; a proof that it has dropped in rain all its earthy vapours, upon its journey from the ocean over the mountain, and that the mountain has imparted to it, in its passage, a coldness which it did not possess nearer the coast. In travelling over the Peter's mountain, near Harrisburg, in Pennsylvania, which runs to the west of the blue hills, parallel to, and not far distant from them, I saw plainly, that a great part of the clouds of rain, which the north-east wind drove upon it, remained suspended on the eastern side, and that it was much clearer on the western side. Thus many vapours are stopped on the east side of every chain of mountains, and the wind grows continually less damp.

Though of all that has been written upon the American climate, therefore, the best in my judgment is what the abovementioned Williams has published, yet I cannot accede to his opinion, that the north-west wind comes so far from the polar lands. The theory of the winds is not yet sufficiently known to determine whether they pass over so great an extent at once. It is indeed known of the trade winds; but these are regular only upon great seas; upon large continents they are not. But, in the present case, it is utterly impossible that the north-west should blow from the polar climes, unless all the travellers have concurred not to tell the truth. The causes have just been seen.

I believe, therefore, it may be adopted for a certainty, that the Apalachian mountains, are the only cause of the cold west and north-west winds in Atlantic America, and the following fact must make it yet more probable. This circumstance, which as far as I know, has not yet been remarked by any traveller, is as follows: westward of the summit of the Blue hills, called in some places Kittatinny, in others the North-hill, it rains not often with a north-east or yet more easterly wind, but generally with the south-west wind. This proves that the north-east wind does not proceed beyond the Allegany mountain, but rebounds back, and still carries with it the watery vapours. This further proves, that when cold east and north-east winds blow at the westward, they are cold streams of air generated upon the mountain itself, which pour themselves towards the warmer and thinner atmosphere on the Mississippi; but not the cold north-east winds coming from the Atlantic ocean, charged with vapours, which do not proceed beyond the Allegany mountain, but strike its east side, and rebound backwards. It has also been found, by corresponding observations, that when to the eastward, north-east winds blow, for several days together, altogether different winds have prevailed in Pittsburg. The rebounding north-east wind comes with its watery vapours from the south-west, owing to the following causes....The mountains run from north-east to south-west, nearly parallel with the coast. The easterly wind proceeds from the north-east point, in the neighbourhood of the banks of Newfoundland. This wind consequently strikes upon the mountains, but in an acute angle. The two considerable summits of the Blue and Allegany mountains, meet in the southern part of Virginia, not far from Staunton, in an acute angle together. Here they rise to their greatest elevation. In this angle consequently the north-east wind presses together all its vapours; and as it can proceed no farther, it must turn back, and carry them with it, by the same way through which it came. Hence it commonly rains, west of the Blue hills, with a south-west wind, originating in the north-east. And when the rain has fallen, there comes immediately from the Allegany mountain a cold west, or north-west wind, which clears up the sky again.

The cold winds always come down from the Allegany mountain. Whence proceeds then this cold property in those mountains? This question has not yet been examined. Can it be owing to the numerous iron mines which they contain? I am far from pretending to decide this question; but I shall here take the liberty to give my opinion concerning it.

The Apalachian mountains (which name I give to the whole collective chain of mountains) are not indeed all very high, if you reckon their elevation from their feet; but they stand upon a level which is itself high. For the land rises gradually from the sea, and where it begins to swell into hills, they are never so high upon the western as upon the eastern side; which is likewise the case with the great chains of mountains, so that from the ocean to the summit of the Allegany mountains you are constantly ascending. The height of the Allegany above the surface of the sea, is calculated at four thousand feet. This is six hundred feet higher than the highest ridge of the Hartz in Germany. Even the vallies, therefore, not far from this mountain top, must be at least two thousand feet above the sea. At such an elevation the air must be considerably cold. Besides, the Apalachian mountains consist of altogether barren, rocky chains of hills, whose component parts are perhaps of a colder nature. Even the larger vallies are full of stony hills, of small fertility, and there is only a very little fruitful level ground, just along the side of the rivulets. All this is covered with wood of slender growth; excepting the pines, which are tolerably stately, but grow only upon a good soil. Consider further, the great extent of this mountainous region: from the Blue hills to the Allegany the distance, in Pennsylvania, at most places, is from one hundred and fifty to two hundred English miles,

And there are considerable gaps in the mountains before you come to the Blue hills. The nearer you draw to the Allegany mountain, the colder you find the climate. The vegetation opens at Philadelphia four weeks earlier than at the Blue mountains: they are not clear of snow, when Philadelphia is surrounded with verdure.

Here then are causes amply sufficient for the cold winds. From the summit of the Allegany, westwards to the Mississippi, the coldness of the climate diminishes again, and its warmth increases, in proportion to the proximity of the river. But the cold winds from the mountains cannot blow here so often, or so strong, as to the eastward, for the following reasons: there is on that side no sea, over which in winter the air can be warmed and attenuated, particularly by the gulf-stream, flowing from the torrid zone, considerably more than over the above-mentioned terra-firma. The cold air, therefore, rushes not with the same violence down from the mountains*; for, as to the westward, there is nothing but land, the equilibrium must be more nearly maintained in the atmosphere.

The exemption from the unpleasant north-east winds, coming from the sea, must give the western climate a great superiority over that to the eastward; for after several days of heat, these north-east storms pour down a cold rain upon the Atlantic states. The air is then thick, oppressive, and relaxing. It attacks chiefly the bowels, and a change of cloathing becomes necessary.—South-east winds on their side, bring in like manner, streams of warm wind—South-west winds bring fair weather.

Beyond the mountains in the internal part of North-America, the unpleasant damp sea winds and the changes of weather proceeding from them are unknown; the climate there must, therefore, be steadier. Its greater warmth, to which almost all travellers testify, may perhaps be chiefly owing to the nature of the ground, and perhaps to the extensive natural meadows, formed, it is said, by the burning away of the woods, and exposed to the heating rays of the sun; and also to the diminished force and greater infrequency of the cold Apalachian winds.

Sum Animi dubius. VIRG. 3. GEORG.

MR. EDITOR,

As you have entered into a kind of contract to supply the public with a regular succession of amusement, you will not surely disdain accepting the contribution of one who is no distant relation of your family, and a great admirer of your undertaking.

On this presumption I have after much debate, and more hesitation (for it is not my way to do any thing in a hurry) set down to communicate to you some anecdotes of my family and myself; which if sufficiently interesting to amuse your readers, neither my ancestors will have lived, nor I written in vain.

I am the only son of Sir Dilatory Doubtful of Dubious-Hall, in this county, descended from an ancient and honourable family long settled at that place. Our ancestor was one of those Norman barons who did William the Conqueror the honour of accompanying him in his descent against England: Of whom it is recorded, that after every thing was fully prepared, and part of the troops were embarked, and just as he himself was stepping on board, he, all at once recollected, that he might possibly perish in the expedition, or that his estate might suffer considerably in his absence; and would have inevitably turned back, had not some of his companions hinted to him, that malice might impute to cowardice what was really the effect of foresight. He therefore (after changing his mind about twenty times more) resolutely set forward; and in reward, I suppose for his feats of valour, received from the hands of the Conqueror the lordship of Castle Dubious, with all its fiefs and appurtenances. The curious may search for the original grant in Doom's-day book—From this time our family spread rapidly, and soon formed alliances with the most respectable of the English nobility—the Shatterbrains—the Daudlers—the Loungers—the Lingerers, and, as I before observed, the Loiterers were not ashamed to cultivate acquaintance, and acknowledge relation with the Doubtfuls. Neither the civil wars of the Henries or Edwards, nor the religious persecutions of Mary and her father, were at all destructive to our ancestors, who in the true spirit of their family, changed their party under the first, and their religion under the last, on the most moderate computation, about six times; by which trifling sacrifice they escaped those severe punishments which more obstinate people deservedly incurred. Happy! could the same timing system of politics have always preserved their persons and estates from the oppression of party, and the plunder of sequestration.

And here, were I to consult my own feelings, should I drop the pen, and leave my heroes in this state of meridian splendour, in imitation of those who finish the history of this country at the peace of sixty-three; but truth demands a different conduct, and bids me pursue the decline and fall of our race, with the same accurate impartiality, with which I have marked its rise, and traced its progress—In that melancholy period, when

"Civil dudgeon first grew high,

"And men fell out, they knew not why."

My great grandfather, Sir Ralph Doubtful was seized with the epidemic fury of the times, and after various resolutions and irresolutions, determined to raise a regiment of a thousand horse, at his own expense. One thing, however, a good deal embarrassed him; he had not yet made up his mind on which side he should employ them. Nor can it be matter of wonder that a point which has puzzled the ablest legislators, should have been too much for the brains of Sir Ralph. He had perused, indeed, with eagerness and attention, the remonstrances of the parliament, and the manifestoes of the king, but their arguments were, unluckily, so equal, that he always found himself of the same opinion with that which he read last. In this dilemma, he determined to have recourse to history, and get himself perfectly acquainted with every part of the constitution. He, therefore, instantly fell to rummaging his library, which (having once belonged to a convent, whose revenues had been granted, at the dissolution of religious houses, to our family) contained a most choice collection of books.—Here he immediately fell foul on Fabian and John Rous, who gave him a prodigious deal of information—hence proceeding in a kind of retrogressive motion; he next attacked the Chronicle of Croyland; and at last William of Mahmsbury, Gildas, and venerable Bede himself were forced to descend from their dusty shelves to increase the knowledge, and settle the tenets of this insatiable politician.—As some of the above works are rather voluminous, and Sir Ralph was not a very fast reader, I think it much to his credit that he fairly read through them all, and had completely finished his course of historic studies in little more than two years. At the end of which period he found himself just as wise as when he first began. And the world would have been in danger of losing the exploits of this hero, and the writings of his historian, had not the offer of a pension and a title, in case of success, determined this disinterested patriot to side with the king.—From this moment my worthy kinsman was no longer er wavering in opinion or lukewarm in zeal; his doubts were all cleared, and his fears were all removed, he even made as much haste as he could to enrol, arm, and discipline his regiment; towards which he had not yet made the least preparation.—I have already observed, that it is not the characteristic of the Doubtfuls ever to put themselves in a hurry; nor had his love of loyalty, or his hopes of a reward, any visible effect, on determining his measures, or quickening his motions: on the contrary, he continued in his usual course to doubt, to deliberate, to approve, and to reject. A twelvemonth passed away before he could enrol a proper number of men; six months more were spent in teaching them to ride gracefully; and in settling the colour of their uniform. It took him up at least an additional six—to determine what plan of operations would be most effectually pursued.—At last every thing was settled exactly to his mind, and on the thirty-first of January, one thousand six hundred and forty-eight, Sir Ralph set forward, at the head of his corps, mounted on a most formidable charger, vowing to take signal vengeance on every ill-fated puritan who should come in his way.—His plan was the most extensive, and at the same time the most simple that can be conceived: as easy in its accomplishment as decisive in its effect. It was indeed no other than to march immediately to London, unperceived by the army of the parliament, of which there were scarce twenty thousand between him and the metropolis—as soon as they arrived there, they were to make themselves masters of the tower, and, of course, of his majesty's person. A troop was to be detached to take possession of Chatham, and all the forts on the river. About thirty privates, headed by a serjeant, were to beat the train-bands out of the city; and Sir Ralph himself obligingly undertook to murder the lord mayor. Every particular being thus adjusted, there remained not the least possibility of a disappointment; the whole party moved on cheerfully, the men in spirits from the hopes of pay and plunder, and their chief elated with the thoughts of his pension and his title. They were not, however, suffered long to enjoy their delusion; for before they had marched many hours, they were informed that his majesty had been executed the day before: this was a terrible blow both to the new colonel and his followers, for the latter deserted by handfuls, and the former, with the small remainder, quietly surrendered themselves to a party of the parliament horse, which soon after came up with them. But the worst was yet to come, for as he was taken in arms, his family were instantly voted malignant, and his whole estate delivered over to the care of the committee of sequestration.

The failure of his hopes, and the ruin of his estate, threw him into a violent fever—hard fare and the damps of an unwholesome prison, completed what disappointment had begun, and my unfortunate ancestor soon after finished his mortal career. From this period the glory of our house declined apace; neither my grandfather or father possessed the genius or spirit of enterprise which distinguished their ancestors, and consequently made not the same figure in history, as the illustrious personage whose memoirs I have been writing.—Before the death of the latter, indeed the estate became so much encumbered, that he found it impossible to breed me up in the hereditary idleness of the family; a misfortune which he might lament, but could not avoid; he, therefore, wisely resolved to give me such an education as should qualify me for filling some very important employment, which he intended to procure me, at a proper time; but whether it was to be civil, military, or ecclesiastic, he was not quite determined. I was accordingly sent from home to school to the university, and from thence sent abroad (where after passing a sufficient time) I returned to my father's house, in order to take possession of the aforesaid employment; towards obtaining which, I have reason to think, he had as yet made no great advancement. However, about a week after my return, he took me into his study, and not without a great deal of previous preparation, made me a long harangue on the subject of his provident care and paternal affection; which he concluded with the following words—"You are now, my son, entered into your twenty-eighth year, and it is not, therefore, too early to begin turning your thoughts to your future profession in life; I would not, however, wish you to hurry yourself in a point of so much importance to your own happiness, and the good of the public. Take, therefore, time to consider the matter well, and at the end of two or three years, make me acquainted with your determination."

* Because it rushes towards the sea, and consequently in the eastern direction.

To this affectionate speech I made as affectionate an answer, and from that moment began my deliberations; but whether the different professions are really so very equal, or whether I am but an inaccurate distinguisher, whether my genius was alike fitted for all or for none, I know not; certain it is, that at the expiration of three years I was obliged to beg a little more time to fix my determination, which my father most readily granted, and even greatly commended me for not having decided too hastily.—This was certainly not the way to quicken me, and accordingly month passed away after month, and year after year, in the same way, and it was not till the age of thirty-five, that I found my talents were best adapted to a military life. This determination was made a little too late, for just as my father was endeavouring to procure me a commission, he was suddenly cut off in his eightieth year by a paralytic stroke, and left me, as his father had left him, the inheritor of an incumbered estate and a ruinous house.

With the death of my father expired all my love of a military life, and I resolved to sit quietly down, and endeavour to find some expedient for paying off my mortgages, and re-building my mansion-house. For effecting this purpose, numberless schemes occurred, and each had their peculiar advantages, but as each had their peculiar disadvantages too, I was most exceedingly embarrassed in my choice, and some more years elapsed before I could fix upon any. At length, after approving and rejecting a variety of plans, just as I had entered my forty-sixth year, I was fully convinced, that to marry some pretty sensible girl of eighteen, of a good family and large fortune, would be the most eligible step I could take.

This resolution being once formed, there remained only to find among my female acquaintance, some person worthy of this high honour; and soon two candidates started up, whose claims were in every respect so very equal, that never throughout a life of doubt and hesitation, do I remember being so terribly put to it before.—The young ladies in question were both heiresses of good fortunes, and descendants from good families; both very amiable and very pretty. Nor do I at all know whether I should ever have settled this point, had not one of them obligingly settled it for me, by marrying a man, who, it seems, had been debating the matter with the lady, while I was debating it with myself.—The difficulty of choice was now most happily removed, and I set forward the next day with the most desperate intention of making an offer in form to the other, who now reigned sole mistress of my affections. Great, however, was my surprise to find on my arrival, the whole house was in confusion, and still greater to hear that Miss had, that morning, eloped with a young officer, who had been some time quartered at a neighbouring town.—Struck with such complicated instances of female perfidy, I returned home in a phrenzy worthy the occasion, and should certainly have made away with myself, could I have determined in what manner to effect my bloody purpose. But I was fortunately so long in deciding, which was the most fashionable mode of suicide, that before this doubt was settled, another arose, namely, whether the reception I should meet with in the other world, would be such as to make me amends for having quitted this in such a hurry; and I therefore deferred to some other opportunity, my journey to that country from whose bourn no traveller returns.—This adventure having perfectly cured me of my matrimonial inclination, I have ever since led a very quiet and tolerably happy life, having my peace of mind disturbed by scarce any other doubts and uncertainties, than whether I shall put on my blue or my brown coat, and whether my Sunday's pudding shall be boiled or baked.—One thing, and one only, has at times, indeed, a little ruffled me, but that I have now settled to my satisfaction, and I hope, sir, to yours also.—For it having some how occurred to me, that as I am turned of three score, and do not intend to marry, I may possibly leave no legitimate issue to emulate my virtues, and continue my name, I have determined, therefore, to bequeath to you Mr. Loiterer, my whole estate, real and personal, on condition you take the name and arms of Doubtful, and promise to lay out the profits of your work in repairing the old mansion, and improving the estates.—And I do hereby assure you, on the word of a gentleman, that it is my most irrevocable determination (if you do not forfeit my good opinion, and if I do not change my mind) to make you my heir and sole executor; in token whereof, I assure you, that I am,

Your affectionate relation,
And humble servant,
DANIEL DOUBTFUL.

INCONVENIENCE OF A LEARNED WIFE.

[From the European Magazine]

SIR,

There has been a great deal of debate and much shedding of ink in the learned world for some time past, respecting the rank that women ought to hold in the scale of creation. Some sour old bachelors have thought, with Sir Anthony Absolute in the play, that women may be taught their letters, but should never learn their mischievous combinations; others, of a softer mould, have in a manner depressed while they exalted them, by bursting forth into rapturous eulogiums on their amiable virtues, which they would at the same time confine to the kitchen and nursery; while a third sort, with more liberality than the one, and more boldness than the other, have contended that literature alone exalts the female character, and that every step a woman mounts in the ladder of learning makes her more eminent in excellence:

"Victorque virum volitare per ora."

Among the votaries of the third sect I beg leave to enrol my name. I began life with a determination to run counter to the established usage of mankind, in the choice of a wife. For I sighed when I reflected on the slavish subjection in which man detains his injured helpmate, in defiance of reason, and in contempt of humanity; I burnt with all the zeal of a Don Quixote to fight the battles of this last and fairest work of nature, and resolved to show the world that I felt what I expressed, by drawing some deserving female from humble life; by providing her with books in all the learned languages, superintending her education with scrupulous anxiety, and at a fit period leading her to the altar, crowned with the never-fading flowers of sagacity and erudition. This grand scheme I immediately put in practice, in the following manner:

You must know, Sir, there is a small shop opposite my study window, which professes to sell gingerbread, earthen-ware, gilt paper, peg-tops, and treacle. To this house of miscellaneous fame I had been accustomed to see a little girl come two or three times a week, and generally return with a handful of gingerbread. This did not at first appear very extraordinary, till I observed the gingerbread to be decorated with the letters of the alphabet, which the sagacious infant devoured more with her eyes than her teeth. This pleased me; it seemed an earnest of future literary greatness, and immediately determined me to gain some acquaintance with the damsel, in order to find whether at some future period she was likely to answer my matrimonial speculation. In a few days I found out her abode, and waited on her mother, an industrious washerwoman in the neighbourhood; told her my tale, to which she did "seriously incline;" and ended by requesting that she would put her daughter under my tuition. The old woman thankfully accepted the offer, assuring me that her daughter was one of the 'cutest girls in the whole street'; and having called her in, and acquainted her with the subject of our conference, I had the satisfaction to find that she expressed an entire readiness to submit to my instructions. We accordingly departed, hand in hand. Little Phoebe (for so she was called) immediately entered upon her course of lectures with an alacrity that both surprised and pleased me. She learned to read even quicker than Madame de Genlis's infant prodigies; soon became acquainted with a large portion of English literature; and in the course of a few years was mistress of the French, Italian, Greek, and Latin languages.

I now considered the time as having arrived, which fate had fixed for my marriage. Phoebe made no objection; a license was obtained; and Dr. Stedfast and Phoebe Morris were introduced to the public, by means of the morning papers, as husband and wife. My pleasure did not, like that of many others, end with the honey-moon, but received a daily accession of delight; for surely no woman, since the time of Queen Elizabeth, was ever possessed of such rare and valuable virtues. The common failings of common women were unknown to Phoebe; her lofty mind "towered above her sex," and displayed such a collection of singular endowments, as, conscious as I am of my inability properly to display, I cannot resist the temptation of endeavouring to describe.

The first talent on which my wife piqued herself, was high spirit. The tame acquiescence of Mrs. Shandy she utterly despised, and indeed gave numerous and forcible proofs of the contrary extreme. For instance, she spoilt me a famous edition of Pope's Works, by throwing a volume into the fire, in which the author had stigmatized some lady in these words: "No ass more meek, no ass more obstinate." She next tore the cover from a volume of Swift's Letters, because he called her sex a race hardly above monkies. Her third stretch of prerogative was displayed by throwing Congreve's Plays out of the window, because in one of them he had declared,

"That women are like tricks by slight of hand,
Which to admire we should not understand."

Nay, she proceeded so far as to send an elegant edition of Orlando Furioso to the pastry-cook, because Ariosto expressed a wish that Angelica had fallen a sacrifice to the frenzy of Orlando; and actually banished poor Virgil from the house, because he had given her sex a neuter gender, and inveighed against them as "varium et mutabile." These diminutions of my library, only served to increase my admiration for my wife, as I considered them fresh proofs of that independent spirit which is so necessary to enable a woman to bear up against our encroaching sex, and is so rare to be met with in our squeamish days.

The next quality in my catalogue, for which I have to compliment my Phoebe, is her contempt of dress. It is a notorious fact, that many women ruin their husbands merely in silk, lace, and muslin. My spouse is so far from running into extravagance in these articles, that I verily believe she has not two yards of either in her possession. Her general dress is a linen robe, floating loosely about, and fastened at the breast with a Roman fibula. In this robe, and an old pair of sandals, she is accustomed to wander through the woods, or by the side of some purling stream, with all the solemnity of an ancient sage.

The third virtue which Phœbe boasts is chastity. This you will acknowledge is no bad quality in a wife. With what rapture have I heard her read Ariosto's account of ancient Amazons, and Hayley's Dissertation on the ancient Maidens of this country! She has completely cleared my house of every female with a tolerable countenance, that I may be kept out of temptation, inasmuch that I may challenge the whole county to produce such a race of scarecrows. I have already told of the ravages she has made in my library; but I forgot to mention, that she has insisted on my parting with a volume of Greek Poems, because there was a small portion of contraband goods on board, which was no other than that famous Ode of Sappho, beginning merely because the expressions were not reconcilable to her ideas of decorum.

Thus, Sir, I have endeavoured to give you a faint sketch of the numerous virtues of my Phœbe; owing, no doubt, to the learned education I have bestowed upon her. Her particular traits of character, her impromptus, bon mots, &c. I shall leave to some future and more able biographer to describe. But candour obliges me to confess that this blaze of excellence does not seem quite congenial to the feelings of those who frequent my house. The majority of my acquaintance, not being men of very profound erudition, endeavour as much as they can to keep out of her way; for she has an odd custom of putting questions which their capacities are not always equal to answering. She once frightened Mr. Simper, the dancing clergyman, from my table, by some inquiry relative to the plusquàm perfectum of a Greek verb; and no longer ago than yesterday, while Sam Sweetwort, the brewer, was entertaining the company with a description of his phæton and four, Phœbe stopt him short in the middle of his harangue by the following lines from Ovid:

*Aureus axis erat, temo aureus, aurea summa
Curvatura rotæ; radiorum argenteus ordo.
Per juga chrysolithi, positæque ex ordine geminæ
Clara repercusso reddebant lumina Phœbo.*

Such, Sir, are the various advantages, to be derived from marrying a learned woman, advantages which none but a philosopher can properly estimate, and which none but a philosopher should endeavour to secure. For it might possibly happen, that a man of confined education would not, for the sake of distant and speculative advantages, willingly forego the common routine of domestic comfort. Such a man might think his wife better employed in making custards than in making syllogisms; in pickling cucumbers than in extracting the square root. He might allow a woman a proper degree of spirit, without wishing to tear her husband's books, or box his ears; and, if he were extremely precise, might assert the possibility of preserving her reputation for chastity, without banishing her husband à mensa et thoro.

I am, &c.

I lately listened to the conversation of two of my city friends, who were indulging some romantic reveries, respecting the ease of a Farmer's life, and the profits of husbandry. These gentlemen, although both were established in a lucrative profession, were eager for an immediate migration to fields and fountains, and were positive that gold might be gathered from every haycock, and that Tranquillity had no more favourite residence than in the woods of Genesee, or on the banks of Mohawk river. I listened to their raptures with a smile of incredulity, for as I had actually lived many years in the country, I knew the fallacy of these extravagant rural speculations. The story of Dr. Shifler in the Idler tells the whole truth, and after the perusal of the following remarks by a writer of admirable sense and forcible expression, perhaps the dream of rural riches will vanish away.

"The pleasures of rural life form one of the common places of the poets, and they have adorned it with the richest colours of description. He who believes their representations will deem nothing more conducive to his happiness than to fly to the remotest wilds, to forests dark with shades, to rivulets gliding over pebbles, to plains clothed with verdure, covered with flocks, and resounding with the shepherd's pipe. That pastoral poets should indulge in such luxuriant descriptions is not wonderful; but even Horace, the man of the world, and the poet of common sense, has, in some passages, yielded to the delusion, and endeavoured to extend it."

The employments of agriculture and the life of the husbandman have also been described by the poets, to use the language of Addison on another occasion as,

Profuse of bliss, and pregnant with delight.

Under these two prepossessions, the one in favour of rural felicity, and the other of the joys of farming; the man of business in town, whether professional, or commercial, has toiled for gain with the hope of retiring into the country in middle, or declining life; which he indulges with no less ardour, than if he were going into Elysium on the day of his long wished for retreat.

But the blaze, which imagination kindled has been extinguished on approaching it; the vision of happiness has vanished, like a dream, on hastening to its actual enjoyment.

It is natural to inquire into the cause of the disappointment. Rural delights are certainly great; though exaggerated by the poet's fancy. Rural employments are certainly natural, amusing, and healthy; though extolled too highly when represented as furnishing delight, unalloyed with vexation.

Persons, who retire to rural life, raise their expectations too high above the pitch, which human enjoyments are ever found to attain. A golden age, when the earth brought forth her fruits with spontaneous exuberance, must be revived to satisfy the ideas of felicity, which they have connected with the operations of agriculture. Success in farming, and without success there can be no pleasure in it, depends on the labours of those, who are commonly unwilling to labour hard for a gentleman, and who, under the appearance of rustic simplicity, conceal a low cunning scarcely compatible with honesty. The defective work, the exorbitant demands, the discontented dispositions of these soon give a very different idea of rural swains, herds, and shepherds, than was received from the poets. These alone are able to convince him of his error, who retires to a farm as to an occupation of uninterrupted tranquillity. Though his circumstances should be such as cannot be affected by any of their injurious treatment, yet his temper will probably be tried by their perverse behaviour; he may not be deeply wounded, but his ease will be effectually destroyed for a time, though he should be only scratched by a bramble, or pricked by a thorn.

Inclement weather and unfavourable seasons combining with improper management, render the produce of the farm, after great expense, and no little solicitude, scanty and ill-conditioned. The object in a lucrative view is perhaps inconsiderable; but disappointment even in trifles, when the heart is set upon them is bitter. Thorns and briars, thistles and nettles are the crop, where wheat was cultivated, or where figs and grapes were expected. Instead of seeing lands laughing with corn, the disappointed gentleman farmer hangs, in a pensive posture, over the gate of the field, that smiles as it were in mockery with the red poppy, the blue bugloss, the yellow charlock, the white bearbind, the silky mallow, and the feather topped dandelion.

If he delights in a garden there are also vexations will spring up among the choicest fruits and flowers. See yonder wall most beautifully covered with peaches that blush like the cheeks of Hebe and Maria. He has chosen the tree with the nicest judgment, trained them with incessant care, and now they are ripe, and to-morrow the finest shall be culled, for it is Maria's birth-day. To-morrow's sun arises, and lo! the wall is stripped. Some caitiff, at the midnight hour, plucked them all with unrelenting hand, and by this time they are safe in the market.

He delights in poultry; he feeds the chickens and the ducklings with his own hand. He chooses the most beautiful in plumage, the largest in size, the finest for the table. But that varlet, Reinard, has stolen them all, but a few that were shut up in a coop to be fattened for newyear's day. These, however, he preserves; but, upon computing the expense, he finds that he might have bought them much fatter and finer at master Hodge the farmer's, at half the expense.

He fattens his own hogs, and every bit of pork stands him in double the money he could buy it for at the butchers. He keeps a dairy, but the cows die with disease, the calves are still-born, the butter rancid for want of care, and the milk sour. Hodge would supply his table with every article, cent per cent cheaper than he can make it at home, and without the least trouble, or hazard of a bad commodity.

Fortunately for the crows and dogs, he keeps a little flock of sheep with the prettiest musical bells ever heard in the country. But for want of skill and care in the management, half of them die of the rot, or are worried to death by curs. Those, which he kills, furnish his table with an inferior mutton, as dear as venison.

He brews his own beer, presses his own cider, and bakes his own bread; but three times out of four the beer is bitter, the cider vapid, and the bread, luckily for the pigs, heavy.

Thus disappointed, he is ready to exclaim with sighs,

Vitæ me redde priori. HORACE.

and looks back with regret on the ease, plenty, liberty, and sociableness of the city, which he once detested.

But I do not mean that a conclusion should be drawn that the country and rural employments, are not able to furnish much pleasure. My wish is to convince persons, who retire into the country late in life, for ease only, that they must not raise their expectations of rural happiness too high; and that in pursuit of ease they ought not to engage in farming to any great extent, because it is an employment full of anxiety and care, subject to much disappointment, and as little adapted to procure ease as the commerce of the busy trader, the employments of the statesman, the lawyer or the physician. He, who wishes in retirement to enjoy all the tranquillity, which the country can afford should rather be a spectator, than a sharer in the employments of agriculture; and be satisfied with inhaling the sweet air and viewing the delightful scenes of the country, without troubling himself, unless he is skilled in husbandry, to raise and produce those necessary commodities of life, which he may purchase at the market cheaper and better, without any anxiety.

* Ut in otia tuta recedant. HORACE.

In the progress of my evening studies, I affect variety both for my own amusement, and the gratification of my readers. I hurry from this book to 'tother; from prose to poetry, and mingle both in my medley collection upon a plan similar to that of the purveyors of a dessert, who take care to furnish grapes and pears, and provoke the fickle palate with piquant ginger, or sooth it with bland almonds and the luscious fig. Moore's Anacreon presents the following, which is as sweet and fair, as the lovely flower it celebrates.

THE ROSE.

While we invoke the wreathed Spring,
Resplendent Rose! to thee we'll sing...
Resplendent Rose! the flower of flowers,
Whose breath perfumes Olympus' bowers;
Whose virgin blush, of chastened dye,
Enchants so much our mortal eye.
When pleasure's bloomy season glows,
The graces love to twine the Rose;
The Rose is warm, Dione's bliss,
And flushes like Dione's kiss?
Oft has the poet's magic tongue
The Rose's fair luxuriance sung;
And long the muses, heavenly maids,
Have rear'd it in their tuneful shades.
When, at the early glance of morn,
It sleeps upon the glittering thorn,
'Tis sweet to dare the tangled fence,
And cull the timid flower thence,
And wipe, with tender hand, away
The tears that on its blushes lay!
'Tis sweet to hold the infant stems
Yet-dropping with Aurora's gems,
And fresh inhale the spicy sighs,
That from the weeping buds arise.
When revel reigns, when mirth is high,
And Bacchus beams in every eye,
Our rosy fillets scent exhale,
And fill with balm the fainting gale!
When morning paints the orient skies,
Her fingers burn with roseate dyes,
The nymphs display the Rose's charms,
It mantles o'er their graceful arms;
Through Cytherea's form it glows,
And mingles with the living snows.
The Rose distils a healing balm,
The beating pulse of pain to calm;
Preserves the cold injured clay,
And mocks the vestige of decay:
And when, at length, in pale decline,
Its florid beauties fade and pine,
Sweet, as in youth, its balmy breath
Diffuses odour even in death!
Oh! whence could such a plant have sprung?
Attend...for thus the tale is sung.
When, humid from the silvery stream,
Effusing beauty's warmest beam,
Venus appear'd, in flushing hues,
Mellow'd by Ocean's briny dews...
When, in the starry courts above,
The pregnant brain of mighty Jove
Disclos'd the nymph of azure glance...
The nymph who shakes the martial lance!
Then, then in strange eventful hour,
The earth produced an infant flower,
Which sprung, with blushing tinctures drest,
And wail'd o'er its parent's breast,
The gods beheld this brilliant birth,
And hail'd the Rose...the boon of earth!
With nectar drops, a ruby tide,
The sweetly-orient buds they dyed,
And bade them bloom, the flowers divine
Of him who sheds the teeming wine;
And bade them, on the spangled thorn
Expand their bosoms to the morn!

BIOGRAPHY.

Robert Burton, brother to the Leicestershire antiquary, is noted as the author of a once popular book, the "Anatomy of Melancholy." He was born at Lindley in 1576, and studied for the church, first at Brazen-nose-college, then at Christ-church, Oxford. In 1616 he was presented to the vicarage of St. Thomas in Oxford, and he had also the rectory of Segrave in Leicestershire, both which preferments he held till his death. He was a close and general student, addicted to judicial astrology, and well versed in all the school learning of the times. He was a man of great integrity and benevolence, but of a humorous and melancholic temper, which gave an oddity to his conduct. When in his melancholy fits, nothing would divert him but going to listen to the ribaldry of the barge-men, at which he would burst into loud peals of laughter. At other times he was one of the most facetious companions in the university. It was to soothe his melancholic disposition that he composed his "Anatomy of Melancholy," a singular work, treating on the causes, effects, and cure of that morbid affection, chiefly by quotations from all the authors of antiquity, which abound in every page, and are thinly interspersed with thoughts of his own. These, however, are often very striking, and display much depth and originality of reflection. The work was first printed in quarto, and afterwards went through several editions in folio, to the great emolument of the bookseller. It is now become very scarce, having been recalled to notice by an ingenious essay of Dr. Ferrier of Manchester, who, in detecting many other plagiarisms of the celebrated Sterne, has pointed out various passages copied verbatim from Burton. The author was not cured by his own remedy. He died at Christ-church in 1639, and the following inscription of his own writing was put upon his monument: "Paucis notus, paucioribus ignotus, hic jacet Democritus junior, cui vitam dedit & mortem melancholia;" (Known to few, unknown to fewer, here lies Democritus, junior, to whom melancholy gave life and death.)

LEVITY.

THE ART OF LAGONICOGRAPHY.

[From the Freeman's Magazine.]

In Gulliver's Travels we find an account of a people, or a sect of wise and economical men, who knowing what a precious thing breath is, and how frequently it is wasted on trifles, carry about with them a number of things, by means of which they make their sentiments known without the trouble and fatigue which attend speech. I am about to trouble you with some memorials of a friend of mine, whose economy extends principally to writing; and although I believe he can converse as volubly and as much to the purpose as most men, yet preserves, in all his letters, the most inflexible adherence to that kind of writing which is denominated the laconic.

As we live separated by some hundred miles, we have no opportunity of conference, unless by letter; and my esteem for him is such, that I am always glad to receive the smallest scrap from his pen: happy it is for me that I am so; for I assure you, sir, I never receive any thing but the smallest scraps from him; all my endeavours to draw from him a long letter have hitherto been in vain; twenty of his epistles would not make up the sum of a common letter of business: and so very saving is he of his ink (for he sends paper enough), that I very rarely can get a dear sir from him, and yet he thinks I am so well acquainted with his hand, that he hardly ever signs his name. As to the place of abode, or the day of the month, or even the month and year, these are things left entirely to my conjecture.

I once had an idea that my friend had taken the alarm at the too common practice of printing confidential letters after the death of a great man, and that he was determined no person should have it in his power to serve him so; but when I consider his modesty, and that he thinks much less of himself than other people do who know him, I am satisfied that my conjecture is not just; and that with every talent for easy and elegant epistolary correspondence, he would be the only man hurt at the publication of his letters in any shape. As I told you before, however, he puts this quite out of my power; for were I disposed to publish such as I am possessed of, five hundred of them would not fill up the space of a shilling pamphlet; and, what is more, the want of date and subscription would lay me open to a flat denial of authenticity from any of his friends. Since your Magazine appeared, I have told him again and again that I would send you some of his letters, but he gave neither consent nor dissent; and I am determined to try the experiment, and perhaps draw from him eight or ten lines in answer, which will be an acquisition of no small moment.

While I am writing to you, sir, I have received a letter from him. A sister of mine who lives in his neighbourhood, being near her time, as it is called, and my correspondent being very intimate in the family, I asked him to write me an account of her health, or whether delivered; in truth, I was here choosing one of two evils, for her husband is as laconic as my friend. The letter I received contains the following twelve words, and no more.

"All tight as yet, but very weary, and looking out for land."

No signature, and no date; and a wonder it is that he took the trouble to address it to me. Many instances could I give of this provoking laconicism, but I shall confine myself to two or three, presuming they will be sufficient.

My friend possesses a considerable sum in the bank, and I am employed by him as attorney, to receive dividends, or sell, if need be. I wrote him on the approach of a rupture with Spain, as many conceived that the stocks would fall, and were selling out their money; the answer was,

"Dear Sir,

"Sell if you think proper, but not all."

The appearance of Dear Sir was novel, but so much was yet left to my judgment by the not all, that I was obliged to request he would let me know how much—and the answer was,

"I will consider of it.

"Yours sincerely, &c."

And here that affair ended, as he has never since considered any thing farther. A very great riot having lately taken place in the town where he lives, I wrote to him for the particulars, without ever reflecting that he was the last man in the world I could expect such information from. The following is a literal copy of his epistle:

"All quiet now, and no great mischief done."

The only other instance of his brevity, with which I shall trouble you, occurred on the death of an uncle: on this melancholy occasion he sent me an official notice, as follows:

"Squaretoes is gone—brush your black cloathes—but he has left you nothing."

Had not a newspaper at the same time informed me of the death of this gentleman, I should have been very much puzzled to know who was meant by Squaretoes! But thus it is, sir, that I am treated, in return for whole sheets of paper, closely written, and which, I am told, he is very impatient to receive.—I hope you will insert this in your next number; for if any thing can draw a letter from him, that will—and if the scheme succeeds, you may depend on my most grateful acknowledgements.

I am, sir, yours,

T. B.

THE COMFORTS OF A CLUB.

SIR,

I have read in Tavernier, or some other traveller, of an English merchant who was cured of an inveterate gout by a severe bastinado, prescribed by a Turkish chiaus in his return to Constantinople with the head of an unfortunate bashaw. It was, doubtless, a severe remedy, and not very easily administered; but it proved so effectual, that the patient never failed, during the remainder of his life, to drink every day to the health of his Mussulman physician. Though I never underwent such a painful application, I myself have been cured of a bad habit by a very unpalatable medicine; to use the phrase of Shakspeare, a certain person gave me the bastinado with his tongue.

You must know, I am a middle-aged man in good circumstances, arising from the profits of a creditable profession, which I have exercised for many years with equal industry and circumspection. At the age of twenty-six I married the daughter of an eminent apothecary, with whom I received a comfortable addition to my fortune. The honey moon was scarce over, when we mutually found ourselves mismatched. She had been educated in notions of pleasure; and I had flattered myself that she would be contented with domestic enjoyments, and place among that number the care of her family: for my own part, I had been used to relax myself in the evening from the fatigues of the day, among a club of honest neighbours, who had been long acquainted with one another. The conversation was sometimes enlivened by quaint sallies and sly repartees; but politics formed the great topic, by which our attention was attracted like the needle by the pole; on this subject I had the vanity to think I was looked upon as a kind of oracle by the society. I had carefully perused the Universal History, together with the Political State of Europe, and pored over maps, until I knew, ad unguem, the situation of all the capital cities in Christendom. This branch of learning was of great consequence to the members of our club, who were generally so little acquainted with geography, that I have known them mistake the Danube for a river of Asia, and Turin for the metropolis of Tuscany. I acquired some reputation by describing the course of the Ohio in the beginning of our American troubles; and I filled the whole club with astonishment, by setting to rights one of the members who talked of crossing the sea to Scotland. During a suspension of foreign intelligence, we sported in puns, conundrums, and merry conceits; we would venture to be inoffensively waggish in bantering each other: we sometimes retailed extempore witticisms, which, between friends, we had studied through the day; and we indulged one or two senior members in their propensity to record the adventures of their youth. In a word, we constituted one of the most peaceful and best affected communities in this great metropolis.

But the comforts of this and all other club conversations, were in a little time destroyed by a stranger, whom one of the members introduced into our society; he was a speculative physician, who had made his fortune by marrying a wealthy widow, now happily in her grave. The essence of all the disputants, gossips, and attorneys of three centuries seemed to enter into the composition of this son of Æsculapius; his tongue rode at full gallop like a country man-midwife; his voice was loud, flat, and monotonous, like the clack of a mill, or rather like the sound produced by a couple of flails on a barn floor—our ears were threshed most unmercifully; we supposed he was an adept in all the arts depending upon medicine, and a politician of course by the courtesy of England; but all subjects were alike to this universalist, from the most sublime metaphysics to the mystery of pin-nak-ing: he disputed with every one of us on our several professions, and silenced us all in our turns: not that he was master of every theme on which he pretended to expatiate; on the contrary, we soon discovered him to be superficial and misinformed in divers articles, and attempted to refute what he had advanced, by breaking out into divers expressions of dissent, such as, "But, pray sir"—"I beg your pardon, sir"—"Give me leave, sir"—"I will venture to say you are misinformed in that particular," and other civil checks of the same nature; but they had no effect upon this hard mouthed courser, except that of stimulating him to proceed with redoubled velocity. He seemed both deaf and blind to the remonstrances and chagrin of the company; but dashed through thick and thin, as if he had undertaken to harangue by inch of candle. We were so everborne by the tide of his loquacity, that we sat for three successive evenings half petrified with astonishment and vexation. Sometimes we were cheered with a glimpse of hope that this torrent would soon exhaust itself; but, alas! we found him a perennial source of noise and disputation. I could not help repeating with Horace,

"Rusticus expectat dum defluat amnis; at ille
"Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis ævum."

The most provoking circumstance of this nuisance was, that he did not speak either for the entertainment or information of the company; he had no other view but that of displaying his own superiority in point of understanding; his aim was to puzzle, to perplex, and to triumph; and, by way of manifesting his wit, he extracted a wretched quibble from every hint, motion, or gesticulation of the society. Overhearing one of the members summing up the reckoning, he denied that five and three made eight, and undertook to prove the contrary by mathematical demonstration. When I called for a bowl of punch, he affirmed there was no such thing in nature; that bowls were made of porcelain, earthen-ware, wood or metals; but they could not be mad of punch, which was a liquid—ergo, I had confounded the majus with the minus; for, omne majus in se continet minus. An honest gentleman, who sat by the fire, having burned his fingers with a hot poker, the doctor assured him the accident was altogether an illusion; that fire did not burn, and that he could not feel pain, which was not a substance, but a mode: ergo, not cognizable by the sense of touching.

As we were naturally quiet and pacific, and, in truth, overawed by the enormous size of his pugilistic member, as well as by his profound skill in the art of man-slaying, which he did not fail to promulgate, we patiently submitted to the scourge of his impertinence: praying heartily that he might succeed so far in his profession as to become a practising doctor. Sometimes we enjoyed an intermission for half an evening, congratulating ourselves upon the deliverance, and began to resume our old channel of conversation, when all of a sudden he would appear like the Gorgon's head... then every countenance fell, and every tongue was silent: his organ forthwith began to play, and nothing was heard but his eternal clapper. It was no discourse which he uttered, but a kind of talkation (if I may be allowed the expression,) more dissonant and disagreeable than the glass alarm-bell of a wooden clock, that should ring twenty-four hours without intermission. To support ourselves under this perpetual annoyance, we had recourse to an extraordinary pint, and smoked a double portion of tobacco; but these expedients, instead of diminishing, served only to increase the effect of his clamour. Our tempers were gradually soured; we grew peevish to every body, but particularly sullen and morose to the doctor, who, far from perceiving the cause of our disgust, believed himself the object of our esteem and admiration; he was too much engrossed by his own impertinence to observe the humours of other men.

For three long months did we bear this dreadful visitation; at length the oldest member, who was indeed the nest-egg, died, and the other individuals began to drop off. Nothing could be more disagreeable than the situation to which I was now reduced. I was engaged in fatiguing business all day, out of humour all the evening, went home extremely ruffled, with the headach, heartburn, and hiccup, and ruminated till morning on my family discomforts. Upon recollecting all these circumstances, I pitied my condition, and compassion was soon changed into contempt. This roused my pride and resolution; I determined to turn over a new leaf, and recover the importance I had lost: I with great difficulty discontinued my attendance at the club, and my absence contributed in a great measure to its dissolution. The doctor was in a little time obliged to harangue to empty chairs, and the landlord became a bankrupt.

Thus was I delivered from the worst of plagues, an impertinent and talkative companion. I have now bid adieu to clubs, and am grown a family man; I see myself beloved by my children, revered by my servants, and respected by my neighbours. I find my expenses considerably lessened, my economy improved, my fortune and credit augmented; and in the fulness of my enjoyment, I cannot help drinking to the health of the loquacious doctor, who is likely to perform much more important cures with his tongue, than ever he will be able to effect by his prescriptions.

If you think Mr. Editor, that these hints may be serviceable to others labouring under the distemper of which I am so happily cured, you may freely communicate them to the public by the channel of your Magazine, which has been the source of much amusement to,

Sir, your very humble servant,

MISOLAUS.

DRAMA.

A new Comedy, entitled Lovers' Resolutions, was lately performed on Drury-Lane theatre, for the first time. The following are the principal characters:

Lord Berville	-	-	-	Mr. Wroughton.
General Wilmore	-	-	-	Mr. R. Palmer.
Major Manford	-	-	-	Mr. Pope.
Jack Worthington	-	-	-	Mr. Bannister.
Mr. Mapletop	-	-	-	Mr. Dawton.
Timothy Mapletop	-	-	-	Mr. Suett.
David	-	-	-	Mr. Wathen.
Lady Caroline	-	-	-	Mrs. Pope.
Fanny Rivers	-	-	-	Mrs. Young.
Mrs. Mapletop	-	-	-	Mrs. Sparks.

The fickleness of lovers' resolutions is the subject upon which the piece is grounded, and hence it derives its name. The scene opens with Lord Berville soliciting a renewal of that love which he had once interrupted between Lady Caroline, his daughter, and her lover Major Manford. The pride of the injured officer triumphs over all the weakness of his heart, though assailed by the entreaties of her father, the threatened violence of General Wilmore, her uncle, and the still more powerful influence of Miss Rivers, an amiable young lady under Major Manford's protection, all acting in concert to effect a reconciliation. His determination appears now fixed; but it soon changes. A sight of Lady Caroline, and the belief that his unkindness would endanger her life, overcome his resolution, awake all his former tenderness, and lead the way to their union. In the progress of this piece, so long as the lover's pride remains unshaken, there is no great deficiency of interest. It is conducted according to the rules of chaste and legitimate comedy; the sentiment is happily diversified with honour, friendship, courage, and parental solicitude, conveyed in simple and unaffect language, and wrought up with so much judgment as to excite a considerable degree of attention. Farther than this point, however, we cannot extend our praise. The first interview with Lady Caroline divests the lover, whom we admired as a brave soldier, slighted for his poverty, though rich in honour, of all his interest, and cloathes him in more than woman's weakness. The sight of a hero, who had fought and bled upon the sands of Egypt fainting from excess of feeling in the presence of his mistress, and supported by two delicate females, excited universal laughter. Nothing is so ludicrous as delicacy, when pushed beyond its limits. Into this fault the author fell, so early as the middle of the third act; and as it continued in a greater or less proportion to the end; so the effect and impression of the last half of the piece were exactly what the most successful farce might be expected to produce. There appeared to be a falling off in the latter scenes, even in the language, which was marked in many passages with common place and inelegant expressions.

It is much to be lamented, that a comedy, evidently intended to be a legitimate one, independent of all meretricious ornament or trickery, should be so defective in its essential points. As to plot, it has none. It exhibits a number of characters but they form no combination. As grave or gay they may serve as contrasts to each other; but their interests are not mixed so as to promote or obstruct the catastrophe, or constitute a connected whole. Miss Rivers is an interesting and accomplished girl, and Jack Worthington is an honest, good hearted, illiterate Kentish yeoman; but the union of two persons so unlike, gives no pleasure to the audience. The family of the Mapletops are also mere matter of embellishment, to fill up the scene, particularly Timothy, a man milliner, introduced merely as a butt for some feeble wit directed against that effeminate set of tradesmen. It is unnecessary to pursue farther a subject that is not likely, from its reception, to draw the public attention a second time. It is said to be the production of Mr. Cumberland; but, though there are some marks of his pen in the delineation of the characters, it is so much beneath his muse, we wish to doubt the report. The Prologue spoken by Mr. Raymond, and the Epilogue by Mrs. Young, were, like the play, vapid and insipid.

The house overflowed at an early hour. Mr. Bannister attempted to announce a second representation, but without success. The disappointment cannot be attributed to the performers. Mr. and Mrs. Pope, the hero and heroine of the piece, indeed all the performers without exception, exerted themselves with zeal, and rendered it ample justice. Mrs. Spark's part is of little compass, but that little was filled with merit.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

A Votive Ode to Philadelphia beauty, is worthy of its theme. Our opinion of the sex is as liberal as that of our captivated correspondent.

Still reign at will, victorious fair,
In British, or Columbian air!
Still with each envying flower adorn
Your tresses, radiant as the morn;
Still let each Asiatic dye
Rich tints for your gay robes supply;
Still through the dancer's labyrinth float
And swell the sweetly lengthened note;
And when charm'd circles round you close
Of rhyming bards and smiling beaus,
Whilst all with eager looks contend
Their wit or worth to recommend,
Still let your mild, yet piercing eyes
Impartially adjudge the prize.

"M." is advised to write for the Port Folio. In the absence of her Satire, more clubs than one require the wholesomeness of advice, and, perhaps, the discipline of reproof.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

There are in the city of Paris, four hundred and fifty-five booksellers, three hundred and forty book-printers, one hundred and thirty-eight masterbookbinders, forty-one stichers, three hundred and twenty-seven engravers, eighty-five copperplate printers, forty-nine print-sellers, and seventy-one shops for retailing old books. The newspapers of Paris are not so many as before the consular government, the following are the numbers published daily of the following papers:

Moniteur, (official paper)	20,000
Journal des Defenseurs, (demi-off)	10,000
Journal de Paris,	16,000
Publiciste,	14,000
Journal des Debates,	12,000
Clef du Cabinet,	6,000

The other papers, such as the old court paper, called Gazette de France, and the Journal du Commerce, Le Citoyen Francaise, Journal du Soir, &c. from five to two thousand. One paper exclusively devoted to advertisements, called Les Petits Affiches, prints thirty thousand daily!

We lately copied from the British Critic, a brief review of the sermons of Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, one of the most eloquent of the American divines. In the London Review, for August 1801, we find the following criticism; which is still more favourable.

From the London Review for August 1801.

"SERMONS ON VARIOUS SUBJECTS, BY SAMUEL STANHOPE SMITH, D. D. PRESIDENT OF THE COLLEGE OF NEW-JERSEY, IN AMERICA."

It is justly observed by the author, that no species of composition is more difficult than that before us, to execute well; so as at once to edify and please, to give the grace of novelty to old and trite truths, and to add the decent and lawful embellishments of art to the simplicity of the gospel. Arduous as the task is we think the preacher has succeeded. His models appear to be the French divines who flourished at the close of the last and commencement of the present century; and particularly Masillon. The language has energy without enthusiasm, and force without bombast: it is correct and perspicuous, elegant and impressive, and seems well calculated to alarm and convince the obstinate and careless. The subjects are....the causes of infidelity...The dangers of pleasure....The rich man and Lazarus....The penitent woman at the feet of Jesus....Industry....The Lord's supper a memorial of Christ....The united influence of reflection and sacred reading in cultivating and purifying the morals....The forgiveness of injuries....The pleasures of religion....Secret faults....Public vices....Death....The last judgment....And the happiness of good men in a future state.

The author professes to have studied to unite the simplicity which becomes the pulpit, with a portion of that elegance which is now so loudly demanded in every kind of writing, and, with the variety of his subjects to have adopted a correspondent variety of style.

In a coffee-house, in London, the following hint was once stuck up by a witty wag. "Gentlemen, learning to spell, are requested to use yesterday's papers."

My Lord Bacon very finely observes that "this same truth is a naked and open daylight that doth not shew the masques, and mummeries, and triumphs of the world half so stately and daintily as candle-light."

The tribe of vulgar politicians, says Edmund Burke, are the lowest of our species. There is no trade so vile and mechanical, as government in their hands. Virtue is not their habits. They are out of themselves in any course of conduct, recommended only by conscience and glory. A large, liberal, and prospective view of the interest of states passes with them for romance, calculators compute them out of their senses. Jesters and buffoons shame them out of every thing grand and elevated.

The Editor is in possession of one of the following Stereotype editions. It is singularly accurate and beautiful.

IMPORTANT IMPROVEMENT.

(From the London Monthly Magazine—for March.)

The practice of Stereotype Printing, lately adopted in Paris by Didot, appears to be one of the most considerable improvements connected with literature, that has been made since the invention of moveable types—Those who confound the book-printing with the solid pages produced in Didot's manner, are mistaken in their notions of its advantages. The solid blocks were carved or cut with great labour in a mass, whereas Didot's solid pages are cast from pages first set up with moveable types, and the moveable types are thus constructed to the best use of which they are susceptible. Upon the stereotype plan, the page is first set up in moveable types, a mould or impression is then taken of the page with any suitable plastic material, and afterwards as many solid pages are cast from the mould as may be wanted. The expense of a solid page does not exceed that of resetting it in moveable types, and the obvious advantage lies in the power which they give of taking off as many impressions at any one time as are likely to be sold. Books by this invention, will be greatly reduced in value, and those standard works for which there is a constant demand will never be out of print. Didot is enabled, to sell at Paris, neat editions of Virgil, Phædrus, Cornelius Nepos, Horace, Sallust, Ovid, the Vicar of Wakefield, the Sentimental Journey, and lady Montague's Letters, as low as seven-pence half-penny per copy. Mr. Philips, of St. Paul's Church-yard, hopes to be able to present the British public, in a short time, with neat and correct editions of the classics, and of many of the best English authors, on terms equally moderate.

Bishop Horsey, in a sermon on the martyrdom of Charles I, has the following passage. It is in that justly indignant tone, which every valiant and right onward man should hold to jacobins and levellers.

If any enjoying the blessings of the British government, dare to avow the wicked sentiment, that this day of national contrition, this rueful day of guilt and shame is a proud day for England to be remembered as such, by the latest posterity of freemen, with such persons it is meet that we abjure all brotherhood. Their spot is not the spot of our family. They have no claim upon our brotherly affection.

In the following paragraph Mr. Burke describes the caution and accuracy with which he once undertook the business to reform.

He proceeded upon principles of research to put him in possession of matter; on principles of method to regulate it; and on principles in the human mind, and in civil affairs to secure and perpetuate the operation.

It is deplorable to remark the prevalence of quackery in the United States. The New-York papers have whole columns, devoted to the advertising of the delusive nostrums of medical swindlers. Many of these mountebanks are "acquitted felons" and imported scoundrels, but we have a gang of physical pretenders of our own growth, who with their pills and lozenges harass the bodies of those miserable dupes who swallow such poisons.

SELECTED POETRY.

[He who remembers the jovial ballad of Nightingale, will not dislike New-Castle Beer, a Drinking Song.]

When fame brought the news of Great-Britain's success,

And told at Olympus each gallant defeat;
Glad Mars sent by Mercury orders express,

To summon the deities all to a treat;

Blithe Comus was plac'd

To guide the gay feast,

And freely declared there was choice of good cheer:

Yet vow'd to his thinking

For exquisite drinking,

Their nectar was nothing to New-Castle beer.

The great god of war to encourage the fun,

And humour the taste of his whimsical guest,

Sent a message that moment to Moore's for a tun

Of stingo, the stoutest, the brightest, and best:

No gods....they all swore

Regal'd so before,

With liquor so lively, so potent and clear:

Each deified fellow

Got jovially mellow,

In honour, brave boys, of our New-Castle beer.

Apollo, perceiving his talents refine,

Repents he drank Helicon water so long:

He bow'd, being ask'd by the musical nine,

And gave the gay board an extempore song;

But, ere he began

He toss'd off his can,

There's nought, like good liquor, the fancy to cheer,

Then sang with great merit

The flavour and spirit

His godship had found in our New-Castle beer.

'Twas stingo like this made Alcides so bold,

It brac'd up his nerves and enliven'd his powers;

And his mystical club, that did wonders of old,

Was nothing, my lads, but such liquor as ours.

The horrible crew

Whom Hercules slew,

Were poverty, calumny, sorrow and fear,

Such a club would you borrow

To drive away sorrow

Apply for a jorum of New-Castle beer.

Ye youngsters, so diffident, languid and pale

Whom love, like the cholic, so rudely infests,

Take a cordial of this 'twill probatum prevail,

And drive the cur Cupid away from your breasts,

Dull whining despise

Grow rosy and wise,

No longer the jest of good fellows appear,

Bid adieu to your folly

Get tipsy....be jolly,

And smoke o'er a tankard of New-Castle beer.

Ye fanciful folk, for whom physic prescribes,

Whom bolus and potion have harass'd to death,

Ye wretches, whom law and her ill looking tribes

Have hunted about till you're quite out of breath,

Here's shelter and ease

No craving for fees,

No danger, no doctor, no bailiff is near,

Your spirits this raises

It cures your diseases,

There's freedom and health in our New-Castle beer.

HYMEN, A FABLE.

When Doris with a blush comply'd,

To be the fond Nicander's bride,

His wild imagination ran

On raptures never known by man....

How high the tides of fancy swell
Expression must despair to tell.

A painter call'd,....Nicander cries,

"Descending from the radiant skies,

Draw me a bright a beauteous boy

The herald of connubial joy,

Draw him with thy peculiar care,

Make him beyond Adonis fair,

Give to his cheeks a roseate hue

Let him have eyes of heavenly blue,

A lustre o'er his charms display

More glorious than the beams of day....

Expect, sir, if you can succeed

A premium for a prince indeed."

His talents straight, the painter try'd,

And, ere the nuptial knot was ty'd,

A picture in the noblest taste,

Before the fond Nicander plac'd.

The lover thus arraign'd his skill

"Your execution's monstrous ill,

A different form my fancy made

You're quite a bungler at the trade,

Where is the robe's luxuriant flow?

Where is the cheek's celestial glow?

Where are the looks so fond and free?

'Tis not an Hymen, Sir, for me."

The painter bow'd with this reply,

"My colours a'nt, your honour, dry;

When time has mellow'd every tint,

'Twill please you, or the deuce is in't;

I'll watch the happy change and then

Attend you with my piece again."

In a few months the painter came

With a performance....still the same.

"Take it away," the husband cried,

I have repeated cause to chide;

Sir, you should all excesses shun;

This is a picture overdone!

There's too much ardour in that eye,

The tincture on the cheek's too high,

The robes have a lascivious play,

The attitude's too loosely gay,

Friend, on the whole this piece, for me,

Is too luxuriant, far too free."

The painter thus...."the fault's you find

Are form'd in your capricious mind,

To passion a devoted slave,

The first directions, Sir, you gave;

Possession has repell'd the flame

Nor left a sentiment the same.

"My picture is design'd to prove

The changes of precarious love.

"On the next stair-case rais'd on high,

Regard it with a curious eye;

As to the first steps you proceed,

'Tis an accomplish'd piece indeed!

But, as you mount some paces higher

Is there a grace that do't expire?"

So various is the human mind,

Such are the frailties of mankind,

What, at a distance charm'd our eyes,

After attainment droops and dies.

[We request some "doctus utriusque lingue" to render the following pretty song from the French.]

CHANSON.

Profitez bien, jeunes fillettes,

Des momens fait pour les amours;

Quand on a passe ses beaux jours

Adieu panniens, vendanges son faites.

Cachez bien les faveurs secrettes,

Amans, dont vous êtes comblés;

Si tot que vous les relevez

Adieu panniens, vendanges son faites.

Il faut s'avoir en amourettes

Se saisir des tendres momens;

Pour des trop timides amans,

Adieu panniens, vendanges son faites.

Faites bien vos marchés, grisettes,

Avant qu'aimer des grands seigneurs

Si tot qu'ils ont en vos faveurs

Adieu panniens, vendanges son faites.

Defiez vous de ces coquettes,

Qui n'en veulent qu'à vos écus,

Si tot que vous, n'en avez plus

Adieu panniens, vendanges son faites.

Veuves, restez, comme vous etes

Vos amans sont doux et soûlés

Dès qu'ils sont maîtres du logis

Adieu panniens, vendanges son faites.

TO DELIA,

ON A CHARGE OF INCONSTANCY.

How can Delia think it strange,

Time should make a lover change?

Time brings all things to an end,

Courage can't the blow defend.

See the proud aspiring oak

Falls beneath the fatal stroke;

If on beauty's cheek he preys,

Straight the rosy bloom decays,

Joy puts out his lambent fires,

And, at Time's approach expires.

How can Delia think it strange,

Time should make a lover change?

EPIGRAM.

Colonel Patrick O'Blarney, as honest a teague,

As ever took snuff to repel pest or plague,

Having bought a French snuff-box of papier machee,

Which to open requir'd much pains do you see!

Always kept a bent sixpence at hand in his pocket,

And call'd it his key, by the which to unlock it,

For by niggling and wedging it under the lid,

He came at his rappee, which was under it hid;

But one day, when he wanted a pinch for a friend,

He search'd for his tester but all to no end,

Till at last 'twixt the pocket and lining he found it,

When in rage he cried "arraah the devil confound

it,

"I'll engage you don't serve me that same trick again,

"For to make me after thus hunting in vain,"

So, opening the box by the help of the tizzy,

And cramming his nose till his noddle was dizzy,

He chuck'd in the coin, and exclaim'd with a shrug,

While tight went the rim down, "so there you lie snug,"

And, my hide and seek friend, I beg leave to remind ye

That the next time I want you....I know where to find ye.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.
No. XXXII.

May heaven have compassion upon those whose doom it is to ply the quill in hot weather! If this task require uncommon diligence, at any time, it makes double demands upon us at a sultry season. And if the habitually industrious, may claim some excuse for indolence, at such a time, the Lounger cannot doubt of a ready forgiveness.

My readers, I hope, have not been very much displeased at my silence for a couple of weeks. When the merchant has deserted his counting-house, the lawyer laid aside his docket, the divine his quill, the shoemaker his awl, and the taylor his shears, it cannot be expected that the mere Lounger should stick to his business. If the interest of their families cannot enable the busiest classes of mankind to get the better of the fear of death, when it hovers over them in the tremendous form of pestilence, what can be expected of one who has no interest of this kind to detain him at a post of danger, whose customary haunts are all dismally solitary, and who finds the hospitable door no longer open? To lounge alone is not always an unpleasant thing, but to lounge in company is infinitely more pleasant. To have a companion sympathetically nodding with you, to see him give you yawn for yawn, and puff for puff, and to have now and then your impatience of the lagging hours echoed by a.... "what's a clock now?".... "Damn it, I believe it'll never be night!".... is extremely desirable. At present, however, all my friends have disappeared. The first alarm of yellow fever is sufficient to disperse them into remote quarters. Yet they have withdrawn from melancholy naked streets, not so much from the fear of death as from the love of variety. Several of them are usually detained in town by some unlucky engagement, in the hot season, and a yellow fever, by putting an end to all business, and thereby permitting them to decamp, is a most welcome visitant. Their hopes and fears vibrate as rapidly as those of the plodders, but the vibrations of one set, are directly opposite to those of the other. When the rumours of fever increase, the Lounger's hopes keeps pace with them. Pestilence is to him a sort of key which opens his prison doors, and gives him the liberty of fields and forests. On the contrary, when these rumours decline, their spirits are, in a like degree, depressed. They have nothing before them but the prospect of impertinent customers and insolent duns. Their ears ring with the odious sounds of.... "have you got?".... and "go to the custom-house and ask?".... On the contrary, when the conservators of the public health publish the joyful tidings of.... "Whereas there is good reason to believe that there prevails among us a malignant and CONTAGIOUS fever!".... how lightly do their spirits dance. What gay images of gasping woodcocks and bleeding squirrels; of foaming bottle and fuming segars; of gigs, carriages and tandems, hover before their eyes, and with what impatience do they haste to some paradise of a watering-place where they may revel for a holiday of two or three months!

Two of my particular friends have gone upon an eastern tour, intending to make a long stay at Lebanon and Ball's-town; three others have bent their steps to the sea-shore, while another has retired from the Yellow-fever to the Yellow-springs. They, no doubt, pass their time very agreeably, if the society of those like ourselves contribute to pleasure. I sympathise with them, however, in the present gloomy prospect of returning health. I can easily imagine their saddened visages, and the disconsolate accent with which they cry out.... "two new cases! Only two!" My generosity, however, in the present case, must yield to my selfishness, nor can I help rejoicing at the probable return of the run-aways, not for their own sake, indeed, but for my own. Solitude has become altogether insupportable. I am tired of seeing the aromatic cloud roll from no lips but mine, and I long to hear some other humming than that of ale.

"But why, Mr. Saunter," I suppose somebody will ask, "do not you follow the example of your friends, and betake yourself, like them, to the sea-shore or the spring-head?" Alas! my reasons for staying in the city, dangerous and lonely as it is, are of the most substantial kind. Some of my friends give me credit for my courage, and I deem it politic not to discountenance the imputation. Others are kind enough to lay my stay to the account of charitable motives. As I walk about a good deal, some people generously suspect that I am hunting poverty to her holes, and warming her darkest and dampest corners with the searching beams of my munificence. I do not care to discourage such kind thoughts by unseasonable candour, especially as such construction is put upon my conduct by very few, and is least apt to occur to those who know me best. The real motive of my stay is known only to the old lady, my aunt, with whom I live. She is confounded stingy, and instead of supplying me with the means of being charitable to others, is even deaf to the claims of that charity which begins at home. I would gladly have the power of relieving every body's wants, and especially should be happy to relive all my own wants, and if I want charity, it is a want, not of inclination, but of means.

I see no necessity of making the world as knowing in this respect as my aunt. I will, therefore, sit down contentedly with the praise of charity from those who are kind enough to give it to me, and with the rewards of courage, to which those are surely entitled, who, whatever be their motive, can look yellow fever boldly in the face.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER III.

Unsteadiness of the climate. Shocking climate in the Southern American states.... Fever country.... Unpleasant climate to the Northward.

The causes of the difference between the climate of North-America, (especially that of the Atlantic states where these diversities are the most remarkable) and that of Europe, are not to be ascribed generally to the youth of the hemisphere, as having risen more recently from the ocean, but to the youth of the country with respect to the culture, to the nature of the soil, and to the organization of the mountains. A people must be called young, when the period at which its civilization commenced is recent, even though it should have previously vegetated through whole centuries in barbarous obscurity. In like manner, a country is new, when its cultivation recently commenced, even though the sun should have shone upon it in its original state, for thousands of years. In this respect, therefore, America is a new country and the climate bears all the marks of early youth, namely, an instability and uncertainty without character.—It has no character at all, and flies like young inexperienced people from one extreme to another. A German may, therefore, easily conclude that in this respect he would gain nothing, by changing his own long settled and completely formed climate, for one, still in the cradle. This may be affirmed, at least, of all the climates eastward of the mountains: and any expectation of finding them improve at the southward, would be greatly disappointed.—In that quarter, they grow constantly worse and worse. All the Europeans who have been there, speak with horror of the climate of the Carolinas and of Georgia, at least of the flat parts of those countries, which are at the same time the largest. The heat, even during winter, is often, in the day time, insupportable; yet the sun is scarcely below the horizon, before it grows so cold as even to freeze a little. If the most scrupulous precautions are not observed against these sudden and violent changes, you are immediately crippled in all your limbs, and in a few hours, sent with a raging fever to bed, from which, in general, the patient never rises again. The mortality in Savannah and Charleston is very great, and the yellow fever almost annual, for it often prevails under the name of a bilious fever. At the end of the summer, the heat is perhaps more cruel than in any other known climate, and continually alternating with cold. Thus, every thing that can make a climate disagreeable and pernicious to the body is here united. To the westward of this unlovely climate, where the country rises in hills, the air is more moderate, and more healthy. Yet the heat in summer is very sultry, the changes sudden and violent, the neighbourhood to the water subject to autumnal fevers, and the winters often cold. At Augusta, however, it freezes but seldom, and the rivers are never filled with ice.

A German physician who had been in the two Floridas, described their climate to me, as very unwholesome, and owing to the oppressive heats, and frequent fogs very disagreeable. The people there, he said, were almost always afflicted with fevers, and when the fogs are in any degree dispelled, if you expose yourself bareheaded to the rays of the sun, a "coup de soleil," which commonly kills upon the spot is inevitable. In the neighbourhood of New-Orleans, in Louisiana, the case is the same, but the land is more fruitful. The climate between the sea and the mountains, even westward of the Mississippi as far as Mexico, is still the same, only with the difference that it grows hotter and unhealthier the further you advance, I say between the sea and the mountains, for the opinion that the Apalachian chain terminates in West Florida seems not well founded; we need only cast a look upon the map to perceive that several rivers spring from the summits of the same mountains, and in opposite directions flow, some to the sea, which is there the gulf of Mexico, and the others into the Missouri. These mountains may very properly be considered as a continuation of the Apalachian mountains, for those who go down the Mississippi, from the mouth of the Ohio, to New-Orleans, observe several ranges of not very lofty hills, through which this majestic river rolls. Mr. Mühlenberg of Lancaster, even maintained that the valley in which that inland city lies, extends as far as Mexico.—The chain of mountains which runs parallel to the coast must be passed, even in Mexico before a good climate can be found. It is only in the internal part of North-America, on the west side of these mountains that the climate is milder, more steady and healthier. The same German physician, just mentioned, who had travelled along the Mississippi, in the Illinois and Wabash country, and generally through the whole valley of the Ohio, did indeed assert that the Mississippi, in many places, for instance in the Illinois country, yearly overflows its banks, and makes the air feverish; that in the land of the Illinois, and near the Wabash, annual fevers prevail, as likewise in many parts of Kentucky and on the Ohio; in his opinion, America was in general the land of fevers. Officers and soldiers in the service of the United States, who have been in those parts of the country, to garrison forts, have confirmed to me, the same thing. Every autumn, more than half the troops are confined with bilious fevers.—The same thing may be gathered from Hockenmüller's short description of his travels. He himself and general Putnam were seized with bilious fevers, upon their journey to the Wabash. Imlay says not a word of this, but Imlay is a panegyrist, who touches not, or varnishes over the bad side of the picture. This is especially the case on lake Erie, and the other lakes, and in the Tennessee country. Even the New-York Gazette, in the autumn of 1795, contained on this subject a paragraph, stating that disease and death raged in the western country, or Tennessee district. We should, therefore, be almost justified in the opinion, that America in its temperate latitudes is as unhealthy as Africa or Asia, in their tropical regions, which are, for their insalubrity, cried down more than all others.

To the northward of Pennsylvania, as has just been seen, there can be no expectation of finding a mild climate. It is more steady than at the southward, but it is a steadiness of evil, that is, of wintry cold. New-England is the dominion over which the northwest wind, exerts, above all others, its tyranny. New-Hampshire, Maine, Vermont, and the northern parts of New-York, groan under a winter nearly eight months long. The cold of Canada is proverbial. Yet, in my judgment, these climates cannot be compared with those of Norway, Sweden, Courland, &c.—For in America the height of the sun in summer, ripens many things which in those European countries can never be produced. For instance, wine, as I believe might be raised in New-England, for the vines would be protected by the depth of the snow from freezing. Indian corn is raised, which it would be in vain to attempt producing in Norway. In general the North-American climates do not correspond with those in Europe, which are usually compared with them, for they produce articles which do not thrive in the latter; because in the supposed corresponding American climate, although the cold be equally great, the heat on the other hand, is much greater.

With respect to the climate of Pennsylvania, and the other middle Atlantic states, I will here give the result of my own personal feelings. This will define its character more perceptibly to the senses.

MISCELLANY.

(From the Loiterer.)

Historiæ munus est, rerum gestarum fumam posteris tradere, e quarum cognitione quid agendum sit & quid fugiendum ediscatur. STRADÆ PROLUS.

If the respective merits of our different studies are to be settled by the pleasure which arises from their pursuit, or the utility which results from their attainment, historic knowledge will justly claim the highest rank amongst our literary acquirements. To review with one glance the various accidents, and mark the latent causes, which have given birth to states, or destroyed empires, to place before us the exploits of the daring, the discoveries of the adventurous, and the systems of the wise, confers the greatest superiority which an enlightened age and a polished nation can enjoy, over an æra of darkness and a clan of barbarians. And though history were always what it too often is, only an enumeration of the madness, folly, and crimes of mankind, it is yet some advantage to know what we would wish to avoid; and if mankind make a proper use of this knowledge, they may derive some benefit even from the crimes, and some wisdom from the follies of their ancestors. But history has surely something better to offer, has other claims upon our attention, other motives to excite our industry, and other sweets to reward our labours.

It relates indeed the vices of tyrants, the meanness of their flatterers, and the miseries of their people; but it relates also the virtues of their destroyers, the public spirit of a party struggling for liberty and the happiness of a nation which enjoys it. And if the unhardened sensibility of youth, and the unpolluted bosom of innocence will turn in disgust from the short-lived frenzies of a Caligula or a Claudius, they will dwell with repeated rapture on the glorious annals of a Trajan or an Antonine.—Since history can boast examples at once so powerful to deter from vicious extravagance, and incite to virtuous undertakings, no wonder it has been ever the favourite study of the wise and great: that it has stimulated the one to new discoveries, and the other to difficult achievements. How much the world stands indebted to the former, the world is ready enough to own; and, (however partial instances among the latter may contradict my assertion, and derange my system) I think the best and wisest of our modern princes have owed much of their merit to their historic information, and from pursuing the actions of the wise have become wise themselves. It cannot indeed be denied that an unfortunate choice of examples, or an imperfect imitation of them, has occasioned much misconduct in princes, and many evils to their unhappy subjects. But this is a misfortune arising from the vanity and perverseness of human nature, both in the historian and the reader; in the former from having drawn his heroes in colours that will not bear a close examination, and in the latter for admiring them without any examination at all. Thus an heroic frenzy seems to have descended (in a kind of entail) from Achilles to Alexander, from Alexander to Lewis the fourteenth, and from Lewis to the late king of Prussia; each of whom was particularly careful to imitate the other, in the very worst parts of his character; and consequently, became in regular gradation, more eminent for ambition and cruelty, and more conspicuous for the lust of fame, and the desire of power.

But, however, the zealous imitation of great characters may have done partial mischief, by exciting fresh desires in the breasts of the turbulent, and the stimulating the ambitious to new conquests; it has, on the other hand, been of general benefit to mankind, in awakening a laudable spirit of emulation among their governors, for the encouragement of every useful and every liberal art, which can add lustre to the dignity of the state, and give a higher relish to the social intercourse of individuals.—It would not, perhaps, be hard to prove, that the total neglect of historic studies among the great, and the corruption of it by the monks, was no inconsiderable cause of those deplorable calamities which afflicted the nations of Europe from the tenth to the fifteenth century. To this, I am aware, it will be objected, that it was not in history alone, but in every other department of science, that the feudal chieftains were uninformed: that if they were bad historians, they were worse philosophers; and, consequently, the defects of their government, and the rudeness of their manners, were rather to be attributed to general ignorance in all the arts and sciences, than to particular deficiency in one alone.—That the nobles, and even the kings of the middle ages, were most grossly ignorant of almost every thing, which they ought to have known towards promoting either the happiness of their subjects, or their own reputation, is a fact too notorious to be denied; but it does not, therefore, follow, that their literary deficiencies were equally conspicuous, or alike fatal to the interests of their people.

For the greatest proficiency in many branches of science, however entertaining to themselves, would have been little useful to others; whereas a very moderate acquaintance with history, would have supplied them with precedents, drawn from the highest authority, and rules applicable to general practice, would have guarded them from the commission of numberless errors, and the perpetration of some crimes. It is at least certain, that from the time when this most instructive and most amusing of the sciences obtained any great degree of perfection, political government has assumed a more regular form, and private security been fixed on a firmer basis. Our possessions are no longer a prey to the attacks of foreign invaders, or the tyranny of domestic usurpation, and our peace is no more disturbed by the intrigues of factious Barons, or the tumults of a discontented populace. Nor is this any way extraordinary, for the great have learned, that all unnecessary exertions of power are productive of discontent, murmurs, and insurrections: and their inferiors will readily allow that confusion, disorder, and anarchy, are as certainly attendants on groundless disaffection, and rebellion without cause.—Thus each party, by mutually receding from the rigid inflexibility of their favourite opinions, and partially relinquishing their separate rights, prevent the collision of jarring principles, and secure the general happiness of the whole on a firm foundation.—Thus far, therefore, the study of history must be acknowledged highly beneficial to the community, since it enables us to regulate our conduct, and form our characters by the most unerring rules, and the most unblemished models; teaches us to anticipate the future by a retrospection on the past, and makes us, if not better, at least wiser than our ancestors.—Were the cultivation of history confined to the great and powerful, and conducive only to the welfare of political society, there would need no additional recommendation to entitle it to the applause of a well-informed and enlightened age. But it is the undoubted, perhaps the peculiar merit of this science, to adapt itself to all the various pursuits, by which individuals can either contribute to the general welfare, or promote their own advancement. It recommends itself at the same time to the intrepid and the busy, and will with equal propriety, grace the tent of the general, and the chamber of the lawyer; and whilst the campaigns of Cæsar, and the jurisprudence of Justinian shall find admirers, it will forever remain a doubt whether the heroes of the sword or the gown are under greatest obligations to the recording labours of the historian.—But the advantages of this science will not stop here; the use as well as pleasure of historic studies extend themselves over every land, where the muses have fixed their residence; and are the constant attendants of genius, taste, and learning. For, though the particular works alone of the general, or the statesman, will be selected by those who wish to imitate their actions, and hope to obtain their rewards; who are emulous either of the martial or civic crown; yet there are numbers, to whom the page of history presents rather an extent of varied country, than one well cultivated but confined field; a country sometimes indeed wild, but always grand, and abounding with every flower which can tempt the eye, and every fruit which can gratify the taste. It is the accurate investigator of human nature; the ardent admirer of classic learning, and the elegant cultivator of the liberal arts, who will reap the most general improvement, and draw the most lasting pleasure from works of this kind.—No clime, no age, no nation will escape his penetrating eye, or however distant, dark, or barbarous, be incapable of furnishing some hints to a mind of intelligent observation, or not deserve the candid remarks of rational criticism. The king, the hero, and the legislator, will engage his attention, and be honoured by his remarks, he will bless the good for their virtues, and drop a tear on the calamities of the wretched. But chiefly will he be pleased to observe the various and progressive steps, by which science has gained her present exalted height, and mark the rapidity with which she is hourly extending the influence of her reign, and the happiness of mankind, over enlightening savages, and regions just emerged from barbarity. He will view her with pleasure, rising after a long night of Gothic darkness, and dispersing by degrees the clouds of ignorance, and the mists of superstition; and he will boast, with a pardonable partiality, that if she has chosen Europe for her temple, she has also selected England for her shrine. And whilst he contemplates other countries with the discerning eye of impartiality, or bestows on them the language of general commendation, he will admire his own with a glow of generous zeal, and expatiate upon its merits with the warmth of grateful affection. The muse of history, indeed, never appears in a more engaging attitude, than when recommending the actions of their ancestors to the notice of British youth.—The deeds of the brave and the hardy are the best study for the noble and the free, and we are under too many obligations to our ancestors, for the happy effects of their virtues, not to take an early opportunity of knowing more intimately, and admiring more warmly, the excellence of our constitution, and the wisdom of its founders.—Such indeed is its excellence, that they who are best acquainted with all its various parts, will be most interested in its preservation, and it will surely be confessed, that an exact knowledge of the causes to which it owes its rise, and the principles on which it is founded, will be the only means to ensure its continuance, and add the blessing of perpetuity to that monument of human wisdom which best deserves it.

THE ART OF PARRYING A CHARITABLE SUBSCRIPTION.

[From the Freemason's Magazine.]

DEAR SON,

The weakness of my feet since the last fit still remaining, so that I cannot visit you. I continue writing, not only as it is an amusement to myself, but may be of more lasting service to you than verbal advice occasionally given.

In my three last I gave you all the precepts that occurred to me relative to getting; I shall now proceed to the topic of saving. And, as the mad extravagance of the present age is charity, and you must meet with frequent temptations, and earnest solicitations to squander your money in that way, I shall, in the first place, give you some instructions in the art of parrying a charitable subscription.

The want of this necessary art has been a great misfortune to many people I could name to you. For, besides parting with their money against their will, they got the character of being charitable, which drew upon them fresh applications from other quarters, multiplying by success, and creating endless vexation. And here I cannot help remarking the wisdom of that precept of our holy religion which requires, that, if we do give alms, we should do it secretly; so secretly, that even the left hand may not know what is done by the right; that no one may be encouraged to ask for more. And this is so agreeable to sound human prudence, that even the unenlightened heathens could say, bis dat qui cito dat; the English of which, as I am informed, is, he gives twice that gives readily; meaning, as I suppose, that, if you are known to give readily, you will soon be asked to give again.

Not that I would have you thought quite uncharitable neither, no more than I would have you thought poor and unable to give. The avoiding of these imputations, while at the same time you save your money, is the aim of the art I am about to instruct you in.

The first rule of this art is, to like the charity, but dislike the mode of it. Suppose, now, for instance, that you are asked to subscribe towards erecting an infirmary or new hospital: you are not immediately to refuse your contribution; nor is it necessary; for you may say, "the design seems a good one, but it is new to you, and you would willingly take a little time to consider of it; because, if you do any thing this way, you would like to do something handsome." This puts by the demand for the present, and before the solicitors call again, inform yourself of all circumstances of the intended situation, constitution, government, qualification of patients, and the like; then, when all is fixed, if you learn that it is to be placed in the fields, "you think it would have been much better in the city, or nearer to the poor, and more at hand to relieve them in case of accidents and other distresses; and, besides, we have already hospitals enow in the fields." If in the city, "you can only approve of the fields, on account of the purer air, so necessary for the sick." If they propose to take in all poor patients, from whatever quarter they come, "you think it too general, and that every country, at least, ought to take care of its own." If it is limited to the poor of the city or country, "you disapprove of its narrowness; for charity and benevolence, like rain and sunshine should be extended to all the human race." While the collectors are endeavouring to remove these prejudices, you ply them with other objections of the like kind, relating to the constitution and management; and it is odds but some of your arguments appear strong and unanswerable even to the advocates for the project themselves: they will be sorry that things are now settled in a different way, and leave you with a high opinion of your understanding, though they got none of your money.

The second rule is, to like some other charity better. Thus, if they come to you for a contribution to the Magdalen, "you approve rather of the Asylum, it being much easier, in your opinion, to prevent vice than to cure it." If they apply for the Asylum, then, "what money you can spare for such purposes, you intend for the Magdalen; the very name reminding you that the conversion of prostitutes is a good and practicable work; but the necessity or utility of the Asylum does not appear so clear to you." Again, suppose your subscription asked to the Lying-in Hospital; then, "you should like one that would be on a more extensive plan, and take in single as well as married women; for very worthy young persons may unfortunately need the convenience of such an hospital, and the saving of a character you look upon to be almost as meritorious as the saving of a life;" but if such a general hospital be proposed, then, "you approve highly of the Married Women's Hospital, and doubt whether a general one would not rather be an encouragement to lewdness and debauchery." One instance more will be sufficient on this head. Suppose they urge you for a subscription to feed and clothe the poor French emigrants, you are then to say, that "charity, to be sure, is a good thing, but charity begins at home; we have, besides, our own common poor, who are crying for bread in the streets, many modest housekeepers and families pining for want, who, you think, should first be provided for, before we give our subsistence to those that would cut our throats. Or you are of opinion, the brave fellows that fight for us, and are now exposed to the hardships of a campaign, should be first comforted; or the widows and children of those who have died in our service, be taken care of." But should a subscription be proposed to you for these purposes, "You are then of opinion, that the care of our own people is the business and duty of the government, which is enabled, by the taxes we pay, to do all that is necessary; but the poor French emigrants, proscribed by their country, have only our charity to rely on; common humanity points them out as proper objects of our beneficence; and besides, to visit the prisoner, to clothe the naked, be kind to the stranger and do good to our enemies, are duties among the strongest required by christianity."

The third rule is, to insinuate (but without saying it in plain terms) that you either will contribute, or have already contributed handsomely, though you do not subscribe. This is done by intimating, "that you highly approve of the thing, but have made a resolution that your name shall never appear in a list of subscribers on such occasions; for that the world, you find, is apt to be very censorious, and if they see that a man has not given according to their ideas of his ability, and the importance of the occasion, they say he is mean and niggardly; or if, by giving liberally, he seems to have set them an example they do not care to follow, then they charge him with vanity and ostentation, and hint, that, from motives of that kind, he does much more than is suitable to his circumstances." And then you add, "that your subscribing or openly giving, is not at all necessary; for that as bankers are nominated to receive contributions, and many have already sent in their mites, and any one may send in what he pleases, you suppose a few guineas from a person unknown, will do as much good as if his name was in the list." This will entitle you to the credit of any one of the sums by an unknown hand, or by N. N. or X. Y. Z. whichever they may think proper to ascribe to you.

The reason why I would not have you say in plain terms, that you have given, or will give, when you really have not, or do not intend it, is, that I would have you incur trespasses no more than debts unnecessarily, and be as frugal of your sins as of your money, for you may have occasion for a lie in some other affair, at some other time, when you cannot serve your turn by an evasion.

Thus, my son, would I have you exercise the great privilege you are endowed with, that of being a reasonable creature: to wit, a creature capable of finding or making a reason for doing, or not doing any thing, as may best suit its interest or its inclination.

And so, referring other instructions to future letters, I recommend the rules contained in this as worthy your closest attention. For they are not the airy speculations of a theorist, but solid advices drawn from the practice of wise and able men: rules, by the help of which, I myself, though I lived many years in great business, and with some reputation as a man of wealth, have ever decently avoided parting with a farthing to these modish plunderers; nor can I recollect that, during my whole life, I have ever given any thing in charity, except once (God forgive me!) a halfpenny to a blind man—for doing me an errand.

I am, my dear son,
Your affectionate father, &c. &c.

SYMPATHY BETWEEN THE BREECHES POCKET AND THE ANIMAL SPIRITS.

(From the same.)

SIR,

The following important discovery is recommended to the literati in general, but more particularly to the College of Physicians; as it may be of the greatest consequence to them in their future practice.

You must know, then, that a wonderful connection and sympathy has lately been observed between the breeches pocket and the animal spirits, which continually rise or fall as the contents of the former ebb or flow: inasmuch, that, from constant observation, I could venture to guess at a man's current cash by the degree of vivacity he has discovered in his conversation. When this cutaneous reservoir is flush, the spirits too are elate; when that is sunk and drained, how flat, dull, and insipid, is every word and action! The very muscles and features of the face are influenced by this obscure fund of life and vigour. The heart proves to be only the inert receptacle of the blood, and those grosser spirits which serve for the animal function: but the pocket is fraught with those finer and more sublime spirits which constitute the wit, and many other distinguishing characters.

I can tell how a poet's finances stand by the very subject of his muse; gloomy elegies, biting satires, grave soliloquies, and dull translations, are certain indications of the res angusta; as Pindaric odes and pointed epigrams intimate a fresh recruit.—So a grave politician, who frequented a noted coffee-house, when these pocket-qualms were on him, used to give the most melancholy and deplorable account of the state of the nation: the increase of taxes, abuse of the public revenue, the national debt, the decay of trade, and the excess of luxury, were the continual topics of his discourse; but when the cold fit of this intermitting disorder left him, the scene was quite altered, and then he was eternally haranguing on the power, grandeur, and wealth of the British nation. In short, this barometer of state always rose or fell, not as the quick, but current silver, contracted or expanded itself within its secret cell.

Under the influence of the same powerful charm, I have remarked a physician in the chamber of a wealthy patient, clear up his countenance, and write his recipe with infinite vivacity and good humour; but in the abode of poverty, what a clouded brow, hopeless vibration of the head, and languor of the nerves! Like the sensitive plant, he shrunk from the cold hand of necessity. Not that the doctor wanted humanity; but when a patient becomes a mere caput mortuum; and the animi sacculi expires, what sympathizing heart but must be sensible of so dire a change?

It is impossible to record a tenth part of the wonderful effects this latent source of life and spirits has produced on the animal economy. What smiles of complacency and cringing adulation to my Lord Bloodrich, who no sooner turns his back than contempt and derision overtake him! What can this be owing to but the secret influence of the divinity, which threw a sort of awe and veneration about him? What but this magic power could have transformed Ned Traffic into a gentleman, Justice Allpunch into a wit, or Squire Jolter into a man of taste? What but this could have given poignancy to the most insipid jokes, and weight to the most superficial arguments of Alderman Heavyside? It is this, that with more than tutelary power protects its votaries from insults and oppressions; that silences the enraged accuser, and snatches the sword from the very hand of justice. Towns and cities, like Jerico, without any miracle, have fallen flat before it; it has stopped the mouths of cannons, and, more surprising still, of faction and slander.

It has thrown a sort of glory about the globose and opaque skulls of quorum justices; it has imparted a dread and reverence to the ensigns of authority; and strange to say! it has made youth and beauty fly into the arms of old age and impotence; given charms to deformity and detestation; transformed Hymen into Mammon, and the God of Love into a Satyr. It has built bridges without foundations, libraries without books, hospitals without endowments, and churches without benefices. It has turned conscience into a leist, honour into a pimp, courage into a modern officer, and honesty into a stock-jobber. In short, there is nothing wonderful it has not effected, except making us wise, virtuous, and happy.

ADDRESS TO VANITY.

Hail, Vanity! thou eccentric goddess, who presidest over our manners, fashions, and amusements. 'Tis to thee we owe these elegant refinements which embellish society! Incited by thee, the sprightly virgin offers her tresses, beautiful as those of Belinda, a sacrifice to the caprice of thy handmaid Fashion, and envelopes her pericranium in a succinct frizzled wig, curled à la Brutus. In vain the poet tunes his lyre to celebrate the power of beautiful ringlets: in vain he says....

"Fair tresses man's imperial race ensnare,
"And beauty draws us with a single hair."

Thy mandates, O Vanity! must be obeyed; or, if a presumptuous fair one will retain her beautiful hair, she must wear it unseen, till at some future period, when thou deignest thy permission, she may open her filicious masked battery to the discomfiture of many a coxcomb. It was thou who invented the entangling net worn by the fair;...to thee those lovely "fishers of men" owe this expedient. See what beaux and heroes flutter in the toils of beauty! Allured by bright eyes, they approach the lovely idol, and the sable meshes of fashion envelop them. To thee, O Vanity! the military hero is indebted for all his graces so irresistibly charming in the eyes of the woman of fashion; thou adjustest his waving plume, his glittering epauletts, his gorget, and his sword-knot; thou regulatest his measured strut, and givest expression to every muscle of his formidable face; 'tis thou who pointest out the lightning of his tremendous eye, "that speaks plain cannon fire, and smoke, and bounce;" thou instructest him to lead his fair partner in the dance, while her little heart, actuated by thee, throbs with vivacity.

The flippant petit maitre, inspired by thee, slanders the fair fame of virtuous beauty, and derides decency. Thou, O goddess! excitest a blush even in the face of masculine Impudence himself, if inadvertently one sentiment of piety should escape his lips, and raise the laugh of fashionable levity at his expense. The modern philosopher, illumined by thy inspiring smiles, boldly steps forward, in defiance of every institution, human and divine; he derides revelation, convinced that thou alone art the true object of rational adoration. The wise precepts that issue from his lips are dictated by thee. O Vanity! human reason has become thy auxiliary; and the inventive powers of wit and genius assert thy authority. The theophilanthropists and illuminati of the continent are outdone by thy priests and priestesses in this renowned city; here the Age of Reason, with a long list of elegant productions of a similar tendency, persuade the public to bow before thy throne. The enlightened free-thinker, actuated by thee, proves, by incontrovertible arguments, that there is no paradise but thine; that the present moment is all we can call our own: this "intellectual spider weaves fine theories out of his own brain;" and, by giving unrestrained indulgence to the passions, he wins over myriads to espouse thy cause, and rallies them around thy standard. See how Superstition flies agast before thy innumerable battalions! nay, even the lovers of truth are put to flight by thy invincible defenders! The hypocrite and the fanatic join the victorious throng, and with malignant aspersions vilify virtue. They unite their voices with the general acclamation in thy favour, and exclaim, "Frivolity, thou art our idol; deism and fanaticism are alike sustained by thee!"

The rout and the masquerade are crowded with thy votaries; nay, the dread of ridicule compels even the serious part of the community to conceal their queer notions, and smile with affected complacency on thy votaries.

Thy reign, O goddess! over the passions and the minds of men is almost universal in this great city; even Mammon himself, who next to thee seems to share the adoration of the admiring throng... even Mammon is obliged to yield his precious hoards as an offering on thy altars.

The theatres resound with the hymns of thy worshippers; there ghosts are conjured from the world unknown to minister to thee. Specters stalk before thy altars, to the great delight of thy votaries; and Pizarro, that renowned Spanish hero, assists in the celebration of thy orgies. Equestrian rites are also performed in honour of thee, O Vanity! and men bound like apes and squirrels for thy gratification. Heroes chaunt in recitative, and heroines expire in song for thy amusement.

But it is in the palaces of the great that thou art ministered to with superior elegance; there Fashion presides...there titled dames and noble virgins pay thee peculiar honours.

The fête is honoured with thy presence, O gracious Vanity! and all the enchantment of extravagant voluptuousness is exhibited there.

To thee the ladies of the ton sacrifice their treasures with generous profusion. In those nocturnal entertainments Art performs prodigies: temporary arbours, saloons, and temples, are erected as if by magic; those superb scenes are adorned with lustres, perfumed with aromatics, and filled with "sounds of sweetest melody;" a numerous train of thy adorers, of both sexes, animate the scene; they dance before thee, and Affectation presides in the ceremonious assembly.

Such are the elegant amusements of the fashionable world, who are universally devoted to thee, and careless of consequences: the polite man of fashion resigns his mansion and his coffers to the management of his dear yoke-fellow. The beautiful arbitresses of dissipation shine with a meteor-like lustre, and emulate each other in modish extravagance, to a degree scarcely equalled by Cleopatra herself.

No language can express the universality of thy power in the gay world, O beloved Vanity! Even antiquated dames forsake their prayer-book...fly to the toilette, and beautify their shrivelled faces with lations bestowed by thee.

Thou, O goddess! invertest the order of things, turning the day of the fashionable world into night, and their night into day. Thy power is unbounded; and Affectation, thy favourite handmaid, attends thy steps as thou movest along, dispensing thy favours to mortals!

I. P.

When viewing the race of men upon the large scale, in my spleen, I have divided them into two classes,.....the deceivers, and the deceived. Indeed so rooted an opinion have I imbibed of the ductility of my fellow-mortals, that I never seriously believed nor vindicated, what are so proudly styled, the honour and dignity of human nature. Read this, ye unwary and draw some useful mementos with me. Leave no part of your body undipped in Styx, and be invulnerable.

See then that Politician, wrapped up in the garb of patriotism, mount the rostrum, tickle the stupid multitude into conviction that he is the people's, the mechanic's, the poor man's friend; that he, indignant of his country's wrongs, alone feels them and asserts her rights. Take off that garb, look through the window of his breast, and see collected, at the apex of his heart, sighs and flutterings after titles, honours, places. Next turn to the bland physician, who, with a nerve of steel himself, feels along the palpitating artery of my Lady Vapours, counts its throbs, prescribes a cordial, and receives a guinea for making Madam a dupe. Look after that military beau that struts through the Mall. A cockade, a sword, and two epaulets, dazzle the crowd, impose on boys and girls, men and maidens to imagine, that not danger, nor the devil himself could appal such a hero. Carry him to the field of honour, and find him white-liver'd as a hen.

How easily my Lawyer, entrenched with forms and books, gulls clients of their cash, is too stale to repeat. For once in your life, be persuaded, that if you come within the circle of his writs, pleas, bars, demurrers, rejoinders, &c. you will be handsomely stripped, even to your pen feathers.

I am all gentleness to the sex: were it not that one smile of a Coquette makes me a slave, a flirt of a well-manœuvred fan puts all my resolution asleep, I would not tread on consecrated ground. While I am sensible, that she is playing me on the line, till some other gudgeon come in view, when I shall be shaken off the hook; that I should fancy nought but love in her eyes, on her cheeks but the down of the peach, her hair all auburn and natural, her lips two rose leaves dipped in dew, symmetry in her form, taste in her dress, wit in her repartees, with sincerity in her bosom, is strange as it is, inconsistent, inconclusive, and unwarrantable... The theatre, is all cheat. The kings, queens, lords, and ladies on the stage, we find, in our streets, are the veriest pieces of mortality. After so much mockery of our senses, not only divinity is fled; something less than mortality remains.

I am the first to confess that Fancy cheats me at her will: not more at the age when I blew the washer-woman's soap suds through a pipe into beautiful balloons, than at the period at which I am arrived, building palaces on earth, and castles in the air. I have roamed, in Imagination's car, from the seat of Paradise in former, to the present degenerate days: I have searched all, of all ages and countries; and, in abundance have found, as many simple, deluded, gazing, cheated, weak-sighted mortals, as myself. But as virtue is better than vice, so is delusion, than wretchedness. 'Tis only in regions superior, the soul finds rest, perfection, and happiness.

PROTEUS.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEE.

I have repeatedly drawn for wit on the rich bank of Dr. EACHARD. As his book is rare, I am very confident that, to use a fashionable word, I do not bore my readers, with what is obvious and stale.

Our Divine thus bitterly jeers a raw pedant at the University, a pragmatical puppy well known at Cambridge in New-England, by the name of Sophomore.

It is very curious to observe what delicate letters your young students write, after they have got a little smack of University learning. In what elaborate heights and tossing nonsense, will they greet a downright English father, or a country friend! If there be a plain word in it, and such as is used at home, this tastes not, says they, of education among philosophers, and it is counted damnable duncery and want of fancy: because your loving friend, or humble servant is a common phrase in country letters; therefore the young epistler is yours to the antipodes, or, at least, to the center of the earth; and because ordinary folks love and respect you, therefore, you are to him, the pole star, a Jacob's staff, a loadstone, and a damask rose. And the misery of it is this pernicious way of expression, often accompanies them to the very grave: and, for the most part, an ordinary cheesemonger, or plumb seller, that scarce ever heard of an University, shall write much better sense, and more to the purpose, than these young philosophers, who injudiciously hunting only for great words, make themselves learnedly ridiculous.

The following is a full length portrait of a pulpit punster.

Those usually, who have been rope dancers in the schools have proved jack puddings in the pulpit. For he that in his youth has allowed himself this liberty of academic wit, and punning has usually so thinned his judgment, is so prejudiced against sober sense, and so disposed to tripping and jingling, that so soon as he gets hold of a text, he presently thinks that he has caught one of his old school questions; and so falls a flinging it out of one hand into another, tossing it this way and that; lets it run a little upon the line, then high jingo come again; here catching at a word, there he nibbling and sucking at an and, a by, a quis, or a quid, a sic, or a sicut; and thus minces the text so small that his parishioners until he rendezvous it again, can scarcely tell what is become of it.

The poverty of the lower clergy in England has been a frequent theme for the compassionate, and the querulous. But this penury of the church is not confined to Great-Britain. From the natural baseness, sordidness and ingratitude of human nature, the character of a parish priest, is treated with contempt, and his beggarly pittance, falsely called a salary, is tardily and avariciously paid. To expect bright discourses from such pinched parsons, is as absurd, in the phrase of Sancho, as to expect "pears from an elm."

Where the minister is pinched as to the tolerable conveniences of this life, the chief of his care and time must be spent, not in an impertinent considering what texts of scripture will be most useful for his parish, what instructions most seasonable, and what authors best to be consulted. But the chief of his thoughts, and his main business must be to study how to live that week; where he shall have bread for his family; whose sow has lately pigged; whence will come the next rejoicing goose, or the next cheerful basket of apples. How far to hennas, or to offerings: when shall we have another christening and cakes, and who is likely to marry or die. These are very seasonable considerations and worthy of a man's thoughts. For a family cannot be maintained by texts and contexts; and the child that lies crying in the cradle will not be satisfied without a little milk, and perhaps sugar, though there be a small German system of Theology in the house.

But suppose he does get into a little hole over the oven, with a lock to it, called his study, towards the latter end of the week, for you must know, sir, there are very few texts of scripture that can be divided at soonest before Friday night; and some there be that will never be divided but upon Sunday morning, and that not very early, but either a little before they go, or in going into church; I say suppose the gentleman thus gets into his study, one may very near guess what he will be doing when he comes there, viz. the bottle of port or of drink is near departed, and the poor single groat in the box is nearly gone.

ment and execution ready to come out against it, for milk, and eggs. Now, sir, can any man think that one thus racked and tortured, can be seriously intent half an hour, to contrive any thing that might be of real advantage to his people. Besides, perhaps that week he has met with some dismal crosses, and undoing misfortunes. There was a sorry conditioned mole, that broke into his pasture, and ploughed up the best part of his glebe; and a little after that, came a couple of spiteful ill favoured cows; and trampled down the little remaining grass. Another day, having but four chickens, sweep comes the Kite and carries away the fattest and hopefulest of the brood. Then, after all this, came the jackdaws and starlings, idle birds that they are, and they took and carried away from his thin thatched house, forty or fifty of the best straws. To make him completely unhappy, after all these afflictions, another day that he had a pair of breeches on, coming over a perverse stile, he suffered very much in carelessly lifting over his leg. Now what parish can be so inconsiderate and unreasonable, as to look for any thing from one, whose fancy is thus checked, and whose understanding is thus ruffled and disordered. They may as soon expect comfort and consolation from one, that lies racked with the gout and stone, as from a divine thus broken and shattered in his fortunes.

In Anderson's Edition of the British Poets it was supposed that every thing written by Thomson had been preserved. I do not remember the following. The eyes of beauty, at once soft and sparkling "now beaming with intelligence, and now glistening with sensibility," have not often been more melodiously extolled, than in the subsequent song, by the author of the Seasons.

In a letter to Mrs. R——, Thompson quotes a passage from Milton, and remarks: Now that I have been transcribing some lines of poetry, I think I once engaged myself, while walking in Kew-lane, to write two or three songs. The following is one of them, which I have stolen from the song of Solomon; from that beautiful expression of love: "Turn away thine eyes from me, for they have overcome me."

O thou, whose tender serious eyes
Expressive, speak the mind I love:
The gentle azure of the skies:
The pensive shadows of the grove.
O mix their beauteous beams with mine,
And let us interchange our hearts;
Let all their sweetness on me shine:
Pour'd thro' my soul be all their darts.
Ah! 'tis too much! I cannot bear
At once so soft, so keen a ray:
In pity, then, my lovely fair,
O turn those killing eyes away!
But what avails it to conceal
One charm, where naught but charms we see?
Their lustre then again reveal,
And let me, Mrs. R., die of thee.

THE FOLLOWING TENDER LINES ARE FROM BIDLAKE'S SUMMER EVE.

"Of those who trod with me life's early vale,
Hail'd light's first beam and breath'd its morning gale,
In all the verdant paths of joyous youth,
Ere error's mists were yet dispell'd by truth,
How many now, alas! I hail no more!
Their sun soon set, their busy day soon o'er!
Of mortal hope we gain the lofty brow;
But, ah! how chang'd the prospect from below!
Still spreads the scene beneath the opening skies,
New prospects glitter, and new objects rise!
But death's tumultuous torrent rolls between,
Forbids our steps, and parts the gaudy scene.
"Friends of my youth! who were no longer found,
Ere half of life had run its busy round,
Lest in this vale of tears, I drop for you,
From the full heart, compassion's softest dew:
For full though sorrow's baleful waters glide,
Ye must I and the sympathetic tide.
I saw ye arm'd with all of fancy's fires,
With all that wealth or ardent youth inspires;

Strong as the new fledg'd eagle, child of Spring,
 I saw ye gaily plume the lusty wing,
 Then upwards rush with new-born vigour gay,
 To chase light pleasure through the realms of day,
 Soon, soon, ye vanish'd like the morning shade,
 Or evening clouds in shifting hues array'd,
 And stole the rays of gladness from my mind,
 A loitering weary traveller left behind;
 Left in the vale of tears, unfit to go
 To search eternal bliss through ways of woe.
 Friends of my youth, perhaps now hovering near,
 Your gentle spirits whisper in my ear
 Some heav'n-born sounds, and all my paths attend,
 My errors lessen, and my steps befriended,
 Still grant your aid, and more, as years increase,
 Smooth all my transient storms with evening peace.

BIOGRAPHY.

John Burton, a learned critic and divine, was born in 1696 at Wembworth in Devonshire, of which parish his father was rector. He was admitted a scholar of Corpus Christi-college, Oxford, in 1713, of which he at length became a tutor. In the exercise of this office he greatly distinguished himself by his assiduity in promoting the improvement of his pupils, and by other exertions for the advancement of learning. In 1725, he was made pro-rector of the university and master of the schools; and in this situation he published an oration and four Latin sermons on the subject of academical discipline. He much improved the discussion of philosophical questions in the schools, and introduced the study of Locke and other modern philosophers. In 1733 he was elected a fellow of Eton-college; and about the same time he was presented to the vicarage of Maple Derham in Oxfordshire. He married the widow of his predecessor in that living, and passed several years of his life in the station of a country clergyman. After his wife's death in 1748, he chiefly resided on his fellowship at Eton, occupied in literary pursuits and the company of the learned. He took the degree of doctor in divinity in 1752. He continued to appear occasionally as a writer and preacher, esteemed and beloved both by the higher and lower classes of his order, and amusing his leisure with poetical exercises, till his death in 1771. Dr. Burton's works are chiefly collected in two volumes of sermons, a volume of "Opuscula Miscellanea Theologica," and another of "Opuscula Metrico-prosaica." The sermons are long and laboured, include a variety of matter, and are somewhat formal in the manner. The Latin theological dissertations display much curious learning; the poetical works in Greek, Latin, and English, shew industry rather than genius. He is perhaps best known as the critical editor of five select Greek tragedies under the title of "Pentalogia." This task he first recommended to a pupil of promising talents, Joseph Bingham, who had printed most of the text and notes when he was cut off by an untimely death. Dr. Burton subjoined a preface, dissertations, and additional notes, and published the work in 1758, 8vo. It has been reprinted at the Clarendon press, and is in much esteem as a book for students in Greek. The style of Dr. Burton in his compositions has been censured as pedantic and affected, and Churchill in one of his poems has exercised all the uncandid severity of his pen to expose it to ridicule.

LEVITY.

[The following easy essay we copy with much approbation from the New-York Evening Post.]

ESSAY ON BLOCKHEADS.

A blockhead is neither an idiot, nor madman. He is one who goes on through the broad road of life with the rest of mankind carrying a load of follies at his back, which he knows not how to get rid of when he is tired, and under which he is continually stumbling. There are various kinds of blockheads which may thus be distinguished; the good-natured blockhead, the stupid blockhead, the silly block-head, the old blockhead, the credulous blockhead, the ignorant blockhead, and the learned blockhead.

The lover who hears the contempt of a scornful mistress without a murmur, may be ranked among the good-natured blockheads: but should he be so lost in speculations on his passion as not to take a hint of kindness in a soft moment, then, he may justly be called a stupid blockhead. The farmer who goes out smoking his pipe, talking with his neighbours, and shaking hands with the parson when he should be at work, may also be placed among the good-natured blockheads; but should the parson's horse be eating his cabbage, his barn ready to tumble down for want of a prop, or his daughter about to run off with a stranger all this time, every one would call him a stupid blockhead. He is also a good-natured blockhead, who bears being the butt of the company at dinner, joins in the joke against himself, and then swallows his wine with satisfaction. But he who stands with the spy-glass to his eye on the battery all day watching what ship is coming up, while his wife is taking private lessons of dancing-masters, music-masters, and masters of various other arts and sciences, must certainly be a stupid blockhead.

A fellow who does nothing but pare his nails, consult his watch, take a view of the atmosphere from his window, or go to church only to shew himself, may justly be reckoned a silly blockhead. The man who at the age of fourscore fills up an arm chair in the room, and tires his hearers with his long stories, may be called an old blockhead; and he who can listen to his long stories, and believe them, must be a credulous blockhead.

The man who takes up a newspaper only to find the day of the month, blames the printer for putting such hard words in it, and talks of politics without knowing in what quarter of the world he is placed or remembering where he was born, is an ignorant, aye, and an impudent blockhead. He is also an ignorant blockhead, who prescribes physic to one who has lost his money, drinks to the company in a glass of water, or mistakes the bank for the city hotel. But the most ignorant blockhead of all is he who, becoming suddenly rich, shows you into his new library, and talks ostentatiously of such authors as Virgil or Homer, when perhaps, for all that he knows of the matter, the one might have been a parson, and the other a doctor.

The last kind of blockheads, and generally the greatest, are the learned blockheads. Mr. Thickhead is a learned blockhead: he has renounced the study of music for that of the logarithms, and has got a fine estate, and a fine wife, merely by his great reputation as a mathematician. He has a great many mathematical oddities; if he walks, it is always in a straight line; if he sits, it is in the form of a triangle; and if he stands, it is in no other posture than that of a perpendicular. In short Mr. Thickhead does every thing with so much mathematical exactness, that he is generally esteemed a very learned man; yet the reader without the help of mathematical demonstration will be apt to consider Mr. Thickhead a mathematical blockhead.

Mr. Mammoth is also esteemed not only a mathematical, but a philosophical, and political blockhead. He has been admitted an honorary member not only among the societies of philosophical and political blockheads in Europe, but also has been made head of the blockheads in America. He admits no man into his service but a blockhead, trusts no man but a blockhead, invites none to his table but blockheads, and in short, has so many blockheads about him, that it is a difficult thing for a wise or well-disposed man to get through the croud; and if a wise, or clever fellow happens to come into his house, and takes a seat with the rest, he immediately gets up in a great passion, drives him out without ceremony, and puts a blockhead in his place. Thus, gentle reader! have I given you all I can think of at present about blockheads, and let him whom the cap fits, put it on.

IRONICUS.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

Receipt to make a Fashionable Lady.

Take about eight yards of gingham, or sprig-muslin, that is seamed together in the form of a Churchman's pulpit robe. Slip on this easy frock—draw it across the shoulders—girt it round about, and across the middle; and let the end of it sweep at least a quarter on the ground. The flowing tresses, which Nature in her luxuriance designed to adorn and cover the shoulders with, must be stuffed with powder, knit at the end, and folded up under the turban à la mode, in the exact form of her refrigerating hand weapon. To the many other embellishments of the head-dress, must be added a quarter and a half of black, or green silk love crape, to defend from the insolence of the sun-beams, and render the inhabitant within, musquito proof. Place this figure in a pair of red or blue Morocco slippers, and set her a walking on the pavement, Phaon by her side, and the work is complete.

N. B. To make her irresistible, she must at every other step, give her head a toss, smack her lips, and turn up her eyes to her beloved country the Moon: making it evident, that she is none of the mean spirited beings that delight in things below.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

PROPOSALS,

For Printing in London, by Subscription,

IN TWO VOLUMES QUARIO,

A Supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary; of a Glossary of the Archaisms and Provincialisms of the English Language. By the Rev. Jonathan Boucher, M. A. Vicar of Epsom, Surry; F. A. S. Honorary Member of the Edinburgh Society of Antiquaries, and of the Stirling Literary Society.

A persuasion, which I have long entertained, that a Supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary was a desideratum in English Literature, first induced me to undertake the Work here announced to the public, and the liberal and very flattering encouragement already given to my first proposals animate me to proceed in it with renewed spirits.

The age of Elizabeth is the boundary beyond which Dr. Johnson has seldom gone. His references are in general restricted to the works of Sidney, Spencer, Hooker, Bacon, Shakspeare, Milton, Cowley, Dryden, Swift, Addison, Pope, and their contemporaries. Some archaological words, however, are admitted by him, when "they are found in authors who are not obsolete; or when they have any force or beauty, that may deserve revival." Governed by this principle, I have extended his plan, and endeavoured to supply his deficiencies, and hence my references are, chiefly, to Robert of Gloucester, Peter Langtoft, Chaucer, Piers Plowman, Gower, Gavin Douglas, Henryson, Dunbar, Lyndesay, Allan Ramsay, and Burns, among our Poets: to the ancient writers in Divinity, History, Medicine, and Law; and also to the Statutes and other public Records. I have drawn still more copiously from "the Well of English undefiled," the common speech of our peasantry. It was the object of Dr. Johnson to furnish his countrymen with a Dictionary of the English language, only, as spoken and written by the best speakers and best modern authors. It is the object of this Supplement to enable those who consult it, to read, and to retain, our ancient British classics; to exhibit a full historical view of our speech as it was formerly spoken; and thus to show that, in language as in politics, "to innovate is not always to reform."

The several Glossaries of Cotgrave, Minshew, Spelman, Skinner, Junius, and Bailey, which alone have any title to the claim of Archæological, though of great merit, yet leave numberless words in our old chroniclers and bards, still unexplained. Wicliff's translation of the Scriptures, venerable as it is on account of its subject, its age, and its author, is, notwithstanding its Glossary, locked up in an unknown tongue. The Glossaries of Ruddiman, Urry, and Tyrwhit, all of them the productions of men of learning and great abilities, yet are limited to the illustration of single works. Those annexed to several of the Scottish provincial poets, to some compositions in the dialect of different districts in the North of England, and to the Exmoor Dialogues (published some years ago as specimens of the West Country Dialect,) are of very inferior value: from which censure, however, I feel much pleasure in having it in my power to except the Glossaries annexed to "Wyntownis' Cronykil," and to "The Complaynt of Scotland."

I offer my Work to the public as Supplemental to other Dictionaries and other Glossaries; yet, anxious to relieve the dryness of verbal discussions, I have, in humble imitation of my great Prototype, attempted occasionally to "intersperse with verdure and flowers the dusty deserts of barren philology." I trust it will not be said, that "ornarines ipsa negat." The explanation of a single vocable has often led me into historical investigation respecting the names of persons or places, municipal regulations, legal terms, religious ceremonies, popular customs, buildings, diet, dress, employments, sports, and amusements, of our ancestors. Literary remarks and criticisms on obscure and difficult passages in our ancient poets and historians, and on the Greek and Roman classics, are likewise incidentally introduced; and not a few on the Scriptures themselves. Indeed, many of the words in the English translation of the Bible cannot be well understood without the aid of an Archæological Lexicographer.

In all Languages, the diversity of sense in which words are used renders perfect accuracy of definition peculiarly difficult. A reader, who is contented to take the definition of a term given him by a Dictionary, which does not at the same time produce the authority on which such definition is founded, must give up his judgment entirely to the judgment of the compiler of the Dictionary. This is to be avoided only by tracing the rise and progress of the word in question. Hence, it has been one of my most constant purposes to pursue the several words which fall under my consideration, through all their doublings and disguises in other languages, whether of Celtic or Gothic origin. Sometimes they are found, little concealed, in the Welsh, Irish, Gaelic, or Armoric; sometimes more disguised in the Italian, French, or Spanish; or in the Latin, Greek, or Hebrew; and, sometimes, taking a different direction, I have traced them to the Saxon, German, Danish, Swedish, and Icelandic. Nor are the instances few in which I have experienced the fate of Voyages of Discovery; and my researches have ended in disappointment. Yet, in an undertaking of such extent and variety, I may surely, without shame, be content with Dr. Johnson, "to leave some obscurities to happier industry, or future information."

In my Etymological Inquiries, my former attention has been directed to those too long neglected sources of ancient learning, the cognate languages of the North. Nor am I without hopes that, in this department, my Work may be acceptable even to foreigners; and that it may thus repay some of the many obligations which British philology owes to German, Swedish, and Danish Literature.

The copies of my first prospectus being exhausted, and it having been thought advisable that the notice of such a Work should be made, if possible, still more general, I avail myself of this opportunity to advert and reply to some obliging suggestions, which have been made to me, since its publication. To obviate the difficulty of ascertaining what words are provincial, and what merely archæological, and also to avoid the confusion which, it has been intimated, must have resulted from there being two alphabets in one work, I have resolved to arrange all my materials under one. The title is also a little altered; the first having been objected to from the motley appearance it exhibited, as being partly Latin and partly English. A writer in the Gentleman's Magazine for February, under the signature of Clericus Derbiensis, has pointed out to me the propriety of printing the Work in one folio volume, for the accommodation of those who, like himself, possess the folio edition of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. Others have expressed a similar wish: and, if I could flatter myself that the subscription would enable me to print a double impression, I should not hesitate a moment to gratify them, and to print both a quarto and a folio edition; but I hope to be permitted, for the present to abide by my first Proposals. The Work shall be sent to press as soon as a competent number of subscribers can be obtained to defray the heavy expenses of paper and printing, and printed in the manner of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary with three columns in one page. A very few more copies than are subscribed for will be printed: the Subscription Price will be Four Guineas, to be paid on the delivery of the Work.

Subscriptions in this city will be received by JOHN MORGAN, No. 51, South Second-Street; where, on application, a Prospectus of the Work can be obtained.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"M" has drawn a fascinating picture of Chloris. If the mere portrait excite the most eager desire what, alas! to a feeling heart, would be the effect of a sight of the lovely original. The following complimentary lines, the first from Green, the second from Butler, must be applied to such a paragon.

"The oak, while you his umbrage deck,
Lest fall his acorns in your neck;
Zephyr his civil Kisses gives,
And plays with curls instead of leaves;
Birds, seeing you, believe it Spring
And during their vacation sing
And flowers lean forwards from their seats
To traffic in exchange of sweets."

"The sun shall now no more dispense
His own, but your bright influence.
Where'er you tread your foot shall set
The primrose and the violet:
All spices, perfumes, and sweet powders,
Shall borrow from your breath their odours:
Nature her charter shall renew,
And take all lives of things from you.
The world depend upon your eye,
And, when you frown upon it, die.
Only our loves shall still survive
New worlds and natures to outlive."

MISCELLANEOUS PARACAGHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Nothing is more highly relished by the Editor than such liberal sentiments as Mr. BURKE has advanced in a celebrated letter, occasioned by the rude attack of the swinish duke of Bedford, another Egalité, who sometimes, in a fit of affected love for the people, had certain whims of economy, not unlike those of our own patriots. Let us hear what a man of expanded heart has to say on this subject:

"I looked on the consideration of public service, or public ornament to be real and very justice: and I ever beheld a scanty and penurious justice to partake of the nature of a wrong. I held it to be in its consequences, the worst economy in the world. In saving money, I soon can count up all the good I do; but when, by a cold penury, I blast the abilities of a nation, and stunt the growth of its active energies, the ill I may do is beyond all calculation.—I never could drive a hard bargain in my life, concerning any matter whatever; and least of all do I know how to haggle and huckster with merit. Mere parsimony is not economy. It is separable in theory from it, and in fact it may, or it may not, be a part of economy according to circumstances. Expense and great expense may be an essential part in true economy. If parsimony were to be considered as one of the kinds of virtue, there is, however, another and an higher economy. Economy is a distributive virtue, and consists, not in saving, but in selection. Parsimony requires no providence, no sagacity, no powers of combination, no comparison, no judgment. Mere instinct, and that not an instinct of the noblest kind may produce this false economy in perfection. The other economy has larger views. It demands a discriminating judgment and a firm sagacious mind. It shuts one door to impudent importunity, only to open another, and a wider to unpresuming merit."

In a tract of Mr. BURKE's, entitled "Thoughts on Scarcity," and to be found only in Rivington's new edition, there occur several brilliant and just observations, which we shall occasionally quote. The following is one of his most recent reflections on the late portentous French revolution. It may be considered as his dying declaration. "That state has fallen by the hands of the parricides of their country, called the revolutionists and constitutionalists of France, a species of traitors, of whose fury and atrocious wickedness nothing in the annals of the phrenzy and depravation of mankind had before furnished an example, and of whom I never can think, or speak, without a mixed sensation of disgust, of horror, and of detestation, not easy to be expressed. These nefarious monsters destroyed their country for what was good in it: For much good there was in the constitution of that noble monarchy, which in all kinds, formed and nourished great men, and great paternos of virtue to the world."

The classical reader will associate with the following the "Hæc studia adolescentiam alunt" &c. of Cicero. It cannot be too often repeated; line upon line; precept upon precept; until it comes into the currency of a proverb; to innovate is not to reform. The French revolutionists complained of every thing; they refused to reform any thing; and they left nothing unchanged. The consequences are before us,—not in remote history, not in future prognostication: they are about us, they are upon us. They shake the public security; they menace private enjoyment. They dwarf the growth of the young; they break the quiet of the old. If we travel they stop our way. They infest us in town; they pursue us to the country. Our business is interrupted; our repose is troubled, our pleasures are saddened; our very studies are poisoned and perverted, and knowledge is rendered worse than ignorance, by the enormous evils of dreadful innovation.

The following is related of the exertions of GARRICK. "It is unaccountable how a texture of nerves, so finely woven, can bear so constant a distention, without the total destruction of his health, for you must not suppose that the storm of passions only affects his surface. I saw him once, after playing the part of Richard, stretched, like the expiring Germanicus, in Poussin's picture, on a sofa, panting, pale, speechless, covered with perspiration, and unable to raise his arm."

POSTHUMOUS.

P. PENCIL'S ELEGY;

SUPPOSED TO BE WRITTEN BY HIMSELF, DURING HIS DECLINE.

In Fortune's lowest ebb, my bark was thrown,
On the broad ocean of tempestuous life;
No prosperous gale, for me, has ever blown;
But adverse winds have rais'd perpetual strife.

Hard is the task, without a pilot's care,
For "infant Reason," on life's billows tost,
The storm, destruction, and the calm, a snare,
To shun the rocks, where ship-wreck'd youth is lost.

But harder still, for Pecunia to oppose,
The mountain weight of prejudice and gold;
Like Hercules, subdue its venom'd foes,
And, spite of pride, the place of merit hold.

Be mine the task, my first ambition cried;
Be toil, my pleasure, and my riches, lore;
My friends, the Muses, and their wreath, my pride;
I ask no wealthier aid, no baser ore.

On earth's low surface, let the million plod,
To one small circle, chain th' immortal mind,
Custom, their instinct, and their gold, their God,
To feeling, callous, and to beauty, blind.

Mark out the world, proud Wealth, and call it
thine,
By fraud, by purchase, or prescriptive right,
Its groves, its fields, its beauties shall be mine;
But most, Parnassus, shall my soul delight.

Farewel, delusive hope of poet's fame!
No more thy heights, Parnassus, court my eye;—
From thy mid regions, let me raise my name,
And with th' immortal, live—or nameless, die!

O'er thy gay fields, a wistful look I cast,
Where sportive Fancy fann'd my youthful fire;
There warm Imagination breathes her last,
And all my fond, deceptive hopes expire!

Ye fickle nine; I bid a last adieu!
Too long bewilder'd by your wanton wiles—
O had I learnt, ere late, this maxim true—
Fortune's a foe to all, who share your smiles.

But cease thy plaint; and be thy name forgot!
Thy country's voice declares thy hapless doom;
Gives cheerless penury, for the Painter's lot;
And dark oblivion, for the Poet's tomb!

Would'st, reader, I my future state reveal,
What lot, for me, the Fates, or Minos draw?—
Bound fast to Ixion's ever turning wheel,
I spin the subtle many thread of Law.

SELECTED POETRY.

ORATIO AD DOMINUM.

[By Hildebert, bishop of Anagninum or Mans, a city of France, published by archbishop Usher, 1647....at the end of a Latin treatise, which has since become very scarce....communicated with the above account of it by H. P. Suffolk, December 5th, 1764.]

Extra portam jam delatum,
Jam satentem, tumulatum,
Vitta ligat, lapis urget;
Sed si jubes, hic resurget:
Jube, lapis revolvetur;
Jube, vitta disrumpetur.

Exiturus nescit moras
Postquam clamas, exi foras.
In hoc salo mea ratis
Infestatur a piratis;
Hinc assultus, inde fluctus;
Hinc et inde mois et luctus.
Sed tu, bone nauta! veni;
Preme ventos, mare leni;
Fac abscedant hi paratæ,
Duc ad portum, salvâ rate,
Infœcunda mea ficus,
Cujus ramus, ramus siccus
Incidetur, incendetur;
Si promulgas, quod meretur.
Sed hoc anno dimittatur,
Stercoretur, fodiatur;
Quod si necdum respondebit;
Flens hoc loquor, tunc ardebit.
Vetus hostis in me furit;
Aquis mersat, flammis urit:
Inde languens et afflictus
Tibi soli sum relictus.
Ut hic hostis evanescat;
Ut infirmus convalescat;
Tu virtutem jejunandi
Des infirmo, des orandi,
Per hoc duo, Christo teste,
Liberabor ab hac peste.
Ab hac peste solve mentem,
Fac devotum penitentem:
Da timorem quo projecto,
De salute nil coniecto.
Da spem, fidem, charitatem;
Da discretam pietatem:
Da contemptum terrenorum,
Appetitum supernorum.
Totum, Deus! in te spero;
Deus, ex te totum quero.
Tu laus mea, meum bonum,
Mea cuncta, tuum donum.
Tu solamen in labore,
Medicamen in languore.
Tu in luctu, mea lyra;
Tu lenimem es in ira.
Tu in arcto, liberator;
Tu in lapsu relevator.
Metum præstas in propectu,
Spem conservas in defectu.
Si quis lædit, tu rependis;
Si minatur, tu defendis;
Quod est anceps, tu dissolvīs;
Quod tegendum, tu involvīs.
Tu intrare me non sinas
Infernales officinas;
Ubi mæror, ubi metus;
Ubi fætor, ubi fletus;
Ubi probra deteguntur;
Ubi rei confunduntur;
Ubi tortor semper cædens,
Ubi totum hoc perenne,
Quia perpes mors Gehennæ,
Me receptet Sion illa,
Sion David urbs tranquilla;
Cujus faber auctor lucis,
Cujus portæ signum crucis;
Cujus cives semper læti,
Cujus muri lapis vivus,
Cujus custos rex festivus.
In hac urbe lux solennis;
Ver æternum, pax perennis,
In hac odor implens cælos,
In hac semper festum nœlos.
Non est ibi corruptela;
Non defectus, non querela:
Non minuti, non deformes;
Omnes Christo sunt conformes.
Urbs cælestis, urbs beata,
Supra petram collocata:
Urbs in portu satis tuto,
De longinquo te saluto;

Te saluto, te suspiro,
Te affecto, te requiro.
Quantum tui gratulentur,
Quam festivè conviventur;
Quis affectus eos stringat,
Aut quæ gemma muros pingat,
Quis chalcedon, quis jacinthus;
Norunt illi, qui sunt intus.
In plateis hujus urbis,
Sociatus piis turbis,
Cum Mōise et Eliâ,
Pium cantem alleluia.

TO MR. SOUTHEY.

ON READING HIS BEAUTIFUL, BUT SEDUCTIVE ODE,
WRITTEN ON SUNDAY MORNING.

Go, Southey, to the House of Pray'r,
And humbly and devoutly there
Adore the God of goodness and of love;
Let the loud organ's peal,
With corresponding zeal,
Thy tuneful bosom ev'ry Sunday move.
Sweet Bard of Bristol! who canst wake the lyre
With so much energy and fire,
To captivate Attention's heart,
Ah! let not thy enchanting art
Be exercis'd to lead astray
The young, the giddy, and the gay,
Too prone by nature to neglect and spurn
Religion's holy call, and from her temple turn.

Go, Southey, to the House of Pray'r,
And set a good example there
To those who wander in the world's wild ways;
Devote a portion of thy precious time
To Piety as well as rhyme,
And socially assist in thy Creator's praise.
Six days, each week, are surely long
Enough for all the other aims of song....
For visiting the lonely woodland bow'rs,
And gath'ring sweet poetic flow'rs
Along each sunny bank and silver stream:
Then to the House of Pray'r
Each seventh day repair,
And let Jehovah's praise that day be thy sole theme.

Go, Southey, to the House of Pray'r;
'Tis likelier on a Sabbath-day
Thou'lt meet Religion there:
She loves not always in the wilds to stray;
The friend of man, she loves among mankind to stay.

Tho' sometimes she her vot'ries lead
To heathy hill or cowslip'd dale,
Or shady grove, or sunny mead,
Or by the streamlet in the vale;
Yet she's no savage wand'rer, Southey, no!
No Anchoret, of gloom and silence fond;
No hippish matron, clouded still in woe,
And subject to despond;
But social, cheerful, and serene,
Of simplest manners, sweetest mien,
Her mild instructions she imparts,
To mend our morals, and to cheer our hearts
With brightest prospect of perennial bliss
In future worlds, if we act right in this.

CHAPTER III.

My own experience with respect to the climate.

From the 30th of September 1791, when I arrived at Philadelphia, to the 4th of October, the weather was very warm, even in the night. The mosquitoes were still extremely troublesome. In the night between the third and the fourth it had frozen, and in this one night, the woods had assumed their autumnal garb. Hereupon a north-west wind blew, and it was considerably cold. The sun was, however, still very powerful at noon. Nightly frosts were afterwards almost continual. The weather in general was clear, except in the morning, when it was foggy. On the 18th of October, it snowed. On the 11th of November, it was summer weather. In the first days of November, there arose a vapour from the ground. Until the new year, there fell no snow, and the rivers were not frozen, although, with north west winds it was sometimes very cold. On the 4th of January, the snow and frost set in. The winter continued to rage with great violence until the end of February, when the ice, which was from four to five feet thick in the rivers, broke up. The snow continued from four to five feet deep upon the ground, until the last of March. Notwithstanding which, there was on the first of March, a thunder storm. The days were generally clear, and in March, the sun shone warm. But in the night, it froze. The north west wind is very dry, and when you are for some time exposed to it, occasions thirst. From the dryness of this wind likewise, it proceeds, that the windows are never frozen as we call it. On the 20th of March, set in a violent rain, which then at length dissolved the snow and the frost, which had penetrated deep into the earth. In the last days of March, the meadows near Philadelphia, assumed their green garb, but not until after the middle of April, near the blue mountains. Towards the last of April, the peach trees blossomed; and the other trees, during the first fortnight in May, did the same. In April there were still many very raw days, when a fire was indispensable: this was always the case with a north west wind. May was lovely throughout. Gentle rains refreshed the air without too much cooling it. June was equally beautiful, with a silver atmosphere, gilt by the rays of the sun, and with a moderate warmth. July was disagreeable; surprisingly hot and then again with unpleasant rainy weather, very cold. On the 23d I left America.

On the 30th of September 1795, I arrived a second time at Philadelphia. The wind was north west, and of course very cold. Throughout October it was almost always fine, and especially about the middle of the day, warm weather. The autumn in America, generally the steadiest season. Yet although it has many clear days, yet it wants many of the agreeable scenes of an European au-turn. Neither such numerous, nor so various flocks of birds of passage are to be seen, nor the faint soft light, which sinks us into melancholy reflections upon the decay of nature. Fine autumnal days in America, are warm summer days generally followed by a cold winter night. In this finest season also, stinking fogs are not uncommon. These are remarkable for occasioning a prickly sensation in the eyes, like that produced by smoke. The first of January 1796, was a warm summer day; but immediately after it, the winter set in with great violence. The sudden changes of the temperature, produced at least upon me, corresponding instantaneous changes in my feelings. Almost every minute, I felt sensations of pain. But as soon as the weather changed, I was well again. I was now and then seized very suddenly with a fever which lasted a quarter or half an hour; but they vanished again as suddenly, as they had come on. What all Philadelphia suffered, as well as myself, were insupportable pains in the back. Great numbers of people in America die of pleurisies.

The winter of 1796, was however not cold enough to cover large rivers, such as the Delaware, with ice. Even the small rivers were free from it. The coldest day was the 31st of January. As usual there were incessant alterations of severe cold with warm sun shine, of clear days with snow, rain and fog. The winter was at an end about the middle of March, and some traces of reviving vegetation were perceptible about the 20th of that month. In the beginning of April, the days were very hot, and the nights so cold, that in the morning every thing was covered with hoar frost. On the 7th of April all the fruit trees were in blossom. Immediately after, it was so cold, that a fire was necessary in the chamber, for comfort, and this cold weather lasted a week long. Then again, it was very hot, and vegetation made a rapid progress. In the first days of May, it was full summer, but immediately after, November weather came on again. It rained, with a north east wind, and was cold. This lasted through all May. It rained every day, and then for a couple of hours was very hot. Then came a thunder shower, after which it was cold again. These sudden transitions continued likewise all through June. There were however some very fine days. In July, all of a sudden came on autumn. For after a day upon which Fahrenheit's thermometer, at least in Virginia, had risen to 90 degrees, the buckwheat and the Indian corn froze in the night. There are frozen boughs always to be seen upon every tree; and Dr. Rush writes that he has found traces of nightly frosts, every month in the year except July, which has now lost its exemption too, by this frost which I here notice. Mr. Jefferson in his book, asserts a remarkable circumstance, namely, that it often freezes when the thermometer stands below [above] the freezing point.

In August, the heat was insupportable, the nights often cold, and the mornings foggy. The heat often produced fainting fits, relaxed the bowels, excited pains, feverish affections, and I, for instance, by advice of a physician, could preserve myself from a putrid fever only by taking pepper mint drops. The beginning of September again was cold and rainy. I travelled on foot into the mountains of Pennsylvania, along the Susquehannah. After a hot day I crossed the river with a cold wind, and was immediately seized with a fever, which however soon left me again. I found in general, numbers of people ill with fevers. In September it was hot again. Fair and unpleasant days alternately succeeded one another as usual, and in the first days of October it rained, with a cold storm and a north east wind. On the 7th of the same month I left America, with fair weather.

A general characteristic feature of the American climate, distinguishing it from that of Germany, may be stated, in the observation that the autumn in America, is of longer duration than in Germany. But the spring does not set in at all earlier. Mr. Muhlenberg, a botanist, told me, that the vegetables generally begin to start about the 17th of May. But the months of January and February are never entirely clear of snow and ice. A German may therefore easily conclude from what he has here seen, that in respect to pleasantness and healthiness of climate, he makes an exchange for the worse, by removing from his native country to the atlantic parts of North America.

MISCELLANY.

[The high admiration with which the Editor surveys the lofty genius and boundless resources of the brightest son of Chatham, urges him to preserve in this paper the testimony of contemporary gratitude given on the natal day of WILLIAM PITT. Since the time of Walsingham the councils of England have never been moulded by a wiser statesman; since the time of Cardinal Ximenes, perilous hours have never been faced by a more intrepid minister, than by the subject of the following article, whose splendid talents have drawn forth the struggling and reluctant praise of one of the most obstinate of his foes, and who has been ardently extolled as "a man formed and fitted by nature to benefit his country, and give it lustre, and who is justly admired abroad as the writer of this article admires him, because his views are liberal, and wide as the horizon, because he has no low, little, mean petty vices, and because he is of a nature not at all suited to be a creature, or a tool."]

MR. PITT'S BIRTH-DAY.

Yesterday being the Anniversary of the birth of the Right Honourable William Pitt, his friends chose to celebrate the same (a vote of censure having been moved, and a vote of thanks having been carried in the House of Commons), by a public dinner, advertised in all the papers to be given at the London Tavern. That house not being sufficiently large, the Merchant Taylors' Hall, and the rooms adjoining, were lent for the accommodation of the company. In the first were laid six tables, besides the cross table at the top, and the galleries at each end. In the Hall dined about 600, and in the adjoining rooms about 300: and many more would have joined, had there been tickets and room for them. A private passage, we understand, communicates from the London Tavern, to the Merchant Taylors' Hall, through which the dinner was served.

• Mr. Sheridan.

Notice being given, that no one would be admitted before four o'clock; at half past three numbers began to assemble at Threadneedle street; and at four, when the doors were opened, several hundreds were waiting for admission, in carriages as well as on foot. The press was excessive, and, as fast as the company could be admitted, the room was filled. The number of Noblemen, and Members of Parliament was very great. At one time, we could count half a dozen blue ribbons and stars, besides red ribbons, at the top of the room. The body of the room was filled with merchants and underwriters, chiefly from Lloyd's Coffee house—and we suppose there never was an occasion on which so great a part of the landed Aristocracy of the country dined under the same roof with so considerable a body of the commercial interest. The Noblemen present, we are assured, amounted to 140. The Members of the House of Commons were certainly as numerous.

Marquis Cornwallis, when he went up the room was very warmly applauded. Among the company, of which we do not pretend to give an accurate list, we noticed the Duke of Rutland; Marquises Cornwallis, Townshend, and Buckingham; Earls Camden and Spencer; Lords Bruce, Carrington, Temple, Grenville, Belgrave, Hood, Longueville, Mulgrave, Hawkesbury, Romney, and Woodhouse, Mr. G. Rose, Mr. C. Long, and Mr. Canning. Mr. T. Grenville, Mr. Windham, Mr. Elliot, Mr. Dent, Aldermen, Curtis, Price, Watson, Glynn, and Anderson.—There were the personal friends of Mr. Pitt in great numbers; those who made the present peace; and those who declared the present peace is ruin. A party of anti-pacifics entered together, viz. the Marquis of Buckingham, followed by Lord Grenville, Mr. T. Grenville, Mr. Windham, and Mr. Elliot. They met at the top of the room, and cordially saluted the peace-makers, viz. Marquis Cornwallis and Lord Hawkesbury. Each, by their conduct, seemed to think Mr. Pitt is for the Peace and Mr. Pitt is against it; and perhaps he himself cannot tell which side he is on.

The company were admitted at four, but the dinner was not served till six!—a monstrous time for city appetites! The dinner and wines were not equal to the charge; but the wines were really good, and this for such a dinner was ample recompense.

The heat of the hall was excessive. A large party, chiefly Noblemen and Members of Parliament, retired from the right of the top table, to an adjoining room to dinner.

As soon as the cloth was withdrawn, NON NOBIS DOMINE was sung by Mess. Dignum, Nield, &c. very charmingly. The first toast, THE KING, was drank with very loud applause, and GOD SAVE THE KING, was sung. Next followed the Queen, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, and the rest of the Royal Family, each respectively saluted. Earl Spencer, who was in the chair, then rose to state that Mr. Pitt was expected to be present at the meeting; but a letter had been received from him, in which, while he expressed his high sense of the honour conferred by the company, he thought it would be indelicate that he himself should be present on that occasion merely complimentary to himself, and begged Earl Spencer would make his excuses. Earl Spencer, after having read Mr. Pitt's letter, proposed Mr. Pitt's health, which was drank with the utmost possible enthusiasm, and with three times three huzzas, handkerchiefs and hats waving, the room literally in a tumult of joy. The huzzas and plaudits were repeated over and over for at least ten minutes: the Gentlemen in the Galleries making signals with their handkerchiefs, and exciting fresh rounds of applause. When the tumult had subsided, Mr. Dignum was called upon for a song, and sung the following

SONG,

To the tune of the "Anacreontic."

To the Statesman, whose genius and judgment matur'd,
From Gallic ambition, 'midst Anarchy's cry.
To this country, her laws and her commerce secur'd;
Can Britons the grateful memorial deny?

No! just to his claim
Of a patriot's name,

They trust not his merit to posthumous fame:
Remember with pride what by Chatham was done,
And hallow the day that gave birth to his son.

Rome's Senate to her Worthies declared ovations,
With civic rewards she encircled their brows;
To a true British Worthly we pour our libations,
While our Senate her Order of merit bestows:

Amidst Europe's alarms,
With persuasion's blest charms,

Britain's Councils he led, rous'd her Heroes to arms:
In the dread wreck of nations her empire maintain'd,
Her spirit unconquer'd her credit unstain'd.

No Jacobin rites in our Fete shall prevail,
Our's the true feast of Reason—the soul's social flow—
Here we cherish the Friend and his virtues we hail,
But the Gallic fraternal Embrace disavow;

Impress'd with his worth,
We indulge in our mirth,

And bright shines the planet that rul'd at his birth.
Round the orbit of Britain, O! long may it move,
Like attendant satellites circling their Jove.

To the Councils of PITT* in an æra that's past,
Her high rank 'midst the nations this city may trace:
Though his statue may moulder, his mem'ry will last,
"The great and the good live again in their race."

Ere to time's distant day,
Our marble convey,

The fame that now blooms, and will know no decay:
Our Father's example our breasts shall inspire,
And we'll honor the Son, as they honor'd the Sire.

Printed copies of the above song, as well as of three others, were plentifully distributed about the tables before dinner. The above was written by Mr. George Rose, and was received with very great applause, the company joining chorus.

Nothing remarkable occurred in the toasts; the four great naval victories, and the naval heroes commanding were drank, viz. Earl Howe, and the first of June; Lord St. Vincent and the fourteenth of February; Lord Duncan and the eleventh of October; and Lord Nelson and the first of August. The Wooden Walls of England, were also given, and an appropriate glee sung. Dignum, after the toast of the eleventh of October sang, Camperdown. The army, the militia, and volunteers; the Lord Mayor, &c. &c. were drank. In the course of the evening the musical party sang the beautiful glee of While the stormy winds do blow. After which Earl Spencer immediately gave, The Pilot who weathered the Storm. A song having been previously distributed with this toast for its burthen, the toast was drank with enthusiasm, and reiterated plaudits, after which the song alluded to was sung by Dignum, as follows:

IF hush'd the loud whirlwind that ruffled the deep,
The sky if no longer dark tempests deform:
When our perils are past, shall our gratitude sleep?
No—Here's to the Pilot that weather'd the Storm!

At the footstool of Power let Flattery fawn;
Let Faction her idols extol to the skies;
To Virtue, in humble retirement withdrawn,
Unblam'd may the accents of Gratitude rise.

And shall not his mem'ry to Britain be dear,
Whose example with envy all nations behold—
A Statesman, unbiass'd by interest or fear,
By power uncorrupted, untainted by gold?

Who, when Terror and Doubt thro' the Universe reign'd,
While Rapine and Treason their standards unfurl'd,
The heart and the hopes of his country maintain'd;
And one kingdom preserv'd 'midst the wreck of the world.

* The late Earl of Chatham.

Unheeding, unthankful, we bask in the blaze,
While the beams of the sun in full Majesty shine;
When he sinks into twilight, with fondness we gaze,
And mark the mild lustre that gilds his decline.

So, PITT, when the course of thy greatness is o'er,
Thy talents, thy virtues, we fondly recall!
Now justly we prize thee, when lost we deplore,
Admir'd in thy zenith, but lov'd in thy fall!

O! take, then—for dangers by wisdom repell'd,
For evils, by courage and constancy brav'd—
O! take, for a Throne, by thy counsels upheld,
The thanks of a people, thy firmness has sav'd!

And O! if again the rude whirlwind should rise,
The dawning of peace should fresh darkness deform;
The regrets of the good, and the fears of the wise,
Shall turn to the Pilot that weather'd the storm!

This song was written by Mr. Canning, and every verse was followed by a loud burst of applause. The whole company was thrown into a transport of joy at the end of each stanza. Such was the successful effect of the song, that at a quarter before ten, Earl Spencer looking round how to conclude the evening handsomely, gave again the toast of The Pilot who weathered the Storm, and the song was repeated with still greater enthusiasm. After this Earl Spencer gave, The Master and Wardens of the Merchant Taylor's Company, and thanks to them for the use of their Hall. He then left the chair, and most of the distinguished personages withdrew. In the course of the evening, Sir R. Peele gave the health of the chairman, which was drank with loud applause, and Earl Spencer simply returned thanks.

Hor.

TO THE AUTHOR OF THE LOITERER.

Though I know not in what degree of estimation you have been accustomed to hold the science of Alchemy, yet as the author of every useful invention has claim on the attention of the candid and liberal, I have made choice of your paper as the vehicle, to impart to my countrymen a discovery, which has for its object the health and happiness of some thousands of his majesty's subjects.

You must know, Sir, it was ever my opinion that there did exist such an universal panacea as should not only cure all diseases incident to the human body, and prolong life to its utmost period, but should be equally beneficial to our mental, as to our corporeal powers; should make us not only healthy, strong, and bold, but also learned, sagacious, and witty. In pursuance of this idea, I have devoted many years to the discovery of this valuable secret; have persevered in my search, in spite of the contempt, of the prejudiced, and the laughter of the gay; and now think the attention of my past life well rewarded, in being enabled to impart to my friends a secret, which will promote the happiness of theirs, and which (unlike the generality of modern projectors) I shall generously communicate to the public, without any subscription whatever.

Know then, Sir, and tell your readers, that this inestimable medicine, so long sought in vain, that its existence is almost become doubtful, is neither more nor less than port wine—which, I will venture to say, if taken in proper quantities, will answer every purpose of an universal medicine, and be found a most perfect restorative in all diseases both of body and mind—In proof of which assertion, I might bring numberless examples from among the young, and some from among the old, in this place; who, from a proper regard to their health, daily take a large dose of this mixture, which doubtless they would not give themselves the trouble of doing, did they not find it extremely beneficial and salutary.—But in this case I rather choose to plead my own manner of life than theirs. An argument which ought to have the more weight, as I am, I believe, the first advertiser who ever swallowed his own medicine. My regular allowance, for I am regularity itself, is something more than a quart, which, according as I find my constitution require, I occasionally increase to three pints, and now and then to double that quantity, but never, on any account, diminish; being entirely of opinion, that the most of our complaints arise from poverty of blood, and having been all my life under apprehension of putrid disorders, to which, I am told, that my constitution is naturally inclined.—By the above-mentioned regimen, however, I have happily escaped them; and excepting a slight touch of the gout; in spring and autumn, and a few nervous tremblings (which I impute to having formerly drank too many diluting liquors) I enjoy at this moment a most perfect and uninterrupted state of health.—Nor am I less indebted to this valuable elixir for improving the qualities of my mind, than preserving the powers of my body, having by long experience observed, that my courage, generosity, and wit, always rise in exact proportion to the number of glasses I have drank. Indeed I have reason to believe I am not naturally conspicuous for any of the above qualifications; and in the morning am very careful how I expose either my person or property, to any unnecessary danger; and have heard it predicted by my most intimate friends (who are indeed always too much inclined to flatter one) that I shall never be taken up for a plot. But in the evening the case is exactly reversed; for my courage and generosity have often induced me to fight those with whom I had no quarrel, and give money to others for whom I had no regard; and the brilliancy of my wit is so redundant, that it seldom fails to get me turned out of the room.—But it is not in the hour of festivity, or amidst the social circle alone, that I am obliged to the assistance of this invigorating fluid; for I always find it wonderfully efficacious in raising my spirits, and restoring my good temper, whenever the carelessness of my landress, the awkwardness of my bedmaker, the blunders of the cook, or any other important misfortune has ruined the natural sweetness of my disposition. And I do hereby heartily recommend a very large dose of this medicine to those unfortunate young men, who, from the frowns of fortune, or of any other fickle fair one, have fallen into the deplorable state, which our politer neighbours dignify with the name ennui, but which plain Englishmen call the blue devils; and I will take upon me to assure them, that they will find, in this Lethæan draught, as complete an opiate to all their cares and sorrows, as in the torturing powder of arsenic, or the benumbing juice of the laurel. And in the prosecution of this plan two particular advantages will arise—first, that the medicine itself is by far the most pleasant and palatable of the two—and secondly, that if it should happen to fail, they would still have it in their power to try the others. For this, however, I must flatter myself, they would find no occasion, and am sanguine enough to imagine, that a proper use of this liquor would considerably lessen the bills of mortality; that our fashionable young men, would be thus enabled to bear up against all the various misfortunes which occur in this troublesome world; would rise superior to the losses of a Newmarket meeting, or an ill run at B——ks's, and would preserve their good temper and spirits, amidst the harsh blasts of the east, or the damps of an autumnal fog.

The utility, therefore, of the plan, must appear evident to every unprejudiced mind, when it is considered, how many fine young fellows, will, by this means be restored to their country and friends, who may encourage the manufactures, and increase the population of the metropolis; and at last be honourably spitted in Kensington gravel-pits, or shot through the head in the gentlest manner, behind Montague-house. Not to mention the triumph which every Englishman must feel, in refuting the cruel sarcasms, which our neighbours have always thrown on us, for those ungentleman-like methods, of making our exit, with which our nation has been too long, and I fear to justly stigmatized; since we shall then shew them that our patience in bearing misfortunes, is equal to our spirit in bringing them on, and that after we have lost our estates, health, and reputation, we dare live to be hanged.—And should it be objected to me by the unbelieving, that like other schemers, I am a dupe to the enthusiasm of my temper, and ascribe powers and advantages to my favourite medicine, which it does not really possess; in answer to this I can assure them, that I have by me, a long and well attested list of cures, which I have already performed on those of my private friends, who have put themselves under my directions, and from which I shall at present select one, which I think will sufficiently establish the credit of the medicine with a discerning public.—A very intimate friend of mine, who was spending the last long vacation at a relation's house in the country, took it into his head (probably from want of something to do,) to fall more violently in love with a young lady, in the neighbourhood, than I hope, you or I, Mr. Loiterer, shall ever be as long as we live. The fair one, it seems, was, or pretended to be, insensible to his passion, and her cruelty had such a dreadful effect on him, that he was reduced in the course of a few weeks, from one of the jolliest fellows in the world, to the merest sighing swain that ever adorned the pages of romance. In this pitiful condition, he came to keep Michaelmas term. I saw in an instant what was the matter with him, and with some difficulty prevailed on him to submit to my regimen. Never was a case better hit—never was a cure more rapidly affected.—On the very first evening, after swallowing a bottle of this liquor, he appeared less absent and dejected than in the morning.—On the second was seen to smile.—On the third, knew several of his intimate friends who were in the room, and sometimes answered when he was spoken to.—On the fourth, fifth, and sixth, shewed evident symptoms of a restoration of reason, and at the expiration of the week, surprised us all, by jumping up from his chair, and singing with great taste and expression,

“And Chloe perhaps might have troubled my life,
“With crosses and losses, vexation and strife;
“But my wine neither nurses nor babies can bring,
“And a big-bellied bottle's a mighty good thing.”

From this moment I pronounced him perfectly cured, and having cautioned him against a relapse suffered him at the end of the term to go back into the country.—But the most curious part of the story is, that the fair lady, who would not have any thing to say to him when he was dying for her, as soon as she found he cared not sixpence about her, began to think him a very fine young fellow; and I received last week a letter signed by both bridegroom and bride, thanking me in the warmest manner, and assuring me, that they considered themselves obliged to me, for their present happiness. Nor let this be wondered at, for it is one of the many advantages belonging to this medicine, that it gives to the most timorous and diffident that happy fluency in conversation and that pleasing ease and assurance of manner, which we all know makes us most acceptable companions to the fair, an advantage, which if you are a man of gallantry, Mr. Loiterer, you will think fully sufficient without any other to recommend it to every young man of spirit and taste.—With you, I believe, any more than myself, it stands not in need of any recommendation—for between ourselves, Mr. Loiterer, I have been long assured that you are no enemy to a bottle.—Horace says—

Fecundi caliceus quem non fecere diertum?

And I say—no man could write such papers as your's who drank water.—Let me then intreat you, sir, to persevere in your plan—avoid by all means the light sour French wines, which will infallibly corrupt your style, and render your thoughts meagre, weak, and insipid—whereas real genuine port, will give you that warmth of imagination, soundness of judgment, and brilliancy of wit, which I hope may long continue to distinguish your productions.—As I hear the dinner bell, I must now finish my letter, which I shall not do without assuring you, that whenever you will come and take your commons with me at—college, I shall be happy to drink a bottle with you (or two if you please) to the success of your work, and that I am, Sir, your's, &c.

TOBY PEILPOT.

ON MUSIC AS A FEMALE ACCOMPLISHMENT.

A DIALOGUE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

R. Busy at thy needle, hey! my friend? That it seems is preferable, just now, to the book, the key, the pencil.

L. It is necessary. Music and painting will not cloathe nor feed me. They are occasional amusements, and are far from being the business of my life. The pencil at least, music is something more.

R. Why what is music to you more than a mere recreation. I never have hitherto inquired, and wonder at myself for not doing so, into the manner in which you distribute your time. How much do you give to your music?

L. Regularly thirty or forty minutes in the twenty-four hours.

R. What is your instrument? and where do you keep it?

L. 'Tis a piano forte. I keep it in my chamber.

R. Why not in your drawing-room? when you wish to gratify your friends must you take them into your chamber?

L. I never gratify my friends with music. I am unable to do it. I should think myself culpable if I had bestowed that time on music, which is necessary to make me a proficient, and to qualify me for pleasing hearers of true taste. Those void of taste, those capable of being pleased with my performance, I should find no pleasure in pleasing.

R. And is that your motive for concealing your instrument?

L. It is one among several. That alone would suffice, but that is not all that influences me.

R. What others have you?

L. I select my friends and visitants for their intellectual and social merits. I invite them to converse with them, to mingle feelings and ideas with them, which can only be done, or, at least, can best be done, by speech. Should they prefer my music to my conversation, what could I infer but their want of a correct taste, or my want of affability or talents? and either inference would mortify my vanity or lower them in my opinion, and unfit them for visitants of mine. They must think lightly of my conversation, or I must think lightly of their judgment.

R. This is reasoning, I think, with too much refinement. In the first place, what you call proficiency in music, is ambiguous and indefinite. No doubt, he that devotes all his zeal and his time to any instrument, will still have something to learn, after forty or sixty years of application. Some new grace, some additional dexterity, will be daily and hourly acquired. At no time can it be said that he has gained all possible excellence; at no time will his friends be able to congratulate him upon having nothing more to learn, but if we cannot be pleased with any thing short of absolute excellence, it follows that no performance can ever please,

The truth is, that this like every other skill, is susceptible of innumerable degrees. The candid and judicious hearer will be pleased, in proportion to the degree of skill that is displayed. The highest degree of skill will please most, but that degree is unattainable. The lowest degree may please, in a low degree, but, nevertheless, will somewhat please him.

Beside, you must not forget of how complex and variable a kind is the pleasure of music. We are pleased with an air, not merely from the skill displayed, the mere fruit of application, memory, and habit, in subdividing time and melody, but in numberless associations flowing from the time, place, the company, the person, character and situation of the performer, and particularly, from the words or images of the stanza or the ode that is thus embellished.

And further, a pleasing performer is not made by merely mechanical command of muscles either of the voice or fingers. She must have sensibility and taste, and these may be gained or be possessed without eternal application to the wires or the gamut. As to sensibility and taste, I see no reason to deny them to you. As to skill, you once confessed, that for five years together, you never omitted to sing or play, once a day at least. Now, surely, this quantity of application, added to that taste, in which I cannot imagine you very deficient, must have qualified you to please the most select and judicious audience.

Your preference of talk to music is laudable, but not enough to justify the total neglect, or obstinate concealment of your music. There is a time, says the adage, for all things, and a season when it is a mark of wisdom even to play the fool. It must be granted that conversation is better than music, and that one topic of conversation is better than any other, but still, as it is necessary to vary conversation, by admitting different topics, it is requisite to diversify our intercourse by different employments. What say you to my arguments?

L. Excuse me if I say that they are inapplicable to the present case. Your general rule, like your adage, is true only with abundance of limitations. Possibly, there may arise cases, when music and cards may be proposed or encouraged, without impropriety; and when these cases occur, I endeavour cheerfully to conform to them; but they occur much oftener than is necessary. It is folly that generally creates them, and indolence that fosters. Very seldom, indeed, and never in my own house, where I endeavour to exempt myself from all impertinent and useless company, has it been necessary to while away the time by a game, or enliven the torpid attention by a tune.

R. So, you place the harpsichord and whist table on the same level. They are equally, you think, time-killers and impertinents? I cannot agree with you. The pleasure of music is not merely sensual. It suspends, to be sure, for a time, but does not incapacitate for conversation. It illuminates the fancy, stimulates reflection, and calls forth, not merely innocent, but laudable and generous emotions, and this is far more the tendency of vocal and social strains, than of instrumental and solitary symphonies, in which it seems you are not unwilling to indulge yourself. I think you said you devote to your minuet some minutes daily.

L. I do, but my motive will, perhaps justify me.

R. What is your motive?

L. I owe duty to my maker; not only the worship that consists in conforming, in sentiments and actions to his known will, but in gratitude and homage. These emotions prompt me to utterance and to musical utterance. I love to give voice to my devotion, and to accompany my voice with the forte and piano of my instrument.

I have gradually, without much design, studied into some regularity in this respect, and have for some years set apart, an half hour before I go to rest, and made it sacred to an hymn. Thoughts, suitable to this office, I have found most readily to occur in night, stillness, and solitude: I have never been fortunate enough to associate in a domestic way, with one capable or willing to join with me in this service. From the nature of the human mind, perhaps, or merely from peculiarities of constitution or habit in myself, I find company of any kind, the glare of day, or of numerous lights, tend to divert and bewilder my attention. I must have power to enter into my own thoughts, darkness and stillness must surround me; the business of the day must be passed, and I must be alone, before I can muse myself into the seriousness and ardour of devotion, before I can commune with my own heart, or raise my affections to my maker.

R. But is that your only religion? do not you approve of social worship?

L. Certainly, but my approbation of public, does not require me to condemn or to intermit the duties of private worship. In the sect, to which I belong, you know that public worship occurs but one day in the seven, but I should think myself culpable in not making it a daily office.

R. But you spoke just now of the tendency of company, and glare and noises to dissipate attention and counteract devout impulses.

L. True, but I spoke only of this tendency in relation to myself; others may have different habits or a different constitution, and in that respect their rectitude and zeal may be superior to mine. Heaven forbid that I should deny zeal or sincerity to those who confine their oraisons to the church on the Sabbath. I only hint that night is the season, and my closet is the place, most favourable to my devotions.

And this, perhaps, has arisen from peculiar circumstances. I left my country when very young, and went to reside among a people who were of a religious profession different from mine. My father was not an irreligious man, but he was religious by habit, and merely in form. Piety consisted with him in going to church, paying his tythe, and dressing himself sprucely on Sundays. There being no congregation established, nor rector supported near him, he thought himself acquitted of the duty of church going, and imagined there was guilt in frequenting himself, or allowing me, his daughter, to frequent the Presbyterian place of worship.

I was young, pliable, and obsequious in consequence of my youthful diffidence and of my father's authoritative deportment. Strange faces startled me, as strange forms disgusted him. I was obliged to content myself therefore, and was easily contented with worshipping on Sundays as unformally as on other days. Habit, while it facilitated and endeared to me this practice, made every other productive of constraint, cold, embarrassing, unprofitable.

R. But your situation is now changed. In New-York you have splendid and commodious churches, and celebrated teachers of your own sect.

L. And yet, (perhaps I ought to say it to my shame) I am far from being a punctual attendant. I am no theologian. I have never dived into controversies, nor gotten creeds and confessions by heart. I am far from denying the utility, or even, in general, the necessity of public worship, but to me it is not, I am inclined to think, either useful or necessary.

Yet I do not estrange myself wholly from church. When all circumstances favour, I go, but I readily permit bad weather or bad health to prevent me from going. Besides, I am no admirer of the preachers whom I hear. Had they more eloquence or more wisdom in their sermons, my taste, if not my piety, would lead me oftener to the church than I am now led.

R. But to return to your music. In what way do you make it subservient to devotion? what pieces do you play?

L. My scheme, I confess to you, is a very strange one. I never play from a book, and can hardly be said to play from memory.

R. Indeed? how then? are you an improvisista?

L. I will tell you how it came. I went to live, as I said, when very young, not more than fourteen, with my father, at ———. I gradually became sociable and intimate with the young ladies of the place. One of them, some years older than myself, was fond of her piano forte, and I, by frequently seeing and hearing her performance, grew fond of it also; she allowed me and even persuaded me to thrum it now and then, and assisted me by her instructions till, in a few months, I could execute a simple tune, a march or a minuet, with tolerable accuracy as to time.

At length, my friend accepted an invitation to spend a winter at New-York, and offered me, meanwhile, the use of her instrument during her absence, which I freely accepted. My father had no pleasure in music, and even condemned it as a waste of time, and as unsuitable to the station in which I was placed. His reasonings had some influence on my judgment, but I thought myself bound to conform to her wishes. I obtained his consent to my receiving the instrument on condition, as he said, that I would keep it out of sight, and give to it but a very few minutes in the day.

During the lightsome and wakeful hours, I was sufficiently employed in attendance upon him, with my books, pen, and household affairs. It was only when the day's occupations and amusements were over, and I withdrew to my chamber, that I found time to be musical; but that was the hour in which I had used myself to offer up the tribute of my gratitude and penitence to Heaven. This office I could not, on any account, relinquish or encroach upon. What then was I to do?

The solemn strains which my friend had sometimes played in my hearing, had frequently and in a powerful degree, soothed and elevated my thoughts. They inspired me with awfulness and rapture. Reflecting on this, and on the union there had always been, in every species of worship, between devotion and music, methought I could not do better than to make them coalesce on this occasion.

I began, therefore, with the simple tune of which I was mistress, and contrived to adapt to it spontaneously the words which occurred to me at the fleeting moment. I never played according to set forms. I was accustomed to lean upon my pillow, collect and fix my thoughts on Providence and Heaven, and utter, lowly, indistinctly, the suggestions of the moment.

To this practice I still partly adhered, but now modulated my accent into some accordance with my instrument. I did not strive after numbers or rhyme. These were restraints wholly unsuited to my purpose or my inclination. I kept to the tune that I had learned; sometimes was silent for a minute, then uttered a word or syllable that chanced to come, and endeavoured, not at first, with constant success to make my voice coincide with the key.

I love to look back upon some parts of my life. To trace my present situation, views, and capacities to their earliest original; their beginnings and their progress, but to describe these would make me, I fear, a tedious companion.

R. Lay aside that apprehension, I beseech you. You cannot please me more than by such details. I pray you go on, and be as minute as possible.

(To be continued.)

CLASSICAL LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

They who are apprized of the Editor's partiality for the ANCIENTS, and of his admiration of W. GIFFORD, the most successful student in the school of Pope, can easily imagine the pleasure, with which the pages of the new translation of JUVENAL have been inspected. The defects of the prior versions are now generally understood. The harshness of Holiday, the peccantry of Stapleton, the carelessness of Dryden, the imbecility of his associates, and the stiffness of Owen, are notorious to every polite scholar. Dr. JOHNSON alone had exhibited a likeness of the indignant bard; but, to pursue the allusion, it was only a half-length, a miniature, and men fondly hoped it was reserved for CHURCHILL to give a complete and vivid picture of a satirist, whose genius was declamatory, and whose voice was indignant like his own. But Churchill, between his profligacy and his patriotism, between the nocturnal debauch of Beckford, and the despicable politics of Joan Wilkes, between the dreams of an excursive fancy, and the seducing indolence of the ingenious Lloyd, had little time, and, perhaps, less inclination, for so momentous, and so grave a work. This task, at once virtuous, lofty, and severe, was reserved for Mr. Gifford, who, in his "Bavard and Mæviad," one of the most pungent and elegant of modern satires, had given the amplest promise of his talents for translation. This elegant version, from the London press, appears before us in all that splendour, with which elegant letters should be ever invested in an enlightened and munificent nation. It is in a superb quarto, printed by Bulmer, and sold by the Nicolls, booksellers to the King. It is both correctly and beautifully executed; and they, who fancy the soul may be discerned in the face, will be gratified by the spirited portrait of the translator, engraved from an original picture by his friend Hoppner, one of the Royal Academicians.

Of the translation itself we shall speak somewhat largely on another occasion. We shall only add that it is given in such ardent and energetic words, as Juvenal would have himself employed, had Juvenal been an Englishman. It has all the dignity of the original. It is enriched with much agreeable preliminary matter, and the notes, copious and learned, present a charming parterre of miscellany.

We perceive with very high satisfaction, that John Morgan, of this city, and Ezra Sargeant, of New-York, booksellers, have undertaken to publish a splendid Edition in America. There is no doubt of its elegant execution, and its liberal encouragement. Our wishes are cordial for its early appearance. For the honour of learning, we shall exult to behold the wide diffusion of GIFFORD'S fame, and an eager admiration of the ANCIENT, whose features he has so gracefully copied. In despite of the new doctors of the rights of Literature, and of a false philosophy, superficial as the French coxcombs who gave it birth, CLASSICAL LEARNING will be cherished by every genuine scholar; and when republican froth has evaporated, and ephemeral innovations shall have skulked away, Athenian and Roman wisdom and beauty will continue permanent.

"Dum jugo montis aper, fluvios dum piscis amabit."

* This is supposed to be the gentleman, whom the Poet in the conclusion of one of his satires, thus affectionately apostrophizes

Thou too, my Hoppner! if my wish availed,
Shouldst praise the strain that but for thee had failed:
Thou knowest, when Indolence possessed me all,
How oft I roused at thy inspiring call;
Burst from the Siren's fascinating power,
And gave the Muse thou lov'st, one studious hour.
Proud of thy friend-hip, while the voice of fame
Pursues thy merits with a loud acclaim,

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

Looking this evening into Heron's observations, made in a journey through the western counties of Scotland, a book of travels not read so much as it deserves, I lighted upon a description of his passage across the Frith of Forth. Our tourist here takes occasion to advert to the dangers formerly experienced in this navigation, and mentions, that at an early epoch, some of the Scottish nobility were shipwrecked in a voyage, at an inclement season, under Sir Patrick Spence. The ballad, in which this melancholy event is recorded, Mr. Heron tells us he remembered to have heard sung to him in his infancy by one of his ancient relations, and our sentimental traveller indulges a Scotsman's pride, and a poet's associations by inserting it in his book. Addison, with no ill-supported sally of enthusiasm, introduced Chey Chace into his Spectator, and I may be permitted, by those who remember my Scottish prejudices, to copy a Caledonian ballad with all its rudeness of dialect and hoar of age.

The king sits in Dumferling toun,
Drinking the blude reid wine;
O whar will I get a guid sailor,
To sail this schip of mine?

Up and spake an eldern knight,
Sat at the king's right ne,
Sir Patrick Spence is the best sailor,
That sails upon the see.

The king has writt'n a braid letter,
And sign'd it wi his hand;
And sent it to Sir Patrick Spence,
Was walking on the sand.

The first line that Sir Patrick red,
A loud laugh lauched he:
The next line that Sir Patrick red
The tier blinded his ee.

O wha is this has don this deed,
This ill deed don to me;
To send me out this time of the zeir
To sail upon the se.

Mak haste, mak haste, my merry men
Our guid schip, sails the morn,
O, say ra sae, my maister deir,
For I fear a deadly storme.

I share the triumph; not displeased to see
Our kindred destinies... for thou, like me,
Wast thrown too soon on the world's dangerous tide,
To sink or swim, as chance might best decide.
We, all too weak to gain the distant land,
The waves had whelm'd, but that an outstretch'd hand
Kindly upheld, when now with fear unnerv'd....
And still protects the life it then preserv'd.
Thee, powers untried, perhaps untell before,
Enabled, though with pain, to reach the shore,
While Wlat stood by, the doubtful strife to view,
Nor lent a friendly arm to help thee through.
Nor ceased the labour there: Haste, ill-suppress,
Advantage took of thy ingenious breast,
Where saving wisdom yet had plac'd no screen,
But every word, and every thought was seen,
To darkness all thy life..... 'Tis past: more bright
Through the departing gloom thou strik'st the sight;
While baffled malice hastes thy powers to own,
And wonders at the worth so long unknown.

I too, whose voice no claims but truth's e'er mov'd,
Who long have seen thy merits, long have loved,
Yet loved in silence, lest the rout should say
Too partial friendship tuned the applauding lay;
Now, now that all conspire thy name to raise,
May join the shout of unsuspected praise.

Go then, since the long struggle now is o'er,
And envy can obstruct thy fame no more;
With ardent hand thy magic toil pursue;
And pour fresh wonders on our rapin'd view.
One Sun is set, one Glorious Sun; whose rays
Long gladdened Britain with no common blaze:
O, may'st thou soon (for clouds begin to rise)
Assert his station in the eastern skies,
Glow with his fires, and give the world to see Another Reynolds risen, My Friend, in thee.

Late, late, yestreen I saw the nau moone
Wi' the auld moone in her arme,
And I fear, I fear, my dear maister
That we will come to harnie.

O, our Scots nobles were richt laith
To wet their cork heil'd schoone,
But large ome at the play wer play'd
Their hats they swam aboome.

O, lang, lang may their ladies sit
Wi' their fans into their hand
Or eir they see Sir Patrick Spence
Cum sailing to the land.

O lang, lang may the ladies stand,
Wi' their gold kems in their hair,
Waiting for their ain dier lairds,
For they'll se them na mair.

Have care, have care to Aberdour,
Its fif fathom deep;
And their lies good Sir Patrick Spence,
Wi' the Scots lairds at his feet.

So frail were then the stoutest vessels in the Scottish navy; so fearful its most skilful mariners; so difficult the navigation of the Frith of Forth. Beside these circumstances, this ballad commemorates facts, illustrative of the manners of these times. It was then a fashion prevalent among the nobility, to wear cork-heel'd shoes. The ladies used fans and wore no ornaments on the head except a comb, restraining the hair. The hat, not the Scottish blue bonnet, was the fashionable stile for the men. Nor are these simple strains destitute of poetical merit. There is a beauty in the manner in which Sir Patrick Spence is represented as passing hastily from his reflections on the probable danger to which he was injudiciously, or maliciously exposed, to give orders for the necessary preparations for his voyage; in the image introduced by the sailor, who wished to divert him from his purpose; in the abrupt transition to the fatal consequences of this ill-timed voyage; and in the images by which the distress of its miscarriage is marked.

When I am disappointed, during the day, of receiving my share of pleasure and improvement from colloquial intercourse with those who converse sensibly, I commonly take up Boswell's Johnson as an excellent substitute for vivacious conversation on topics of taste and literature. The following remark of Dr. JOHNSON is quite to my taste.

"Sir, there is one Mrs. Macaulay* in this town, a great republican. One day, when I was at her house, I put on a very grave countenance, and said to her, 'Madam I am now become a convert to your way of thinking. I am convinced that all mankind are upon an equal footing; and to give you an unquestionable proof, madam, that I am in earnest, here is a very sensible, civil, well-behaved fellow-citizen, your footman. I desire that he may be allowed to sit down and dine with us.' I thus, sir, shewed the absurdity of the levelling doctrine. Sir your levellers wish to level down, as far as themselves, but they cannot bear levelling up to themselves."

* When some historians meet with any information in favour of those personages, whom they have chosen to execrate, as it were, systematically, they employ forgeries, interpolations, or still more effectual villainy. Mrs. Macaulay, when she consulted the MSS. at the British museum, was accustomed, in her historical researches, when she came to any passage, unbecomingly to her party, or, in favour of the STUARTS, to destroy the page of the MSS. These dilapidations were at length perceived, and she was watched. The Harleian MS. 7379, will go down to posterity as an eternal testimony of her historical impartiality. It is a collection of state letters. This MS. has three pages entirely torn out; and it has a note, signed by the principal librarian that, on such a day, the MS. was delivered to her, and the same day the pages were found to be destroyed.

See Dr. Lisle's Dissertation on Anecdotes,
Edition of 1793, pages 69 and 70.

This statement of the honesty of this republican hater of good principles is copied faithfully from the works of an elegant scholar, who, to use his own words, "was induced to notice this singular occurrence, not by design, but by accident; with no other view than that of literary instruction, and for no other party than that of truth."

Mr. Pye, the present laureat, in his summer's retirement, has lately amused himself by twining another poetical wreath. The following is one of the flowers.

SONNET WRITTEN AT CLIEFDEN SPRING.

Majestic Thames, whose ample current flows,
The wood reflecting in its silver tide,
Which hanging from the hills, that grace thy side
O'er this clear fount its massy foliage throws;
Here on thy brink my limbs again repose:
Yet though thy waves Augusta's towers divide,
Or by the foot of princely Windsor glide:
Still with more heartfelt joy my bosom glows,
While Memory shows by Isis virgin stream
Where first I woud the witching powers of song,
As wrapt in Fancy's dear delusive dream,
I desultory rovd her banks along,
Nor ask'd a brighter wreath to grace my theme
Than humbly grew her willow shades among.

Mr. Gibbon, in his unrestrained correspondence with lord Sheffield, introduces the following opinions, which are the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. I care not how they are relished by the fanatics of democracy.

"I beg leave to subscribe my assent to Mr. BURKE's creed on the revolution of France. I admire his eloquence, I approve his politics, I adore his chivalry, and I can almost excuse his reverence for church establishments. I have sometimes thought of writing a dialogue of the dead, in which Lucian, Erasmus, and Voltaire should mutually acknowledge the danger of exposing an old superstition to the contempt of the blind and fanatic multitude."

Speaking of the progress of the republican infection in Switzerland, he says:

"The fanatic missionaries of sedition have scattered the seeds of discontent in our cities and villages, which had flourished above 300 years, without fearing the approach of war, or feeling the weight of government."

On the receipt of the rueful intelligence of the murder of Louis, he makes the following reflections:

"An innocent and well disposed prince has paid the forfeit of the sins of his predecessors; of the ambition of Louis XIV, of the profusion of Louis XV. The French nation had a glorious opportunity, but they have abused, and have lost their advantages. If they had been content with a liberal translation of our system, if they had respected the prerogatives of the crown, and the privileges of the nobles, they might have raised a solid fabric ON THE ONLY TRUE FOUNDATION, THE NATURAL ARISTOCRACY OF A GREAT COUNTRY. How different is the prospect! Their King brought a captive to Paris, after his palace had been stained by the blood of his guards; the nobles in exile; the clergy plundered in a way which strikes at the root of all property; the capital an independent republic; the union of the provinces dissolved; the flames of discord kindled by the worst of men (in that light I consider Mirabeau); and the most honest of the assembly a set of wild visionaries, (like our "Dr. Price,) who gravely debate and dream about the establishment of a pure and perfect democracy of five and twenty millions, the virtues of the golden age and the primitive rights and equality of mankind, which would lead, in fair reasoning, to an equal partition of lands and money."

* The old Jewry cashier of Kings. Of this precious Puritan see a full length and loathsome picture in Burke's reflections.

From the ingenious, wise, and correct Miss HAMILTON, we copy the following sensible remarks on the discipline of children. This lady, of the old school, knows nothing of those rights of infants, and that insolence of the cradle, so finely understood and so confidently taught in this free country.

"The idea of obedience ought to be early and firmly associated with ideas of security and happiness. In the education of youth were all prohibitions made absolute, and the necessity of issuing them guarded against as much as possible, so that they should not often occur, it would go far towards rendering obedience natural and easy; for it would then appear a matter of necessity and as such be submitted to without reluctance.

"I was some years ago intimately acquainted with a respectable and happy family, where the behaviour of the children excited my admiration. One morning, on entering the drawing room, I found the little group of laughing cherubs at high play round their fond mother, who was encouraging their sportive vivacity, which was, at that time, noisy enough, but which, on my entrance, she hushed by a single word. No bad humour followed. But as the spirits, which had been elevated by the preceding amusement, could not at once sink into a state of quiescence, the judicious mother did not require what she knew could not, without difficulty, be complied with, but calmly addressing them, gave the choice of remaining in the room without making any noise, or of going to their own apartment, where they might make what noise they pleased. The eldest and youngest of the four preferred the former, while the two others went away to the nursery. Those who staid with us, amused themselves by cutting paper in a corner, without giving any interruption to our conversation. I could not refrain from expressing my admiration at their behaviour, and begged to know by what art she had attained such a perfect government of her children's wills and actions. By no art, returned this excellent parent, but that of teaching them from the very cradle an implicit submission. Having never once been permitted to disobey me, they have no idea of attempting it; but, you see, I always give them a choice when it can be done with propriety; if it cannot, whatever I say they know to be a law, like that of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not."

I transcribe from Sir William Jones another of the Odes of Hafiz. If this introduction will induce our friend, O, to give it a poetical dress, fifteen minutes of this evening will not be employed wholly in vain.

"May the hand never shake which gathered the grapes! May the foot never slip which pressed them!"

"That poignant liquor, which the zealot calls the mother of sins, is pleasanter and sweeter to me than the kisses of a maiden.

"Wine two years old and a damsel of fourteen, are sufficient society for me above all companies great and small.

"How delightful is dancing to lively notes, and the cheerful melody of the flute, especially when we touch the hand of a beautiful girl.

"Call for wine and scatter flowers around; what more canst thou ask from Fate? Thus spoke the Nightingale this morning: what sayst thou, sweet rose, to his precepts?"

"Bring thy couch to the garden of roses, that thou mayest kiss the cheeks and lips of lovely damsels, quaff rich wine, and smell odoriferous blossoms.

"O branch of an exquisite rose plant, for whose sake dost thou grow? Ah! on whom will that smiling rose bud confer delight?"

"The rose would have discoursed on the beauties of my charmer, but the gale was jealous and stole her breath, before she spoke."

In this age, the only friends, who are free from blemish, are a flask of pure wine, and a volume of elegant love songs.

In the first volume of the works of this elegant orientalist, after his dissertation on the mystical poetry of the Persians, he has introduced a little pastoral drama, called Gi ta govinda, or the songs of Jayadeva. The whole is too long for translation, and, indeed, many parts are local, trifling, or obscure. But a selection might be made of very brilliant couplets, which would exhibit most of the loves and graces in poetry.

LEVITY.

SPECIMEN OF BIOGRAPHY.

A. B. was born in the year—(no matter what) his parents were (no matter who) he had a pleasant, chubby, countenance, frisked about in his nurse's arms—said ta when he was bid, and every body pronounced him to be—a sweet baby.

After this he began to walk alone, went from one end of the room to the other, spoke pa and ma and several other words very distinctly, and looked so charming, that every one declared he was—a pretty boy.

He was now sent to school, where he learned his letters so well, that in a year or two he could read a short lesson in the spelling book, and repeat it to his papa and mama by heart (on condition of receiving a slice of plumb cake) and was always desired to walk in and be admitted by the company who all agreed that he was—a charming child.

In his progress, by listening to the conversation of those about him, he acquired a perfect memory, as well as the prompt and proper application of common phrases in common speech, and which he delivered in such a pleasing accent, and unblushing countenance, that he universally acquired the character of—a wonderful boy for his years.

He was now sent to a superior school, and began to study Latin, Arithmetic, &c. Here he equalled, at least, if not excelled his fellow scholars in his proficiency, but playing so many droll tricks at the expense of ushers, and his school fellows, that they had no scruple in pronouncing him—a clever lad.

He was next sent to college, where he out did all his competitors in the midnight frolic, played an excellent hand at whist, learned to drink his bottle, and was so pleasant at singing a catch or glee, that they all agreed in bestowing upon him the epithet of—a promising fellow.

Here, too, he distinguished himself in certain amours, rather of the expensive kind, though they did not extend to higher game than his bedmaker or his laundress's daughters; when his parents were informed of his gallantries, they cried out in exstasy that he was—a wild dog.

His term being over, he was sent to London, placed in one of the inns of court, proper place to study law, and see the world. Here he formed a new set of acquaintances, with whom he drank, gamed, and saw fights; he was the life and soul of his company; for he knew more, and had more ready money, as well as wit, than any of them; and the sly, old benchers of the inns shook their heads, and declared he was—a fine dashing fellow.

In his anxiety to see the world he frequented all kinds of company, from the clubs in St. James's to the cellars in St. Giles—and made such droll remarks on what he saw, and seemed to enter so heartily into every kind of conviviality, that although some thought him mad, yet the majority pronounced him—a queer dog and no fool.

He now began to dress in stile, dine in stile, give dinners in stile, and keep women in stile. He was a great man at the coffee-houses; in the box lobbies of the theatres his person was an object—his opinion a law—and from his many transactions of public notoriety, people began to consider him as—a back.

In process of time, he learned to judge of horse flesh, frequented the races, betted considerably on the favourite horse of the day, and won large sums—Lords now shook hands with him, grave senators asked his opinion, not on state but stable affairs; and he was known in the Turf coffee-houses as one of the fraternity. In a word, he was—a knowing one.

But, some how or other, his fortune, which had for some time been in his own hands, began to decrease; he was less successful in his betts; his bills remained unpaid for months; tradesmen began to be clamorous; money must be had; and to get it he ventured on many schemes, which the world does not approve of nor think quite consistent with honesty, and became—a black leg.

Amid all this he never was an apostate to the cause of the fair sex, but pursued his amours with inconstant constancy; and with the advantages of a good person, some art, and more assurance, he was set down for—a Devil among the women.

By degrees, however, he found his affairs so much deranged, that he came to the resolution to sell the remainder of what he possessed, buy an annuity, and retire from public business, and life. In managing this matter he made so good a bargain, that even the Jews shook their heads, stroked their beards and swore—ash Got's my shudge he ish no Chreshstain!

After this he enjoyed himself to a pretty advanced age, having gone through, besides the characters before mentioned, several others, such as an Odd Fellow—Hearty Cock—Pleasant Dog, &c. At length, his whole course being run, he died at his lodgings at a hair dresser's in Barbican, leaving his moveables and personal effects to an old woman, who swept his room, made his bed, and tucked him up, which occasioned people to say,—“He was still the old man.”

There was not enough left, however, to bury him, and the parish took this expense off the shoulders of his wealthy OLD FRIENDS, who signified their concern at his death, by the tender exclamation, “poor devil! What, is he dead!—Well, I knew him once a fine fellow!”

DRAMA.

MR. KING, the Comedian of Drury-Lane Theatre.—This popular performer took his leave of the town in his professional capacity on the 24th of May, in the part of Sir Peter Teazle, in Mr. Sheridan's admired Comedy of the School for Scandal, which, considering his advanced years, and infirm health, he played extremely well.

After the ballet of The Festival of Bacchus, Mr. King came forward, attended by Mr. Charles Kemble, who kindly officiated as his Prompter, lest on such a trying occasion his memory should accidentally fail him, while he delivered the following Address, written by Richard Cumberland, Esq.

Whilst in my heart those feelings yet survive,
That keep respect and gratitude alive,
Feelings, which though all others should decay,
Will be the last that time can bear away,
The fate that none can fly from, I invite,
And doom my own dramatic death this night.
Patrons farewell! though you still kindly my defects
would spare,

Constant indulgence who would wish to bear!
Who that retains the sense of better days
Can sue for pardon, whilst he pants for praise?
On well-earn'd fame the mind with pride reflects,
But pity sinks the man whom it protects.
Your Fathers had my strength. My only claim
Was zeal, their favour was my only fame.
If late, too often when the whole was due
I've paid half service to the Muse and you;
Not what I was I now decline the field
And ground those arms which I but feebly wield,
The poet, nearly breathless, lame, or blind,
Whilst the Muse vents his creative mind,
Continues wearing his immortal wreath—
Lives in his fame, and triumphs over death—

Whilst every chance that deals the passing blow,
Lays the poor actor's short-lived trophies low:
That chance has come to me that comes to all,
My drama done, I let the Curtain fall.

As soon as Mr. King had made his bow, Mrs. Jordan came on the stage, and gracefully led him to the green-room, which he found filled with all the performers.—Mr. Dowton, after allowing Mr. King a little breathing time, then came up to him to beg him to take a cheerful draught out of a silver cup, which his brothers and sisters of the Sock and Buskin, begged him to do them the favour to accept as a trifling token of their regard and grateful remembrance of his merit as a Comedian, and his uniform friendly conduct towards them all, during the many years he had continued to please the public before the curtain, and endear himself to them behind it. Mr. King, in a tone that expressed his feelings, declared the deep sense he should ever entertain of this most affectionate mark of their regard and esteem, and assured them, that if his health permitted, he should gratify himself with the pleasure of frequently coming among them. The cup was then handed round, and all the ladies and gentlemen of the Theatre drank Mr. King's health.

The cup and salver to it, are most elegantly engraved. On the former is an inscription, signifying the cause and occasion of the present, with all the Performers' names (contributors to it) engraved upon it, and on the base of it is the following motto, from a scene in the fifth act of Henry the Fifth.

“If he be not fellow with the best King,
“Thou shalt find the best King of good fellows.”

The salver, which was a noble one, was decorated richly, and had Mr. King's arms splendidly engraved in the centre.

The present, and manner of it, does great credit to the performers of Drury-lane theatre, and the profession in general.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

GIFFORD'S JUVENAL.

The singular merit of the writings of that justly celebrated satirist, Juvenal, is so generally known and acknowledged, that a *recommenda*tion of a new edition to the American public, would, we fear, be considered as an indignity offered to their judgment, their taste, and skill in classical literature, more especially as the translation is from the keen and polished pen of WILLIAM GIFFORD, between whom and the Roman poet, there exists a striking similarity in poignant satire, and brilliant diction, as to render him, beyond all preceding translators, admirably qualified not only accurately to communicate, but highly to ornament, in an English version, the correct and glowing ideas of a splendid satirist, whose strictures are levelled against vices which prevail in every age; and whose philosophic reflections are calculated to improve the morals and refine the manners of every nation.

In the present version, the deficiencies and errors of the earlier translators, have been sedulously and successfully avoided; and we hesitate not to assert, that the nature, spirit, and beauties of the original are more faithfully and forcibly infused into our language in this, than in any translation which has yet appeared.

The publishers assure their patrons, that no exertions or expense shall be wanting to give every degree of elegance, which a new type, hot-pressed paper, and a highly finished portrait of Mr. Gifford, can add to the undertaking.

A succinct life of Juvenal is prefixed to this work, and a biography of his learned and judicious translator, written in a style so pure, modest, and pathetic, as highly to interest and gratify every reader.

We cannot resist the temptation of copying as a select specimen of this golden work, a few couplets from the dignified Exordium to the tenth Satire; one of the most moral of poems; which has excited the admiration even of licentious wit, and deserves the liberal commendation of an Ecclesiastical dignitary,

“Omnibus in tems, quæ sunt a Godibus usque “Auroram et Gorgem, etc—

In every clime, from Ganges' distant stream
To Gades, gilded by the western beam,
Few, from the clouds of mental error free,
In its true light, or Good, or Evil see.

The traveller, freighted with a little wealth,
Sets forth at night and makes his way by stealth,
E'en then he fears the bludgeon and the blade,
And starts at every rush's waving shade;
While, void of care, the beggar trips along,
And, in the spoiler's presence, trolls his song.

The first great wish we all with rapture own,
The general cry, to every temple known,
Is GOLD, GOLD, GOLD! “O, give us gold, ye Powers,
“And let our neighbour's coffers yield to ours!”
Yet more from Earthen bowls destruction sip:
Dread then the baneful draught, when at thy lip,
The goblet mantles, graced with gems divine
And the broad gold inflames the Seine wine.

What crowds, by envied Power, the wish of all,
Are hurld from high; press'd in their rapid fall,
By cumbrous names! the statues tumbled down,
And dragg'd by hooting thousands through the town;
The cars upturn'd, the wheels to shivers broke,
And the steeds f acur'd by the axe's stroke!—
Then roar the fires; the sooty artist blows,
And all Sejanus in the furnace glows;
Sejanus once, so honour'd, so ador'd
And only second to the world's great lord,
Runs glittering from the mould in cups and cans,
And such mean things, in pitchers, pots, and pans.

The urchin, whom a slave conducts to school,
Has scarce acquir'd his first and easiest rule,
Ere ardent hopes his little bosom seize,
To rival Tully and Demosthenes
In ELOQUENCE and FAME: for this he prays,
And plagues Minerva through her sacred days.

Yet, both these orators, in evil hours,
Prov'd the sad victims of persuasive powers,
Both found it fatal to harangue too well,
And that by steel, and this by poison fell.

The conclusion of this grave satire, from the pen of a pagan bard, is worthy of the most fervent piety of a Christian Bishop.

Thy pious offerings to the temples bear
And, while the altars blaze, be this thy prayer.
O, Thou, who seest the wants of human kind,
Grant me all health of body, health of mind,
A soul prepar'd to meet the powers of fate,
And look undaunted on a future state;
That reckons death a blessing, yet can bear
Existence nobly with its weight of care;
That anger and desire alike restrains,
And counts Alcides' toils and cruel pains
Superior to the feasts and wanton sports
And morbid softness of the Assyrian courts.

Thou to give thyself mayst well suffice:
The only path to peace through virtue lies.
O Fortune, Fortune! all thy boasted powers
Would shrink to nothing, were but Prudence ours;
But man, fond man, exalts thee to the spheres,
And clothes thee in the attributes he fears.

The original is one of the noblest flights of Roman eloquence, and one of the holiest aspirations of Roman piety. The translation is worthy of the diamond pen of William Gifford, a writer whom one feels proud to commend, and who always gives us the most sterling sense in the most nervous expression.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Our correspondent may have a complete idea of what we mean by a “finished man at this exigent moment” in the political year, by looking at the following lines.

Supremely wise, when wisdom's wanted,
Prudent, when caution is a merit;
Upright, inflexible, undaunted,
Pure and enlightened, like a spirit.
Sworn enemy to falsehood base,
Against corruption firm and steady;
Not for one single beat or race,
But always booted, always ready.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

[The following is the production of a young American, and was written during our revolutionary war. I send it to you for publication, knowing that by giving it a place in your valuable paper, you will rescue it from an unmerited oblivion.

Your humble servant,
O.....]

THE SOW'S LAMENTATION.

The darkened sky obscures the opening dawn,
And blackening clouds hang heavy o'er the lawn.
Deep glooms the morn, all Nature's aspect low'rs,
And sympathetic mourns a fate like ours.
Sad omens these to heart distressed like mine,
Torn at the ills prepared for you my swine.
For this the day by destiny decreed;
The day in which, my pigings, you must bleed,
Bend your young throats to the relentless knife,
And e'er you scarce have lived; relinquish life.
Ah! how shall I endure the tragic blow;
Ah! how support the mighty weight of woe:
Doomed by consuming pains to slow decay,
Of griefs incessant the perpetual prey...
Forever blasted be his hated name,
Complete his misery, and his portion shame:
Who first proposed this barbarous mode of praise,
And usher'd in these dire thanksgiving days;
For this, alas! in earliest youth must die,
The fairest pigs that ever graced a sty.
Say, could nought else compose the chosen feast,
Or save from slaughter the devoted beast?
What then avails, that goodly pumpkins grow,
That from the stalks, new sweets are forc'd to flow?
Not all the pumpkins that their fields afford,
Nor treacle plenteous streaming from the board;
Nor frothing flip, nor richly ginger'd pyes
Can save: my shoats must fall a sacrifice.
Oh! had I died while pregnant yet and big;
Curst be the hour that I conceived with pig.
Far happier me that I had ne'er been born
To glut with swill, or taste of Indian corn:
To run, to root, or wallow in the mire,
Than live to see my offspring thus expire.
Hark! from yon pens what dreadful sounds arise;
What piteous squeaks, what agonizing cries:
What horrid gruntings echo through the vale,
While every hog repeats the dismal tale.
Alas! too fruitless are our heaviest moans,
Fruitless the kindred sigh, the parent's groans:
Hopeless we weep, in wild despair complain,
And grunt our sorrows, but we grunt in vain.
Not such our lot in ancient days of yore,
When Israel's sons their mild dominion bore;
From fate like this, we claimed a full release,
Secure we wallowed, and we swilled in peace.
No savage eye predominant for food;
Nor cruel hands were crimson'd in our blood....
Then sows in safety littered on the plain,
And pigs were left to run and pig again.
Ah! blissful days to pigling, sow, and boar,
Blest era past, to be recalled no more.
A sad reverse of this, alone we see;
The contrast dire of past felicity.
Where shall I fly; ah! whither shall I find
One gleam of hope, to sooth my tortur'd mind?
Thrice, have I litter'd in the verdant mead;
Thrice, have thanksgiving days destroyed the breed:
And lo! a fourth, the assembly doth enjoin;
A fourth must die, that Yankee saints may dine.
Receive my last embrace....my pigs draw near,
Too dear before, in sorrow doubly dear.
Ye hog-presiding powers! if such there are,
Nor yet are hogs beneath a guardian's care;
Again, to us those happy times restore,
When these thanksgiving days shall be no more;

When presbyterianism shall no more abuse,
And Yankee saints embrace the faith of Jews:
Convert their churches into synagogues,
And be protectors of the race of Logs.
Indulgent prove, with aspect more benign,
Regard the sufferings of us wretched swine;
The ardent pantings of a soul distress,
Compose her sorrows, and return her rest;
In deep affliction see thy suppliant bow,
Deign to relieve an agonizing sow.

SELECTED POETRY.

BRITAIN'S TREE OF LIBERTY.

BY MR. BRAINE, OF GREENWICH.

I sing the Tree of Liberty,
Believe me 'tis no joke, sir,
The best e'er found on English ground....
I mean the Tree call'd Oak, sir;
The body far....I do compare,
Unto our gracious King, sir,
The limbs so great....the Lords of state,
In 'em allow'd the thing, sir.
The branches long....so stout and strong,
Represent the Legislation,
The leaves so gay....I'm proud to say,
The people of the Nation:
It's pond'rous root....each way doth shoot,
The body to protect, sir;
The fibrous claws....I deem the laws,
Which some folks much neglect, sir.

Some Scions few....of pois'nous hue,
Have dar'd to grow around, sir,
This goodly Tree of Liberty,
To stab with deadly wound, sir;
But Providence....our great defence,
With merciful prevention,
And mighty stroke, preserv'd this Oak,
And blighted their intention.

Your glasses fill....and with good will,
Each drink the following Toast, sir,
May this Oak Tree....for ever be
Each honest Briton's boast, sir;
May this Tree last, without a blast,
Till Time's great Revolution!
May God defend unto the end
Our King and Constitution.

WAS I RIGHT, OR WAS I NOT?

A SONG.

Was I right, or was I not?
Tell me, girls, and tell me true;
You, I mean, who've husbands got,
Was I wrong to do so too?

No....I'm sure to die a maid
Ne'er was meant to be my lot;
Hymen call'd, and I obey'd,
Was I right, or was I not?

When the youth, that pleas'd my mind,
Told his love, in language sweet,
Could I see him, fond and kind,
Sigh and languish at my feet?

No, no, no....it was in vain,
Frowns and threats were quite forgot,
Soon at church I eas'd his pain,
Was I right, or was I not?

This, I know, a single life
Never was design'd for me;
No, no, no....'tis nought but strife
That you surely will agree.

Girls, get married....that's your plan,
Cupid will assist the plot;
Then, like me, secure your man....
Was I right, or was I not?

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

[The following amorous sonnet, of the famous Portuguese poet Camoens, and for which we are indebted to the learned and ingenious William Hayley, esq. may be acceptable to some of your readers, especially as it offers a fair comparison with Petrarch in his own walk, who, as well as our own great Milton, (twenty-third sonnet) has wrote on the same subject. The Luciad of Camoens, as we have it in the elegant translation of William Julius Mickle, esq. is an honour to his country, and not inferior in merit, in my opinion, to the Jerusalem of Tasso. What pity that we cannot, as yet, see the national pretensions of Spain to epic fame in an English translation. It is much to be wished that Mr. Hayley, or some person of equal talents and erudition, should give us the whole of the Araucana d'Euclilla. This seems to have a better claim to confer national honour than any of the epic poems of their great boast Lopez de Vega. Mr. Hayley would enable us to see the beauties of the Spanish no less than Mr. Mickle has ha of the Portuguese poet, whose various merit he so beautifully describes.

"Thy thankless country heard thy varying lyre,

SONNET ON HIS MISTRESS.

While prest with woes from which it cannot flee,
My fancy sinks, and slumber seals my eyes,
Her spirit hastens in my dreams to rise,
Who was in life but as a dream to me.

O'er a dread waste, so wide no eye can see
How far its sense-evading limit lies,
I follow her quick step, but ah! she flies!
Our distance widening by stern Fate's decree.

Fly not from me kind shadow! I exclaim:
She with fix'd eyes that her soft thoughts reveal,
And seem to say...."forbear thy fond design!"
Still flies....I call her, but her half form'd name
Lies on my fault'ring tongue. I wake and feel
Not e'en one short delusion may be mine.

TO A HANDSOME, BUT LOQUACIOUS YOUNG LADY.

While raptured on your charms I gaze,
You speak so loud and long,
I find you angel in your face,
But woman in your tongue.

When taken captive by your eyes,
What pains I might endure,
But happily your tongue supplies,
To beauty's wounds a cure.

You still, perhaps, my love might gain,
If ever it could be,
That you from speaking could refrain,
Or I could only see.

That this shall be the case, appears
How small a chance, so long
As I shall still retain my ears,
And you retain your tongue.

If lovers then you would pursue,
Ah! learn your power to prize,
Nor by your idle tongue undo
The conquests of your eyes.

TO A STRIKING BEAUTY.

When Charlotte's lilly hand I press'd,
And with a heart-enslaving sigh,
Presumptuous drew it to my breast,
It flew like lightning to my eye:
In vain I struggled to withstand
The power of Charlotte's lilly hand.

PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER V.

Unwholesomeness of the water....Considerations upon America, considered as a quarter of the world.

The water is, in America, generally considered as unwholesome. For all those who do not choose to have a fever every year, are advised not to dwell near the water. It is impregnated with sulphur. Every morning and evening a mischievous vapour rises from the rivers. The Susquehannah is peculiarly unhealthy. The proportion of water to land, is greater, in the United States, and in America generally, than any where else, which is easily accounted for by the extensive woods. It is even affirmed that all the rivers and brooks have grown smaller since the country began to be cultivated. The superfluous moisture is, however, in connection with the warmth, generally the cause of the rapid vegetation. For there falls much more rain, reckoned by inches in Pennsylvania, than in the middle parts of Europe, although there are fewer rainy days.

The earth, which is in every country, the principal object, (since the air and water must receive a modification analogous to it,) is stated by the Abbé Raynal to be throughout barren; that is, in the Atlantic states. But I shall here, first suggest some considerations respecting the new quarter of the world in general.

It appears to me that Africa, Asia, and Europe, or the old world so called, forms only one division of the earth, and America the other. Instead of four divisions, therefore, there should be only two, or, if New-Holland, and the other islands of the Southern ocean, be, as I think they should be, considered as a separate part of the world, three. The three ancient quarters of the world are notoriously one continent, connected together by the isthmus of Suez, as South and North America are by that of Panama.

I call America a new division of the world, not that it has been proved to have risen more recently from the sea than the old world, but because it was more lately discovered, (though upon this principle the islands of the Southern Archipelago should be called the newest part of the world;) but chiefly because it has been very lately first cultivated; for what is a mere land, without people?

But, that America remained longer covered by the sea, than the other parts of the world, and of course, is in that respect younger, notwithstanding all which Buffon advances in support of that opinion, still remains problematical. The high mountains in south-America, seem, indeed, to confirm this system, inasmuch as rivers, in process of time, by washing away the earth, reduce the loftiness of mountains. But then again, this testimonial of a modern creation is not extant in North-America, where the mountains, hitherto known, are not even so high as those of Germany.

It is further said that America was less populous than the old world, and might be considered as a single forest. I remark that it could not be so very thin of inhabitants, if the Spaniards destroyed twelve millions of people. I find that Peru was a populous empire, and that Mexico could not be called poorly peopled. That America, with the exception of those two empires, was covered by one continued forest, may prove that the inhabitants paid little attention to cultivation, but not that the country is new. But why did the Indians neglect cultivation? It may be answered, because they had no knowledge of iron. But why had they no knowledge of that substance, with which all North-America teems? Mankind are variously formed. Unity in variety is a general law of Nature. If this proves that the Indians had little genius, it proves not the youth of the country. They may have lived on, thousands of years together, without ever thinking of iron. The small number of people, might, very naturally, be imputed to the perpetual wars of the several tribes against one another. But even in North-America, we find the number of inhabitants to have been considerable, at the time of the discovery, before the Europeans had poisoned them with their brandy and their small pox. The colonists also diminished the game, the principal food of the Indians, and population always decays with the means of subsistence. Why has not New-Holland, which is yet more thinly peopled than America was, at the time of its first discovery, been reckoned among the new countries? Mankind, as I said before, are variously formed, and as there are wild and tame beasts of the same species, in like manner the Indians of America may be called wild men, or men of the woods. It is well known that they cannot live at all in a civilized condition, which proves that they are organized only for the woods. There are beasts of the woods and beasts of the field. Why should there not be men of the woods and men of the field?

It has been argued that the inhabitants of America came from Asia. I wonder why persons have racked their brains to discover, whence America received her population, without inquiring, at the same time, whence Europe, and our earthly ball in general, was peopled. Perhaps it will be answered the world is from eternity, and the human race likewise. If I grant this, I may still maintain the case with respect to America to be the same. No....it is answered. America bears too many unquestionable marks of a more recent origin, so that the inhabitants must have proceeded altogether from the old world. I have just shewn that some of these proofs of youth alleged concerning this quarter of the earth are not conclusive. All this remains uncertain, and even if the badness of the soil, and the inferiority of the aboriginal beasts and men, which have been very much cried down, were proved, it would not be an unanswerable proof. It might be said, countries are various in their nature; one is better than another, and the plants, the beasts, and the men, in one country may be not so well constituted as in another. The nature of the soil alone might cause this. But the fact, that all the American beasts are inferior in their organization to those of other parts of the world, is not altogether accurate. The squirrels in America are as pretty animals as they are elsewhere. The various kinds of deer, are as well shaped, and equally swift. The racoon, a species peculiar to America, is a handsome, lively animal. It is said, likewise, that all the animals common to both hemispheres are, in America, smaller than in the old world. This opinion arises from the circumstance that all the American species of beasts, and even of birds, form an intermediate gradation between two different kinds in Europe, so that they are not exactly the same, but constitute a connecting chain between the several degrees of the animal kingdom. Thus, for instance, the common Pennsylvanian hare (not the white hare, which has been found there, only within these two years,) is an intermediate between the rabbit and the hare; the partridge is the same between the European quail and partridge, &c. so that it might as well be said that all animals in America are larger, if they were compared with the European species next under them. The various kinds of deer cannot by any means be called smaller. The American elk, is a large stag, and properly the same as the large European stag, only somewhat larger. The moose is properly the American elk, and according to credible accounts often weighs two thousand pounds. It is, therefore, assuredly not smaller than that of Europe.

Nor is it universally true, that all animals, and even mankind, degenerate in America, as Buffon and Pauw maintain. The horses, and the horn-cattle in Chili, Tucuman, Mexico, &c. have certainly not degenerated. In Connecticut there are oxen which weigh two thousand pounds. I must, however, acknowledge that the horses in the United States appeared to me very much degenerated, whatever care was taken of their breed. They are smaller, and universally weak in the hind parts, even when their fore parts are handsome. Neither have they any spirit. The horn-cattle too are small, even though they should weigh as much. That the descendants from the Europeans, in respect to bodily strength, at least the second or third generation, have very much degenerated, and in this respect generally seem to be far below the Europeans, I have already said. It would still remain, however, to inquire how much of this is to be ascribed to the account of education and the mode of living. I have likewise thought, I remarked, : the provisions, fewer nourishing parts, contained in the same quantity. The meat looks well, but it is stringy, and less nutritious. It is also certain that there are fewer native species of birds and beasts, in America, than in parallel climates of the old world. There appear to me, likewise, to be fewer individuals of every species. But all this does not prove that America was a part of the world, not long since, covered with water, and if the contrary remains equally without proof, although the numerous marks of ancient cultivation, and the bones which have been discovered, of a large animal, no longer extant, seem to confirm it, we shall do very well to suspend our judgment in Spallanzani was entrusted with the cabinet of natural history in the university; but he found himself almost the nominal depositary of a treasure which did not exist: he himself laid the foundations of it; and it is become, by his endeavours, one of the most valuable and useful.

He enriched it by his repeated travels, both by sea and land, into Europe and Asia, across the Appenine Mountains, the Alps and Krapacks, to the bottom of mines, amidst the ruins of volcanoes, and on the brink of their craters: by these means he completed that vast collection of curiosities, which all the world's wealth could never have purchased; because wealth can never supply the place of genius and discernment.

In 1779 Spallanzani traversed Switzerland and the Grison territories. He proceeded to Geneva, where he rested a month with his friends; who were no less charmed with his conversation than with his writings. He then returned to Pavia, and published, in 1780, a new work in two volumes, intitled, Dissertationi di Fisica Animale e Vegetabile. Some of Spallanzani's experiments upon digestion, which he made for the improvement of his pupils, led him to study that mysterious operation. He repeated the experiments of Reaumur upon gallinaceous fowls; and observed, that trituration, which is, in this case, an assistant to digestion, is, nevertheless, not the efficient cause of it. He discerned, that the gizzard of these birds, which, equal in sharpness to the keenest lancet, pulverises nuts and filberts, does not digest the powder which it forms; but that the nutritious matter thus reduced to powder undergoes a new transformation in the stomach, in order to render it an aliment congenial to the nature of the blood and the humours of the body. He laid it down as an established principle, that digestion operates in the stomach of a great number of animals by the active energy of a certain juice, which dissolves the aliments received; and with a view to render his demonstration more incontestable, he had the courage to try some experiments upon himself, and the address to complete his proofs by artificial digestions made in glasses upon his table, effected from mixing the masticated nutriment with the gastric juice, which he found means to extract from the stomach of animals.

This work gave offence to John Hunter. He published, in 1785, some observations upon digestion, where he took occasion to make very severe animadversions on Spallanzani, who revenged himself by publishing this work in Italian, and addressing to Caldani, in 1788, Una Lettera Apologetica in risposta alle Osservazioni del Signor Giovanni Hunter.

The second volume treats of the propagation of animals and plants. Spallanzani proves by experiments equally new and surprising, the existence of the germ before fecundation; he demonstrates the existence of tadpoles in the females of five different species of frogs, toads, and salamanders, before fecundation; he relates the success of fecundations effected by art upon the tadpoles of these five species, and even upon a quadruped; he shews, in the same manner, the seed in flowers, before the emission of their prolific powder; and, by a nice and delicate anatomy, of which, perhaps, an idea can hardly be formed, he shews, in the spartium junceum, the lobe as well as the seeds, in their integuments: he traces them through their different stages of budding, before and after the possibility of being fecundated, and leaves not the shadow of a doubt, but that the seed and its integuments exist a long time before the flower begins to bud, and, consequently, a long time before the prolific power can exert. He repeated his observations upon many species of plants, with the same results; in short, he raised some individual plants from female flowers, which contained fruitful seed, though there cannot be even the slightest suspicion of their having any communication with the prolific powder of the male flowers. Spallanzani, as was customary with him, took the opportunity presented by the academic vacations of the year 1781 to make a tour abroad, the principal object of which was to increase the collection of curiosities in the cabinet of Pavia. He set out in July for Marsailles, where he commenced a new history of the sea, which, though incomplete, would furnish an infinite number of new and curious facts, relating to several inhabitants of the waves. He afterwards proceeded to Massa and Carrara, in order to observe the quarries of that marble in such great esteem among statuaries; he returned to Spezzia, and brought back to Pavia an immense collection of fishes, both of the testaceous and crustaceous description, which he deposited in this cabinet, of which his travels had rendered him the worthy trustee. With the same views and with similar success, he visited the coasts of Istria in 1782, and the Appenine mountains in 1783, where he had an opportunity of observing the dreadful storms and the singular vapour which have rendered that year famous in meteorology. His fame daily increased: the emperor Joseph II. knew him when he was in Lombardy; from the very first he sought the conversation of Spallanzani, and testified the great esteem which he entertained for his talents, by presenting him with his own portrait set in gold.

The university of Padua made him an offer, in the year 1785, of the professorship of natural history, then vacant by the death of Anthony Vallisneri, promising him, at the same time, more considerable perquisites than those which he enjoyed at Pavia; but the archduke doubled his salary, and permitted him to accompany to Constantinople the Chevalier Zuliani. He set out on this journey the 21st of August; on his road he made many observations upon the marine productions which he met with in those latitudes, as well as upon the meteorological events daily occurring. He touched at several islands in the Archipelago, which he surveyed with a philosophical eye; he descended towards Troy, in order to visit those romantic abodes so beautifully described by the bard whom he most admired, and, slowly moving through those poetical recesses, he made some geological observations truly original.

Spallanzani arrived at Constantinople on the 11th of October, and continued there eleven months. The physical and moral phenomena of this country, hitherto unknown to him, riveted his attention; he traversed the shores of both the seas, climbed the neighbouring hills, and visited the island of Chalki, where he discovered to the Turks a copper-mine, of which they were before entirely ignorant. He proceeded to the island of Principi, some miles distant from Constantinople, where he discovered an iron mine wholly unknown. He set out on his return to Europe the 16th of August, 1786, loaded with oriental spoils, composed of animals peculiar to those regions.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

..... Novit, quid toto fiat in orbe,
Quid Seres, quid Thraces agant.

JUVENAL.

[It may be remembered by those, who are even acrimoniously prejudiced against Mr. Cobbett, that the following work is free from any illiberal or unfounded remarks upon our national character; that it is not a party production; that it aspires and has attained to the dignity of a permanent work; that it is a genuine register of important incidents; and is a remarkably cheap, useful and correct publication. Its tone, as might be expected, is manly, but its expression is discreet and temperate. It deserves, and will receive, the attentive perusal of every honest seeker after truth and information, whether he is "of Paul or Apollonius."

COBBETT'S WEEKLY POLITICAL REGISTER.

This work, which has already met with success that the editor believes to be without a parallel in the history of periodical publications, is intended to be the most ample and complete repository of political and historical knowledge that ever appeared in England or any other country. The contents are as follow: I. An historical account of the Proceedings in Parliament, somewhat in the same manner, but more minute, than the account of those proceedings usually contained in the Annual Registers. II. All State Papers, whether they immediately relate to Great Britain or not; and, under this head, care is taken to recur to such compacts and translations of past times as do, or may, affect the circumstances of the present time. For instance, the same number which contains a discussion of that part of the treaty of Amiens which relates to Guiana, also contains such parts of the treaties of Utrecht and of Paris as relate to the French and the Portuguese territory in that part of the world. Again: in order to shew what the views of France are in preventing England from having treaties of commerce with other nations, extracts are made from thirteen treaties between France and other powers, in which the Republic has either made, or stipulated for treaties of commerce. So that the Register does, in fact, contain all the authentic materials and information that can possibly be necessary to the forming of a correct judgment on current events. III. Fair and free discussions of the measures of government, whether relating to foreign affairs, colonies, commerce, manufactures, revenue, debts, expenditures, laws civil, military or ecclesiastical. On these various and important subjects the work already contains such information as the editor is led to hope has been of some service to the country. Nor are transactions, of a nature not so immediately political, excluded from notice; as in the instances of the letters to Sir Joseph Banks and Mr. Otto. In short, every thing which materially affects, directly or indirectly, the interest or honor of the British nation, is in this work, a subject of remark, if not of ample investigation. IV. Brief notices of all new books and pamphlets that relate to history, politics, political economy, or that bear upon subjects connected therewith. In some instances the principles and statements of works so noticed are examined and controverted; but the general intention of this department is to point out to the reader, and to put on record, the existence of the several works that relate more particularly to the events of the present time. Twenty-four books and pamphlets of this description have already been noticed... The preceding important heads are followed by a selection of such Foreign Intelligence and Domestic Occurrences as are of some public importance; to which are added a weekly account of Promotions, Births, Marriages, Deaths, Prices of Stocks, of Corn, Meat, Bread, &c. also of the Course of Exchange and of the Changes of the Weather. Each number closes with a Summary View of the most important Political Occurrences, whether foreign or domestic.

Such are the weekly contents of the work. Its form is a Royal Octavo, with a double column, and folio d pages, for the convenience of reference. This form renders the work manageable. The numbers are so many sheets of a volume, which will be completed at the end of the half year, and will contain 416 pages, besides the General Title, Table of Contents, Supplement and Index, of which it is necessary to say a few words. That part of the work, which appears weekly, will form a chronicle: not only of public events and transactions, but of the opinions entertained relative thereto. This, however, is not quite enough to render the work so complete as the editor could wish it. There are many articles, such as parliamentary reports and other papers, for instance, which would overload the weekly numbers, but which it is, nevertheless, necessary to preserve. Such papers, therefore, together with all the other various subjects usually included in the Annual Registers, and with some that those Registers have never yet touched upon, will form the Supplement to the half yearly volume, in which will be included an account of all new publications foreign and domestic, a complete history of the theatre, &c. &c. and which will close with an Historical Summary and a complete and copious Index. A General Title and Table of Contents will be printed at the same time; and due notice will be given of the time and manner of obtaining the whole.

Subscriptions and orders for this Register will be received by JOHN MORGAN, No. 51, South Second Street, Philadelphia, and by EZRA SARGENT & Co. No. 129, Water Street, New-York. The price of the weekly Number is 20 cents each. They can be forwarded by post to any part of the United States, at the same expence as any other newspaper.

Each Number contains full as much letter-press as any other newspaper, and is entirely unencumbered with advertisements, or with useless matter of any kind. The annual expence is only 10 dols. 40 cents, and as the supplementary part will have no stamp, and will be supplied as cheap as possible, the two volumes which will complete the year, will in proportion to the quantity of print (which will be equal to upwards of three thousand pages of the common Annual Registers), be as cheap as any book published in London.

Complete sets may be had, on early application as above.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Mr. Gifford, commenting upon a virulent passage in the fourth satire of Juvenal, has a sarcasm at the beetle blindness of the darling commentator, which reminds us of one of the most severe passages in the Baviad and Mæviad. The passage as it appears in the new translation, runs thus:

When the lost Flavius, drunk with fury, tore
The prostrate world, that bled at every pore,
And Rome beheld, in body and in mind,
A bald pate Nero rise to curse mankind.

The Old Scholiast says these four lines provoked the emperor to send Juvenal into banishment. This is a judicious thought, as they must be allowed to be much more offensive than the short reflection on Paris, in the seventh satire, which is commonly cited as the cause of his exile. There are, however, two objections, Mr. G. slyly adds, which I own have their weight with me; first, that Domitian would have thrown the author of so severe a passage from the Tarpeian rock, instead of sending him into Egypt; and secondly, that he was luckily dead, as the Critic would have found, if he had read a few lines further, when it was written!

The fame of some of our new Country Banks has induced many French Bankers to come over to learn the art of lending money without cash.

"Wit makes the man, the want of it the fellow." According to the principle of Pope there were a great many Fellows at the late Masquerades.

We are glad to read the following in a London paper. There is no doubt, but the book in question is both true and beautiful. "This day is published, in one volume, 1-mo. price 6s. The Spirit of Anti-Jacobinism for 1802 (to be continued annually); being a collection of essays, letters, dissertations, and other pieces, in prose and verse, on subjects religious, moral, political, and literary; partly selected from fugitive publications of the day, and partly original....Among the original pieces (which will ever form by much the greater part of the volume) are contributions, which will be regularly continued from some of the first poets and prose-writers of the present day.

Published by J. Whittle, at the Anti-Jacobin Office, No. 3, Southampton-street, Strand; and sold by Cobbet and Morgan, at the Crown and Mitre, Pall-mall; Chapple, No. 166, Pall-mall; Hurst, Paternoster-row; and all other Booksellers in town and country."

The following will give American parents some idea of the early moral and literary instruction, which youth in Scotland enjoy. "Wants a situation, a young lad, from Scotland, who writes a fine hand, and is forward in arithmetic, and a good Latin scholar: his friends would be happy to fix him with some reputable merchant, banker, or tradesman; he is in his thirteenth year, of reputable parents, of good disposition, and would make himself useful: he has been brought up with strict principles of religion; has been but ten days in town. For further particulars, apply to No. 6, John-street, lead to Portland-st."

We publish the following from a London paper, and hope that these Tables, for the comfort and health of the Student, may be imported into America, and that as the scholar leans upon them he may experience additional brightness of thought, and a quicker fluency of expression. "By his Majesty's Royal letters patent.—Pocock's Elevating Tables, on a principle entirely new, which can be adapted to those suitable for the Libraries of Noblemen, the officers of State, those of gentlemen of the law, merchants' counting-houses, and the studies of artists, and are calculated to accommodate every person who writes, reads, draws, or studies; the altitude being varied at pleasure, whereby they are made to suit a sitting or a standing position, which is a very great alleviation to those gentlemen who sit or stand in one posture, for the above or other purposes many hours together, either of which positions, long continued, is very wearisome, greatly injurious to the health, and often ruinous to the constitution; but a change from a sitting to a standing posture, and vice versa, as often as may be required, must be a great relief and convenience, particularly as a change from a standing-desk to a sitting-desk, and even to the flat surface of a table, is so easily obtained, for the sorting of papers, or other purposes, without deranging any thing lying thereon; and this on a principle so perfectly secure, at any altitude, that it cannot be put out of order.—May be had at Pocock's, No. 26, Southampton-street, Strand, the Warehouse for his Patent Boethema Mattresses, Patent Improved Sofas, Couches, Easy Chairs, Reclining Chair Beds, Carving Chairs, Rising Stools, and various other articles of useful mechanical furniture, peculiarly adapted for ease, comfort, and repose, and which gives that great relief the changes of position only can afford."

Extract of a letter from Paris, dated Aug. 10, 1802.

"Literature in all its branches is most unremittingly pursued and encouraged in the metropolis of the republic. Every man of learning, whether native or foreigner, is here courted and paid the most marked attention to, invited to exert his talents, and is well rewarded for any new invention or discovery. For this purpose, the Government and Ministers render themselves easy of access, and individuals are forward in promoting their introduction and success in every branch of literary effort. It is the same with respect to mechanical arts and workmen of all descriptions. There appears now to exist in Paris one universal emulation, and that is to repair the evils of the revolution as fast as possible, by encouraging every person capable of seconding their laudable views. In a recent instance, the Chief Consul liberally and wisely ordered a premium, voted by the National Institute to a foreigner (a German residing at Vienna) for the improvement of the Lunar Tables, to be doubled, paying the additional sum out of his own pocket, and accompanying the whole with an invitation to the party to repair to Paris, where he will be provided for.

I am at this moment engaged in translating into English a valuable work, written by an eminent author here, to point out a plan for improving the French language, by making the writing and pronunciation of it correspond, and doing away the caprices and variations for which it is so remarkable. Without a friend, or even a single acquaintance in Paris, I have myself, within one week, procured as much literary employment as I can possibly attend to, by mere personal application to the parties: I have acquired three or four valuable patrons, in consequence of laying before them a copy of a work I lately published in London."

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The Editor will deem it an act of literary kindness, if any gentleman possessing the Didot edition stereotype of Phædrus, Sallust, and the Vicar of Wakefield, in the French translation, will be so courteous as to send them, for a short time, with the address of the owner, to No. 25, North Second Street, or to point out where they may be obtained.

The Editor wishes to be informed, where he can procure the London Town and Country Magazine from the year 1773 to 1780 inclusive, and he will likewise be particularly obliged if some literary virtuoso will indicate in what public or private library may be found a quaint book of the fifteenth century, entitled, "A Paradise of Daintie Devices."

The Editor is particularly obliged to some gentleman trafficking to the East Indies who has communicated to him a valuable file of "The Government Gazette" of Madras, together with a circular from Mr. Richard Taylor, the proprietor of that paper. The Editor will be very happy to exchange the Port Folio for a publication so ingenious as the Madras Gazette, and, in such a commerce, will always esteem himself the gainer. He will also cheerfully convey to Mr. Taylor any American intelligence, that may interest that gentleman, or prove of public utility.

As I could write and cypher, (as the phrase is,) C—— next thought of sending me to Newfoundland, to assist in a store-house. For this purpose he negotiated with a Mr. Holdsworthy of Dartmouth, who agreed to fit me out. I left Ashburton with little expectation of seeing it again, and indeed with little care, and rode with my godfather to the dwelling of Mr. Holdsworthy. On seeing me, this great man observed, with a look of pity and contempt that I was "too small," and sent me away sufficiently mortified. I expected to be very ill received by my godfather, but he said nothing. He did not, however, choose to take me back himself, but sent me in the passage boat to Totness, from whence I was to walk home. On the passage, the boat was driven by a midnight storm on the rocks, and I escaped with life almost by miracle.

My godfather had now humbler views for me, and I had little heart to resist any thing. He proposed to send me on board one of the Torbay fishing boats; I ventured, however, to remonstrate against this, and the matter was compromised, by my consenting to go on board a coaster. A coaster was speedily found for me at Brixham, and thither I went when little more than thirteen.

My master, whose name was Full, though a gross and ignorant, was not an ill natured man; at least not to me: and my mistress used me with unvarying kindness, moved perhaps by my weakness and tender years. In return, I did what I could to requite her, and my good will was not overlooked.

Our vessel was not very large, nor our crew very numerous. On ordinary occasions, such as short trips to Dartmouth, Plymouth, &c. it consisted only of my master, an apprentice nearly out of his time, and myself: when we had to go farther, to Portsmouth, for example, an additional hand was hired for the voyage.

In this vessel (the Two Brothers) I continued nearly a twelve month; and here I got acquainted with nautical terms, and contracted a love for the sea, which a lapse of thirty years has but little diminished.

It will be easily conceived that my life was a life of hardship. I was not only a "ship boy on the high and giddy mast," but also in the cabin, where every menial office fell to my lot; yet if I was restless and discontented, I can safely say, it was not so much on account of this, as of my being precluded from all possibility of reading: as my master did not possess, nor do I recollect seeing during the whole time of my abode with him, a single book of any description, except the Coasting Pilot.

As my lot seemed to be cast, however, I was not negligent in seeking such information as promised to be useful; and I therefore, frequented, at my leisure hours, such vessels as dropt into Torbay. On attempting to get on board one of these, which I did at midnight, I missed my footing and fell into the sea. The floating away of the boat alarmed the man on deck, who came to the ship's side just in time to see me sink.

He immediately threw out several ropes, one of which providentially (for I was unconscious of it) entangled itself about me, and I was drawn up to the surface, till a boat could be got round. The usual methods were taken to recover me, and I awoke in bed the next morning, remembering nothing but the horror I felt, when I first found myself unable to cry out for assistance.

This was not my only escape, but I forbear to speak of them. An escape of another kind was now preparing for me, which deserves all my notice as it was decisive of my future fate.

On Christmas day (1770) I was surprised by a message from my godfather, saying that he had sent a man and horse to bring me to Ashburton, and desiring me to set out without delay. My master, as well as myself, supposed it was to spend the holidays there; and he, therefore, made no objection to my going. We were, however, both mistaken.

Since I had lived at Brixham, I had broken off all connection with Ashburton. I had no relation there but my poor brother,* who was yet too young for any kind of correspondence, and the conduct of my godfather towards me, did not entitle him to any portion of my gratitude, or kind remembrance. I lived, therefore, in a sort of sullen independence on all I had formerly known, and thought without regret of being abandoned by every one to my fate. But I had not been overlooked. The women of Brixham, who travelled to Ashburton twice a week with fish, and who had known my parents, did not see me without kind concern, running about the beach in a ragged jacket and trowsers. They mentioned this to the people of Ashburton, and never without commiserating my change of condition. This tale often repeated, awakened at length the pity of their auditors, and, as the next step, their resentment against the man who had reduced me to such a state of wretchedness. In a large town, this would have had little effect, but in a place like Ashburton, where every report speedily becomes the common property of all the inhabitants, it raised a murmur which my godfather found himself either unable or unwilling to withstand: he therefore determined, as I have just observed, to recall me; which he could easily do, as I wanted some months of fourteen, and consequently was not yet bound.

All this I learned on my arrival: and my heart, which had been cruelly shut up, now opened to kinder sentiments, and fairer views.

After the holidays I returned to my darling pursuit, arithmetic: my progress was now so rapid, that in a few months I was at the head of the school, and qualified to assist my master, (Mr. E. Furlong) on any extraordinary emergency. As he usually gave me a trifle on those occasions, it raised a thought in me, that by engaging with him as a regular assistant, and undertaking the instruction of a few evening scholars, I might, with a little additional aid, be enabled to support myself. God knows, my ideas of support at this time were of no very extravagant nature. I had besides another object in view. Mr. Hugh Smerdon, my first master, was now grown old and infirm; it seemed unlikely that he should hold out above three or four years: and I fondly flattered myself that notwithstanding my youth, I might possibly be appointed to succeed him. I was in my fifteenth year, when I built these castles; a storm, however, was collecting, which unexpectedly burst upon me, and swept them all away.

On mentioning my little plan to C—— he treated it with the utmost contempt; and told me, in his turn, that as I had learned enough at school and more than enough, he must be considered as having fairly discharged his duty (so indeed he had;) he added, that he had been negotiating with his cousin, a shoemaker of some respectability, who had liberally agreed to take me without a fee, as an apprentice. I was so shocked at this intelligence, that I did not remonstrate; but went in sullenness and silence to my new master, to whom I was soon after bound,* till I should attain the age of twenty-one.

The family consisted of four Journeymen, two sons about my own age, and an apprentice somewhat older. In these there was nothing remarkable; but my master himself was the strangest creature! He was a Presbyterian, whose reading was entirely confined to the small tracts published on the Exeter Controversy. As these (at least his portion of them) were all on one side, he entertained no doubt of their infallibility, and being noisy and disputatious, was sure to silence his opponents; and became, in consequence of it, intolerably arrogant and conceited. He was not, however, indebted solely to his knowledge of the subject for his triumph: he was possessed of Fenning's Dictionary, and he made a most singular use of it. His custom was to fix on any word in common use, and then to get by heart the synonym, or periphrasis by which it was explained in the book; this he constantly substituted for the other, and as his opponents were commonly ignorant of his meaning, his victory was complete.

With such a man I was not likely to add much to my stock of knowledge, small as it was; and indeed nothing could well be smaller. At this period I had read nothing but a black letter romance called Parismus and Parismenus, and a few loose magazines which my mother had brought from South Molton. The Bible, indeed, I was well acquainted with; it was the favourite study of my grandmother, and reading it frequently with her, had impressed it strongly on my mind; these then, with the Imitation of Thomas a Kempis, which I used to read to my mother on her deathbed, constituted the whole of my literary acquisitions.

As I hated my new profession with a perfect hatred, I made no progress in it; and was consequently little regarded in the family, of which I sunk by degrees into the common drudge: this did not much disquiet me, for my spirits were now humbled. I did not, however, quite resign the hopes of one day succeeding to Mr. Hugh Smerdon, and, therefore, secretly prosecuted my favourite study, at every interval of leisure.

These intervals were not very frequent; and when the use I made of them was found out, they were rendered still less so. I could not guess the motives for this at first; but at length I discovered that my master intended his youngest son for the situation to which I aspired.

I possessed at this time but one book in the world: it was a treatise on Algebra, given to me by a young woman who had found it in a lodging house. I considered it as a treasure; but it was a treasure locked up: for it supposed the reader to be well acquainted with simple equation, and I knew nothing of the matter. My master's son had purchased Fenning's Introduction: this was precisely what I wanted, but he carefully concealed it from me, and I was indebted to chance alone for stumbling upon his hiding place. I sat up for the greatest part of several nights successively, and, before he suspected that his treatise was discovered, had completely mastered it. I could now enter upon my own; and that carried me pretty far into the science.

This was not done without difficulty. I had not a farthing on earth, nor a friend to give me one: pen, ink, and paper, therefore, (in despite of the flippant remark of Lord Oxford,) were, for the most part, as completely out of my reach as a crown and sceptre. There was, indeed, a resource, but the utmost caution and secrecy were necessary in applying to it. I beat out pieces of leather as smooth as possible, and wrought my problems on them with a blunted awl: for the rest, my memory was tenacious, and I could multiply and divide by it to a great extent.

* Of my brother, here introduced for the last time, I must yet say a few words. He was literally

The child of misery, baptized in tears; and the short passage of his life did not belie the melancholy presage of his infancy. When he was seven years old, the parish bound him out to a husbandman of the name of Leman, with whom he endured incredible hardships, which I had it not in my power to alleviate. At nine years of age he broke his thigh, and I took that opportunity to teach him to read and write. When my own situation was improved, I persuaded him to try the sea: he did so, and was taken on board the Egmont, on condition that his master should receive his wages. The time was now fast approaching when I could serve him; but he was doomed to know no favourable change of fortune; he fell sick, and died at Cork.

* My indenture, which now lies before me, is dated the first of January, 1772.

MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF LAZARUS SPALLANZANI, THE CELEBRATED NATURALIST.

LAZARUS SPALLANZANI was born at Scandiano, in the department of Crostolo, on the 10th of January, 1729; he was the son of John Nicholas Spallanzani, a counsellor of great repute, and of Lucia Zigliani: he commenced his studies in his own country, and at the age of fifteen went to Reggio de Modena, where he prosecuted them with the utmost assiduity. The Jesuits, who initiated him into the study of polite literature, and the Dominican friars who heard of his vast improvements, were desirous of attaching him to their order; but his passion for knowledge led him to Bologna, where his relation, Laura Bassi, a lady deservedly celebrated for her genius, her eloquence, and her knowledge of natural philosophy and mathematics, was, at that time, one of the most illustrious professors of that university, and, indeed, of all Italy. Under the direction of this enlightened guide, Spallanzani learned to prefer the study of Nature to that of her commentators, or to estimate the real value of the commentary in proportion to the comparison it bore with the original; he soon perceived the wisdom of her instructions, and ere long experienced their happy effects.

Spallanzani's taste for philosophy was by no means exclusive; he studied his own language with peculiar attention, made a considerable proficiency in the Latin, and more particularly applied himself to the French and Greek. Spallanzani, in conformity to the inclinations of a father who loved him, applied to the study of jurisprudence; he was even on the point of being admitted a doctor, when Anthony Vallisneri, professor of natural history at Padua, induced him to renounce that intention, by promising the consent of his father, who was so sensibly affected at his thus devoting himself to his will, that he left him at liberty to pursue his own inclinations: from that moment he addicted himself to the study of mathematics; but without discontinuing that of the ancient and modern languages.

Spallanzani was soon well known in Italy; and his own country was the first to do homage to his talents. In the year 1754, the university of Reggio chose him professor of logic, metaphysics, and Greek; he continued to deliver his lectures there for six years, consecrating to physical researches, those intervals of leisure which his vocation admitted. Some new discoveries excited his passion for natural history, which was continually augmented by the success of his early efforts. His observations upon the animalcula in infusions attracted the attention of Haller, and of Bonnet, who pointed out the path by which he himself had ascended to such a degree of eminence, and already proclaimed him to the learned world as nature's interpreter.

In 1760 Spallanzani was invited to the university of Modena: though his interest might have prompted him to accept the advantageous offers of the respective universities of Coimbra, Parma, and Cesena, yet his patriotism and attachment to his family decided him in the resolution of limiting his exertions to the service of his country. The same considerations induced him to reject some years after, the proposals of the academy of Petersburg. He resided at Modena till the year 1768, and had the satisfaction of seeing that his own unaided powers had created a race of illustrious men, who still shine forth the glory of Italy. In the number of these must be reckoned Venturi, professor of natural philosophy at Modena; Belloni, bishop of Carpi; Lucchesini, ambassador of the late king of Prussia; and Angelo Massa, the poet of Parma.

During his residence at Modena, Spallanzani published, in 1765, a treatise, intitled Saggio di Osservazioni Microscopiche concernente il Sistenta di Needham Buffon. In this pamphlet he established, upon the most ingenious and well founded experiments, the animality of microscopic animalcula. He sent his work to Bonnet, who formed his judgment of the author by this production, and who lived to see the accomplishment of the favourable prediction which he then pronounced. From that moment the closest intimacy was cemented between these two philosophers: which continued to the end of their lives.

In the same year Spallanzani produced a dissertation truly original: De Latidibus ab aqua Resistantibus; he there demonstrated, by the most striking experiments, contrary to the received opinion, that the phenomenon, which, in the style of infantine recreation, is termed ducks and drakes, is not produced by the elasticity of the water; but by the change of direction which the stone undergoes in its motion after having struck upon the water when it ascends the inflexion of the cavity indented by the shock.

In 1768 Spallanzani prepared the philosophers for the surprising discoveries with which he was to present them in the course of his life, by publishing his Prodromo di un Opera da Imprimersi sopra le Riproduzioni Animali. He there sketched the plan of a work which he was composing on this important subject; but this simple prospectus revealed more sources of philosophical information than all the books which had hitherto appeared: because it pointed out the method which must be pursued in those mysterious inquiries, and collected, under one view, many unexpected facts; particularly the existence of tadpoles, anterior to the period of fecundation in many species of toads and frogs; the regeneration of the head in decapitated bodies of snails, which he had already communicated to Bonnet in the year 1766, and which was, for a short time, disputed, notwithstanding the repeated confirmation of this phenomenon by Herissant and Lavoisier: he also finally demonstrated it some time afterwards in a work, intitled, Memorie della Societa Italiana; by the instance of the reproduction of the tail, legs, and jaws in the mutilated aquatic Salamander. These facts astonish to this day, when reflected on, though time may have rendered them familiar to our senses; and it is not easy to decide which presents greater claims to admiration, the ability of Spallanzani in affording such incontestible proofs, or the indefatigability and undaunted boldness which he manifested in pursuing and demonstrating the results of his arduous and surprising experiments. It will ever be a subject of regret, that the project of his great work was not realized; but a variety of circumstances prevented him from yielding to the solicitations of his friends in that particular.

The physiology of Haller, which Spallanzani was studying, fixed his attention on the circulation of the blood, in which he discovered many remarkable phenomena. In 1768 he published a small work, Dell' azione del cuore ne' vasi Sanguigni nuove Osservazioni; and he reprinted it in 1773 with three new dissertations: De' Fenomeni della Circolazione osservata nel giro universale de' Vasi; de' Fenomeni della Circolazione Languente; de' moti del sangue indipendente dell' azione del cuore e del pulsare delle Arterie. This book, little known, comprises a series of the most refined and delicate observations and experiments upon a subject of which our knowledge was before extremely superficial.

When the university of Pavia was reestablished upon a more extensive plan, the empress Maria Theresa, through the medium of the Count de Firmian, invited Spallanzani to fill the place of professor of natural history. His great reputation obtained him this distinction which was solicited for him by many celebrated men.

On his arrival at the university, Spallanzani selected Bonnet's Contemplation de la Nature for the subject of his lectures: he supplied its deficiencies, developed the ideas, and illustrated the justness of its theory by his own experiments; he translated it into Italian, and enriched it with notes: he likewise added a preface, where he took occasion to remark the subjects of animal and vegetable economy; which more especially merited the attention of his pupils, as it sometimes pointed out to them the means of succeeding in these researches. He published the first volume of his translation in 1769, and the second in 1770.

Spallanzani's intimacy with Bonnet influenced his genius, which insensibly adopted the severe methodical manner of the Genevan philosopher; he gloried in being his pupil, and employed his meditations upon his admirable productions with ever new delight; whence it happened that he was powerfully incited to search in nature the proofs of Bonnet's opinion upon the generation of organic bodies; a subject which, for a considerable time, engrossed his whole attention. In the year 1776 he published the two first volumes of his Opuscoli di Fisica Animale e Vegetabile; they consist of illustrations of a part of the microscopic observations which had already appeared. Wholly absorbed by the great phenomenon of generation, he examined the opinion of Needham, in order to demonstrate its impossibility.....Needham, dissatisfied with Spallanzani's microscopic observations, which invalidated his doctrine of an imaginary vegetable power imparting motion to matter, challenged the professor of Reggio to revise what he had published; but he avoided a formal reply by publishing a series of new facts and experiments.

He demonstrated that the animalcula of infusions are produced by germs; that there are some, e.g. certain species of eggs and seeds, which are equally proof against the severity of the most intense cold and the heat of boiling water. On this occasion he treated of the influence of cold upon animals, and proved, that the lethargic numbness of some during winter does not at all depend upon the impression which the cold makes upon the blood, since a frog, deprived of its blood, becomes lethargic when it is chilled in ice, and then swims as usual when it has recovered its natural warmth. He demonstrated, in the same manner, that odours, various liquors, and a vacuum, act upon animalcula as upon other animals; that they are oviparus, viviparus, and hermaphrodites.

The second volume of this work is a voyage into regions still more unknown. A sublime pencil had already delineated them, but the picture was not finished from nature. Spallanzani gives a history of spermatic animalcula, which their eloquent historian invariably confounds with the animalcula of infusions. One cannot but admire the modest diffidence of this new philosopher, struggling almost always against the conviction of his own senses, and the authority of Buffon; and he appears to admit, with much reluctance, the result of these observations, multiplied and varied in a thousand different ways, which expose the weak foundations upon which the system of organic molecules is erected.

Spallanzani afterwards describes the wheel-animal and the sloth, two species of animalcula, the monsters of the microscopic world, singular from their figure and organization, but still more so from their faculty of resuming life after a total suspension of all its apparent acts during many years: it is this phenomenon which he more especially considers in order to ascertain the limits and conditions of it, to enable him to investigate its causes, and connect them with others, to which they are analogous. He annexed to this collection an account of that appearance on certain bodies which is called mould; he shewed that its seeds float in the air; and he remarked, that the microscopic funguses were distinguished from other plants by their tendency to grow in all directions, without being subjected to the almost universal law of the perpendicularity of the stem to the soil.

the case, and consider the question as yet unsettled.

But whether America be new or old, there is no occasion to derive its inhabitants from elsewhere. This is the shortest solution. With regard to America there can be no difficulty on account of its proximity to the north of Asia. But with respect to the islands of the South Sea, there is much more, because they are so far distant from all other land, and the inhabitants knew not enough of navigation to have come from so far. Even in this case, however, ways might be found out; such as, that those islands are part of a continent now sunk. An explanation would be possible without recurring to emigration. I will not directly maintain that upon land which the waters have left bare, at first plants, then animals, and at length men, would by the plastic power of internal nature be formed; such an opinion would be too novel, too bold, and would be cried down as a paradox; but I believe so much as this to be ascertained, that insects are produced without seeds or eggs, concerning which subject I shall make the following extract: "That hurtful insects are produced from eggs which have lain concealed every where in the earth, ever since the creation, is not conformable to the general experience; seeing that worms are found in seeds, in nuts, in wood, in stones, and even in leaves; and seeing likewise that these little insects which swim and fly unseen in stinking water, in sour wine and in corrupt air favour the opinion of those who maintain, that the bad smells themselves, and the exhalations from plants, from the earth and from stagnant waters, produce the rudiments of such animalcula. The circumstance that after their first production they propagate by eggs or impregnation, proves nothing against their immediate origin; for every animal receives together with its intestines the organs and the means of propagation."

Upon such an island, rising naked from the sea, grass would be found after the lapse of a few years. How does the seed get there? I have not ventured in these days to ascribe the operations of nature to the deity for fear of being charged with hyperphysical orthodoxy; even the expression "Soul of the world" would perhaps have sounded hyperphysical; and therefore I used with full deliberation that of internal nature.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEE.

Mr. Maurice, the indefatigable researcher among the antiquities of India, has the following memorable passage in the preface to his elaborate work. It is a true picture of the sanguine hopes, and torturing disappointments of a literary adventurer.

"Conscious that I had by continued inquiry, extensive reading, and intense application, endeavoured to prepare myself for the important task; I too eagerly indulged those sanguine expectations of success, which were entertained by the private circle of my friends. Enjoying from nature a very ample portion of those high and volatile spirits, which as they are often in early youth the occasion of many errors, so in riper years they too frequently buoy up with false hopes the deluded imagination; I suffered those spirits to betray me into the most fatal delusions. I exulted in the fair prospects that a life early marked by the vicissitudes of fortune, or rather continually passed in the extremes of gay hope and gloomy disappointment, as it approached its meridian was likely to be cheered with the dawn of success and a share of probable independence; and that some moiety of public applause would be the consequence of incessant efforts to merit it, and that an adequate portion of public emolument would be the reward of servile literary toil.

"Disappointed in my hopes and injured in my property, my work treated with contempt by some, and with neglect by others. I still relaxed not from the vigorous prosecution of it. I felt that the active spark of honest ambition, kindled in my mind, was far from being extinguished, nor was I entirely deserted, at this trying crisis, by those constitutional spirits, which I have sometimes found to rise in proportion to the urgency of adversity; and which amid the various scenes of chequered life have often enabled me to trample on greater difficulties."

One of the most frequent complaints of the sincere student is, that he is distracted by the multitude of books with which he sees himself environed in every library. The following remarks of a profound scholar will relieve his distraction. "While the objects of learning are increased, the time to be spent in pursuit of it, according to the modes of modern life, is greatly contracted. Every year produces some valuable work in some department of science, or polite letters, and the accomplished scholar, is expected, and cannot but wish to give it some attention. The art of printing has multiplied books to such a degree that it is a vain attempt either to collect or to read all that has been published. It becomes necessary, therefore, to read, in the classical sense of the word, LEGERE, that is to pick out, to select the most valuable and worthiest objects, not only the best parts of books, but previously to the selection, to chuse out of an infinite number the best books, or at least those, which are best adapted to the particular pursuit or employment in life. Without this care, there is danger of confusion and distraction, of a vain labour, and of that poverty which arises from superfluity."

"The surface of the globe becomes every day more known, enlarges the field of modern History, Geography, Botany, and furnishes new opportunities for the study of human nature. At the revival of learning, voyages and travels constituted a very small part of the scholar's and philosopher's library; but at present, in England only, the books of this class are sufficiently numerous to fill a large Museum. He, who would understand human nature must inspect them, and will also find it necessary to have recourse to the Dutch and the French travellers. A man might find employment for his life in reading itineraries alone.

"The recent improvements in science have multiplied books necessary to be read by the general scholar to a wonderful extent. The volumes of scientific and literary societies or academies are infinite. The mineral, the vegetable, and the animal kingdoms have been accurately examined and the result brought to public view in crowded and bulky tomes. The minutest productions of nature have been described with prolixity; from the hyssop on the wall to the cedar of Lebanon, from the atom to the mountain, from the mite to man, the whale, and the elephant.

"The study of antiquities has added greatly to the number of books. Politics, history, and law, have also crowded the library.

"The field of divinity has been most industriously cultivated, and the harvest has been great. The age of Methuselah would be too short to read all the theological works of English divines, to which must be added the excellent productions of France, Holland, and other neighbouring nations. Biblical learning alone, so pregnant is the sacred volume, would occupy a long life, exclusive of all attention to practical theology.

"Moral philosophy, both systematical and miscellaneous, is so far extended that if it is at all necessary to the conduct of life, every man must die without knowing how to live; for the longest life would not afford opportunities for its study.

"Philology and criticism have appeared in books, which equal or exceed in number and size all the original works united, which it was their primary intention to elucidate.

"A species of books, unknown to the ancients, and such as are found to attract more readers than any others, has arisen in the last century; I mean romances and fictitious histories of private and familiar life under the name of novels.

"Add to all this a vast quantity of poetry or verse of all kinds, and on all subjects; add tragedies and comedies; add pamphlets in all their variety, fugitive papers, publications of diurnal intelligence; and the sum becomes so great as to lead the general student to a degree of despair.

"I have already said that not only the work to be done has increased upon us, but the time of doing it has decreased according to the modes of living which now prevail.

"Early rising is not in vogue. Breakfast occupies a long time. The person must be studiously attired, or the student will find his learning will not give him admission into the company of people of condition and fashion, nor indeed into any company where decorum is regarded.

"The newspapers must be read; or conversation may lose one of its most abundant sources. Morning calls must be made, and cards left with servants, or friendship and patronage may be irrecoverably lost. A morning walk or ride will conduce to an appetite, and the person must be dressed from head to foot before a genteel student can think of meeting company at dinner. Very little time, it is evident, can be found in the midst of all these necessary occupations, for poring over folios. To neglect any of them for his book may cause a scholar to be called an odd fellow, or a humourist, and dismissed to Coventry.

"But the morning loss, you will say, may be recovered by the diligence of the afternoon. Impossible; for the hour of dining is the same which in the days of that polite scholar and fine gentleman, Sir Philip Sydney, used to be the supper time; and convivial pleasures are so great, as to render him who would relinquish them for musty books obnoxious to the imputation of a book-worm. Indeed the mind is unfit for contemplation after a full meal and a generous glass. Various amusements intervene to employ the time till the hour of repose closes the season both of action and contemplation.

"While so much is to be done and so little is the time, how can we expect to find many profoundly learned? And yet there is as much pretension to learning and as much volubility upon all subjects of science as could be expected in the most crude age. How is this phenomenon to be accounted for?

"In the first place, superficial learning quite enough to gratify talkers and to satisfy common hearers, is easily picked up by reading the newspapers and periodical pamphlets, in which little scraps are dealt out like small wares at a retail shop for the convenience of the poor.

"In the next place, a reliance on genius as it is called, without application, gives a boldness of utterance and assertion which often sets off base metal with the glitter of gold. Never was there an age, when there was so many pretenders to genius. The great art is under the confidence of genius to make the most advantageous display of the little learning you have, to disparage what you have not, to put a good face upon defect, and supply weakness and want of real merit by a noisy confidence and boisterous pretension to native powers above the reach of application. It is not uncommon to throw contempt upon all who shew their willingness to labour in pursuit of knowledge, a persuasion that, though a man may be born with powers to acquire knowledge, yet that he is not born with knowledge acquired, with innate science, history, philosophy, and languages.

" Knowledge may certainly be acquired by one man sooner than by another, and in much greater abundance; but it must be acquired by application, since it is neither innate nor can be mechanically infused.

" Since then the field of knowledge is enlarged, and the time to be spent in the cultivation of it contracted, it is requisite that the student should select a little part of the field only for particular cultivation; and thus, by husbanding his time so as to dig and manure it well, he may carry home a good crop of corn, while others are contented with spontaneous weeds, leaves, thorns, thistles, stubble, chaff and underwood.

" Let him enjoy the prospect of the fine country around as far as the horizon extends; but let him be satisfied with cultivating with his own hands a little ferme ornee, well laid out, prettily diversified, and within a moderate enclosure."

BIOGRAPHY.

[It has been pertinently remarked by a great writer, whose opinion deserves all our respect, that these parallel circumstances and kindred images, to which we readily conform our minds, are, above all other writings, to be found in the lives of particular persons. Hence, no species of writing seems more worthy of cultivation than Biography, since none can be more delightful, or more useful, none can more certainly chain the heart, by irresistible interest, or more widely diffuse instruction to every diversity of condition. This just sentiment from the highest authority; a conviction of the great utility of such an article, and the delight which it always affords, both the Editor and his readers, are sufficiently incentive to our attention to this fairest kind of philosophy, which "teacheth by examples." In future, Biography shall constitute a regular department in the Port Folio, and for this, and the ensuing week, we have provided a banquet for our readers, in an admirable life of WILLIAM GIFFORD, ESQ. a man dear to every friend of literature, and a poet, an honor to the greatest nation. To write a narrative of one's own life has been always considered a task of extreme delicacy. HUME and GIBSON have executed it excellently well, but not without vanity. From this foible, so degrading to our own dignity, so insulting to the pride of others, this article is wholly free. It is composed in a style of "invincible modesty;" and it is pleasant to perceive how little the wise man arrogates, who is entitled to challenge all our praise. The pathetic manner with which our sensitive bard mentions his Mother, must endear him to every filial breast. His early studies, his perseverance, in spite of the bullets of fortune, and the picturesque circumstance of his etching the symbols of a science with the broken instrument of his humiliating labour, are all highly interesting. His ardent gratitude to his early patron will not escape the moral reader, and, when that passage is adverted to, which records the munificence of a British Nobleman to a man of genius, struggling with adversity, it will be discerned that there is one country, where when a Virgil appears, he never wants a Mæcenæ.]

SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF

WILLIAM GIFFORD, ESQ.

Written by himself.

I know but little of my family, and that little is not very precise. My great grandfather, (the most remote of it that I ever recollect to have heard mentioned,) possessed considerable property at Halsworthy, a parish in the neighbourhood of Ashburton; but whether acquired or inherited I never thought of asking, and do not know.*

* Lord Bolingbroke. See his Miscellaneous works.

† The writer of this article could not read the passage alluded to without emotion. To the lessons of a Mother he is indebted for much of what partial friendship may be willing to ascribe to him.

‡ A country truly great and free, where Bounty follows Service. Where ingratitude is no part of the national character. Where, when a WASHINGTON, or an ADAMS, a HAMILTON, or a PICKENS, are lavish of life to promote public welfare, there are none so detestably base, so meanly penurious as to withhold from them the rewards of honest fame. Note, by the Editor.

• I have, however, some faint notion of hearing my mother say that he or his father had been a China Merchant at London. By China Merchants I always understood, and so perhaps did she, a dealer in China Ware.

He was probably a native of Devonshire, for there he spent the last years of his life; spent them too, in some sort of consideration, for Mr. T. (a very respectable surgeon of Ashburton,) loved to repeat to me, when I first grew into notice, that he had frequently hunted with his hounds.

My grandfather was on ill terms with him; I believe not without sufficient reason, for he was extravagant and dissipated.—My father never mentioned his name, but my mother would sometimes tell me that he had ruined the family. That he spent much, I know, but I am inclined to think that his undutiful conduct occasioned my great grandfather to bequeath a part of his property from him.

My father, I fear, revenged in some measure the cause of my great grandfather. He was, as I heard my mother say, "a very wild young man, who could be kept to nothing." He was sent to the grammar school at Exeter; from which he made his escape, and entered on board a man of war. He was soon reclaimed from this situation by my grandfather, and left his school a second time to wander in some vagabond society.* He was now probably given up, for he was, on his return from this notable adventure, reduced to article himself to a plumber and glazier, with whom he luckily staid long enough to learn the business. I suppose his father was now dead, for he became possessed of two small estates, married my mother,† (the daughter of a carpenter at Ashburton,) and thought himself rich enough to set up for himself; which he did with some credit at South Molton.—Why he chose to fix there, I never inquired; but I learned from my mother, that after a residence of four or five years he was again thoughtless enough to engage in a dangerous frolic, which drove him once more to sea. This was an attempt to excite a riot in a Methodist chapel; for which his companions were prosecuted, and he fled, as I have mentioned.

My father was a good seaman, and was soon made second in command in the Lyon, a large armed transport in the service of government, while my mother, (then with child of me) returned to her native place, Ashburton, where I was born in April 1757.

The resources of my mother were very scanty. They arose from the rent of three or four small fields, which yet remained unsold. With these, however, she did what she could for me; and as soon as I was old enough to be trusted out of her sight, sent me to a school mistress of the name of Parret, from whom I learned in due time to read. I cannot boast much of my acquisitions at this school; they consisted merely of the contents of the "Child's spelling book;" but from my mother, who had stored up the literature of a country town, which about half a century ago, amounted to little more than what was disseminated by itinerant ballad singers, or rather readers, I had acquired much curious knowledge of Catskin, and the Golden Bull, and the Bloody Gardner, and many other histories equally instructive and amusing.

My father returned from sea in 1764. He had been at the siege of the Havannah; and though he received more than a hundred pounds for prize money, and his wages were considerable; yet, as he had not acquired any strict habits of economy, he brought home but a trifling sum. The little property yet left was, therefore, turned into money; a trifle more was got by agreeing to renounce all future pretensions to an estate at Totness‡ and with this my father set up a second time as a glazier and house painter. I was now about eight years old, and was put to the free school (kept by Hugh Smerdon,) to learn to read and write and cypher. Here I continued about three years, making a most wretched progress, when my father fell sick and died. He had not acquired wisdom from his misfortunes, but continued wasting his time in unprofitable pursuits, to the great detriment of his business. He loved drink for the sake of society, and to this love he fell a martyr; dying of a decayed and ruined constitution before he was forty. The town's people thought him a shrewd and sensible man, and regretted his death. As for me, I never greatly loved him; I had not grown up with him; and he was too prone to repulse my little advances to familiarity, with coldness or anger. He had certainly some reason to be displeased with me, for I learned little at school, and nothing at home, though he would now and then attempt to give me some insight into the business. As impressions of any kind are not very strong at the age of eleven or twelve, I did not long feel his loss; nor was it a subject of much sorrow to me, that my mother was doubtful of her ability to continue me at school, though I had by this time acquired a love for reading.

* He had gone with Bamfylde Moore Carew, then an old man.

† Her maiden name was Elizabeth Cain. My father's christian name was Edward.

‡ This was a lot of small houses, which had been thoughtlessly suffered to fall into decay, and of which the rents had been so long unclaimed, that they could not now be recovered, unless by an expensive litigation.

I never knew in what circumstances my mother was left: most probably they were inadequate to her support, without some kind of exertion, especially as she was now burthened with a second child about six or eight months old. Unfortunately she determined to prosecute my father's business; for which purpose she engaged a couple of journeymen, who, finding her ignorant of every part of it, wasted her property, and embezzled her money. What the consequence of this double fraud would have been, there was no opportunity of knowing, as, in somewhat less than a twelve month, my poor mother followed my father to the grave. She was an excellent woman, bore my father's infirmities with patience and good humour, loved her children dearly, and died at last, exhausted with anxiety and grief more on their account than on her own.

I was not quite thirteen when this happened; my little brother was hardly two; and we had not a relation nor a friend in the world. Every thing that was left was seized by a person of the name of C—, for money advanced to my mother. It may be supposed that I could not dispute the justice of his claims; and as no one else interfered, he was suffered to do as he liked. My little brother was sent to the alms-house, whither his nurse followed him out of pure affection; and I was taken to the house of the person I have just mentioned, who was also my god father. Respect for the opinion of the town, (which, whether correct or not, was, that he had repaid himself by the sale of my mother's effects,) induced him to send me again to school, where I was more diligent than before, and more successful. I grew fond of arithmetic, and my master began to distinguish me: but these golden days were over in less than three months. C—, sickened at the expense; and, as the people were now indifferent to my fate, he looked round for an opportunity of ridding himself of a useless charge. He had previously attempted to engage me in the drudgery of husbandry. I drove the plough for one day to gratify him, but I left it with a firm resolution to do so no more, and, in despite of his threats and promises, adhered to my determination. In this I was guided no less by necessity than will. During my father's life, in attempting to clamber up a table, I had fallen backward, and drawn it after me: its edge fell upon my breast, and I never recovered the effects of the blow; of which I was made extremely sensible on any extraordinary exertion. Ploughing, therefore, was out of the question, and, as I have already said, I utterly refused to follow it.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PORT FOLIO.

[Moiverius or De Moivre, (or Accius Secundus, according to the fashion of that age, which allowed the learned to assume new names of their own choice) was a Frenchman of the sixteenth century, and a celebrated writer of Latin poetry. In the bloom of life, he conceived the design of retiring into the bosom of the Alps, and renouncing all intercourse with the world, but that which is maintained by reading and writing, and this design he actually executed. He sought the most desolate part of the Ligurian shore, and fitting up an apartment in a half ruined fortress, which belonged to a nobleman of Burgundy, one of his patrons, he secluded himself from all society but that of shepherds, fishermen, and hunters of the boquetin. He relinquished this life, after some time, chiefly at the importunity of Laura D'Orvillers his mistress. During its continuance, however, he wrote several poems. The following is an attempt to put into an English dress, one of these, in which he appears to reply to some remonstrance of his mistress Laura. The most interesting parts only are taken, and if the lines be not unworthy of your notice, you are welcome to them.

"SOLITARY WORSHIP."

FROM THE LATIN OF ACCIUS SECUNDUS.

No teacher's voice my ear demands;
No kindling altar built by hands;
No sacramental bread is broke;
No urns exhale sabæan smoke;
No organ pipe or choral band
Amid my hallowed circle stand;
No rays of glimmering taper shine
To lead me to the curtained shrine;
No sacred verse, from mystic page,
Reveals the lore of saint or sage;
No keen polemic knife dissects
The vitals of ambiguous texts,
And marks out to my aching eye
How meanings grow and multiply:
What then my Laura, must there be
No converse 'twixt my God and me?

Th' aspiring dame that loads the ground
And all the pomp of measured sound
Please heaven, but will they please as well
As still small voice from desert cell?

In stately halls and busy marts
His smiles shall cheer ten thousand hearts,
But smiles he not in depths of caves,
And the rough world of winds and waves?

An antique trunk or mossy root
Will all my artless worship suit:
The new blown rose and new mown hay
Shall bring the incense that I pay;
The rustling leaves, the murmuring brook
Are texts from out my sacred book.

My God in rocks and trees I view;
His steps to inmost groves pursue;
I hear his voice in thundering seas;
I hear it whispering in the breeze.

A thousand poets of the wing,
Who, "sweetly, without salary, sing,"
Embowered, in poplar or in palm,
Shall give me psalmody and psalm.

Or if, in mood austerer, I,
Delight, on stronger plumes, to fly,
Symphonious winds and waves shall join
Their spells to witch these ears of mine:
Thunders my hymning choirs shall be,
And echoing rocks my minstrelsy.

The sun, when, in his eastern way,
His upward glance foreruns the day,
Me duly calls from light repose;
Me, the sole priest my temple knows:

I hie me to the bowery shade
By clasping vines and branches made,
In museful fit entranced, and there
I softly breathe my matin prayer.

The pebbly path whose various gloss
Is chequered by sweet humble moss,
With light from starry lamps above,
Or glow-worm's vesper lamp I love.

When vigil zeal abjures the bed
I heed not where repose the dead.
No spectre leads to stony pile
Where mimic deaths around me smile;
No voice is uttered by the grave,
My steps, from passing snares, to save.

The pillar'd roof and spiry fane
Unveil their marble pomp in vain.
The glimmering aisle and ghostly cell,
May ope at toll of signal bell,
And those who can, may bow the knee,
But other fanes must ope for me.

My eye some towery Alp has caught
O'erhung by Heaven's own vasty vault.
Columnar rocks shall form the base,
O'erspread by oaks of giant race.
In his hoar sides the ocean wave
Shall scoop out many a darksome cave;
In such a fane does Heaven delight,
And I adore, as angels might.

Or if from Nature's wild domain
Sickly or stormy skies detain;
If driving snows or miry earth
Me prisoner make to roof and hearth,
And shut me out from grove and hill,
And bowery shade and murmuring rill,
And mountain caves and thundering seas....
My quiet, homebuilt nook will please,
And Zeal as promptly shall repair,
To closet secrecy and prayer....
And while no eyes profane intrude
On sweet Devotion's solitude,
Be mine to sit, and muse alone
O'er pictured forms, or featured stone,
Some likeness, traced by those who can,
Of him who lived and died for man.

Or snatched away, in rapture hurl'd
I rove o'er all th' ideal world,
And cull out thoughts and words rehearse
That move in voluntary verse,
And ask, O teacher best, of thee
The grace of meek humility.
"Twixt hand and hand," to raise a screen
And save and bless, like thee, unseen.

To God's commending eye shall turn
To fervours that in secret burn;
The ear divine shall kindly bend
When earthly ears no audience lend:
And deeds of mute unwitnessed love,
Shall find there lasting fame above.

THE INDIAN STUDENT; OR, THE FORCE OF NATURE.

From Susquehannah's utmost springs
Where savage tribes pursue their game,
His blanket tied with yellow strings,
The shepherd of the forest came.

Not long before a wand'ring priest
Express his wish with visage sad,
Ah why! he cry'd, in satan's waste,
Ay why detain so fine a lad.

In Yankee land there stands a town
Where learning may be purchas'd low,

* "Let not thy left hand know what the right hand," &c.

Exchange his blanket for a gown,
And let the lad to college go.

From long debate the council rose,
And viewing Shallum's tricks with joy
To Harvard hall o'er drifted snows,
They sent the tawny colour'd boy.

Awhile he wrote, a while he read,
Awhile attended grammar rules,
An Indian savage, so well bred,
Great credit promis'd to the schools.

Some thought he would in law excel,
Some said in physic he would shine,
And some who lik'd him passing well,
Beheld in him a sound divine.

But those of more discerning eye,
E'en then could other prospects show,
They saw him lay his Virgil by,
To wander with his dearer bow.

The tedious hours of study spent,
The heavy moulded lecture done,
He to the woods a hunting went,
But sigh'd to see the setting sun.

The shady banks, the purling streams,
The woody wild his heart possest,
The dewy lawn his morning dreams
In Fancy's finest colours drest.

Ah why, he cry'd, did I forsake
My native woods for gloomy walls,
The silver stream, the limpid lake,
For musty books and college halls.

A little could my wants supply,
Can wealth or honour give me more?
Or will the sylvan god deny
The humble treat he gave before?

Where Nature's ancient forests grow,
And mingled laurel never fades,
My heart is fix'd, and I must go
To die among my native shades.

He spake, and to the western springs,
His gown discharg'd, his money spent,
His blanket ty'd with yellow strings,
The shepherd of the forest went.

Returning to his rural plain,
The Indians welcom'd him with joy,
The council took him home again,
And blest the tawny colour'd boy.

SELECTED POETRY.

IMITATED FROM CATULLUS.

Doris, that dear bewitching prude,
Still calls me saucy, pert, and rude,
And sometimes almost strikes me;
And yet, I swear, I can't tell how,
Spite of the knitting of her brow,
I'm very sure she likes me.

Ask you me why I fancy thus?
Why I have call'd her jilt and puss,
And thought myself above her;
And yet I feel it to my cost,
That when I rail against her most,
I'm very sure I love her.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

IN AMERICA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BULOW.

PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER VI.

Probable revolutions of the earth in former times.

What is more certain than the novelty of the American hemisphere is, that it formerly extended much farther eastward than it does at present. In fact the water deepens very gradually as you proceed from the shore. A vessel approaching the coast may sail boldly forward until it finds bottom at sixty fathoms deep, it is then still distant enough from land. The West-India islands have long been considered as the remains of a continent now under water. To this may be added the tradition of a continent, now sunk, called Atlantis, of which the western isles, and according to some, even Ireland where fossils altogether different from those in the rest of Europe, and only like those of America are found, may perhaps be the remains. Mr. Muhlenberg, whom I have already more than once mentioned, is of opinion that the ranges of granite, which occasion the falls in the rivers of the Atlantic United States, and, indeed, the falls nearest to the sea, were the central point of North-America in former times, and that it extended eastward as far as the banks of Newfoundland, and the easternmost West-India island. He mentions another fact which deserves particular attention. In New-Jersey, upon digging wells, there have been found, from forty to fifty feet beneath the surface of the earth, petrified wood, remnants of arms, in a word, unquestionable proofs of an inhabited surface. So much then had a country, once inhabited, sunk under ground; and the inundation extended to the ranges of granite, from which the sea had afterwards retired again. In fact the lower part of the Atlantic states, situated nearest to the coast, bear indisputable marks of having been not long ago covered by the sea. The water has deposited upon the ground it had overflowed new layers of earth, consisting here chiefly of sand and gravel. America, therefore, was not a new country, but, like a great island, the remnant of a still greater continent. The present North-America was then the mountainous part of that immense country; and thus the savage character of its inhabitants is easily accounted for; by considering, that only the savage inhabitants of the mountains were left, when the civilized inhabitants of the plains, in the great country of Atlantis, were drowned. These plains must have enjoyed, at that time, a milder climate than the Atlantic states do at present; as the cold winds from the mountains, in their passage over a cultivated surface, must have lost much of their severity. But I do not see why in particular this range of granite should be the central point, or spine of that country, since there are higher mountains, farther back from the sea, and that must be called the principal mountain from which the rivers take their source; which is here the Allegany.

Partial deluges have unquestionably taken place, even though a general one may be contrary to the known laws of nature. Perhaps the world was so ordered by its creator, that whole nations, when grown so thoroughly corrupt, as to render all reformation impossible, should be annihilated by such great natural revolutions. Perhaps this is the reason why the sea covers two thirds of our globe; for the same quantity of water might exist beneath the excavated and inhabited surface of the earth. Thus in the golden age, of which we have so many traditions, there was perhaps no sea visibly extant, and the whole surface of the globe was perhaps every where inhabited. Perhaps Providence has permitted these deluges in order to reduce the number of the wicked, and the mass of crimes.

POSTSCRIPT TO THE FIRST VOLUME.

I shall draw upon myself, to an high degree, the wrath of those strange men, who for their absurd partiality towards America, can be properly called by no other name than the Americomanes. It would be vain boasting here to say that I despise this rancour. The rage of men possessed of any kind of mania is never to be despised; and I see already the Americomanes, with foaming mouths, wild looks, and wigs starting from their heads by the standing on end of the hair beneath them, (for age is not a preservative against folly) breaking loose upon me. These curious personages deserve to be represented in all their ridiculous colours for the amusement of the German public. It would, indeed, be a sin to laugh at an unfortunate person, already so severely punished by such a sort of insanity or mania; but it so happens that these Americomanes possess more or less the faculty of writing; hence it may almost lead us to think, that it is not so much a mania as self-interest that makes them so much in love with America; because they draw from her their materials for thick volumes, which they could otherwise not extract from their own brains. These volumes, they think, will not sell so well if the public should take impressions unfavourable to America, whether true or false.—Hence their rage against every friend to truth, who plucks the mask from the face, which they are busied with painting, of their doll, America, and shews her in her deformity to the public. What cares a self-interested compiler whether he spreads abroad in the world error or not? He compiles, and compiles, and compiles as long as people will purchase his compilations. If, however, they should set up their yell against me, the German public will know how to decide, between them, who by false representations of American freedom and happiness, inveigle their fellow-citizens to emigrate to America; and me, who by proving the superiority of Germany, endeavour to persuade the Germans to stay where they are well.

Although I have in this work already opposed here and there a sufficient shield against the blunt critical arrows of those Americomanes, I will, however, here anticipate and answer some objections, such as may be expected from them, and only from them.

They will perhaps say that I draw from the official letters of General Washington inferences such as he himself would never have dreamt of.—But all those, who are not in the fever-fit of the mania, will very easily observe, that I have drawn no inferences at all, but have only quoted the facts related in those letters. What they may chuse to call inferences are inevitable consequences from the premises. A blind Americomane, however, sees not this, and I cannot remove the cataract; for he is incurable.

The Americomanes, who are not over intelligent, will say that my argument to prove external trade prejudicial to agriculture in America is unintelligible. I must here first inform them, that even the country people in Pennsylvania, call any man, who does not understand that, in plain terms a "blockhead," which expression substantially, though not literally, designates the head of an Americomane. Secondly I can answer them here, what squire Thornhill, in the Vicar of Wakefield, says to poor Moses. "Sir, I am your humble servant; I find you require of me to furnish you with arguments, and with understanding besides." (Vicar of Wakefield, chap. 7.)

The Americomanes, of whom it may be expected that they will talk of things which they do not understand, will express their wonder at my saying; it would be an easy thing for an active general, with a moderate army to conquer America. I am willing to let my judgment in this case, pass for nothing, although I learnt the art of war as my profession, and although my essay upon the plan of operation of the allies in Belgium, published in Archenholz's Minerva, for June 1794, in the judgment of connoisseurs, proved at least that I am not altogether ignorant in this respect. But upon this occasion they come in collision with a man, with whom it were the greatest presumption for men of their standard to pretend comparing themselves; and this man is no other than General Lloyd. This officer goes even so far as to maintain that for the conquest of all North-America, it would be sufficient to master New-England. But I found my opinion, that the country might easily be subdued, upon the want of defensive means. Mr. Morse says, indeed, that America has eight hundred thousand men for its defence. But every one, except a child or an Americomane, must know, that it is impossible to raise in a mass, or to maintain in the field, the whole number of men qualified to bear arms. The French have found these levies in a mass, during the present war, impossible and ridiculous.—What immense magazines would be necessary for it? Who would remain to till the fields if these eight hundred thousand men were collected together in an army? Are the magazines extant? Can they be collected in a country where corn is so enormously dear? How soon would the "neruum rerum gerendarum," money, be found wanting? From what vast distances must the immense stores of provisions be transported, where a small population is dispersed over so large an extent of country? To concentrate either men or things, much more time is necessary in America than in the most thinly peopled country of Europe. It is, therefore, not true that America contains eight hundred thousand men for her defence, even though she should have so many, or yet more, fit to bear arms; for when war is the subject of discussion, the only question is, how many fighting men a State can concentrate, and, when concentrated, maintain?

When it is known that in Pennsylvania alone there are twenty powder mills, it sounds very strangely, to hear me say, that the Americans have no powder; that is, not in sufficient quantities to carry on war according to the modern practice. But this proves what an immense difference there is, between considering a country, in another quarter of the world at two hundred leagues distance, in one's chamber, and having been in the country itself.—Thus, in the close chamber for instance, it is not known that these powder mills never, or very seldom, work, because no saltpetre, or at any rate no people to hunt it up are to be found. It may, however, boldly be maintained that there is not sufficient powder for an army during war, in a country, where a pound of gun-powder costs a Spanish dollar and an half, and where a profit of 150 per cent. or more, could be made upon German powder, if the ships dared to take it with them. Tolerable hunting powder costs at least two dollars a pound.

I know very well that the government has purchased some powder; but not sufficient for the wants of an army in the field: especially of an undisciplined army like the militia of the United States.

I, therefore, adhere to the assertion, that the Americans have not powder enough to carry on a war, and that if they were at this moment attacked, they would be as destitute of that article as they were in their revolutionary war.—Nor are the Americans sufficiently armed. Nearly two thirds of the militia, that of New-England perhaps excepted, are either unarmed, or have only muskets without bayonets. The arms for the three thousand soldiers of the United States were imported from Europe. Three thousand men are down upon paper; only half the number really exist. American officers themselves declare the militia to be troops nearly useless.

General Washington expresses in one of his official letters to Congress, the opinion, that the utmost exertion of all their power could not maintain more than seven or eight thousand men. At the close of the war the American army was, indeed, thirteen thousand strong, but it was by the assistance of France, which clothed and armed the American soldiers, and lent money to the nation.

At this day, every thing is dearer than in the time of war. The state was not then burthened with so oppressive a national debt, and a new paper emission would not succeed again, for the fate of the former bills would altogether deprive it of credit. I really know not, how, in case of a war, the Americans would extricate themselves from their perplexity. General Washington sees this very well; and has, therefore, used every possible endeavour to guard against a war, in which his diplomatic address has been successful.

If, therefore, America, for these causes, is unfit to stand a long war, I do not see how she could resist a sudden attack from Canada. I could even easily indicate the roads through which the columns should march, and the places where forts ought to be built, to keep the country in check; but this is not the place for it, and perhaps I shall have occasion to say something upon the subject in a military work, which I propose to write. Since the surrender of the forts the case is, indeed a little altered. When I speak upon subjects belonging to my profession, the Americomanes should at least leave me in quiet; for they understand nothing of it, and by their animadversions can only make themselves the more ridiculous.

The Americomanes have, as I hear, maintained that judge ———, who was detected in stealing, could not be a judge, because he was not the chief justice. This places the logic of these people in a very extraordinary point of view. A is not Z. I say so too.—But I spoke not of the chief justice, but of judge ———. The incredible ignorance, discovered in the assertion that a judge and a justice are the same, and that both are officers corresponding with village bailiffs, I have in this work already shewn; but I must here once more express my astonishment, how persons totally unacquainted with the very elements of the American constitution can have the face to write about it!

Such objections as those, of which I have here detailed the whole series, can in fact be made only by the high priest of the whole fanatical fraternity of the Americomanes. Such adversaries are not dangerous; I think myself happy to have none but such as are thus weak; and truth must soon or late triumph over the paltry cavilling of such little beings, who think it for their interest to disfigure her.

The Americomanes should turn their eyes towards professor Ebeling, and blush. This deserving author of a good system of American Geography knows very well that from the materials which the Americans themselves send him, the unfavourable side of the country and of the people cannot be seen; he is also too wise not to be convinced how great a difference there is, between having been in a country, and writing about it, without ever having seen it. Professor Ebeling appears, therefore, to remain neutral between the Americomanes and me; for he has hitherto observed a most judicious silence respecting my letters in the Minerva.

Those Germans who will not trust my account, and adhere to the foolish Americomanes, are welcome to go there and learn by their own experience. They are welcome to pay very dear for very bad land, and in the elegant Tulpehaccon (properly Tulpehaccon, but so the Americans pronounce it) or the Arcadian sow-swamp, dream away delightful days. For all me too, they may taste a little of the yellow fever; all this would give me very little concern, since they chuse to know every thing better than those who have been there.

Let me be permitted to add here, some remarks upon the letter written from Philadelphia by Doctor Bollman, and published in a monthly periodical paper at Berlin, last November. Persons who read every thing superficially, will say that Mr. Bollman's opinion and mine do not agree together—I do not think so. But if Mr. Bollman and myself should in future come in collision with each other, he, as a man of education, will not adopt the Billingsgate language of the Americomanes, who seem to have learnt their style from the American sailors, in the most disreputable quarter of Hamburg.

And first, it is not surprising that Mr. Bollman's imagination, should clothe with rosy coloured garments every object, seeing that he tells us at the beginning of his letter, how much he was admired by the women in Philadelphia, and with what delight he danced away his time with them in joyous dalliance and frolic sport. I am really rejoiced to hear it, and heartily wish the Doctor joy upon it. Doctor Bollman is, however, by no means excessively fascinated in favour of the Americans. He finds that even these ladies have much the manners of dragoons, and that their husbands, singly and solely devoted to getting money, are very tiresome companions. He likewise finds that there is in America very little good, and contents himself with the reflection, that evil arises even from good: but he thinks there is also little evil, so that moral apathy, appears to him, to constitute the American character. He likewise compares America to a great empty house, containing very little furniture, where it is very uncomfortable to dwell, and where the air is disagreeably damp; this comparison appears to me very just. All this sounds not very favourably, and is, perhaps, only the prelude to things which will occur, when Mr. Bollman shall have had a longer time for observation, and when the Americans shall grow more indifferent towards him in process of time, and cease to heap civilities upon him, on account of a noble action by which he distinguished himself in Europe. The first moments in the tumult of joy to find one's self honoured and beloved, are not the fittest for cool observation.

This probably is the cause why Mr. Bollman's opinions for the most part dwell merely upon the surface of things, as it appears evident, from several passages in his letter, that he was by no means deficient in penetration or understanding. It is further to be considered, how short his residence in America had been when he wrote the letter.—Thus he infers, for instance, the prosperity of the state from the greatness of its exportations. Upon this subject, I hope, more important ideas will be found in my book. As he saw only the sea-ports New-York and Philadelphia, and the neighbourhood round them, he did indeed perceive every where a false tinsel of prosperity. Perhaps he would have formed a different judgment, if he could have compared the debit and credit sides of the account books.—These were not, indeed, shewn to me; but I have certain principles by virtue of which I believe I can judge of them with tolerable accuracy.

Mr. Bollman says, the neighbourhood of Philadelphia is fertile. If he means that it produces something, he is right. But he has not examined it, for the fertility is very indifferent. The ground is so covered with garlick that very little wheat can be raised upon it. For grass it is better. I have taken very particular pains in this respect, for I intended to purchase a plantation there, and although I was in treaty for one, which was tolerably cheap (at seven pounds Pennsylvania currency, an acre) I found, upon closer examination, that it was more advisable not to make the bargain. The land is for the most part already exhausted, and labour is enormously dear.—In this book, I treat circumstantially of the neighbourhood of Philadelphia.

It is interesting to find two observers writing from a foreign country, at the same time, nearly the same things. What Mr. Bollman writes of the democratic and aristocratic parties, and of their leaders, and likewise of the southern and northern states, will all be found in one of my letters to Mr. Archenholz, published in the Minerva for June 1796.—But my narrative is more complete as any person may see, who will take the pains to compare the Minerva of June 1796, with the Berlin monthly publication for November of the same year. Doctor Bollman, indeed, touches in his letter upon so many subjects, that he could not dwell long upon any one of them.—But the remark, that the attachment to democracy in the southern states, proceeds from the circumstance that they have no white populace is equally just and novel.

Mr. Bollman judges the British treaty, as I believe, very correctly, and states accurately the questions which were brought forward in the debates upon it. But when he speaks of the federalists and anti-federalists he falls into a capital error, which it is my duty here to censure, in order that it may not be spread abroad among the German public. I am surprised that the editor of the Berlin monthly publication did not correct it, at least in a little note. This error probably was occasioned by Doctor Bollman's having had no occasion to study the theory of politics in general, and of the constitution of the United States in particular. It is as follows.

Doctor Bollman states the federalists to be merely the friends of the senate, and the anti-federalists to be its adversaries. But the anti-federalists are hostile to the whole congress in as much as it is a legislative power. It is well known that previous to the present federal constitution the Congress possessed not the smallest legislative power. They could negotiate and conclude treaties with foreign powers; they could also require from the several states the sums necessary for the support of the union, by making known to each state the quota of its contribution towards the common expenses, but nothing further. The Congress were then exactly what the Amphyctions were among the Greeks, and what the assemblies of the Helvetic league are at present.—A federal constitution existed properly then, which could not continue, because few of the states would pay their contributions; because they were deficient in republican virtue; so that properly the anti-federalists are federalists. The real federal constitution was annihilated by this nominal federal constitution, which erected a single legislative power extending over all the states; and this transfer of the legislative power to a single representative body (the division into two houses being nothing to the purpose, since the senate forms a part of the Congress) is what the anti-federalists oppose.—In as much, therefore, as the anti-federalists are democrats, and as the senate is the most aristocratic part of the Congress, just so far are they more inimical to it, than to the house of representatives—Hence likewise proceeded the propositions of Virginia, the most democratically inclined of all the states, to elect the senators only for three years instead of six, as they are now chosen, and to take from the senate the powers of trying impeachments and ratifying treaties, and give the former to the supreme judicial court, and extend the latter to the concurrences of the house of representatives. Of these Virginian propositions Mr. Bollman says not one word. But it is impossible to speak of every thing in a letter.

Mr. Bollman says, the anti-federal state of Virginia, even during the revolution was against the establishment of two houses.—How! during the revolution?—I am truly astonished—Does Mr. Bollman call the perfectly peaceable introduction of the present federal constitution, so called, a revolution?—If he does, it is unusual; for by the revolution is commonly understood the war with England for independence. During that war, there was no question about two houses; for the Congress, under the former constitution, consisted of a single assembly. The new constitution, and with it the two houses, was first introduced in 1789, that is, six years after the peace which put an end to the revolution....But perhaps Mr. Bollman calls the introduction of the present constitution a revolution, and if so, he is perhaps right in saying that the state of Virginia was opposed to the establishment of two houses.—But he must have found this in the debates of the Virginia convention, which he surely never read through.

Mr. Bollman judges of the principles of the anti federalists from their name. He thinks they favoured a single assembly in order still more to concentrate power, and the truth is precisely the contrary. They are opposers of the present constitution because it concentrates the power, and properly transforms the federative government into a single national corporation. The anti-federalists are friends to the independence of the states.

These errors of an ingenious man, were doubtless occasioned by a want of previous knowledge. We may look forward, however, to very interesting information from him, and I shall be truly rejoiced, if he shall shew that I have been mistaken in what I have unfavourably represented. I say "unfavourably," because I do not merely blame, but praise likewise, as will be found in the present work.

As I consider my sincere love of truth as a shield against all attacks, under the shelter of which I am perfectly secured, my adversaries may perhaps have a very pleasant joke at my expense, which I shall, however, here disarm by meeting it before-hand. They may perhaps say that I give myself out for a knight without fear or reproach, for a sort of literary Bayard.—My answer is, that they have guessed right, and that I do so consider myself.—So they may now spare themselves the trouble of making the objection.

At this day the best way to obtain, is to confer praise. There is likewise an opinion wandering about among mankind, that nations must be more tenderly treated than individuals. This is not true. The exalted founder of the Christian religion openly reproached the Jews according to their deserts.—The truth should be told, and those who cannot bear it should be laughed out of countenance.

I advise those who think my argument in the second chapter of this work, upon the importance of original descent, tiresome, and nothing to the purpose, to take in hand, the Island of Felsenburg, the beautiful Melusina, or "the Merry Jester," and also a very pretty little work entitled the "Genteel Hangman."

So many gentlemen have within a short time found themselves deceived in their expectations, and therefore returned from America, that I am surprised they have published nothing concerning that country. It will perhaps be said that herein they shew themselves wiser than me. I am not of that opinion. Ease and personal convenience ought not to be preferred to the benefit of the public.—It would be peculiarly interesting if Count Burghausen should write upon the subject, as he is so richly qualified to compose an interesting work, and as upon his return to Germany, he declared such to be his intention.

The following circumstance, among others, proves how unacquainted even learned men are with the American constitution. I saw, in Philadelphia, a German just then arrived there, who shewed me a letter of recommendation, from a certain German author, to Washington.—The superscription was "To George Washington, President of the Congress of the United States." This sounds exactly as if one should write "To Frederick-William, King of the Government of the Kingdom of Prussia." Under the federal constitution, there is a President of the United States, but no President of Congress—under the old constitution there was a President of Congress.—Every school boy ought to know so much as that.

ALTONA, March 27, 1797.

ON MUSIC AS A FEMALE ACCOMPLISHMENT.

A DIALOGUE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

L. Well then, I will. I will take you at your word, yet I would not if you did not give other proofs than merely verbal ones, of curiosity and interest in my homely tale. You look as if you were attentive and inquisitive, and I will trust to that.

My first attempts, you will easily suppose, were awkward and ridiculous. I knew that any one who heard me would judge so, and that I should judge so of another, yet I found strange delight in my rude ditty. I was encouraged likewise, by the perception of my progress. It was slow enough, but after some months I could not deny that I managed matters more easily than at first.

I could never endure mere repetition. Some license, some independence, some exertion of my own fancy, I exercised from the first moment that I touched the keys, and these licenses increased as habit improved my dexterity. I always, at every new performance, added or retrenched, flattened or sharpened, assembled or spread out, augmented, lessened, or varied my treble or my base. It was one strain, but with as many variations as there were attempts to play.

Even to this day I cannot read music. I cannot play from any written piece, though I am well enough acquainted with symbols and terms, yet, when I accidentally hear a good performer, I listen with great eagerness and considerable benefit. I have knowledge to see his peculiarities, his differences from me, and to imitate them when alone. This is a singular mode of studying music, but I believe it is the best. It confers a more masterly acquaintance with the instrument. It makes you, at the same time player and composer. It brings your own judgment and invention into exercise. You do not become so swift and so agile, it is true; you do not so much qualify yourself to please others, as if you had by rote, or could play from scores, all Handel and Scarlatti, but you administer with more success to your own pleasure. There is more delight, and, I think, more merit in composing even badly, than in merely copying or repeating the finest compositions of another, and this is true in poetry and painting as well music, at least so it is with me.

R. But these excellencies need not be separated. Your invention would be improved by studying and performing the works of others, and the same means that enabled you to give pleasure to others, would likewise heighten your own.

L. I have sometimes thought so too, and so great is my passion for music, that the utmost exertions of my fortitude were requisite to abstain from the boundless indulgence. I have sometimes been scarcely able to refrain from devoting to my instrument, not half hours merely, but days and weeks. I doubt whether any motive, but necessity and my father's will would, at my first setting out, have sufficed. Had I been a girl of fortune and leisure, and my friends encouraged my musical pursuits, I am pretty sure that I should have neglected every other path for the sake of this. Happily for me, however, I had indigence and a father's distaste to restrain me, till my reason acquired strength enough to regulate my actions.

Greatly still do I love music, but I see the folly and even the guilt of allowing it to engross much of my time. I see how comparatively selfish, worthless and fleeting is the pleasure which it gives; how much below the ennobling exercises of the reason in reflecting, the fancy in inventing, or the heart in feeling. Nothing but its subservience to my religious duty reconciles me to the practice of it. As mere recreation it is superfluous. I have taught myself to derive amusement from sources more refined; more permanent; more intellectual than this.

I have known females seat themselves at ten o'clock in the morning, open their book, and proceed with the utmost regularity each day successively, for months together, through half a dozen highland airs, or intricate concerto's. How have I pitied their grovelling taste, and perverse sensibility! How have I lamented their unsufferable waste of time, and abuse of leisure! How many sources of true and beneficial pleasure are forgotten and unthought of while this passion is fostered, and how, indeed, inferior was this kind of musical performance to that which I pursued.

BIOGRAPHY.

SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF WILLIAM GIFFORD, ESQ.

Written by himself.
(Concluded.)

Hitherto I had not so much as dreamt of poetry; indeed I scarce knew it by name; and whatever may be said of the force of nature, I never "lisp'd in numbers." I recollect the occasion of my first attempt: it is, like all the rest of my non-adventures, of so unimportant a nature, that I should blush to call the attention of the idler reader to it, but for the reason alleged in the introductory paragraph. A person, whose name escapes me, had undertaken to paint a sign for an ale-house: it was to be a lion, but the unfortunate artist produced a dog. On this awkward affair, one of my acquaintance wrote a copy of what we called verse: I liked it, but fancied I could compose something more to the purpose: I tried, and by the unanimous suffrage of my shop-mates, was allowed to have succeeded. Notwithstanding this encouragement, I thought no more of verse, till another occurrence as trifling as the former, furnished me with a fresh subject, and so I went on, till I had got together about a dozen of them. Certainly nothing on earth was ever so deplorable: such as they were, however, they were talked of in my little circle, and I was sometimes invited to repeat them, even out of it. I never committed a line to paper for two reasons; first, because I had no paper; and secondly, perhaps I might be excused from going farther: but in truth I was afraid; for my master had already threatened me for hitching the name of one of his customers into a rhyme.

The repetitions of which I speak were attended with applause, and sometimes with favours more substantial: little collections were now and then made, and I have received sixpence in an evening. To one who had so long lived in the absolute want of money, such a resource seemed like a Peruvian mine. I furnished myself by degrees with paper, &c. and what was of more importance, with books of geometry, and of the higher branches of Algebra, which I cautiously concealed. Poetry, even at this time, was no amusement of mine: it was subservient to other purposes; and I only had recourse to it when I wanted money for my mathematical pursuits.

But the clouds were gathering fast. My master's anger was raised to a terrible pitch by my indifference to his concerns, and still more by the reports which were daily brought to him of my presumptuous attempts at versification. I was required to give up my papers, and when I refused, my garret was searched, my little hoard of books discovered and removed, and all future repetitions prohibited in the strictest manner.

This was a very severe stroke, and I felt it most sensibly; it was followed by another severer still: a stroke which crushed the hopes I had so long and so fondly cherished, and resigned me at once to despair. Mr. Hugh Smerdon, on whose succession I had calculated, died, and was succeeded by a person not much older than myself, and certainly not so well qualified for the situation.

I look back to that part of my life which immediately followed this event, with little satisfaction; it was a period of gloom, and savage unsociability; by degrees I sunk into a kind of corporeal torpor, or, if roused into activity by the spirit of youth, wasted the exertion in splenetic and vexatious tricks, which alienated the few acquaintances compassion had yet left me. So I crept on in silent discontent; unfriended and unpitied; indignant at the present, careless of the future, an object at once of apprehension and dislike.

From this state of abjectness I was raised by a young woman of my own class. She was a neighbour; and whenever I took my solitary walk, with my Wolfius in my pocket, she usually came to the door, and by a smile, or a short question put in the friendliest manner, endeavoured to solicit my attention. My heart had been long shut to kindness, but the sentiment was not dead in me: it revived at the first encouraging word; and the gratitude I felt for it, was the first pleasing sensation I had ventured to entertain for many dreary months.

Together with gratitude, hope, and other passions still more enlivening, took place of that uncomfortable gloominess which so lately possessed me: I returned to my companions, and by every winning art in my power, strove to make them forget my former repulsive ways. In this I was not unsuccessful; I recovered their good will, and by degrees grew to be somewhat of a favorite.

My master still murmured; for the business of the shop went on no better than before: I comforted myself, however, with the reflection that my apprenticeship was drawing to a conclusion, when I determined to renounce the employment forever, and to open a private school.

In this humble and obscure state, poor beyond the common lot, yet flattering my ambition with day-dreams which, perhaps, would never have been realized, I was found, in the twentieth year of my age, by Mr. William Cookesley, a name never to be pronounced by me without veneration. The lamentable doggerel which I have already mentioned, and which had passed from mouth to mouth among people of my own degree, had, by some accident or other, reached his ear, and given him a curiosity to enquire after the author.

It was my good fortune to interest his benevolence. My little history was not untinctured with melancholy, and I laid it fairly before him: his first care was to console: his second, which he cherished to the last moment of his existence, was to relieve and support me.

Mr. Cookesley was not rich: his eminence in his profession, which was that of a surgeon, procured him, indeed, much employment; but in a country town, men of science are not the most liberally rewarded: he had besides, a very numerous family, which left him little for the purposes of general benevolence: that little however was cheerfully bestowed, and his activity and zeal were always at hand to supply the deficiencies of his fortune.

On examining into the nature of my literary attainments, he found them absolutely nothing: he heard, however, with equal surprise and pleasure, that amidst the grossest ignorance of books, I had made a very considerable progress in the mathematics. He engaged me to enter into the details of this affair; and when he learned that I made it in circumstances of discouragement and danger, he became more warmly interested in my favour, as he now saw a possibility of serving me.

The plan that occurred to him was naturally that which had so often suggested itself to me. There were, indeed, several obstacles to be overcome: I had eighteen months, yet to serve; my hand writing was bad, and my language very incorrect; but nothing could slacken the zeal of this excellent man, he procured a few of my poor attempts at rhyme, dispersed them amongst his friends and acquaintance, and when my name was become somewhat familiar to them, set on foot a subscription for my relief. I still preserve the original paper: its title was not very magnificent, though it exceeded the most sanguine wishes of my heart: it ran thus, "a Subscription for purchasing the remainder of the time of William Gifford, and for enabling him to improve himself in Writing and English Grammar." Few contributed more than five shillings, and none went beyond ten and sixpence: enough, however, was collected to free me from my apprenticeship, (the sum my master received was six pounds,) and to maintain me a few months during which I assiduously attended the Rev. Thomas Smerdon.

At the expiration of this period, it was found that my progress (for I will speak the truth in modesty,) had been more considerable than my patrons expected; I had also written in the interim several little pieces of poetry, less rugged, I suppose, than my former ones, and certainly with fewer anomalies of language. My preceptor too, spoke favourably of me; and my benefactor who was now become my father and my friend, had little difficulty in persuading my patrons to renew their donations, and continue me at school for another year. Such liberality was not lost upon me; I grew anxious to make the best return in my power, and I redoubled my diligence. Now that I am sunk into indolence, I look back with some degree of scepticism to the exertions of that period.

In two years and two months from the day of my emancipation, I was pronounced by Mr. Smerdon, fit for the university. The plan of opening a writing school had been abandoned almost from the first; and Mr. Cookesley looked round for some one who had interest enough to procure me some little office at Oxford. This person who was soon found out, was Thomas Taylor, Esq. of Denbury, a gentleman to whom I had already been indebted for much liberal and friendly support. He procured me the place of Bib. Lect. at Exeter College; and this, with such occasional assistance from the country as Mr. Cookesley undertook to provide, was thought sufficient to enable me to live, at least, till I had taken a degree.

During my attendance on Mr. Smerdon I had written, as I observed before, several tuneful trifles, some as exercises, others voluntarily (for poetry was now become my delight,) and not a few at the desire of my friends. When I became capable however, of reading Latin and Greek with some degree of facility, that gentleman employed all my leisure hours in translations from the Classics; and indeed I do not know a single school book, of which I did not render some portion into English verse. Among others, Juvenal engaged my attention, or rather my master's, and I translated the tenth satire for a holiday task.—Mr. Smerdon was much pleased with this, (I was not undelighted with it myself;) and as I was now become fond of the author, he easily persuaded me to proceed with him and I translated in succession the third, the fourth, the twelfth, and I think the eighth Satires. As I had no end in view but that of giving a temporary satisfaction to my benefactors, I thought little more of these, than of many other things of the same nature which I wrote from time to time and of which I never copied a single line.

On my removing to Exeter College, however, my friend, ever attentive to my concerns, advised me to copy my translation of the tenth Satire, and present it on my arrival, to the Rev. Dr. Stinton, (afterwards Rector,) to whom Mr. Taylor had given me an introductory letter; I did so, and it was kindly received. Thus encouraged, I took up the first and second Satires, (I mention them in the order they were translated,) when my friend, who had sedulously watched my progress, first started the idea of my going through the whole, and publishing it by subscription, as a means of increasing my means of subsistence. To this I readily acceded, and finished the thirteenth, eleventh, and fifteenth Satires; the remainder were the work of a much later period.

When I had got thus far, we thought it a fit time to mention our design; it was very generally approved of by my friends; and on the first of January 1781, the subscription was opened by Mr. Cookesley at Ashburton, and by myself at Exeter College.

So bold an undertaking so precipitately announced, will give the reader, I fear, a higher opinion of my conceit than of my talents: neither the one nor the other, however, had the smallest concern with the business, which originated solely in ignorance; I wrote verses with great facility, and I was simple enough to imagine that little more was necessary for a translator of Juvenal! I was not indeed, unconscious of my inaccuracies: I knew that they were numerous, and that I had need of some friendly eye to point them out, and some judicious hand to rectify or remove them: but for these as well as for every thing else, I looked to Mr. Cookesley, and that worthy man, with his usual alacrity of kindness, undertook the laborious task of revising the whole translation. My friend was no great Latinist, perhaps I was the better of the two; but he had taste and judgment, which I wanted. What advantages might have been ultimately derived from them, there was unhappily no opportunity of ascertaining, as it pleased the Almighty to call him to himself by a sudden death, before we had quite finished the first Satire. He died with a letter of mine unopened in his hands.

This event, which took place on the 15th of January, 1781, afflicted me beyond measure.* I was not only deprived of a most faithful and affectionate friend, but of a zealous and ever active protector, on whom I confidently relied for support: the sums that were still necessary for me he always collected; and it was to be feared that the assistance which was not solicited with warmth, would insensibly cease to be afforded.

In many instances this was actually the case: the desertion, however, was not general; and I was encouraged to hope, by the unexpected friendship of Serrington Savery, a gentleman who voluntarily stood forth as my patron, and watched over my interests with kindness and attention.

Some time before Mr. Cookesley's death, we had agreed that it would be proper to deliver out, with the terms of subscription, a specimen of the manner in which the translation was executed; † to obviate any idea of selection, a sheet was accordingly taken from the beginning of the first Satire. My friend died while it was in the press.

After a few melancholy weeks, I resumed the translation; but found myself utterly incapable of proceeding. I had been so accustomed to connect Mr. Cookesley's name with every part of it, and I laboured with such delight in the hope of giving him pleasure, that now, when he appeared to have left me in the midst of my enterprize, and I was abandoned to my own efforts, I seemed to engage in a hopeless struggle, without motive or end; and his idea, which was perpetually recurring to me, brought such bitter anguish with it, that I shut up the work with feelings bordering on distraction.

To relieve my mind I had recourse to other pursuits. I endeavoured to become more intimately acquainted with the Classics, and to acquire some of the modern languages: by permission too, or rather recommendation, of the Rector and Fellows, I also undertook the care of a few pupils; this removed much of my anxiety respecting my future means of support. I have a heartfelt pleasure in mentioning this indulgence of my college; it could arise from nothing but the liberal desire inherent, I think, in the members of both our Universities, to encourage every thing that bears the most distant resemblance to talents: for I had no claims upon them for any particular exertions.

The lapse of many months had now soothed and tranquilized my mind, and I once more returned to the translation, to which a wish to serve a young man surrounded with difficulties, had induced a number of respectable characters to set their names: but alas, what a mortification! I now discovered, for the first time, that my own inexperience, and the advice of my too partial friends had engaged me in a work, for the due execution of which, my literary attainments were by no means sufficient. Errors and misconceptions appeared in every page. I had indeed caught something of the spirit of Juvenal, but his meaning had frequently escaped me, and I saw the necessity of a long and painful revision, which would carry me far beyond the period fixed for the appearance of the work. Alarmed at the prospect I instantly resolved (if not wisely, yet I trust honestly) to renounce the publication for the present.

In pursuance of this resolution, I wrote to my friend in the country, (the Rev. Serrington Savery,) requesting him to return the subscription money in his hands, to the subscribers. He did not approve of my plan: nevertheless he promised, in a letter which now lies before me, to comply with it; and, in a subsequent one, added that he had already begun to do so.

For myself, I also made several repayments; and trusted a sum of money to make others, with a fellow collegian, who, not long after, fell by his own hands in the presence of his father. But there were still some whose abode could not be discovered, and others, on whom to press the taking back of eight shillings would neither be decent nor respectful: even from these I ventured to flatter myself that I should find pardon, when on some future day I presented them with the work, (which I was still secretly determined to complete,) rendered more worthy of their patronage, and increased by notes, which I now perceived to be absolutely necessary, to more than double its proposed size.

In the leisure of a country residence, I fancied this might be done in two years: perhaps I was not too sanguine: the experiment, however, was not made, for about this time a circumstance happened which changed my views, and indeed my whole system of life.

I had contracted an acquaintance with a person of the name of — recommended to my particular notice by a gentleman of Devonshire, whom I was proud of an opportunity to oblige. This person's residence at Oxford was not long; and when he returned to town, I maintained a correspondence with him by letters. At his particular request, these were inclosed in a cover and sent to Lord Grosvenor: one day I inadvertently omitted the direction, and his Lordship, necessarily supposing it to be meant for himself, opened and read it. There was something in it which attracted his notice; and when he gave the letter to my friend, he had the curiosity to enquire about his correspondent, at Oxford: and, upon the answer he received, the kindness to desire he might be brought to see him upon his coming to town; to this circumstance, purely accidental on all sides, and to this alone, I owe my introduction to that nobleman.

On my first visit he asked me what friends I had, and what were my prospects in life; and I told him that I had no friends, and no prospects of any kind. He said no more; but when I called to take leave, previous to returning to college, I found that this simple exposure of my circumstances had sunk deep into his mind. At parting, he informed me that he charged himself with my present support, and future establishment, and that till this last could be effected to my wish, I should come and reside with him. These were not words of course, they were more than fulfilled in every point. I did go, and reside with him; and I experienced a warm and cordial reception, a kind and affectionate esteem, that has known neither diminution nor interruption, from that hour to this, a period of twenty years!

In his Lordship's house I proceeded with Juvenal, till I was called upon to accompany his son, (one of the most amiable and accomplished young noblemen that this country, fertile in such characters, could ever boast) to the continent. With him in two successive tours, I spent many years: years of which the remembrance will always be dear to me, from the recollection that a friendship was then contracted, which time and a more intimate knowledge of each other, have mellowed into a regard that forms at once the pride and happiness of my life.

It is long since I have been returned and settled in the bosom of competence and peace—my translation frequently engaged my thoughts, but I had lost the ardor and the confidence of youth, and was seriously doubtful of my abilities to do it justice. I have wished a thousand times that I could decline it altogether: but the ever recurring idea that there were people of the description I have already mentioned, who had just and forcible claims on me for the due performance of my engagement, forbade the thought; and I slowly proceeded towards the completion of a work in which I should never have engaged, had my friend's inexperience or my own, suffered us to suspect for a moment the labour, and the talents of more than one kind, absolutely necessary to its success in any tolerable degree. Such as I could make it, it is now before the public.

MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF LAZARUS SPALLANZANI, THE CELEBRATED NATURALIST.

(Concluded.)

A sea voyage was, in every respect, the safest as well as the most convenient; but Spallanzani regarded with an eye of perfect indifference the dangers attending long journeys by land, when he entertained any hopes of meeting with new instruction; he boldly confronted all the perils of these desert regions destitute of civil government. Having reached Bucharest, he was detained there nine days by the celebrated and unfortunate Mauroceni, hospodar of Wallachia; this prince, justly renowned for his liberal patronage of the sciences, received him with the most flattering marks of distinction; made him a present of several rarities of his country, and provided him with horses, and an escort of thirty soldiers through the whole extent of his dominions. Spallanzani passed through Hermanstadt to Transylvania, and arrived at Vienna on the 7th of December, after having visited the numberless mines of Transylvania, Hungary, and Germany.

Spallanzani remained five days in the metropolis of Austria, held two conferences of considerable length with the emperor Joseph II, was entertained by the principal noblemen of the court, and visited by all men of literature. At length he arrived at Pavia; the students came out of the city gates to meet him, and accompanied him to his house, in all the rapturous ardour of unfeigned joy, and, by the most irresistible compulsion, dragged him to the auditory. Impelled by their desire to hear him, they compelled him to ascend the chair, whence he was accustomed to deliver his lectures. Spallanzani, sensibly affected by this conduct, painted to them, in the most eloquent and animated manner, his gratitude and attachment: kind wishes, cries of joy, and shouts of applause, were renewed with more ardor, and he was compelled to request them to restrain their satisfaction, and to permit him to retire to his own house, that he might obtain that repose of which he found himself so much in need. He had, at this time, more than five hundred students.

* I began this unadorned narrative on the 15th of January, 1801; twenty years have therefore elapsed since I lost my benefactor and my friend. In the interval I have wept a thousand times at the recollection of his goodness: I yet cherish his memory with filial respect, and at this distant period, my heart sinks within me at every repetition of his name.

† Many of these papers were distributed; the terms which I extract from one of them, were these, "The work shall be printed in quarto (without notes) and be delivered to subscribers in the month of December next. The price will be sixteen shillings in boards, half to be paid at the time of subscribing, the remainder on delivery of the book."

The cabinet of Pavia was always the dear object of Spallanzani's thoughts; among the numerous rarities which he had there collected, his mind was only intent on those which were still wanting. He was struck with its deficiency in volcanic substances, of which a few only were collected, without order, uninteresting, and uninformative, though Italy was the theatre where the volcanic fires, for so many ages, had displayed their desolating energy. He resolved to instruct his disciples, his country, and himself, on these phenomena so important and so little known, and to collect the documents of their history on the spot, where they are the incessant terror of the surrounding inhabitants, and the useless subject of philosophical observations: he prepared himself for this important undertaking by a laborious course of study. He set out for Naples in the summer of 1788; and, in the course of a dangerous voyage, examined, with minuteness and undaunted courage, the terrible phenomena of Vesuvius, Lipari, Etna, Sylla, and Charybdis. By these means, at the age of sixty, he amassed that invaluable collection of anecdotes comprised in his work, intitled, Voyages dans les deux Siciles, where he embraces the opportunity of comparing the descriptions which Homer, Pindar, Virgil, Diodorus Siculus, and Strabo, have given of those celebrated places, with what he himself saw.

In the travels of Spallanzani is found a new volcanology; he teaches the mode of calculating the degree of intensity in the heat of volcanic fires, as well as of investigating its cause. He has, by analysis, almost ascertained that peculiar species of gas, which, like a strong lever, tears from the earth's entrails, and hurls, even to the summit of Etna, those torrents of melted pumice stones which are disgorged by that volcano. He discloses the nature of pumice stones, which he has since demonstrated in some of artificial fabrication. He proves that the burning of these mountains proceeds from the inflammation of hydrogen carbonic gas; and this solution equally applies to the phenomena of Barigazzo, and several other places, some of which were then burning in secret. He found means to render those fires serviceable in making lime, and they are still made use of for this purpose. Spallanzani concludes this excellent production with some interesting researches relative to swallows, taking occasion to describe, under the impulse of a refined imagination, the amiable manners, and the rapidity of flight for which this species of birds are distinguished; the useful hints which they furnish to an observer for the invention of an aerial post, their migrations regulated by the temperature of the air, and its propitiousness to the birth of certain insects; lastly, he discusses the celebrated problem of their state of torpor during winter, and he proves that an artificial cold, more intense than that of our climates, does not render these birds lethargic. He then treats of the owl species; and in conclusion, he speaks of eels and their mode of generation, which still remains a problem to be solved; but he gradually conducts the reader through his researches, to the very step which promises a complete solution.

Spallanzani anxiously observed the progress of French chymistry, which he adopted without the least hesitation; it was formed for a judicious mind like his, which delighted to account for the phenomena which it observed. When Gottling published his experiments upon the combustion of phosphorus in azote, Spallanzani wished to try the solidity of these arguments which were brought against his favourite system, and, therefore, published in 1797, his Chimico esame degli Esperimenti del Signore Gottling, Professore a Tena, where he refuted the conclusions of that chymist, by disproving the facts which had produced them.

Spallanzani frequently discovered what before would have been considered impossible. In 1793, he again made a display of this kind, which he published in his Lettere sopra il sospetto d'un nuovo Senso nei Pipistrelli; he there informed the world that bats, deprived of sight, act in every respect with the same precision as those who possess that sense; that they avoid equally well the slightest obstacles, and know exactly the proper place to perch, when their flight is at an end. These extraordinary experiments were confirmed by several of the most distinguished naturalists, and made Spallanzani suspect a new sense in these birds, because he thought he had demonstrated, by exclusion, that their other senses were not able to supply the defect of sight; but the anatomical details of Professor Jurine, upon the organ of hearing in this singular bird, made him incline to the opinion that the ear might serve instead of the eye, as in all those cases where bats are in the dark.

Spallanzani terminated his literary career by a letter addressed to the celebrated chymist, Giobert, Sopra le piante chiuse ne' vasi dentro l'acqua e l'aria, esposte a l'immediata lume solare e l'ombra. It is a melancholy event, for this department of science, that his death deprived it of the discoveries which he was on the point of effecting.

All these productions, though printed and generally applauded, still did not form the sum of Spallanzani's labours. He had, for a long time, employed his studies on the phenomena of respiration, upon their resemblances and differences through the extensive and various circle of animated nature, and he endeavoured to reduce to some certain method his researches on this subject, which must still excite astonishment by a number of facts but little known. He left a valuable collection of experiments and observations upon animal reproductions, upon sponges, the nature of which he defines, and upon a thousand interesting phenomena, which he knew how to draw from the obscurity which enveloped them. He had almost finished his travels to Constantinople, and had collected a stock of materials for the history of the sea.

Spallanzani's reputation was equal to the number, extent, and difficulty of his labours. France, Germany, and England, were all eager to possess his works in their respective languages. He was admitted into the academies and learned societies of London, Stockholm, Gottingen, Holland, Lyons, Bologna, Turin, Padua, Mantua, and Geneva. He maintained a correspondence with the academic societies of Paris and Montpellier; he received from the great Frederic himself the diploma as member of the academy of Berlin, and maintained a direct correspondence with him. Salicetti, while commissioner in the French army of Italy, offered him the professorship of natural philosophy at Paris, which he refused, on account of his advanced age: and the college of physicians at Madrid received him into their body.

In person, Spallanzani was rather tall; his aspect serene, yet noble; his forehead large; his eyes black and sparkling; his complexion dark, and his constitution robust. During the whole course of his life he was afflicted with no disorders, if we except a fit of the ague, which he caught in the mines of Schemnitz, at a time when the season was intensely cold. In the year 1795 he was attacked by a slight retention of urine, and several fits of the gout, which, however, did not suspend, in the least degree, his scientific pursuits.

He was generally esteemed; his virtues, untinctured by austerity, displayed themselves in all the circumstances of his life. He was beloved by all his relations, whom he inspired with his own taste; his brother Nicolas, a doctor of laws, assisted him in his experiments, and continued them, when he returned to Pavia; his sister is an eminent naturalist, perfect mistress of her brother's cabinet of natural history, acquainted with the most abstruse properties of every piece, and all the refined inductions which may be drawn from them.

Spallanzani paid great attention to the education of his nephews, and had the pleasure of seeing the eldest titular professor of physic at Padua.

On the 3d of February, 1799, Spallanzani had some returns of his urinary disorder; he passed the night restless, and in the morning became delirious. His intimate friends, Tourdes, a French physician, and the celebrated Professor Scarpa, exerted every effort that genius, knowledge, and friendship, could inspire, to save him; but he died on the 6th, edifying with his piety those who were standing round his bed. His death penetrated his whole family with grief, drew tears from all his friends, filled his pupils with the deepest affliction, and depressed with sorrow a nation proud of having given him birth. The 13th, his colleague, Professor Gregorio Fontano, made an eloquent motion in the Legislative Assembly at Milan, to erect a monument to Spallanzani by the side of those of Frisi, Beccaria, and Verri.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

[A decision of a profound Jurist, respecting literary property, naturally interests every writer, from the author of superb quartos down to the humble manufacturer of such a miscellany as the Port Folio. The following is a remarkable case, recently adjudged; and the opinion of Lord Ellenborough is expressed with the nicest discrimination, and appears to be perfectly correct.]

KING'S BENCH.

CARY vs. KEARSLEY.

This was an action of damages against the defendant, who is a bookseller, for publishing as an original work, a book of the Roads in Great-Britain, a great part of which was extracted from the plaintiff's book, "Cary's Pocket Companion;" in which several roads were laid down from actual surveys made by the plaintiff and persons employed by him for that purpose.

The two books were produced in Court; and there were no less than one hundred and thirty parts of Mr. Kearsley's book alleged to be taken from Mr. Cary's; but the method and arrangement of Mr. Kearsley's book was totally different, several mistakes of Mr. Cary's first edition were corrected, and no passage could be produced which was not much enlarged upon and improved by the defendant in his book.

Lord Ellenborough, under these circumstances, was of opinion, that the plaintiff must be nonsuited; he considered that it would be fettering science and impeding the progress of the human mind in improvement, to have it considered a law, that when a man sits down to write a book on any subject, he has no right to resort to the recorded information on that subject, conveyed by the different persons who had before written on the subject. In this case the defendant had taken extracts, (and, in his opinion, he had a right so to do) from the plaintiff's book; but the arrangement and plan of the work, as well as the most important matter of it, was his own; he thought the plaintiff had not made out such a case as entitled him, by law, to recover... Plaintiff nonsuited.

THE DRAMA.

DRURY LANE.

The tragedy of ROMEO and JULIET was performed to crowded audience. Mrs. Pope was the heroine of the piece; she was received with repeated thunders of applause on her entrance. It was her first appearance on these boards, and with the additional recommendation of Mr. Pope's Romeo, she attracted many from the fashionable circles. Her performance was marked with much simplicity in all those early scenes which display a pure and ardent love: not that simplicity which may be reconcileable with feeble powers; but of the kind that flows from a just conception of the character, embellished with all the delicacy and playful innocence, so essential to the execution of a finished picture. Loud applause attended this display of taste; it became still more loud, as the interest of the scene increased with the incidents of terror which lead to the catastrophe. Here she evinced great force and energy, and gave, with true expression, all the agony of love and despair. The scene in which she swallows the potion was particularly distinguished for good acting, and excited a burst of applause from every part of the house. Indeed, in look, person, manner, and peculiar style of powers, we know not where to find so just a portrait of Juliet as Mrs. Pope, and as such she must prove a valuable acquisition to any theatre. She displayed much presence of mind in the last scene. Coming out of the tomb she dropped her dagger, and being in want of it when she should stab herself, she snatched up Paris's sword, saying, "With this sword," instead of "With this dagger," &c.

Mr. Pope, in great variety and sweetness of tones, in energy and feeling, possesses many qualifications for Romeo; but Romeo is a romantic youth; he is light, elastic, full of fire and vivacity. In a character, therefore, in which so much depends upon looking the part, the manliness and firmness, in the manner of Mr. Pope, do not allow us to expect a perfect performance. It was however, a good representation, and met with much applause. Mr. Bannister did justice to Mercutio until the dying scene, in which he trespassed rather too far upon the ludicrous. There was little to commend in the other characters, and yet nothing to give offence. In point of decorations, the piece was got up with appropriate splendour.

LEVITY.

TAKE CARE OF EVERY THING.

(FROM THE FRENCH.)

My friend, you are scarcely arrived at Paris, and you already give yourself up to all the pleasures which the capital presents; whither are you hastening at this early hour? I am going to meet two young men who have shewn me the greatest friendship, and who have promised to make me acquainted with every thing curious that Paris contains. My friend, take care of your curiosity. They have an infinite acquaintance, and they appear to be on the best terms with the principal persons of the Government, they have promised to patronise me, and to get me... My friend, take care of patrons, of men of importance, and above all, of their promises. They will take me to dine at one of the first taverns. My friend, take care of their appetite, and above all, of the bill. From that we will go to the theatre. My friend, take care of your pockets. On leaving the theatre, they will introduce me in the house of a charming woman, who, from the accounts they have given her of me, desires very much to be acquainted with me, and has already conceived a particular affection for me. My friend, take care of her desires, of her affection, and above all of the experience of your young men. They have assured me that every day there are elegant parties at her bouse; that they play at billote, and they wish to teach me the game. My friend, take care of your masters, of their instructions, and above all of your purse. They told me that I would meet a man of fortune there, who is at present under some difficulties; he wishes to borrow a sum of money; he is a man of honour, and they have made me promise to do him this service. My friend, take care of the goodness of your heart; take care of men of fortune under difficulties; and above all of borrowers. But they will give me good securities and a reasonable interest. My friend, take care of every thing that they will shew you... of every thing they say to you... take care of every body... take care of every thing... and above all take care!

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

When we advert to the present government of France, and consider the past we agree with the editor of the Boston Gazette:—"Happy it is, that the French people, after passing the ruin and disorder of ten years revolution, are again the subjects of any thing like a regular and permanent government; but happier far would it have been for them and their posterity had they remained loyal subjects under the administration of the Capets, and never listened to the syren songs of Democracy."

George Rose, Esq. an opulent member of the Imperial Parliament, is constantly aimed at by the archers of opposition. He lately narrowly escaped drowning, as he was crossing the Thames, and the wits remarked, "Rich as George Rose was supposed to be, it appears, from his Thames expedition, that he is not able to keep his head above water."

They who are afraid of "the flatulence of tea," or of the morbid watchfulness which strong coffee often produces, will read the following, and fancy that a more wholesome breakfast is discovered. "A Salutary Breakfast.....Le Roe's English Coffee. This Coffee, which is a balsamic of the most excellent nature, extracted from the choicest aromatic plants and herbs, and from the most salubrious barks, has, during an experience of near fifty years, established its extraordinary efficacy in consumptive habits, and proved itself one of the greatest restoratives and preservatives of health ever yet discovered. It has also the sanction of many eminent men of the faculty, particularly of the late Dr. Fothergill, who prescribed it in consumptive and nervous complaints, as well as in coughs of long standing, asthmas, tremors, palpitations of the heart, &c. It is much recommended to those of weak constitutions, with whom tea does not agree, as it is more nourishing than sago and jellies, and will not offend the most delicate stomach. It is to be taken for breakfast, as tea or foreign coffee, and is very pleasant to the palate. Sold, by appointment of the proprietor, in canisters, price 2s. and 9d. each, duty included, by Mr. Newbery, No. 45, St. Paul's."

The following will edify every indigent bachelor. In the treasury of one of the Kings of Persia was found a vase, with the following lines, inlaid in letters of gold. One cannot but smile at the turn, in which is an equal proportion of philosophy and humour:—"He who has no wealth has no credit; ...he who has not an obedient wife has no repose; ...he who has no offspring has no strength; he who has no kindred has no supporters; and he who has none of these, lives free from care."

Many have read in the English Journals, of the Pigot Diamond, a gem of extraordinary size and lustre. We have just had an account of its sale at auction. "Yesterday the sale of the Pigot Diamond drew a very numerous and fashionable company to CHRISTIE'S rooms in Pall Mall. The sale of so rare an article gave CHRISTIE an opportunity of exerting those powers of eloquence and poetic fancy in which he is so liberally gifted. The oratory of his pulpit, of a kind hitherto unnoticed by the critics, indeed, is very fairly entitled to that honour. Mr. CHRISTIE said, that it had often been his lot to present to the public articles of great antiquity, valuable in the estimation of some for the various properties and merits they possessed, but which not unfrequently were unseemly to the eye, and repulsive to the ordinary observer. This article, however, could boast of as high an antiquity as any the most rare production which ever attracted the attention of the curious, or challenged the regards of those who studied the works of nature. In this the choicest powers of nature had been at work since the first of time to perfect a gem than which the mines never produced a finer specimen to dazzle the admiring universe, and to embellish the lustre of beauty and grandeur. Unfortunate, indeed, were the owners of this jewel of high price in its being brought to a market where its worth might not be sufficiently valued, where the charms of the fair needed not such ornaments, and whose sparkling eyes outshone all the diamonds of Golcondah. In any other country the Pigot diamond would be sought as a distinction where superior beauty was more rarely to be found.

These animated sallies heightened the zeal of competition, and after a good deal of bidding the Pigot Diamond was knocked down to PARKER and BIRKETTS, Princes street, for 9500 guineas.

We know not whether the French soldiers find the ladies less kind after the toils of war and battle than the soldiers of this and other countries, but suicide for love has lately been rather frequent among the troops. After Buonaparte had reviewed two regiments at Malmaison on Wednesday last, he published general orders for the day, and taking notice of the death of a grenadier who had put an end to himself for love, reminds the troops "that they ought to know how to subdue their passions, that they ought to bear the sufferings of the mind with as much fortitude as the firing of a battery, and that to give themselves up to grief, and commit suicide, for the purpose of getting rid of it, is to abandon the field of battle before the day is won."

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

By a glance at the reluctant rhyme of R. we are convinced that he toils like a blacksmith, at his anvil of poetry. The Muse does not visit him unbidden. We can see him at his ungracious task, when he is defrauded in his vain hope of the bright thought, and the lucky expression.

"Et in versu faciendo,

"Sape caput scaberr, vivas et roderet ungues."

Our Norfolk friend has well translated the French stanzas, in our 35th number, "Profitez bien, jeunes fillettes." We see no objection to the measure he has adopted. The burden of each stanza is neatly turned.

Adieu panniens, vendages sons faites.

"An impatient Subscriber" at New-York, instead of the customary invocation, addresses the Editor reproachfully, with "Dilatory Sir," and after reminding him of the tardy appearance of the Port Folio, exhorts him to read an essay on Procrastination. The Editor is more flattered, than molested by this sarcasm. As it implies an eagerness to read his lucubrations, however late, or however lazy, all the harshness and the acidity of reproof becomes dulcified by this delicious infusion of flattery to an author. But, seriously, if our correspondent will advert to the general sickness and general sorrow which have recently saddened the city, his benignity will be copious of excuses for our neglect. At the end of the year, neither he, nor any other friend, who has subscribed for this paper, shall have a right to complain of our promises violated, or our files broken. If the Editor has fled from his pen and his press, and forsaken infected streets for ".....Healthy wilds, and scenes as fair

As ever recompensed the peasant's care," even the indulgence of this such a rural vagary, even this truant assumption of the right to wander, may prove ultimately useful. Those who are in training for a robust exercise of their powers, generally feast themselves for a short season with the cates of indulgence, and when it becomes necessary to task their alertness, they recede a short distance.....only to bound forward with greater vigour.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. DACTYL AND COMEDIA.

[A dashing blade, of a neighbouring sea port, finding himself in a state of Impecuniacy, has wisely determined to mend his affairs by leaving every scene of his former pleasures, and taking a trip to the "North West." He called at our shop the other day, and requested us to weave him a "Farewel," suitable to the occasion. We gave the outlines to our oldest journeyman, a reformed rake, formerly a dissenting preacher: and having been requested by the same blond to make it public, you have it here with.]

Cambridge, Sept. 10, 1802.

THE BUCK'S FAREWEL,

IN A LETTER TO HIS FRIEND ON THE DAY OF HIS DEPARTURE FOR THE NORTH WEST COAST, AND CHINA.

Farewel, dear Jack, I bid you now adieu,
'Tis the last letter I shall pen to you :
Twice twelve dull months around my head must roll,
Seas intervene and threatening tempests howl,
'Ere I behold my much loved country more,
Or press with eager steps my natal shore.
On the frail bark 'tis doomed I cross the seas,
Bear the rough storm or fly the beneath the breeze,
To where the savage on our western shore,
Echoes his war-whoop with a hideous roar,
Where China's cities spread o'er all the plain,
And wide canals branch out into the main,
I go ...from home-born scenes which ever please,
And all delights, to tempt the boisterous seas ;
Yet as we sail, how oft will fancy pour
Her fairy shade o'er the reflecting hour,
Display the pleasures of the crowded mall,
The splendid play-house or the magic ball.
And must I go and leave these joys behind,
Give all my pleasures to the "fleeting wind."
No more to Cornhill lounge with easy air,
To catch the glance and simper of the fair.
No more to each, my careless curls to shew,
Pull off my hat with many a well tim'd bow—
In this dull voyage no fair I have to please
Save the rough Squaw or dusky Tiamese.
Thro' the cool mall no longer shall I stray,
As healthful breezes close the sultry day,
View the gay crowd of pleasure's votaries there
Offer to health and joy their evening prayer,
See the fair belle trip lightly down the green,
While staring loungers on each post are seen,
Not Beauty's self has power their hearts to move,
Thee Idleness, 'tis thee alone they love.
Shall I no more when Summer holds her regin,
Leave the dull town and course the dusty plain :
At thy hotel, O Wyeth, no more alight,
Where Fresh Pond breaks romantic on the sight ;
Thy cooling punch no more with rapture sip,
Or raise the well cream'd strawberry to my lip,
Or play at bowls inspired by punch or wine,
And victor, win each time at five, seven, nine,
While on each side applauding fair ones stand,
And praise the unerring trueness of my hand.
So erst, at Grecian games, the chariot flies,
Loud creaks the wheels, the dust ascends the skies,
The well train'd beast obedient to the yoke,
Feels the sharp lash and flies beneath the stroke ;
'Mid the fair nymphs the conquering hero stands,
And takes the laurel from their snowy hands.
At the play-house shall I no more appear,
Where wit draws mirth, and suffering worth a tear ;
In the stage box no more with smiles, survey
The crowded house—and now and then the play,
Shall I no more at dull tea parties sit,
Hand round the tea cups and display my wit ;
While listening prudes applaud the tales I tell,
And envious slander cries—"I thought so—well."
* * * * *
Shall I no more when winter chills the ground,
And whit'ning snow-drifts spread the country round,

Snap the shrill whip in the warm bear skin sleigh,
As the fleet courser treads the well beat way.
No more to Wells's drive with dashing air,
Drink the warm beverage or the coffee share.
To thy hall, Porter, shall I no more go,
Where trips the belle and lightly moves the beau,
Down the alluring dance in rapture move,
Press the fair hand and whisper vows of love :
Debarred these pleasures, can I live resigned
"Nor cast one longing lingering look behind."
Shall I no more to Sulien's bend my way,
When night's black vapours chase the light away,
Where erst the circling wine my soul inspired
To Blood like feats and all my courage fired.
When the Old South resounds the mid-night hour,
And all, but Bucks, are lock'd in Sleep's dark power.
Shall I then stalk the lonely street no more,
And tear the knocker from the bounding door :
Or should a Governor his breath resign
Put in deep mourning every Cornhill sign,
These joys I quit, and when the spicy gales
Blow from the shore and fill our spreading sails,
Tho' India's odours scent the teeming air,
"I cannot but remember such things were."
Through want of cash alone, dear Jack, I fly
To distant climes and a less healthy sky ;
Yet though at present from this land I rove,
And quit each object of my former love,
That friend enlivening hope, still hovers round,
Will still attend me on each foreign ground,
With magic hand will point to Boston's shores
Where yielding commerce all her riches pours,
And fondly whispers—I shall soon behold
Each well known friend and taste each joy of old,
Again shall strut the moonlight mall—Again
Lash the tired courser o'er the dusty plain :
Again in Balls each graceful charm display ;
Nor want of Cash, shall force me more away.

[Some of our papers have hinted at the amours of a certain great personage, which are said to be of a dark complexion. In the language of poetry, there are "jetty loves," as well, as "rosy loves," and Cupid sometimes pierces a black heart. If, according to the elegant proverbs of Dr. Franklin, "a man may kiss his cow," surely a Philosopher may kiss his wench. The following from an eastern paper is witty and poetical.]

A SONG

SUPPOSED TO HAVE BEEN WRITTEN BY THE SAGE OF MONTICELLO.

Et etiam fusco grata colore Venus. OVID.
And Venus pleases though as black as jet.

Tune Yankee Doodle.

OF all the damsels on the green,
On mountain, or in valley,
A lass so luscious ne'er was seen
As Monticellian Sally.

Yankee doodle, who's the noodle ?

What wife were half so handy ?

To breed a flock, of slaves for stock,

A blackamoor's the dandy.

Search every town and city through,
Search market, street and alley ;
No dame at dusk shall meet your view,
So yielding as my Sally.

Yankee doodle, &c.

When press'd by loads of state affairs,
I seek to sport and dally,
The sweetest solace of my cares
Is in the lap of Sally.

Yankee doodle, &c.

Let Yankey parsons preach their worst—
Let tory Witting's rally !
You men of morals ! and be curst,
You would snap like sharks for Sally.

Yankee doodle, &c.

She's black you tell me—grant she be—
Must colour always tally ?
Black is love's proper hue for me—
And white's the hue for Sally.*
Yankee doodle, &c.

What though she by the glands secretes ;
Must I stand shil-I shall-I ?
Tuck'd up between a pair of sheets
There's no perfume like Sally †
Yankee doodle, &c.

You call her slave—and pray were slaves
Made only for the galley ?
Try for yourselves, ye witless knaves—
Take each to bed your Sally.

Yankee doodle, whose the noodle ?
Wine's vapid, tope me brandy—
For still I find to breed my kind,
A negro-wench the dandy !

THE STORM.

ON the lone cliff, that hides its savage brow
Within the bosom of each threat'ning cloud,
I listen'd for the ship-bell's sound,
The merry seaman's laugh, the labouring oar ;
I look'd for vales, with blooming flowrets crown'd ;
But all were fled. The wind blew cold and loud ;
No foot-step mark'd a wanderer on the shore,
The waves with anger rent the rock below.
Shivering I saw the tumbling bark a wreck,
Sink 'midst the fury of the boiling waves,
Poor hapless sailors' cold untimely graves,
Their knell the sea-birds' melancholy shriek.
Perhaps some female at this very hour,
Chill'd by the grasp of fear, upraids the wind,
And racks with busy thought the brooding mind,
As on the window beats the midnight show'r.
But half the world unknown to thought or care,
Secure in costly domes, lie hid in sleep,
Deaf to the moanings of the troubled air,
Or shrieks of death that issue from the deep.

ORIGINAL PAPERS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO. THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

No. XXXIII.

..... Arcades ambo
Et cantare pares, et respondere parati. VIRGIL.

Both young Arcadians, both alike inspired
To sing and answer as the song required. DRYDEN.

Yesterday, just as I was falling asleep after dinner, not without a hope that I might dream of a Lounger, the penny post brought me the following letter, and they, who know my aversion to write, will easily imagine how it soothed my laziness, to receive a gratuitous essay.

"Verba, et preterea nihil.".....

MR. SAUNTER,

In "The American Lounger," No. 31, we had the pleasure to find that a shop, or "Ware-house," has been opened at Cambridge, in the COLON and SPONDIC style, by our worthy friends and "former journeymen," Messrs. DACTYL and COMMA. Feeling a natural solicitude for the success of those, who have been faithful labourers in our service, we cannot but be highly gratified that these gentlemen have commenced business under such favourable auspices as the approbation and patronage of Mr. OLDSCHOOL. From the local peculiarity of our situation, we have ever contented ourselves with attempting to amuse a part of those country readers, whom even Mr. OLDSCHOOL himself formerly vouchsafed to entertain with his productions. But, as Messrs. DACTYL and COMMA extend their commerce to le beau monde. We are happy that their shop exhibits a handsome assortment, and venture to predict they will prove themselves something more than mere Troubadours.

We shall gratefully remember the deference shown us at the head of their advertisement, and although we aspire to no higher merit than that of making and vending poetical playthings, literary gewgaws, political gimcracks, &c. yet, as you will sometimes "saunter" into their shop, should your fancy direct your choice to any articles not then on hand, they may, on application, be immediately supplied from our "Toy-Shop." Any draughts they may have occasion to make on our company will be readily recognised by our banker at the foot of Mount Pindus; and any business relative to barter or consignment may be transacted with our factor at the Hippocrene waters.

Although the intrinsic value of intellectual coin is greater than that of any other specie whatever; yet from the contempt and derision those meet with who attempt to pass it in this country, and the consequent depreciation of its current value, (not to mention the great embarrassment it suffers from frequent counterfeits,) there is but very little of it in circulation. We cannot, therefore, too much admire their method of "hammering out ideas," as such artifice is absolutely necessary to keep pace with the rest of the world; for we have often seen an idea barely sufficient to occupy five lines, malletted till it was made to spread over fifty pages.

"Crutches for lame poets," must have a rapid sale, if we may judge from the number of those lunatics, we every day see hobbling about in this part of the country, which is as much infested with them as ever Grubb-Street was in the days of Pope and Swift.

Their other articles in general will, we think, receive the approbation even of the critic, or connoisseur; but, we presume, they have several choice commodities omitted in their catalogue, in the use of which they were very lavish while with us, and which they have great skill in preparing; such as double refined essence of epic....the best superfine flour of Rhetoric, &c. &c.

We send you, Mr. SAUNTER, two poetical scraps, which are almost the only pieces of our manufacture, which have not been copied into various papers. They are the lighter effusions of our junior partner, Trochee, who, to use the phrase of Corporal Trim, is piqued at the notice taken of other pieces, which he thinks less elegant than these, and is therefore so presumptuous as to risk them at your disposal. As we have not yet published a bill of our wares, we would wish to inform the curious that we have on hand new and rare articles....such as a "system of Reviling," or the Art of Rising by Falsehood, in the manner of the learned Martinus Scriblerus, recommended by the Worcester "Farmer," and designed principally as a guide to democratic authors and editors.—A curious refractive instrument, which being applied to any subject under consideration makes truth appear like falsehood, fairness like fraud, and the faithful and enjoined performance of public duties like speculation and plunder,—constructed solely for the use of "committees of investigation."—The quintessence of the wisdom, magnanimity and political honesty of our "virtuous administration, carefully preserved in an ounce phial;—cum centum aliis of equal curiosity.

Supplicating your clemency, Mr. SAUNTER, for presuming thus far upon your urbanity, we beg leave to subscribe ourselves, as Nick Bottom, the weaver would express it, "conjunctly and severally" your most obedient servants.

ODE TO AMANDA.

Tell me, AMANDA, tell me why
I feel such deep anxiety,
When absent from thy face;
Why turn my thoughts, on rapid wing,
Back to the object, whence they spring,
And all thy beauties trace?

When once admitted to thy sight
I enjoy, with every new delight,
Thy soul-enlivening charms,
How calm, how tranquil is my breast!
Each anxious thought now sunk to rest,
No care my heart alarms.

But when the dreaded hour arrives,
That bids me lose those tender ties,
By which we conference hold;

What perturbation fills my mind,
To leave that lovely form behind,
Whose charms my heart enfold!

Then, as I turn—my steps retrace,
I yield not THEE; yet quit the place,
Thus made so dear to me;
For every breeze and murmur'ing stream,
Responsive to my fav'rite theme,
Re-echoes nought but THEE.

What, then AMANDA, can this be,
That binds my every thought to THEE,
Nor lets my fancy rove?—
The hidden cause Thou canst reveal;—
But oh, Thou wilt not—must not tell,
Because Thou know'st 'tis Love!

Grant, then, my suit, and condescend
To be my only bosom friend,
Forever and anon:—
Tho' fortune frown, and woes assail,
Tho' some applaud, and others rail,
Our joys and griefs be ONE.

T.

TO MIRA.

O MIRA! see yon blooming rose,
Among the flow'rs outspread;
The fairest blossom, sure, that blows
T' adorn the Florist's bed.

See, as some damsel wanders by
To cull the flow'rs gay,
Its graceful form attracts her eye,
And lures her steps that way.

She plucks it—tho' with fears oppress,
Lest she too bold appear:—
It sheds its fragrance on her breast,
And blush'd forgiveness there.

Then may not I still hope, my Fair,
That I shall pardon'd be;
When, with unfeign'd and pure desire,
I press my suit to THEE?

T.

TO A MIRROR.

Since still my passion-pleading strains
Have fail'd her heart to move,
Show, Mirror! to that lovely maid,
The charms that make me love.
Reflect on her the thrilling beam
Of magic from her eye,
So, like Narcissus, she shall gaze,
And self-enamoured die.

In a Saunter, through the "Vanity Fair" of this world, no one delights to loiter in the "Toy-shops" of the place, more than the LOUNGER. To enter into that of my correspondents, which is always frequented by fair customers, and is always brilliant with the play-things of fancy, will be our frequent pleasure. But, to drop the metaphor; we cordially thank our friends for their poetical favours, which we will strive to preserve in this fugitive speculation. The Lounger hopes they will not be lazy in business, but remember, with the sage Dr. Franklin, the Sancho Panza of America, that God helps them, who help themselves. We remark that these ingenious Partners, like most of our young men of letters, love to mingle political with literary truth; and we cannot refrain from expressing our high approbation of the delicate and ingenious compliment to the pure integrity of a great statesman, and an ex-secretary, whose talents, none but the prejudiced depreciate, and whose virtues have no enemy, but the liar and the coward.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

IN AMERICA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BULOW.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CONTINUATION OF PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER VII.

Error of the Abbé Raynal.—America is not more fertile than Germany.—Agriculture in Pennsylvania.

After these few considerations, upon America in general, I return again to those upon the soil of the United States in particular. The Abbé Raynal says, that it is every where bad, eastward of the Allegany. This censure is, however, too general. There is along the rivers always some, though little, good land. There are in the mountains fruitful vallies. But when the Abbé Raynal adds, that the country could not, at most, feed more than ten million of inhabitants, and would then leave nothing for exportation, it may boldly be maintained that this celebrated writer was perhaps not well versed in the important principles of agriculture. The more hands there are employed in tilling the land, the more it produces. Industrious people will render even an ungrateful soil fertile. The example of Japan and of China may prove this. The best land produces about thirty bushels of wheat by the acre, in very good years—Let us examine whether this fertility exceeds that of the most fruitful corn countries in Germany.

Near Leipzig, an acre of that country produces 17 Dresden scheffels of wheat, that is, seventeen fold. An intelligent farming gentleman, Mr. Zehntner, who owns an estate near Leipzig, and with whom I became acquainted in America, assured me of this. A Leipzig acre is but one third larger than the English or American acre, which contains 160 square rods, the rood being of $16\frac{1}{2}$ English feet. A Dresden scheffel is at least equal to $2\frac{1}{2}$ bushels. Seventeen scheffels, therefore, amount to $42\frac{1}{2}$ bushels. Deduct one third for the excess of the Saxon over the American acre in size, and there remains $28\frac{1}{2}$ bushels for the produce of a space equal to an American acre. The difference is, therefore, not very considerable.

It would remain to be examined which of the American or the European wheat weighs the most. An Englishman assured me, that the American wheat is heavier than the English. The English bushel of wheat weighs 58 pounds, and the American now and then 60. But I have spoken of 30 bushels by the acre. This is the utmost produce of the best lands, such as for instance in Kentucky. Generally speaking, 30 bushels are quite out of the question, and the produce is only of twelve. Cooper says in his book, that the produce of an acre in England is upon an average 36 bushels. Let it further be considered that in America, the land of which I now speak is entirely new, such as produces likewise enormous crops at first: in Germany, greater crops, indeed, than in America.

But in America they sow less than in Europe. In England they sow $2\frac{1}{2}$ bushels to an acre; in America only one bushel. This is an advantage. But the question is, whether in Europe the harvest would not be equally great, if the quantity of grain sowed were less. Many plants in Germany freeze, it is said, in the autumn and in the spring, and then weeds grow up in their places. But America is the true mother-country of nightly frosts in spring and autumn; the same thing, therefore, must happen there. If the grain were to be sowed earlier in the autumn, it would acquire greater strength, and thus be better able to resist the frost. It may be, however, that a greater vegetative vigour, proceeding from greater heat and moisture, and to which the sulphureous nature of the soil may likewise contribute, gives to the new sown grain a more rapid growth in America, so that it may be better able to resist the frost.

In the middle states, eastward of the Allegany mountain, the best land produces in the first harvests twenty bushels of wheat by the acre; but after a few years it must be manured and tended with extraordinary care to bring forth as much.—In some vallies, not far from the western branch of the Susquehannah, in Penns, Bald Eagle, and Buffalo vallies, they talk, indeed, of thirty bushels by the acre. But the neighbourhood of Lancaster, in Pennsylvania, is among the most fruitful parts of the Atlantic states, as it is incomparably the best cultivated. The county of Lancaster is the paradise of the United States, on this side of the Allegany; and after travelling through it, you have seen the best they can afford. This superiority is singly and solely due to the German colonists. There prevails the greatest industry; notwithstanding all obstacles, even some manufactories have arisen among the Germans, and it may be with truth affirmed, that agriculture is here carried on with more intelligence than in some, perhaps than in most, of the northern parts of Germany; the highest produce, however, is twenty bushels of wheat by the acre, which is not equal to that of the best lands in the north of Germany. In most places, even of Lancaster county, the produce does not exceed ten or twelve bushels. The crop of hay produces twenty hundred by the acre, which is equal to that of Germany. Observe, however, that they manure their meadows with plaster of Paris. This manure is generally very much in use among them; but it ruins the soil, so that after some time it will no longer produce wheat. Their meadows are all artificially watered, which they find easy, by the numerous springs arising in the hills, and which contributes to the cheerful appearance of the country. They frequently plant fruit-trees upon their fields. But Mr. Muhlenberg, an active farmer, told me that nothing grows well under them. It would be much better to enclose the fields with fruit trees, and instead of the wooden railing, which they call fences, and which are very expensive, seeing that every post costs them one fourth of a dollar, live hedges would be much preferable, and would improve the appearance of the country. Of an alternative exchange of seeds, or rotation of crops, they have no correct theory. They often sow upon the same ground wheat or rye two or three times in succession.

To the cultivation of clover they are more attached, than is yet the case in the north of Germany. These colonists originated in the south of Germany, where agriculture is carried on in higher perfection than in its northern parts however inferior the inhabitants may be to their northern countrymen in the cultivation of the mind.

The appearance of the corn, even in the district of Lancaster, I did not find to be better than in the north of Germany, in general.—Elsewhere than in Lancaster county it looked more wretchedly than I have ever seen, even in the sands of Brandenburg. Throughout New-Jersey, where, owing to the Hessian fly, they scarcely raise any wheat, the rye was scarcely three span high, shortly before the harvest. It stood at the same time so thin, that the ground was every where to be seen, and the ears were very small. In a great part of Pennsylvania, it was exactly the same; especially upon the hills covered with a gravelly loam. Barley is not at all or very little cultivated. This is true to such an extent, that one of my friends intended to make a speculation on barley, by purchasing it in the country of Brunswick, and selling it again, with very great profit to the brewers of Philadelphia.—All the barley that I saw was beneath all censure.

The advantage of sowing more thinly remains, therefore, with the Americans, in case it be really necessary to sow so thick in Germany, which is not yet proved. But this gain does not balance the $8\frac{1}{2}$ bushels, which are raised near Leipzig, by the acre, more than near Lancaster, for it amounts to little more than one bushel. I know very well that there are some examples of small spots of land close to Lancaster, which, with extraordinary tending and manuring, have produced thirty or thirty-five bushels, or even more, by the acre. But such cases are extremely rare, and if an acre of land in Germany be treated like a garden, its produce there too, will be surprizingly great.

But the advantage of sowing thin is lost again, by the multitude of pernicious vermin, and especially by the Hessian-fly, which, in Europe, is altogether unknown. They foolishly call it the Hessian-fly, though it was never seen in Hesse. They pretend that this insect came from the Hessian camp, on Long-Island.—It eats away the stem of the wheat, and has wings. It attacks not so readily the bearded wheat.

The Indian corn, which has been found upon trial, to grow very well in the north of Germany, ought to be more cultivated, and the practice of the Americans, who between the hills of the corn, which are about four feet distant from each other, plant a kind of kidney beans, or potatoes, and squashes, and thus raise too harvests upon one spot, should be imitated.

Another advantage for farming in America is the raising of a crop of buck-wheat after that of rye has been gathered in.—This, I believe, would not be practicable in Germany, where the autumns are not so warm.

(To be Continued.)

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

One of the ancients has remarked, divers of the moderns have remarked, in short it has been remarked a thousand times, but I shall remark it once more, that there is no book so full of dross but you may now and then find a solid or a sparkling passage. Even in the works of philosopher Godwin, I have at length found something, which, in the language of trade, may turn to account. It was not in his "Political Justice," however, nor in his veritable history of "St. Leon," nor in his memoirs of the melting Mary, nor in any of his Sectary sermons, but in the unparalleled adventures of "Caleb Williams," who so justly describes "Things as they are," and who is so nobly inquisitive after all useful knowledge. Mr. Godwin describes Caleb as plunged in the dungeon of a county jail. He is darkling and disconsolate. He has no books; he has no tools of trade; he has not even a plane from the joiner's shop of Rousseau. But the genius of Mr. Godwin has given his incarcerated hero a noble employment, and I quote the passage with no penurious measure of approbation.

"I found out the secret of employing my mind. I said I am shut up for half the day in total darkness, without any external source of amusement; the other half I spend in the midst of noise, turbulence, and confusion. What then? Can I not draw amusement from the stores of my own mind? Is it not freighted with various knowledge? Have I not been employed, from my infancy in gratifying an insatiable curiosity? When should I derive benefit from these superior advantages, if not at present? Accordingly, I tasked the stores of my memory, and the powers of my invention. I amused myself with recollecting the history of my life. By degrees, I called to mind a number of minute circumstances, which, but for this exercise, would have been forever forgotten. I repassed, in my thoughts, whole conversations; I recollected their subjects, their arrangement, their incidents, and, frequently, their very words. I mused upon these ideas till I was totally absorbed in thought—I repeated them, till my mind glowed with enthusiasm. I had my different employments fitted for the solitude of the night, in which I could give full scope to the impulses of my mind, and the uproar of the day, in which my chief object was to be insensible to the disorder in which I was surrounded, was no impediment to my plan.

"By degrees, I quitted my own story, and amused myself with imaginary adventures. I figured to myself every situation in which I could be placed, and conceived the conduct to be observed in each. Thus, scenes of insult and danger, of tenderness and oppression, became familiar to me. In fancy, I often passed the awful hour of dissolving nature. In some of my reveries, I boiled with impetuous indignation, and, in others, patiently collected the whole force of my mind for some fearful encounter. I cultivated the powers of oratory, suited to these different states, and improved more in eloquence, in the solitude of my dungeon, than, perhaps, I should have done in the busiest and most crowded scenes. At length, I proceeded to as regular a disposition of my time as the man in his study, who passes from mathematics to poetry, and from poetry to the law of nations, in the different parts of each single day; and I as seldom infringed upon my plan, nor were my subjects of disquisition less numerous than his. I went over, by the assistance of memory only, a considerable part of Euclid during my confinement, and revived, day after day, the series of facts and incidents in some of the most celebrated historians."—Bravo! Mr. Godwin. "O sic omnia dixisset."

At the close of his fourteenth satire, JUVENAL, after eloquently enumerating the perils which AYL-RICE encounters in quest of riches, metes, with the measure of a philosopher, a competence, with content. In the exquisite translation by WM. GIFFORD, Esq. we miss neither the energy nor the grace of the original.

Wealth, by such hardships earn'd, requires more pain,
More care to keep it, than at first to gain;
Whate'er my miseries, make me not, kind fate,
The sleepless Argus of a vast estate.
The slaves of Licinus, a numerous band,
Watch through the night, with buckets in their hand,
While their rich master, trembling, lies, afraid
Lest fire his ivory, amber, gold invade.
The naked Cynic mocks such anxious cares,
His earthen tub no conflagration fears;
If crack'd or broke, he soon procures a new,
Or, coarsely soldering, makes the old one do.—
E'en Philip's son, when in the little cell,
Content, he saw the mighty master dwell,
Own'd, with a sigh, that he, who nought desir'd,
Was happier, far, than he who worlds requir'd,
And whose ambition certain dangers brought,
As vast, as boundless as the objects sought.
Fortune, advanc'd to heaven by fools alone,
Would lose, were Prudence our's, her shadowy throne.
"What call I, then, enough?" what will afford
A decent habit and a frugal board;
What Socrates, of old, sufficient thought,
And Epicurus: these, by Nature taught,
Squar'd, by her simple rules, their blameless life—
Nature and Wisdom never are at strife.
Thou think'st, perhaps, these rigid means too scant,
And that I ground Philosophy on Want;
Take then, for I will be indulgent now,
And something for the change of times allow,
As much as Otlio for a knight requires—
If this unequal to thy wild desires,
Contract thy brow, enlarge the sum, and take
As much as two,—as much as three will make.
If yet, in spite of this prodigious store,
Thy craving bosom yawn, unfill'd, for more,
Then all the wealth of Lydia's king, increas'd
By all the treasures of the gorgeous East,
Will not content thee; no, nor all the gold
Of that proud slave whose mandate Rome control'd,
Who sway'd the Emp'rour, and whose fatal word
Plung'd in the Empress' breast the lingering sword.

It has been observed, that there is a pleasure in poetic pains, which none but poets know. COWPER describes the fondness of an author for his literary progeny, as though he were narrating the memorable kindness of a mother.

None, but an author, knows an author's cares,
Or Fancy's fondness for the child she bears.
Committed once into the public arms,
The baby seems to smile with added charms.
Like something precious ventur'd far from shore,
'Tis valued for the danger's sake the more.
He views it with complacency supreme,
Solicits kind attention to his dream;
And, daily more enamour'd of the cheat,
Kneels, and asks heaven to bless the dear deceit.

I do not feel this partial love for the unhappy children of my indiscreet brain. I am nearly as indifferent to them as the worthy ROUSSEAU was said to have been to the natural consequences of his illicit love. It is incident to me to sit down sullenly to my literary task; to execute it with extreme difficulty; and then to rise, without the smallest satisfaction. My fancy is fond of books, but it is directed to other people's books. She has very little attachment to my own. Reading is delightful; I have read till my hair is blanched, and my eyes are dim. I hope the ETERNAL SOURCE OF ALL INTELLIGENCE will still permit me to quaff long draughts of the pure fountain of literature! But writing! God help the miserable man who is obliged to wear out a thousand goose quills. Writing is really hard work, says CERVANTES, who, like myself, acquired scanty, but INDEPENDENT BREAD, by the labours of the pen, when Spain was as propitious to letters as America is now!

The poetry of the Persians still sounds in my ear, and still thrills my heart. It is truly pleasant to read the following in the numerous prose of Sir WILLIAM JONES. It will be still more delightful, if exalted into the melodious couplets of O. who appears worthy both to sing and make love, in the groves of Asia.
"While the soft gale of Malaya wafts perfume from the beautiful clove plant, and the recess of each flowery arbour sweetly resounds with the strains of the Cecilia, mingled with the murmurs of the honey-making swarms, Heri dances, O lovely friend, with a company of damsels in this vernal season; a season full of delights, but painful to separated lovers."

Ira, a lovely maiden, an inhabitant of Diarrbec, thus affectionately addresses her lover, wandering on the banks of the Tigris.

"What are the thoughts of thine heart, oh, beloved of my soul! now, whilst in the bright eye of the spring, thou wanderest through the fields of Eneni?"

"Is the image of thine Ira combined with the prospects around thee? Or do they chase her from thy bosom, like the fading shadow of a morning dream?"

"When the birds salute thee with their music, dost thou say, 'sweet are your notes! but, ah, much sweeter would they be, oh! airy warblers, were Ira at my side enjoying your delicious thrills!'"

"When thy thoughts turn back upon the crowded city, what objects do they first embrace? Do the deities of commerce rise up before thee? Do those of thy dwelling seize thy imagination, or doth the image of Ira, aloof and distinct, present itself, like the spire of the distant temple, and occupy thy mind?"

"Thy fancy rolls through the dark period of approaching years. Oh say, on whom doth it rest for the companion of thy journey? Dost thou see Ira as thy comforter? Is it her who will give to thy age the gay spirit of youth, and make thy declining sun cheery as in the morn of thy strength?"

"Oh, answer me, my beloved. With the pen of sincerity reveal thy inmost soul, and teach me whether thy flame be like the rose of the garden, or the prickly wild rose of the mountain; shall its fragrance be the balm of my life, and the blessing of my existence; or shall its thorns enter into my heart, and tear the peace of my bosom with the poignant anguish of thy perfidy?"

BOSWELL, relating a political dispute between his father and Dr. JOHNSON, has a curious conclusion.

"To-day, Dr. JOHNSON and my father came in collision. If I recollect right, the contest began while my father was shewing him his collection of medals, and Oliver Cromwell's coin unfortunately introduced Charles I. and toryism. They became exceedingly warm and violent, and I was much distressed by being present at such an altercation between two men, both of whom I revered, yet I durst not interfere.

"They are now in another and a higher state of existence; and, as they were both worthy Christian men, I trust they have met in happiness. But I must observe, in justice to my friend's political principles and my own, they have met in a place where there is no room for whiggism."

One of the Divines of the English church has told us, that if it were possible a sinner should gain admission into the kingdom of heaven, he would be very restless and unhappy there, because his evil propensities would not suffer him to be satisfied with celestial tranquillity.

ON MUSIC AS A FEMALE ACCOMPLISHMENT.

A DIALOGUE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

It is thus, you say, that we are enabled to give pleasure to others; but low, indeed, must be that ambition, which is satisfied with pleasing by mere mimicry; by putting off every distinctive property, every thing that constitutes themselves, and warbling the words of others, and running through unmeaning, inappropriate, unintelligent notes.

Every one that has fingers and a larynx, fashioned on a certain manner, is equal to this accomplishment. Neither virtue, nor talents, nor social feelings, have any power over the genuine happiness of others, or any will, usefully to exercise that power, are required in a musical performer. Ignorance of nature or science, sensuality, caprice, and folly, are all consistent with musical skill: you will say, perhaps, that they are also compatible with genius and goodness, but I doubt it.

That time, requisite to make a skilful performer, duty requires us to employ in a better manner. Genius, unexercised, undisciplined, or wasted on frivolous and momentary purposes, will languish and expire. And how deficient in true taste must she be, who knows not, or holds in contempt, every other mode of employing her precious leisure, and every other mode of entertaining her friends.

When others approach me, I am instantly engrossed by tenderness or curiosity. I meditate their features, their gestures, their accents; I am eager to see them smile, or hear them talk. To communicate my own feelings or ideas, and to receive theirs in turn. One impulse of the heart, one flash of wit, one ray of intelligence in myself or my companion, I value more than twenty oratorios.

If my companion be displeasing or improper, in any way, to converse with, yet I find abundant and profitable occupation in surveying her, in comparing and inferring from what I see or hear; or subjects spring from my own reflection, sufficient to engage my attention. Music may, indeed, be possibly, at some time, necessary to silence the impertinent and please the stupid, and then, perhaps, I might comply with it, as I do with any other debasing and luckless necessity.

R. This surely is arguing with too much rigour. You demand too much from human beings, when you oblige them to forego every pursuit, but the best, and every gratification but the highest.

L. Surely, my friend, you are in jest. It is highly proper to demand this, since by the very terms you use, compliance will merely be the adoption of the best pursuit, and the enjoyment of the highest pleasure. I am truly sensible, that music, if it be not the best, is far from being the worst of human pursuits. To spend the day at the harpsichord, is vicious and absurd, but there are other ways of spending the day far more vicious and absurd. There are a thousand books to be read; a thousand reveries to be indulged; a thousand companions to be talked to; a thousand topics of discourse and modes of action, more foolish and pernicious than eternal thrumming at an instrument. But what is hence to be inferred? May I justify an ill action in myself, by reflecting that it is possible to have been worse employed? Am I to encourage another to pursue an evil path, by reminding him of the many paths that are still more evil?

No. I ought rather earnestly to search for and recommend a better path and a better mode of conduct. Few of us are so wise, that our present conduct is not obviously hurtful or absurd, and might not, with inexpressible advantage, be changed for a different. Instead of hunting after pleas for indolence and dissipation, and thus still more perverting my taste and weakening my principles, my best interests demand that I should detect, deplore and abjure my follies and vices, and incessantly labour after higher excellence.

R. All this is abstractedly true, but I see not any useful application. We are defective creatures, and should labour to cure our imperfections, but, after all our labour, we shall be defective still. We must sometimes form a kind of compromise with our vicious habits. If a man cannot, and it often happens that he cannot, be allured from a dangerous path by the highest good, or prevail on him to give up indolence for the highest and best species of activity, I must content myself with offering to his choice a lower one. Music is better than lasciviousness or gluttony, and a man will forego the latter for the former, who will not exchange it for poetry or mathematics. To play from morn to night upon a jews-harp, is better than to loll away the year upon a sofa, to saunter it away in the street, or chatter it away at a tea-table.

L. In that I agree with you, but this surely is no vindication of music.

R. It is not. It is merely an attempt to justify the preference of music to a worse pursuit. Your feelings and mine, while looking at a player on the harp, are curiously contrasted. You are offended and grieved, because you are busy in imagining some possible mode of employing the same time better. I am pleased, because I exclaim, in secret, How much worse, more hurtfully, or frivolously, might, and probably, (all circumstances weighed together) would this creature be employed, if she had not been a minstrel! But how, let me ask, with your maxims of economy, can you reconcile yourself to so costly an instrument?

L. I told you that I did not buy it. Had I not obtained it without expense, I should not have been a player, and had I been obliged to restore it to my friend, I should have stopped short at a very early stage in my progress. Luckily for me, however, my friend's abode in New-York procured her an husband, who, shortly after marriage, carried her to Scotland, her native country. She left many things in my possession, as tokens of her love, pictures, books, and, among the rest, her favourite instrument. My pride remonstrated a little against accepting such a present, but a better motive to reluctance existed than pride. My father's frugality, if I may call it by the mildest name, would never allow me to retain, merely for the purpose of luxury, or what he deemed such, what would readily bring upwards of an hundred dollars. I could not persuade him to permit me to keep it merely in trust till my friend's return, or till I should receive her directions to dispose of it.

R. Methinks I should be glad to hear your performance. Your musical education has been so singular, that I want greatly to know the fruits of it.

L. I am not surprised at your curiosity, but I am afraid, I confess, to admit your claim. I told you what I thought of the influence of such an education, and when I reflect on what ought to be the benefits of this kind of exercise and application during five years, I am ashamed of my slow and imperfect progress.

R. Do not let that shame, that unworthy shame, govern you.

L. Unworthy, you justly call it. I cannot deliberately wish to be thought better or worse than I really am. That shall not be an obstacle.

R. Then pray make haste, and let me judge of your minstrelsy.

L. No, that can never be.

R. Never be? You alarm me. Why not?

L. Have you so soon forgotten my times and occasions? My music, I told you, is an hymn, played alone, at night, and in my chamber. How then can you expect to be an auditor?

R. And will you not for once deviate from your rule? Not to gratify a friend, who requests the privilege, not so much on account of any direct pleasure that will flow from your performance, as to judge of your skill?

L. That, truly, is a plausible argument from you, who have owned yourself without any knowledge, either practical or speculative, of the art, and to me, who have a very contemptuous opinion of my own skill. Indeed I cannot comply. It is not pride nor diffidence that hinders, but a long established belief of what is fit and right to be done, on such occasions.

R. Well, I will not importune you; but, in truth, I am the less inclined to be importunate, because I can attain the same end, more effectually, without disturbing your regularities.

L. As how, I pray you?

R. By taking post, at midnight, underneath your chamber window. You will then play, without the tremours or misgivings that the conscious presence of a stranger brings along with it. Your inspirations will be free, spontaneous, and divine. Your ditty will be heard, more flowing and more sweet at a little distance; and will borrow, from the stillness of the night, charms that noon day can never bestow.

L. What a scheme for a sober-sides like thee! A votary of love and the muses might adopt such a plan, without the blame of inconsistency; but thou—

R. You mistake, my good friend. The lover and the poet will, indeed, resort to such a scene, but not as listeners. They will bring their pipe or string, their elegy or ode, along with them, and lay claim to the homage of attention; but I shall come only with a view to being instructed or delighted by another. I hope you will not disappoint me, by playing in a lower key, or by shutting your windows.

L. No. I have declined obliging you immediately, not through affectation, not through pride or diffidence, and, therefore, shall not be displeased with any scheme for reconciling your wishes with my scruples—But why lose we thus the precious time in prating. Do you not mark the farewell beam trembling on the very topmost leaves of those pines? Let us move to an higher window, whence the sun's last gleamings may be seen. I would rather join with you in watching and admiring the descent of a Summer's sun, than in settling the dignity and value of a solo or a concert.

R. I am not quite of your opinion, for—

L. Nay, I will not stay to argue with you. Don't you see? The sun will be set before you have gotten half through your syllogism. Let us begone this moment.

R. Go, then, I will follow you.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

[Justice is administered with no less purity in the colonial dependencies of Great-Britain, than in the Courts of Westminster Hall. The following curious report is extracted from "The Government Gazette of Madras." The case originated from a personal insult and injury, arising from the arbitrary exercise of a well known custom among mariners when they have on board an ill-fated passenger, who has never crossed the line. The argument of the Counsel for the prosecutor, and the opinion of the learned recorder must satisfy every well governed mind. The sailor is usually a generous, nay an amiable character. He has a tear for pity, and a heart, open as day to melting charity. But when from a ridiculous precedent, he assumes the right of drenching with filthy water and shaving with a jagged blade, it is right and decorous that this Tarpaulin tyranny be overthrown by the Laws.]

Lately came on to be tried in the Honourable the Court of Recorder of Bombay, before Sir William Syer, Kt. Recorder, Edward Atkins, Esq. Mayor, and Alexander Adamson, Esq. Alderman, a cause wherein Nathaniel Castleton Maw was Plaintiff, and Charles Learmouth and others, Defendants.

This was an action of assault and battery brought by the plaintiff, a Lieutenant on the Military Establishment at Bombay, against the defendants, two of whom are Officers, and the rest Seamen of the ship Scaleby Castle of that port.—The case was as follows.

When the Scaleby Castle on her passage from England to Bombay crossed the line, the Sailors according to custom insisted that the whole of the Passengers, should undergo the ceremony of Shaving and Ducking. The plaintiff being averse to the Ceremony, declared he would do his utmost to resist it, at the same time offering to purchase his exemption, but his offers were refused, and he was compelled to submit to the operation.

Mr. Threipland for the plaintiff, in a very able speech which occupied the attention of a crowded Court for upwards of an hour and an half, after making many ingenious observations on this absurd custom, which was "much more honoured in the breach than the observance" said, that if the proceedings on board the Scaleby Castle on the 28th of September 1801, had been kept within reasonable bounds, had Neptune, as he was called, and his attendant deities confined themselves to throwing a few Pails-full of their own Element about the ship, or exacted any moderate fine or forfeit from those who were landmen enough to prefer the comforts of a dry skin, these proceedings would never have been the subject of complaint, but when amusement degenerates into brutality, when under colour and pretext of sport, proceedings take place revolting to every man of common sense and feeling, when young Gentlemen, passengers on board a merchant vessel, and intitled to respect and attention, are not suffered to purchase their exemption from injury and outrage, but are forced at the point of naked cutlasses to submit to both, it was high time for the country to interfere and to teach those who were ignorant of it before, that it extends its protecting arm to those who travel by water, as well as those who journey by land.

Mr. Threipland then drew the attention of the Court to the character and general conduct of his client, insisting that in proportion as his mind and manners, his habits and his rank in life intitled him to respect and attention, in that proportion was the aggravation of the injury of which he complained.

He then described the treatment his client had met with, and which was the subject of the action.—It appeared that the plaintiff had made repeated offers both of Money and Spirits to the men, on condition that they should not molest him, and finding these offers contemptuously rejected, shut himself up in his Cabin, which he barricaded in the best manner he was able, and took the further precaution of lowering his port, to prevent intrusion from without.—A gang, however, whose characters had been previously cast, began attempting to force open the Door, but not succeeding in this so easily as they expected; they all, with one accord, went on Deck, as if for further orders—accordingly, Mr. Raymond, the 3d Mate desired some of them to go below and take the door off the hinges, and suggested that others might get in at the port; while one party went down with the Carpenter for the first of these purposes, a Sailor of the name of Edwards was let down the side of the Ship, brandishing a naked Cutlass in one hand, while he held a Bludgeon in the other. By the assistance of the latter Weapon, the Plaintiff's port was lifted up, and Edwards stretching the arm which held the Cutlass into the Cabin, made thrusts in every direction, which the Plaintiff for some time parried with his Sword, but abstained from doing Edwards any injury.—He at length got into the Cabin, his associates at the same instant rushing in at the door, they then pressed round the plaintiff, wrested his Sword from him, and dragged him upon deck—There he clung for some time to the post of the Cuddy door, and seeing no hopes of protection, but the contrary, from the 1st and 3d Mates who were upon deck, called out for the Captain of the ship, but from the tumult of the moment, and from the circumstance of the door of his apartment being shut, he heard nothing as he afterwards declared of this appeal to his protection, which otherwise there could be no doubt from his disapprobation of the proceedings, when informed of them, would not have been made in vain.

Such was now the agitation of the plaintiff's mind, that he actually made an attempt to escape from farther outrage by throwing himself overboard, and would have effected his fatal purpose but for the active humanity of a Friend—He was at length dragged along the Quarter Deck to the Waist, and forcibly fix'd in a Boat half full of filthy water, his eyes were bandaged with a dirty Napkin, a nauseous composition of Tar and Pitch was rubbed over his face, and taken off again by means of part of a rusty hoop partaking more of the nature of a Saw, than of a Razor—He was then pushed back with violence into the Boat, and there held struggling for some seconds with his head under water.—In consequence of this treatment the plaintiff was so ill as to require the assistance of the ship's Surgeon.

Evidence was adduced in support of the Plaintiff's Case.

Mr. Dowdeswell for the defendants observed that no particular injury was proved to have been done to the plaintiff, that the other passengers voluntarily underwent the ceremonies of the day, and considered them as a joke. The Custom had so long prevailed, that if it did not justify the Defendants, it would be trusted exempt them from the payment of large damages. General notice had been given by Captain Gardiner that if any Passenger disliked to partake of the pastimes of the day, he might go into his, Captain Gardiner's, Cabin.—The plaintiff instead of availing himself of such protection, had come upon deck armed with a Cutlass and Pistols, bidding defiance, by such defiance, he had brought the Injury, if he could be said to have suffered any, upon himself.—It was the character of British Sailors to revolt at such defiance.—In respect to the two Mates, Mr. Learmouth and Mr. Raymond, they were mere passive Spectators, and had not to answer for a neglect of duty to a superior Officer.

Mr. Dowdeswell then stated some further Circumstances in extenuation of the conduct of his Clients, and in Mitigation of Damages.

The Recorder in delivering Judgment, said, the Court highly approved of the Plaintiff's conduct in bringing the present action. When the Indulgence of one man's mirth is made the Medium of Violence or Injury to another, it was highly proper, that it should be restrained—something had been said of justifying or at least extenuating the proceedings complained of on the ground of custom and usage, but he hoped it never would be supposed that that Court would entertain the Idea, that custom or usage, could legalize or justify oppression or Injustice of any kind. The proceedings in the present Instance had been carried much beyond even former usage. It did not indeed appear that the plaintiff suffered greater Violence than the other Gentlemen, or that he received any very important personal injury, but the Dirt and filth to which he was subjected, was extreme in the highest degree, and added to Injury, the greatest insult to the feelings of a Gentleman.

The Court were of opinion that the charge was brought home to the Defendants Learmouth and Raymond, it was sufficient that they were privy to, and present, and concurring in the general design.

With respect to the other Defendants, the Court saw no reason to acquit any of them, they all seemed to have formed part of Neptune's Gang, and to have taken more or less active parts in the transaction.

The Recorder lamented that the Defendants were so numerous; encouraged by their officers, the blame imputable to the men was comparatively small, but on that ground the Court could not sever the Damages, or apportion them to any particular person's guilt.—The Damages given must be entire. The Plaintiff might however do, what the Court could not, he might levy them on which of the Defendants he pleased, leaving it to them to call on the others to contribute their proportion, so that the Damages would ultimately fall where they ought.

With respect to the Quantum, the Defendants did not appear to be in a situation to pay very heavy damages, it was however proper that the plaintiff should be reimbursed all the expenses of his suit, and that the Damages should not only be sufficient for that purpose, but such as marked the disapprobation of the Court of the proceedings of the Defendants, and would prevent a repetition of similar practises in future.

The Court gave the Plaintiff 400 Rupees damages.

THE FINE ARTS.

[We give the following a place in the Port Folio, because it is tributary to the Genius of OPLE and WEST; and because it seems to be the opinion of some that "it is an object of the highest patriotism to protect the Fine Arts."]

ROYAL ACADEMY.

On Saturday the Royal Academy gave their grand preliminary dinner. It was honoured by the presence of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Orleans and his brother M. de Calonne, and a number of distinguished foreigners, beside an unusually great assemblage of our own nobility and public characters, who were in full dress, and decorated with their several orders of knighthood. We were pleased to see Mr. Addington and Lord Hawkesbury among the guests, as likewise Lord Holland, Mr. Gray, Mr. Whitebread, and others of the leading members of opposition. It is an object of the highest patriotism to protect the fine arts, without the cultivation of which, all the boasted manufactures of England would speedily decline; and the Minister cannot render a more useful service to his country, than to repair the criminal neglect of his predecessor.

We can only for this day give a coup d'œil of the Exhibition. The first impression on the eye is extremely fascinating, by the harmony which reigns in the disposition of the pictures, and the judicious contrast of the colours throughout. In this respect the Council have merit; and we are happy to say that the first effect of the display is not diminished by a nearer and more critical inspection. It has the usual mercantile character of our school by abounding in portraits; but it is with infinite pleasure that we observe a spirit of improvement the most promising, and particularly among the younger artists. The tone of colour is chaster, the principles of drawing seem to be better understood, and there is less of that taudry glare and fluttering theatrical manner which used to disgust the eye of taste.

Mr. Lawrence stands eminently at the head of the portrait painters in this exhibition. His Lady Templeton is a most beautiful picture; Mr. Erskine, Earl Cowper, Lady Exeter, the Princess of Wales, Lady Cunningham, &c. are also elegant specimens of his art, and are in a tone of more chaste and sober purity than heretofore.

Mr. Opie stands alone at the head of the History Painting. It is greatly to the credit of this distinguished Academician that his love for the Arts supersedes his selfish attention to practice; and that with the grandest power of giving identity and character to portrait, he aspires to the grander powers of painting, and makes his canvass the source of moral emotion and of classical taste. In this exhibition he has a variety of most interesting subjects. It is difficult to say, from a transient view, which of his productions is entitled to the palm of excellence. His Riggah watching by the bodies of Saul's Sons; or the discovery of the clandestine correspondence, which we think his best piece, but it is possible that the amateurs may discover in his other works beauties at least equal to these. They will certainly discover that if he chose to give his mind and powers to portrait, that he could not merely animate the face by the most perfect delineation of the features, but endue it with the character and soul of the original. In his portraits of Miss Alderson and of Miss Talbot, there is the graceful softness of female beauty with the truth and certainty of real likeness.

Mr. Shee has a number of very fine Portraits. The Duke of Leinster is, in our mind, the best. We lament that an artist of such superior mind will not employ his powers to better purposes.

Mr. Hoppner, we lament to say, has only one picture—the Portrait of a Cook Maid. We know not whether he designs this piece as a playful and harmless kind of satire; but we are sure that every genuine admirer of the Arts would have been gratified to see him preserve his usual rank in the Exhibition.

Mr. West has nothing very splendid in the rooms, his small works have their usual beauty. The Paddington Passage Boat is his best.

Sir William Beachy has a number of Portraits, and among others, a portrait of the Princess Augusta under an umbrella. It is a whimsical idea well executed.

Sir George Beaumont has enriched the Academy with some delightful Landscapes. If such men could be drawn within the vortex of a Pic Nic, it will be brought to rival the regular artists of a profession—but it is only once in a century that our amateur arrives even at mediocrity in an art.

Mr. Nollekens has displayed his superior art in a Bust of the Duke of Bedford, of Mr. Fox, and in several other subjects. They are the best productions in the class of sculpture for the year.

Mr. Westall has a number of drawings, and one or two paintings, in his usual stile of delicate and glittering art.

Mr. Louthenbourg and Sir F. Bourgeois have each a specimen or two of their Landscapes; and

Mr. Daniels has some East India Scenery in his usual beautiful stile.

Mr. Davis occupies the principal space in the Great Room with the representation of the Hostage Princes of Mysore, which are said to be Portraits. The picture promises, from its size, more than it performs. The figures are too minute to have character or interest.

In Miniature Painting, Mr. Kelly is, as he constantly has been, advancing in his art to perfection; and Mr. Bone in Enamel has no competitor. Mrs. Wheatley has several most delightful specimens of her improved ability, particularly a Portrait of Mr. Wheatley from memory, which speaks as much for the tenderness and constancy of her affection as the talent of her pencil. Mr. J. R. Smith has several Portraits of the most perfect identity, particularly of Mr. Fox, Lord Holland, Dr. Saunders, &c. Nothing can be more striking than their likenesses.

Upon the whole the Exhibition will be found to contain more specimens of merit than have been seen for some years, though it also contains a number of pictures that ought to have been excluded.

THE DRAMA.

The Tragedy of The Distressed Mother which was performed at Drury-Lane Theatre, presented Mrs. Siddons in the character of Hermione, and Mr. Kemble in that of Orestes. With such powerful support, this play must maintain as high a rank as it is, perhaps, capable of attaining in the scale of dramatic performance. Love, jealousy, and madness, constitute the prevailing features of these two characters, in the delineation of which the Author has left vast room for the taste and judgment of the performer. Indeed, in the representation of madness, this is necessarily the case, because the look, the gesture, and the wildness, its principal ingredients, are exclusively the actor's, and a few incoherent sentences are all the Author can possibly supply.—It was in this arduous part of the character, Mr. Kemble last night displayed unrivalled excellence. Nothing can be conceived more beautiful than the whole scene, from the commencement of his frenzy to his final exit. No words can describe the anguish, sorrow, and despair, so forcibly expressed in his countenance, in the long, silent pause, that succeeds the reproaches of Hermione, for the death of Pyrrhus, to which she had urged him. The progress of his frenzy was marked and delineated by the same masterly force and discrimination to its conclusion, when, quite exhausted by its furious workings, he sinks lifeless into the arms of his attendants.—The applause was loud and incessant through this whole scene, in which the actor seemed to rule and direct the feelings of the audience with resistless sway. There is a dignity in the countenance and deportment of Mrs. Siddons happily suited to the character of Hermione. Pride and jealousy are also passions peculiarly adapted to her powers. Her representation of this proud and jealous Princess was, as has been often witnessed, a most exquisite piece of acting. Her "Is Pyrrhus slain?" could not be excelled, and was only equalled by the "Am I awake? where am I? Soft, my soul."

Mrs. Powell was interesting in Andromache, and played the part with truth and feeling. The other characters were well supported. The piece was got up with all that attention to costume and characteristic embellishment which might be expected, as it has been always experienced from a manager of such pure and classic taste as Mr. Kemble. Notwithstanding it had to contend with the disadvantages of the twelfth Night, it drew an elegant and numerous audience.

Mr. Cooke performed Lear in the celebrated Tragedy of that name at Covent-Garden Theatre. It is a character little suited to his talents. In the expression of strong and turbulent passions, he will always find his forte; but he wants gentleness and softness for melting and melancholy scenes. Whatever, therefore, may be his excellence in the ambitious and heroic Richard; those who have duly weighed his peculiar powers could not expect much from his representation of the broken-hearted Lear. No principle can be more clear, than that cruelty and ingratitude are black in proportion to the weakness and helplessness of the object on which they are exercised. The great master of the human heart accordingly makes this good old King represent himself as a man standing upon the last verge of life—a man "eighty years old and upwards." It is from turning such a man as this out of doors, and by his ungrateful children, too, to "bide the pelting of the pitiless storm," that the interest principally arises. In this line, so clearly marked by the poet, Mr. Cooke shewed a total want of discrimination. His step was almost uniformly firm, and his whole deportment too vigorous for his years. The heart, therefore, could not feel that pity which the sight of a deserving object, physically unable to contend with unmerited hardships, never fails to produce. His enunciation also, which was clear and strong, had none of the tremulousness of feeble old age, and his voice seldom succeeded in the modulation of tones sufficiently plaintive and delicate to express the agonies of a broken heart. The scene where he imprecates a curse upon the ungrateful Goneril was given with energy, but without that anguish which must wring a parent's bosom in such a situation. The mad scene with Edgar was also a very imperfect piece of acting, and few of the beautiful passages with which the piece abounds, received that exquisite colouring and embellishment with which Mr. Kemble in the same character calls down such plaudits in the other house. Mr. Cooke having so evidently placed himself in the way of comparison, this allusion cannot be deemed invidious.—This new essay should, however, make him slow to venture beyond his depth, and justifies our apprehension that he does not possess an elasticity of mind, a pliancy of powers, to enable him to pursue his rival through all the variety of his characters with the same success that he encounters him on Bosworth field.

Mr. H. Siddons was an excellent Edgar; his mad scenes displayed much chaste and natural acting, and several passages were marked with beauties peculiarly his own. His representation of the character would be still more interesting, were he to infuse into his manner more fondness for his mistress, Cordelia, and his unfortunate father, the Earl of Gloucester. Miss Murray, whose excellence in characters of simple pathos is so well known, was a most interesting portrait of Cordelia. She played the part with great delicacy and feeling, sweetness, and simplicity.

Mr. Hull, in Gloster, was natural and impressive; and Mr. Waddy, though a little coarse as Earl of Kent, was a good picture of blunt honesty in his humble disguise as Caius. The other characters did not possess much merit, or deserve much notice.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FROM THE TOY-SHOP OF

MESSRS. VERBAL AND TROCHEE.

During the civil commotions, incident to revolutions in any country, literary pursuits are mostly suspended and the progress of the Arts and Sciences interrupted. In France, we know, this has not so generally been the case, for she has had her Institute, and her learned men in most departments of Literature; but we fear their influence has been directed more to the propagation of their modern vain philosophy and deistical romance, than to the cultivation of sound principles and solid learning.

The return of peace, though it has given Bonaparte a stretch of power but little favourable to "suffering humanity," and the liberty of Europe, seems also to have given an excitement to improvement, and a more favourable aspect to Literature. When we see the conductors of the press turning their attention from those bewitching novels and romances, which are calculated only to heat the imagination and poison the fancy, without mending the heart or enlightening the understanding—to the publication and distribution of the ancient Classics, and the productions of the distinguished English authors, we consider it as the surest evidence of the revival of true taste and just sentiments.

In Paris Didot has made considerable improvement, in adopting Stereotype Printing, (or printing on immovable types,) by which he is enabled to sell neat editions of the Latin Classics and English authors, at the very low price of seven pence half-penny per copy. Among the former we are happy to notice an edition of Virgil, Horace, Salust, Ovid, &c. and among the latter, Sterne's Sentimental Journey, Lady Montague's Letters, and Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield.

A periodical work is published monthly, at Paris, intitled Bibliothèque Francoise. It is edited by M. Pougens, of distinguished merit as a man of letters. "The work embraces original productions and a literary review; is devoted to science, letters, and arts, and to the support of sound morals, and receives the approbation of men of every political description, both in Germany and England, as well as in France." Associated with M. Pougens, we find the names of more than thirty persons of eminent literary abilities, to a certain number of whom is allotted their appropriate department. In the department for Literature, Poetry, Drama, &c. we with the greatest pleasure recognize the name of Miss Helen Maria Williams.

From the respectability of late publications, and the known talents of many, who have espoused the cause of Learning, we think we have ground to anticipate moral and literary acquisitions honorary to France; and although the political horizon seems beclouded with portents of absolute despotism, yet there is a gleam of hope, that the inhabitants of the fairest country in Europe, which has so long been deluged with torrents of vice, immorality, and dissipation, will be, in some measure, restored to the rectitude of principle, and the better observance and exercise of moral, social, and relative duties.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

George Colman, jun. who has already amused the laughing world in his "Night gown and Slippers," intends adding to his old stock of mirth a new work, to be intitled "Broad Grins."

A new periodical paper is publishing in London entitled "Pic Nic."

Another Translation of that fascinating work, the Arabian Nights, has been made by the Rev. E. Foster. They are in five volumes, Royal Octavo, embellished with twenty-four high finished engravings in the Line manner, from pictures, painted on purpose, by Robert Smirke, R. A. As a specimen of the luxury of Literature in London, several copies of this work are printed in quarto, on the finest vellum paper and letter press in Bulmer's best manner, with proofs of the Plates on French paper. Price TEN GUINEAS in boards!

* By a late article, we are sorry to hear that the extent of Didot's undertaking is beyond the exertions of an individual; and will, at last, fail, unless patronized by the Government, or some beneficent Mæcenas.

The Right Rev. Beilby Porteus, Bishop of London, has published in two Octavo volumes, Lectures on the Gospel of St. Matthew—The Edgeworths, Hibernian authors, have published a whimsical essay on Irish Bulls, which is said to be a performance of merit and humour; and "Julietta, or the Triumph of Mental Acquirements over personal defects," will be read with complacency, by those to whom nature has denied a fair exterior, but more nobly endowed with the rich furniture of the soul.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The intense application of a First Consul may be usefully and gloriously imitated, by those who prefer Fame to Health, and who do not Propter vitam, vivendi perdere causas. Juv.

The following particulars of the First Consul's private life, are extracted from a new work of MEYER'S:—"BUONAPARTE'S day is made of 14 hours of almost uninterrupted labour. He gives very little time to sleep and recreation. His meals are abstemious and quickly finished; but he drinks a great deal of strong coffee, especially during his nightly labours. "This mode of living" said his Physician lately to him, "must ruin your health. You cannot long hold out under it." "How long do you think," said Buonaparte. "Perhaps three years or so." "Well," replied the Consul, "that is quite long enough for me." A walk in the Park, or half an hour at tennis, is his daily recreation. His natural bias leads him to avoid the crowd. His conversations, which do not turn on the great affairs of Europe and France, are extremely short. Of those trusted persons, known by the name of Favourites, he has none. He never once allows the least appearance of influence to be exercised over him. In company, he is silent and retired within himself. In the private circle of his own family, he is placid and agreeable, and never appears morose or insolent to his domestics. His behaviour to his wife is that of a Citizen, and by no means of a Parisian. Many Tradesmen in Paris call their wives Madam and you. Buonaparte thou's his, and never calls her but by her Christian name, JOSEPHINE? She calls him General, and usually thou, (tu.) Speaking of him, she says, my husband, or the General; but rarely the Consul."

The First Consul of France is about to restore the Royal Band of Music. He has his court, his Nobility, his Parliaments (under a slight variation of name, like his own authority,) his Cardinal Legate, and his Bishops. He seems to want nothing of the ancient Royal establishment, but the Confessor, which it must be owned would be a most interesting and important post in his Republic.

The London Morning Post publishes and sells daily about three thousand papers. It is doubted whether any American Gazette has such a circulation.—But Duane vaunts of 4000!

Denniston and Cheetham, Editors of the New-York Citizen, a republican paper, and yet furiously opposed to the interests of the Vice-President, whether his intents "be wicked or charitable," aver that "to his closest friends the deportment of Col. Burr is bland; to the community at large, sour and forbidding." We know not whether the distinction, made by these simple Editors, between the private and public courtesy of the Vice-President be just. We suppose it is not, for it should seem that the civility of the cunning Colonel, like that of Dryden's Absalom,

On both sides bowing, popularly low, is of so general a direction that each bystander might exclaim

* This, in French, is affectionate.

Perhaps when he smil'd upon all
I have thought that he smil'd upon me.

yet if this fancy of ours be incorrect, and we mistake the character of the Vice-President, then the very objection, made by the learned Denniston and Cheetham is highly in his favour. Shakespeare describes a personage, who at least was as ambitious as Col. Burr; and, in language not less bland, than that of D. and C.

*Lefty and sour to those who lov'd him not,
But to those men who sought him sweet as summer.*

The writer of this article would think better of Col. Burr, if the above charge be strictly true, and if it be his habit to treat the mob with austerity, it is the habit of a contemplative, and a dignified man.

The following Walpole sarcasm is a cutting reproof of the wearisome stile of the Attorney General of the United States, whose Christian name is LEVI, and who writes, in a manner somewhat lengthy and lengthy. "A witty correspondent observes that, on running over the ponderous columns of the Farmer's leaden No. Eleven, he could not refrain from stopping short before he had half perused it, and throwing it on the table, spontaneously repeated a line of Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel,

"Levi, thou art a load, I'll lay thee down."

The following parallel between two famous sons of Mars is in the best manner of PLUTARCH. We copy it, with our commendation, from a morning paper. "Buonaparte and Moreau are the two Military Colossi of the day. Such is the transcendence of their achievements and the splendour of their names, that they admit not of a comparison with any other living characters. Even Charles of Austria, though a distinguished General, bears but a secondary rank in the scale of greatness.

It is doubted by some which of the two heroes of France, should be esteemed pre-eminent in military accomplishments.—Perhaps the following remarks, founded on a recollection of the conduct of these Generals in the field, may shed some light on this controverted point:

Moreau is consummate in conducting a retreat, Buonaparte in never suffering such a movement to become necessary. To a chief who fights only to conquer, and never fails in the plan of a campaign, the science of retreat would be useless and cumbersome. Moreau is unequalled in the art of extricating an army from difficulty and danger, Buonaparte in that of never allowing his army to fall into either. Moreau can seize on opportunities as they offer, and is calculated to sustain the most obstinate conflict. Buonaparte is capable of creating opportunities and conducts his attack with such impetuosity, that victory generally declares for him before obstinacy can be displayed on the part of the enemy. Moreau, qualified to receive an attack with invincible firmness, and repel it with equal courage, possesses a happy and splendid assemblage of talents for defending his country against invading armies, but looking down on the mere business of defence, it belongs to Buonaparte alone to conquer Italy and Egypt, and bring even the empire of Germany to his feet. In battle, Moreau resembles the cliff that receives, unshaken the fury of the tempest, but Buonaparte, the impetuous thunder-cloud, whose lightning nothing terrestrial can withstand. Moreau is, indeed, a great General, and a perfect Epitome of the Art of War; but Buonaparte, the Child of Genius, the pupil of Fortune—Buonaparte superior to the discipline of Military Schools, is formed by nature for a CONQUEROR.

The annual election for state officers was lately held in Vermont. The Editor of the Windsor Gazette, in stating the votes of that place, to have been given greatly in favour of the democratic candidates, observes:—"In publishing this important transaction, we are led to a deep contemplation on the insufficiency of truth and moderation, to predominate over delusion and party zeal; and the uncertainty of all calculations, founded on the supposed discernment of "The People;" whose choice of a magistrate is almost always bad except in cases of imminent danger. In republics approaching so near a complete democracy, as that of ours, it usually happens, that in a state of national tranquillity, the wise are obliged to submit to be counselled by fools, who with vanity and presumption enough to give momentum to innate cunning and intrigue, lead "The People" whither they please, while the honest, the upright and the wise disdain to adopt the "necessary arts," and retire, with sorrow and disgust, from so dishonourable a contest."

An Irish footman having carried a basket of game from his master to a friend, waited a considerable time for his customary fee, but finding no present appear, scratched his head and said, "Sir, if my master should say, Paddy, what did the gentleman give you? what would your honour have me to tell him?"

The wags of Paris say that the ladies there show every part of their person but their face, while those beauties that used to be covered are displayed, the face is hid by a thick veil. We suppose that these elegantes show so much that they are ashamed to show their faces.

An honest and dignified writer has a just and indignant passage in one of his works, which we cannot sufficiently admire. "The Mob is a monster I never could abide, either in its head, tail, midriff, or members. I detest the whole of it as a mass of ignorance, presumption, malice and brutality; and in this term of reprobation I include all who affect its manners or court its society."

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The "retiring modesty" of B. is amiable and interesting. Dr. YOUNG, somewhere, extolling one of his diffident friends, says, in his wonted epigrammatic way,

*You decline the mistress I pursue,
Others are fond of Fame, but Fame of you.*

and B. like the pheasant, beautifully described by COWPER:

*Christian-like, retreats, with modest mien,
To the close copse or far-sequester'd green,
And shines without desiring to be seen.*

Our "Boston subscribers" are respectfully notified, that the procrastination of their papers is attributable to the recent calamity in this city. No one shall be ultimately deprived of the Port Folio; and it should be remembered by those, who exact the receipt of it on a certain day, that as it is not a newspaper, but is composed of materials not essentially fugitive, it is of trivial moment at what time it may be perused. The political events of the flying hour must be instantly contemplated, or they fade in the distance; but miscellaneous papers may be read to day or to-morrow.

We thank "Ferdinando" for his obliging offer of a translation of Ramel's narrative of his deportation to Cayenne. But we have already received the London copy. It is, indeed, "no tale told by an idiot," but an unvarnished story of that species of tyranny, which surpasses in atrocity every exercise of despotic power urged by Tiberius, or described by Tacitus. We wish it to be distinctly heard, when we say that our allusion is to the capriciously cruel TYRANNY OF A REPUBLIC.

We are happy in recognizing, once more, the hand of Asmodeo.

The gentleman who has sent us the Scottish rhymes, "on Sntac top," is thanked for a very curious article, which we have not neglected.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Norfolk, October 6, 1802.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

The following translation of the French song in your 35th Port Folio may probably not be considered as too paraphrastic.—I know not whether it will be a recommendation its being attempted in the present uncommon measure, without the claim of being doctus utriusque lingue. If you approve of this, you may give it a place in your next. J. D.

Young damsels, improve well the favourite season,
When youth and gay spirits you have in full store;
If Love's not illum'd by a spark, dropt from reason,
You can't gather grapes when the vintage is o'er.

Should your swain but betray by a glance or confession,
That you are the object he'll ever adore;
If you let others know, and deride the impression,
Adieu to the grapes, for the vintage is o'er.

When Love, by his power o'er the heart of your lover,
When as timid he wishes his vows forth to pour;
You must seize the soft moment your love to discover,

Or else look for grapes when the vintage is o'er.

But be coy, ye young handmaids, when those in high station,
Do pour forth their love, and your pity implore;
If you guide not your hearts by the rein of discretion,

You may look for the grapes when the vintage is o'er.

Distrust too, those triflers, who flutter around you,
Who want most your cash....or who wish nothing more;
If they find this to fail, they'd no longer attend you,

But let you seek grapes when the vintage is o'er.

Ye widows, when lovers are soft and submissive,
You may doubt which they want most....yourself or your store;
As soon as they're masters, you may be quite passive,

They'll let you seek grapes, when the vintage is o'er.

SELECTED POETRY.

[The following verses of the Scots poet, Hamilton, whose life you gave us in the first volume of the Port Folio, seem to exhibit an elegant sprightliness, in easy and harmonious language and numbers. The works of this amiable writer are not sufficiently known. It belongs to literary miscellanies like yours to rescue such from obscurity. The Spectator of an Addison gave life, as it were, to the languishing existence of the Paradise Lost; and the Lounger of a Mc Kenzie first introduced to the regard of the learned and the liberal the poems of Robert Burns. The "Contemplation" of Hamilton alone would entitle him to rank with those who have drank largely at the Castalian fountain. He seems to have cultivated the acquaintance of the muses generally, but Erato and Polyhymnia were his favourites. J. D.]

The following is selected not so much for its comparative excellence as for its brevity.

TO A YOUNG LADY, ON HER TAKING ILL SOMETHING
HE HAD SAID.

Why hangs that cloud upon thy brow?
That beautiful heaven erewhile serene?
Whence do these storms and tempests flow,
Or what this gust of sorrow mean?
And must then mankind lose that light
Which in thine eyes was wont to shine,
And lie obscur'd in endless night,
For each poor silly speech of mine?

Dear girl!....how could I wrong thy name?
Thy form so fair and faultless stands,
That should ill tongues abuse thy fame,
Thy beauty would make large amends:
Or if I durst profanely try
Thy beauty's pow'rful charms t' upbraid,
Thy virtue well might give the lie,
Nor call thy beauty to its aid.

For Venus, ev'ry-heart t'insnare,
With all her charms hath deck'd thy face,
And Pallas, with unusual care,
Bids Wisdom brighten ev'ry grace.
Who can the double pain endure?
Or who must not resign the field
To thee, celestial maid.....secure
With Cupid's bow and Pallas' shield?....

If then to thee such pow'r is given,
Let not the wretch in torments live,
But smile....and learn to copy Heaven,
Since we must sin ere it forgive:....
Yet pitying Heav'n not only does
Forgive th' offender and th' offence,
But ev'n itself, appeas'd, bestows,
As the reward of penitence.

[The following verses to the memory of the lamented poet Cunningham, by his friend and brother poet Ferguson, are probably not much known. They seem to be an happy imitation of the pathos, as well as of the melodious anapaests of his friend and their archetype Shenstone. J. D.]

Ye mournful meanders and groves,
Delight of the muse and her song!
Ye grottos and dropping alcoves,
No strangers to Corydon's tongue!

Let each Sylvan and Dryad declare,
His themes and his music how dear;
Their plaints and their dirges prepare,
Attendant on Corydon's bier.

The echo that join'd in the lay,
So amorous, sprightly, and free,
Shall send forth the sounds of dismay,
And sigh with sad pity for thee.

His flocks now may wander and bleat,
To hills tell the tale of their woe;
The woodlands the tale shall repeat,
And the waters shall mournfully flow.

For these were the haunts of his love,
The sacred retreats of his ease,
Where favourite Fancy would rove,
As wanton as light as the breeze.

Her zone will discolour'd appear,
With fanciful ringlets unbound,
A face pale and languid she'll wear,
A heart fraught with sorrow profound.

To him ev'ry passion was known
That throbb'd in the breast with desire;
Each gentle affection was shewn
In the soft-sighing songs of his lyre.

Like the carolling thrush on the spray,
In music soft warbling and wild,
To love was devoted each lay,
In accents pathetic and mild.

To many a fanciful spring,
His lyre was melodiously strung,
While Fairies and Fawns, in a ring,
Have applauded the swain as he sung.

To the cheerful he usher'd his smiles,
To the woeful his sigh and his tears;
A condoler with Want and her toils,
When the voice of Oppression was near.

Tho' titles and wealth were his due,
And fortune denied the reward;
Yet truth and sincerity knew,
What the goddess would never regard.

Now adieu to the songs of the swain,
Let peace still attend on his shade;
And his pipe that is dumb to his strain,
In the grave be with Corydon laid.

MARINE SONG.

Written for the Anniversary of the Liverpool (England)
Marine Society.

PUBLISHED SEPTEMBER 1799.

What is life but an ocean, precarious as those
Which surround this terraqueous ball?
What is man but a bark, often laden with woes?
What is death but the harbour of all?
On our passage to-day may be mild and serene,
And our loftiest canvass be shewn,
While to-morrow fierce tempests may blacken the scene,
And our masts by the board may be gone.

On life's rosy morn, with a prosperous breeze,
We all our light sails may display,
With a cloudless horizon may sweep at our ease,
And of sorrow ne'er feel the salt spray:
But ere we have reach'd our meridian, the gale
From the point of ill fortune may blow,
And the sun of our being, all cheerless and pale,
May set in the wild waves of woe.

Experience, when bound o'er the turbulent waves,
Remembers that ills may arise,
And with sedulous care, 'ere the danger he braves
His bark with spare tackle supplies:
So you on life's ocean, with provident minds,
Have here a spare anchor secur'd,
With which, in despite of adversity's winds,
The helpless will one day be moor'd.

When the strong arm of winter uplifts the blue main,
And snow-storms and ship wrecks abound,
When hollow cheek'd famine inflicts the fell pain,
And the swamp flings destruction around,
When the folly of rulers embroils human kind,
And myriads are robb'd of their breath,
This wise institution may come o'er the mind,
And may soften the pillow of death.

The poor widow'd mourner, the sweet prattling throng,

And the veteran, whose powers are no more,
Shall here find an arm to defend them from wrong,
And to chase meager want from their door:
This is tempering the wind to the lamb newly shorn,
This is following the ant's prudent ways;
And, O blest Institution! the child yet unborn,
With rapture shall lisp forth thy praise.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

IN AMERICA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BULOW.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CONTINUATION OF PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER VIII.

*In Continuation—Experiments to cultivate the vine—
Mr. Legaud—Attempts to make silk.*

In the district of Lancaster, if a person farms out his plantation, he cannot get three per cent. upon his capital, and finds it besides very perplexing, how to compel the farmer to make payment. The lands are commonly farmed out for half of their produce.

With all this, the countryman is not so thriving, as with the same advantages he would be in Germany, nor even, as in many places, he is already with inferior advantages. In the marsh lands along the Elbe, in some parts of the province of Magdeburg, in the low-lands inhabited by Mennonists along the Vistula, the country farmer appears to live in greater abundance, and to enjoy many more comforts, than in the richest parts of North America; that is, in the county of Lancaster, which is without comparison the richest. Let it be considered, that independent of other great advantages, such as the non-existence of feudality and the like, that the American farmer lives in a country which maintains no army.—Now, let the armies in Germany, which make the greatest part of the taxes necessary, be disbanded; let the German farmer be made as free as the American; and you will see in a few years whether the latter can compare with the former in prosperity.

If the Atlantic part of North America, cannot, in respect to fertility bear a comparison with Germany, taking both countries upon an average, and supposing all circumstances on both sides equal, how then would the comparison stand with Italy, Sicily, and Greece?—Wangenheim has likewise observed, that as much is raised upon a small surface in Germany, as upon a larger one in the United States of America.—The fruit is in general bad; this however, is owing to the neglect of this pleasing part of rural cultivation. There are peaches in great abundance, which when grafted, are of a very good quality.—There are scarcely any plums or pears, and what there are of them, are bad. Apples are the best fruit, and in greatest plenty.—They are for the most part sweet, and some of the sorts are truly excellent. Scarcely any body has grapes, although they succeed well, and come to full maturity. The wild, native grape, is easily improved by transplantation, resists the frost, and bears fruit in extraordinary abundance. As wild grapes are found at the northward, even in Canada, they ought to be transplanted to the north of Europe, where European grapes will no longer ripen, and they would be found to answer perhaps for making wine. Is not this wild grape a proof, that North America was once cultivated, and that it has by some revolution, lost its inhabitants? Many of these wild grapes have a very good taste; those which I had occasion to eat, had too strong a taste of musk. Perhaps the cultivation of the vine, might succeed in this country, at least, no better use could be made of many arid hills in it: but no body undertakes it.—A certain French gentleman, formerly a lawyer in Normandy, Mr. Legaud, has a Vineyard, situated on the Schuylkill, at Spring-Mill, 13 English miles from Philadelphia. It exposes him much to the chicaneries of his neighbours, who, as the Norman lawyer says, are much addicted to law suits.—Their language always is, that vineyards cannot succeed in their country. But they only do it from envy, because they cannot bear to see a foreigner more industrious than themselves; for Mr. Legaud says, that in the year 1791 he raised very good samples of wine. One sort was a white wine, which he compared to the "Vin de Grave," and to Moselle wine; another sort was equal to the best Medoc. Wine from the Cape grape, which he has likewise in his vineyard was excellent. He has besides the Champagne and Burgundy grapes, and others; but he says that none of them seem to suit the climate, so well as those of the Cape. He now and then sells vine twigs especially to go to Kentucky. The government gives him no support. He has already been obliged to sell the plantation, and the vineyard is all that he has left. He could give me no wine to taste; but he gave me some brandy which he had distilled from his wine, and which was very good. There are other examples of successful attempts in Pennsylvania to raise wine. In North Carolina, a wealthy planter has begun to cultivate the vine upon a large scale; and has succeeded not only in the French, but likewise in the Italian method; that is, in making the vines twine themselves round trees, and form garlands from one tree to another.—He lives in Warren County.

Attempts have been made in Connecticut to make silk, which succeeded so well, that they ought to have been followed up, by others; but no soul thinks of it. Mr. Livingston in New-York, proposed to plant live hedges of Mulberry, and to put silk worms upon the leaves, under the open sky, instead of feeding them within doors; he says they would thus be subject to fewer diseases. The Americans will here make the objection, that it is yet too early to expect such things in America. But it is not too early for them to raise wheat or Indian corn, and Indian corn requires as much labour, in hoeing as the vine. The labour, in silk making, may be performed by women and children. It is too early in an infant nation, to display so much luxury; evil habits, and immorality have been introduced much too early. It is in like manner too early to encourage, above all things, navigation and foreign commerce; but all the branches of Agriculture, that is, the raising of all kinds of natural productions, are at all times the fittest means of giving to a nation the vigour of blooming manhood.

DIALOGUE II.

ON PAINTING AS A FEMALE ACCOMPLISHMENT.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

L. What a scene is there? Are you not in raptures with it? You shall not be a friend of mine, if you do not see more charms in a scene like this, than in any spell which music can create.

R. I must be pleased, if that be the condition, and yet, if I were not seated just here, if my pleasure were not heightened by sympathy with yours, and by contrast with the noise, sultriness, and tiresome monotony of the city I have lately left, I am afraid my sensations would not rise to transport.

L. Insensible creature that thou art! How shall I make thee, a votarist of colours; as much enamoured of the pencil as thou pretendest to be of the chords?

R. It is easily done. Only make your good opinion depend upon my taste, and I will instantly set about acquiring and improving it.

L. That I cannot do. Your application to painting, such as would make you a proficient, would be far from strengthening your claim to my esteem.

R. Indeed! How comes it then that you yourself are so good an artist.

L. It was, in a very small part, the consequence of inclination. I believe nature designed me, if any design she had, to be a painter. Of all my senses, I exercised none with so much delight and perseverance as my sight. Impressions, made through this medium, were stronger, more distinct, more durable, than any other tribe of impressions. I found it easier to retain in my fancy, and to describe in words, the features of a face or landscape, once carefully examined, than any person whose powers, in that respect, I have had an opportunity of knowing.

I had, likewise, a wonderful dexterity in giving a moral significance to lines and shades, especially in faces. Every one's character was settled with me, when once his face was surveyed. I was led, at the beginning, you may readily imagine, into strange mistakes; but the detection of these did not dishearten me. They merely occasioned a change in the principles on which I judged of characters.

With all these faculties and habits, it was easy to have made me an enthusiast in painting, at a very early age, but this did not happen. While living with my father, I saw nothing to awaken or direct my wishes in this respect, except now and then, a few prints of indifferent merit in the houses of my friends, and these I looked upon, for the most part, with unconcern.

The materials of the painter, colours, pencils, and the like, the instructions of an artist, time and tables were all necessary; and none of these did I enjoy. My father's parsimony, no less than his notions of what was proper and becoming the female character, denied me all these means; and, to say the truth, I scarcely regretted the want of them. My pleasure lay in marking and analyzing the forms of nature, or in depicting imaginary scenes in which these forms, without the pencil's aid, were newly combined and arranged.

I am inclined to believe, that if these advantages had been possessed, I should not have employed them. I was too volatile, too covetous of pleasure, and of time, to lose so much of it in the mixing and laying on of colours; in copying the works of others; and providing for future excellence, by laborious attention to rudiments and sketches.

The Hicory, seen from my summer-house, robed in verdure and luxuriance, was too beautiful, too deserving contemplation, to be imperfectly portrayed on paper or canvas. I could not have reconciled my impatient spirit to the drudgery, and did not then see, what I have since discovered, that the purpose of copying, directs, disciplines, gives accuracy and vigour to attention and fancy, that objects can scarcely be said to have been seen that have not been examined with a view to imitation.

Having lost my father, and returned to my Aunt Hollis's in England, I had new incitements and new opportunities to make myself a painter. I soon became sensible of my precarious and dependant condition; on how many slight and casual events, my mere subsistence depended. My Aunt was not without her virtues. I was, in many ways serviceable to her happiness, ways, indeed, of which she, herself, was unconscious, and which her pride would not permit her to acknowledge. This belief enabled me cheerfully to bear numerous inconveniences, but it was by no means, improbable that events would take place, marriage, change of residence or temper, which would make it impossible for me, longer to live with her, and in that case my subsistence must be gained by my own exertions.

I wanted to discover some profession, to which as a female, young, single, unpropertied, I might betake myself. This was a subject of much reflection. I examined the whole catalogue of trades, and weighed with much care, their respective claims to my choice. You will smile at my presumption, when I tell you the profession, for which, for some time, I thought myself best qualified, but the dread of your smile, shall not make me conceal it: especially as I never carried my design into effect.

I had an active fancy. I had ever been a close observer of faces and manners. I was never satisfied with viewing things, exactly as they rose before me. I was apt to imagine, in their order, some change, and to ask what consequences would ensue if things were so and so, instead of being as they were. I found little in my real situation, to gratify or exercise my feelings. My ordinary companions were trite and vulgar characters, with whom I was incapable of sympathy; yet these I loved, if I may so say, to explore, to examine their modes of thinking and acting, and to conjecture in what different shapes they would have appeared, had they been placed in different circumstances.

I had also, an ease in writing, in putting my thoughts into words, in describing characters and incidents and objects that few of my age possessed. I knew that the world is pleased with tales of fiction; that this manufacture was considerably popular; that a price was set upon it, proportioned not merely to quantity and numbers, but to the genius and dexterity displayed by the artist. Why, thought I, may I not pursue the footsteps of so many of my sex, from Mademoiselle Geudire, down to Mrs. Bennet, and endeavour to live upon the profits of my story telling pen. The tools of this art are cheap. The time employed in finishing a piece of work and the perfection of the workmanship, will much depend upon myself. I am fond of quiet and seclusion. I wish not to be molested by the selfishness, the superintendence, the tyranny of masters and employers. I wish to blend profit and pleasure, and health and purity of conscience. I wish to benefit others, by the means of profiting myself. I wish for intellectual and moral occupation. Can any calling be more favourable to all these ends than the writing of Romances.

I had always used myself, from a very early age, in setting down my thoughts and adventures, daily, upon paper. This was a kind of religious duty, the omission of which, was as inexcusable as that of my nightly hymn. To preserve some record of the past, to state my employments during the day, and my progress in useful knowledge, in however few words, I conceived to be my duty, and this, unless in extraordinary circumstances, I have never omitted.

To this practice I ascribe my facility in writing, in painting imitations of the heart and recounting dialogues, and this, I came at length to regard as a kind of education, or apprenticeship to the trade which now appeared most deserving to be followed.

Full of this new scheme, I began to tutor my invention to settle plans and discipline my taste. I looked about for a model, whose style and manner I might assiduously copy, and began sketches of different works.

While thus busied, I became acquainted with Mrs. Eckstein, the widow of an artist, who came from Saxony, and settled with his wife in London, many years before my return thither. This man acquired decent subsistence by portrait miniature painting. His wife had a genius for the same art, and under her husband's instructions, became no mean proficient. She employed her skill to increase the common fund, first, by occasionally copying her husband's pictures, when copies were required, and at length by painting from female originals.

Gradually the business was divided between them, and the female faces were constantly transferred by Eckstein to his wife. Her skill came into fashion and repute, and the gains of the wife were little inferior to those of the husband. They had no offspring, and mere domestic avocations were unsuited to her taste.

Though their gains were considerable, they lived without much foresight or economy. All they gained during the year, they spent before the end of it; and hence at Eckstein's death, his wife was left without any means of support but her profession.

She possessed much general literature, of an independent though improvident spirit, had little respect for the ordinary maxims of the world and of her sex, and when you had surmounted your punctilios, and reconciled yourself to a few seeming, for they were not real, infractions of decorum, you found her a valuable friend.

Our acquaintance began after her husband's death, and quickly ripened into confidence and intimacy. I paid her frequent visits at her lodgings, was, of course, prompted to examine her arrangements and performances, and to reason on the nature of her art.

Every thing that I saw coincided with my early propensities and my new schemes for employment and subsistence. Here was an example of one who pursued no servile or dishonourable trade, and who, with a little difference of character, with more attention to the delicacies of her sex, with more neatness in her household, more economy in her expense, might, in a few years, acquire such opulence as to dispense with daily application. Might not this example deserve to be studied and followed?

As soon as my friend discovered my thoughts, she expressed great eagerness to encourage and assist me in my undertaking; expatiated with great zeal, on the advantages of her pursuit, offered me the use of her models, her colours and apartments, and even importuned me to take up my abode with her, and form a kind of partnership.

To this, however, there were obstacles, rising partly, from certain dissonances and disparities between our characters and manners, and partly from the temper and views of my aunt, which were not to be surmounted. I was willing, so far, to profit by her offers, as to take, daily, her instructions in the art. For nearly two years I was an assiduous scholar, and my zeal being seconded by inclination and by interest, I made no despicable progress.

R. Did you confine yourself merely to the face.

L. Chiefly to the face. I sought for, and laboured after excellence in no other branch of the art. No object, in the circle of nature, more merits to be looked upon and studied than the human countenance, and never is there any danger of exhausting its varieties. My observation was thus rendered acute, vivid and limited to one class of objects, and my source of pleasure was augmented in a degree surprising to myself.

R. Had you ever any need of lucratively applying your skill.

L. Never. Fortunately, I have passed my life, hitherto, without the necessity of purchasing my food with my labour.

R. What use then have you made of your skill?

L. Chiefly for my own gratification, and for that of my friend. I was lately counting up the faces real and imaginary, which I had sketched, during three years, and dividing them into classes. What, think you, was the number?

R. I should be glad to know.

L. The number is three hundred and fourteen, which, on an average, is hardly less than one in three days, but, in truth, I applied myself to painting with much regularity. Some portion of almost every day I bestowed upon it.

LEVITY.

[It might have been imagined that the age of Aeronauts was passed, and that even a French head would not be giddy enough to thrust itself into a Balloon after those fragile vehicles had reeled and tumbled among all the clouds, to the disgrace and ridicule of the new Philosophy. But notwithstanding the vain flights of Blanchard, and the fatal fall of P. Rozier, it seems the Lunar project of soaring to the skies is not yet relinquished. One Garnerin, a hair brained fellow, who cannot probably gain his bread on earth, has launched a Balloon to adventure into the upper regions, and the London mob, who have the same asinine stupidity, and the same sheepish inclination to throng together, as a Tenney's mob, have run gaping after this madcap, and have given him all the pence they could rake, or they could steal, to see his flimsy, tiffany globe of inflation. In one of the early flights of this modern Icarus, he was accompanied, by a Captain Sowden, who appears to be as simple a soul, as one of our militia officers. This man, after his return to this nether world, published a narrative of his tour, in a style of long low exaggeration, not unworthy of Gulliver himself. Even the audacity of the Frenchman was abashed at this; and when he made his next sally to the skies, he left Sowden to vapour, below stairs, and took nothing with him—but his wife—and his cat. On this last circumstance, the London wits have founded the following merry epistle, which is "droll enough," in the words of one of the elegant proverbs of the moral Franklin, "to make a cat laugh."]

MONSIEUR LE CHAT'S

DESCRIPTION OF HIS AERIAL EXCURSION WITH MONSIEUR AND MADAM GARNERIN.

IN MR. GARNERIN'S BALLOON.

MR EDITOR.

With a view to anticipate the inquiries of my friends, in particular, and anxious to prove my gratitude to the public, in general, for the lively interest they have shewn for my safety, I seize the first moment of recovery from fatigue and pain, to give you an account of my aerial voyage. Brought up under the care of Madame Garnerin, I may be said to have been nursed in the very bosom of aerostation, and to have breathed nothing but the pure air of oxygenated gaz from the first moment of my birth. Hearing of my mistress's intended ascension, and having learned, from my master's late experiment, the turbulent nature of the Eng-fish atmosphere, I who had been a quiet spectator of her aerial flights in more peaceful skies, determined on sharing the danger of her new voyage.

My determination being made known to Mons. Garnerin he immediately sat about repairing the balloon, lately used at Lord's Cricket-ground, and a new circle was added for the purpose of adapting it to the increased weight which it was to carry, in the persons of myself and Madame Garnerin. —All this business was conducted in the most private manner; and my intentions were most carefully concealed, lest my female acquaintance, which is extensive, particularly among the tabbies, should take the alarm, and endeavour to shake my resolution, as happened to my friend Captain Sowden, at Ranelagh. Your account of the previous business being perfectly accurate, I shall not trouble you with the process of inflation or any particulars of the preparation or scenery prior to the first moment of our flight.

When every thing was ready, Mr. Astley, jun. handed Madame Garnerin into the boat, and I followed, supported by the hand of Captain Sowden. I never experienced more attention and politeness from any man in my life. The Captain could not but know, that I had his narrative particularly in my eye; and, that if he had dealt in the marvellous, he had every thing to dread from a person of my sagacity, vigilance, and activity. With all this consciousness about him, so far from feeling the slightest jealousy, he appeared quite regardless of any consequent injury to his fame, and poured out the most earnest prayers for our success. So much I must say in justice to Captain Sowden. It was a magnanimous trait of disinterestedness in a rival, well worthy of a British sailor. The very first moment I found myself buoyant, I felt disposed not to be an idle spectator, but to take an active part in the boat. Madame Garnerin, however, near whom I was seated in a neat wicker basket, patting me gently upon the head, and smiling irresistibly, said it would be of dangerous consequence, and requested me to sit still. Ever obedient to the call of beauty, I complied, and instantly began to pur a little tune, to prove at once the placidity of my temper, and the total absence of all fear and apprehension.

We had now ascended a height of 6000 feet.—The balloon was almost stationary, and seemed to float in a perfect vacuum. Not a breath of air, not a murmur. All was still as a mouse around us. My companions thinking this a good opportunity to take a snack, and feeling the effect which exposure to the pure air generally produces upon my constitution, I prepared to gratify my appetite with a leg of cold chicken. Mr. Garnerin here interposing, assured me that such gross food would infallibly obtund my intellectual faculties, and requested me to reserve my appetite for the milky way, which would afford pure and safe nourishment. I readily acquiesced, and while the rest were disposing of several hams, and a dozen of chickens, devoted myself entirely to physical observations. Captain Sowden says, that "When he got above the clouds, the earth appeared like a vast panorama, or map of fifty miles circumference, where he could not only follow the great roads with the eye, but even distinguish on them the ruts and the furrows in the fields."—I cannot pretend to say, whether the Captain served in Egypt; but, if this account be serious, he certainly laboured under an inveterate ophthalmia at the time. Its appearance to me in every situation was quite different. At first, it looked dark, and like the convex side of a huge wooden bowl. As we receded from it, it became brighter and brighter, so as to look, at our greatest elevation, like a newly scoured pewter platter; and had we continued to ascend still higher, or as far as the earth is removed from Mars or Venus, I am satisfied it would have looked exactly like a silver goblet. These appearances correspond with all astronomical calculations; and, therefore, the brightness of the earth, which Captain Sowden attributes to an increase of his visual strength, was nothing more than the reflection of the sun's rays, which, at a given distance, would have shewn him the earth exactly as the moon appears when viewed from the world. Hovering over Westminster, St. Stephens Chapel appeared to me like a rat-trap. I could distinctly see the inside; and around the Treasury Bench, it was strewn with cheese-parings, and candle-ends, and the rats assembling from all sides fighting and quarrelling for a mouthful.

Not having passed over Epping Forest, I am not competent to make any remarks upon the gooseberry bush, and other rural objects; but I had an opportunity of ascertaining the principle which Captain Sowden lays down, of objects being discernible in proportion to their minuteness, for so he would infer, when he says that immense objects vanished to a speck, while he could clearly see the smallest ruts and hedges.

It is an old saying, that "When the cat is away the mice will play." Looking then with a scrutinizing eye down on Westminster, I could not perceive a single mouse stirring, although every house was deserted. I then exercised my olfactory nerves, but in vain, to catch up the effluvia of some kitchen, or cook's shop, and lastly, I attempted, with similar want of success, to overhear the cry of cat's meat, or the barking of a lap-dog. These failures convince me, that the senses have no such morbid affection as that imputed to them, and that Captain Sowden meant it in a figurative sense, and as a moral lesson, when he says that the slightest flaws are visible, while objects on the grandest scale pass without notice.

I had now attained the greatest elevation ever reached by any of the feline race, and Monsieur Garnerin proposed that one of us should descend in the parachute: we were exactly over Milkbank, where the storm and tempest of the late elections had not reached, and all was calm, while the sky was rent and torn all over Maidstone and Brentford. Madame Garnerin expressed an inclination to make the experiment. I was musing upon the use to which balloons might be applied by cats in pursuit of the feathered race, when my mistress's danger roused me from my reverie. I instantly claimed the honour of this hazardous mission, observing, that I had nine lives, and was ready to sacrifice one of them for so much beauty. I was accordingly placed in the basket of the parachute, and gave a mew as the signal that I was ready.—My companions cut the rope which attached the parachute to the balloon, and I began to descend. I have been used to sudden and violent falls from the roofs of the highest houses, but never did I experience so dreadful a shock. For the first 50 yards I fell with the most astonishing velocity, but the parachute had now become fully expanded, and my descent after was gradual, but still too rapid for observation.

The only thing curious that struck me in my descent, was the balloon, when viewed in the middle of my way. The appearance of the two Gentlemen, and the Lady dressed, particularly about the head with light floating gauze, viewed through the netting, was peculiarly strange. The netting had exactly the effect of the wires of a cage, or such as is used in an aviary, and the persons within had the appearance of some strange animals confined in a large inclosure of wire-work. This deception of the sight was peculiarly grateful to an animal like me, so fond of birds, and I congratulated myself that the idea of a cage had not presented itself when I was above, as, in such case, I should have probably been unable to restrain the propensity of my nature, and might have flown at my companions. The great interest which the people took in my fate, fully compensated the danger and trouble. Every eye was turned from the balloon and fixed upon me, and several ladies swooned, fearing I should fall into the river. To their great joy, however, and my own inexpressible satisfaction, I landed about fifty yards inside Milkbank. You can have no idea of the crowds that ran from all sides to offer me their assistance. They rushed with so much impetuosity that they tumbled over one another into the ditches. Previous to my departure from the skies, it was thought a necessary precaution, as I could not speak English, to tie a label to my neck, offering a reward of a guinea to any person who should conduct me in safety to Mrs. Garnerin, No. 55 Poland-street. I now experienced fresh proofs of the love of the English people, and their attachment to my person. Thousands contended for the honour of being my guide, which was awarded to the landlord of the house, while the others were busily employed in tearing the parachute to pieces, with a view to prevent me from ever exposing myself to a similar danger. This I know was their motive, and that they mean to preserve the shreds as the most precious reliques. —Although scarcely scratched by the journey, I was too much bruised and fatigued to be able to return to the garden; and, as you truly conjectured, I felt too much fever and agitation to be able to give you an immediate account. I request you may put this letter into an English dress, and make my apology to the fashionable world for the disappointment which my absence from the garden must have necessarily produced.

I remain, Sir, your's,

LE CHAT.

GRIMALKIN'S MONODY.

Cats who frail nymphs in gay assemblies guard,
As Buckram stiff, and bearded like the pard;
Calumnious cats who circulate faux paux,
And reputations maul with murr'rous claws
Shrill cats whom fierce domestic brawls delight,
Cross cats who nothing want but teeth to bite;
Starch cats of puritanic aspect sad,
And learned cats who talk their husband's mad
Confounded cats, who cough, and croak, and cry,
And maudlin cats, who drink eternally;
Prim cats, of countenance and mien precise,
Yet oft'ner hankering for men than mice,
Curs' cats whom nought but castigation checks,
Penurious cats who buy their coals by pecks;
Fastidious cats who pine for costly cates,
And jealous cats who catechise their mates;
Cat prudes who, when they're ask'd the question squall,
And ne'er give answer categorical;
Uncleanly cats, who never pare their nails,
Cat gossips full of Canterbury tales;
Cat grandams vex'd with asthmas and catarrhs,
And superstitious cats who curse their stars;
Cats who their favours barter for a bribe,
And canting cats the worst of all the tribe,
And faded virgin cats, and tabbies old,
Who at quadrille remorseless mouse for gold;
Cats of each class, craft, calling, and degree,
Envy the fame of Tabby a Paris.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

[In his illiberal travels, Bulow very saucily tells us that our delightful Philadelphia Tea-Parties, so charming to the ladies, and so interesting to all men of sense, are given, merely because they are a cheap mode of entertaining our dear American friends. It seems, however, that the extremes of rigid economy and ostentatious magnificence are reconciled in other countries, beside our own. The following might form a new scene in Reynolds' Comedy of "Cheap Living."]

KING'S BENCH.

CLARK V. FAUGHAN.

The plaintiff is a proprietor of a china and glass shop; the defendant, a lady of great fortune, residing in Manchester-square, and occasionally giving superb fetes and galas.

The present action was brought for so small a sum as 5l. 9s. which the plaintiff charged for the hire of dishes and glasses for the defendant's last gala. Mrs. V. considered the charge exorbitant, and offered 4l. 6s.; the difference then, which was but 23s. formed the ground of the present action.

Mr. GARROW, on the part of the plaintiff, commented with great liveliness and humour on the prevailing rage for fetes and galas; he said, his instructions on this occasion had led him into a secret he had never known before, that those things were not attended with quite so great an expence as he had hitherto imagined: he had been informed by his brief, that a most superb gala could be given without any uncommon stock of dishes or of glasses; but that every thing which covers the table, or glitters on the side-board, may be hired by the night, for little or nothing; he was himself so pleased and edified with this information, that, although hitherto he had not figured much in the splendid walks of fashion, he had now serious intentions of giving a gala himself some day after the Sittings, that should not interfere with the circuits. He should now point out to the Jury some items in this account, which he was convinced they would judge so very reasonable, that if they chose to give galas, and wanted to hire the necessary articles, they would give a preference to his client:

Items.	£.	s.	d.
To 300 Wine-Glasses	-	0	12 6
To 200 Comforters	-	0	8 4

What those comforters were, he could not precisely expound; he had not a fashionable dictionary in his pocket; but he verily believed they were the same articles which the vulgar called dram-glasses. He then stated, that the charge for 80 rummers was only 6s. 8d. His statement was here corrected by Mr. JERVIS, who was also for the plaintiff, and observed that it was but 3s. 4d. Mr. GARROW thanked Mr. JERVIS for setting him right, and said that Mr. JERVIS, who was just returned from the Election at Yarmouth, must know what were the expences of a gala: he was then continuing in a strain of pleasant irony, when,

Mr. ENSKINE, on the part of the defendant, observed, that however the Court might be amused by the witty observations of his learned friend, it was clear that this matter would be best adjusted by a reference.

Mr. GARROW immediately acquiesced, and it was referred to Mr. Lowton.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

....."Extremely gay,
Music, company, and play." PRIOR.

[The innocent simplicity, and the unsullied purity of our republican manners have always protected us from the dangerous luxury of a Masquerade. But, as Dr. Goldsmith sagely remarks, almost every one however low minded himself, delights to read of high life, and high lived anecdotes, with memoirs of Lords, Ladies, and knights of the garter. To gratify this curiosity we insert the following account of a late midnight revel, at the house of a Lady of Fashion in London. An additional inducement to copy this article is the elegance and gaiety of style, in which it is expressed. We are confident that the most precise of our readers will read it with no extraordinary emotions of disgust; and while at safe distance they gaze at the frolick revellers making the vaulted roof of pleasure ring

"Where night down stooping from her ebony throne Views CONSTELLATIONS, BRIGHTER THAN HER OWN,"

the pride of superior Virtue may be indulged, as the rigid republican reflects, that he cannot mingle in these giddy circles, cannot approach the ranks of nobility, nor taste the hated bowl of British delight.

MRS. ORBY HUNTER'S MASQUERADE.

The pressure of public business has not only delayed, but must necessarily abridge our account of this elegant entertainment, of which we have already taken some notice. We regret that we cannot devote to it that portion of our paper which its superior gaiety and splendour deserve. Disguise is so natural to the French, a Masquerade has been considered their national fete, while the sincerity of the English character is supposed to render us neither enthusiastic admirers of this species of pleasure, or capable of supporting it with all the brilliancy of which it is susceptible. This observation may have been just in less polished times; but its force would not be felt by the liveliest Parisian at the scene which we are now describing. In its progress to perfection we applaud the rule of excluding dominos, which, with the exceptions of Prince William of Gloucester and the Earl of Landaff, was strictly adhered to upon this occasion. Dominos, like sinecure placemen and pensioners, are so many burthens upon the consolidated fund of pleasure, without adding a mite to the public stock. The drones should not be suffered to kiss the flowers, and to sip the sweets and revel in the hive of the busy bee. The only excuse that can be made, is, that scarcely a character can be conceived that is not worn out: This is a mere fallacy. A painter might as well say, he could not produce an original picture, because he cannot invent a new colour. A Masquerade must be always a new scene, even without novelty of character, according to the preponderance of each. Sometimes they have a theatrical appearance from the excess of dramatic characters, sometimes they assume a religious hue from the overflow of Monks, Nuns, Priests and Friars. Mrs. Hunter's Masquerade inclined to the Mahomedan cast; and, most assuredly, if the beauty of the scene and the number of lovely women be considered, the Prophet might be excused for making it his paradise. Among his followers were Lords Valentia and Graves, Sir Sidney Smith, the two Mr. Savilles, Persian Hussars, the Hon. Miss Melton, a Sultana, Lieut. Col. Ponsonby, the Grand Signior, and the three Miss Calls, Grecian Captives. A Masquerade is the true emblem of peace, as it represents all nations in harmony. To the children of Mahomed, then, we are to add the Marquis of Lorne Count Beaujolais, and the Dukes of Orleans, and Montpensier, handsome Spaniards; Lord Forbes a German, without any knowledge of his mother tongue; Mr. Carlo Doyle, an excellent French Hair-Dresser; Mr. Graves, a French Cook, Sir James de Bath, a Swiss Peasant; Monk Lewis, an Hungarian Officer; and Mr. W. Porter, a Hindoo Rajah, of uncommon splendour; the diamonds and pearls of whose turban were upwards of 2000l. in value. The character was so well supported, and he looked the Orientalist so completely, that the Persian Prince, Mirza Abo Faleh Khan, who was present, in his proper costume, mistook him for a countryman.

In the theatrical department many characters were sustained with great spirit. Among the most prominent were the Hon. J. Macdonald, who, as Sylvester Daggerswood, gave many excellent imitations of Mr. Suett; Sir George Tapps, in Richard the Third; Mr. Wm. Ogilvy, in Sir Archy M. Sarcasm; and Capt. Coburn, a Falstaff, attended by Mr. James, a very sober Bardolph; Col. O'Kelly was a Scrub, with a truly Hibernian brogue, but well supported; and Sir James Pultney was a Weird Sister, but which of the lovely three we could not discover. The Devil as usual, made his appearance, incarnate, in Mr. Leslie, but he came armed only in his terrors, leaving his temptations to the daughters of Eve, who inherit her loveliness. In this list were the beautiful Madame Recamier, in a splendid fancy dress; Mrs. Wilson, a Virgin of the Sun; Mrs. Bristol, an Indian Princess, extremely elegant; the Countess of Kenmare, a Country Girl, with the bloom of Hebe on her cheek, and the purity of Diana in her bosom. Miss Lewis as Ariel, charmed with sylphid loveliness; her wings were of filigree work in silver, and she looked as if she had just alighted from a sun-beam. Among the eccentric characters irreducible to any class, were Lady Charlotte Campbell, the wife of the captain of a banditti; Lady Mexborough, an elegant imitation of Miss De Camp in "Of Age To-Morrow"; Lord Strangford and Mr. T. Sheridan as Countrymen, better acquainted with the ways of the town than those of a farm; Lord and Lady Montford, and Sir R. Wilson Poor Pilgrims; Earl Mountnorris an excellent Beefeater, a character very well supported by several other gentlemen at supper; Countess Mountnorris, a Lady of fashion of the last reign, with great spirit; Mr. Devereaux, a Clown, with bells for buttons; Mr. Penn, a Pierrot; Lady E. Loftus, a nun; Baroness Balk, a Flower Girl; Major Mayne a Pun, a realsatyr, in dress and execution, an excellent character; Mr. Crawford, a Punch; Capt. Durham, a Sailor; Mr. Kingsmill, a Friar, was open in his confession, and rather severe in his attacks upon his own cloth; Lord Ranelagh, and Lord Clanbrock, Vandykes. Miss Elizabeth Abrams, a Romp; two Miss Abrams, Housemaids; Mr. Skeffington, a Conjuror without tricks; Mr. Macrae, a Haymaker; Colonel Coburn was first a Jew Pedlar and then an Old Maid, both excellent; Miss Augusta Coburn, and Lady Welby, were also Old Maids; and Mr. Henry Salt, all attic, a Monk, was of course one of the best characters in the room. It is curious enough, and affords a proof of his extraordinary taste, that the Devil, while he neglected all these, should occupy himself the whole night in persecuting Mr. Smith Owen, in character of judge. The fancy dresses were in the most elegant style, particularly those of Lady Jersey, Lady Ann Wyndham, Mrs. Drummond Smith, the two Miss Devereux, Mrs. and Miss H. Combe, Governor Bentinck, Lady Clonmell, and Lady C. Brown. Mr. C. Mills, Mr. W. Bushby, and Sir H. Hawke, were in old English dresses. Pleasure is like the apples which Hippomenes threw at the feet of Atalanta; it can't be gathered without loss of time. It was this probably induced General Arabin, and Lord C. Manners, to take up the rattle and turn Watchmen: but though they often called the hour the company did not think of calling their coaches until they had gathered plentifully of the golden fruit.

THE DRAMA.

[During the suspension of Theatrical amusements in Philadelphia, we have had recourse to the British Journals for Dramatic History and Criticism. But the following article we borrow from the N. York Morning Chronicle, and give it a gracious reception in the Port Folio, because it is a just tribute to the genius of Mrs. Whitlock, and the splendid Cooper, and because it is elegantly written in a spirit of no ordinary criticism.

MINOR CRITIC—No. III.

On Friday evening the town was entertained with the representation of Home's excellent tragedy of Douglas. We have been accustomed to the frequent performance of this drama, but have never received from it, as much pleasure as on this occasion. The strength with which the principal characters were cast, brought into view beauties which had long lain dormant.

Mrs. Whitlock, as Lady Randolph, made her second appearance this evening. The character is not adapted to the most favourable display of her talents, which, if we may credit report, will be brought into full operation in Lady Macbeth. Our observations would induce us to expect, that her power will be more impressively manifested in the strong emotions of that character, than in the plaintive grief and apprehensive maternal tenderness which predominate in the bosom of Matilda. Her Lady Randolph was received by the audience, with much interest, and her efforts honoured with repeated plaudits. When Mrs. W. is more familiarised to her situation in our Theatre, and we become more accustomed to her mode of expressing her sensations, we shall expect an increase of pleasure from her performance.

Mr. Fennel made his first appearance this evening, in Glenalvon: nor did he appear like the Fennel of last season, "shorn of his beams." He now emerged from behind the cloud that has so long obscured his talents, and assumed his station among the foremost of the drama. In appearance he is improved; and his voice has greatly recovered its distinctness. His Glenalvon is in a style of very superior excellence. The shades of the character are marked with a degree of strength and judgment that we have never seen exhibited in other hands. His first soliloquy, was, we think, his best. In the more advanced stages of the tragedy, we thought that we could perceive the influence of his late indisposition, diminishing the exertion of that accurate discrimination which is required in every sentence of it, and preventing his bringing his powers of execution into full effect. In expressing our commendation of his performance, we must notice with high approbation, his playing the character throughout. In that scene in which young Norval recounts his learning the art of war, Glenalvon has nothing to say; yet we observed the surprised attention with which he fixes his eye on Lady Randolph and witnesses the maternal emotions, which appear to him the emotions of love. With the same satisfaction, we saw him trace the departing steps of Norval, after the interview with his mother in the wood. The angry dialogue with young Norval was admirably managed on both sides; but Fennel suffered himself, in one or two instances, to be pushed from his character. The moment Glenalvon loses his air of scornful derision, he loses his high ground. As long as he can divert himself with the angry passion of his antagonist, so long will he maintain the superiority. In the eye of the haughty Glenalvon, Norval is merely a wandering peasant, whose vulgar birth he regards with contempt, and whom he considers as the paramour of the Scottish dame. It is also his declared intention, in this conversation, to gall the passion of the youth. Under such circumstances, his own anger cannot be excited. Had the case been otherwise the fierce Glenalvon, who, though a villain, is no coward, would have met him point to point at the first menacing expression. Fennel perfectly comprehends the strong hold of the character; but he has been in the practice of playing against Norval's of a more same complexion. The fire and energy of Cooper gave a degree of importance that he was unaccustomed to encounter, and required a greater stock of contempt than he was prepared to exert. The circumstances of the scene injurious to him were of advantage to his opponent. We have sometimes thought that Cooper's Norval rather bullied his antagonist. In fact, he had played his own character, when the feelings he exhibited were not called for by the conduct of his adversary. In the present instance, where we witnessed in Glenalvon, the stately deportment and taunting accents of Fennel, we felt forcibly the correctness and excellence of Cooper's manner. If Mr. Fennel distinguishes himself in future, as on this evening, he will prove an invaluable acquisition to the company.

Mr. Cooper's Young Norval possessed more merit on this, than any former occasion, though we have ever ranked it among his finest performances. His juvenile appearance is eminently adapted to the character, and his style of acting exhibits to great advantage, the modest yet gallant spirit of the youth. In the interview with Glenalvon, already mentioned, he has the additional merit of originality. We have been accustomed to see in Norval the ingenuous stripling, who receives unmerited reproof with candour, though indignant astonishment—till his passions are roused by the galling language of his opponent. Mr. Cooper exhibits him in very different colours. He shews us the fiery spirited youth, conscious of his own dignity, who knows the baseness of Glenalvon—who has resolved, at a suitable period, to dare him to the combat—and who now with difficulty curbs his rage at the first expression bordering on insolence. His manner we think by far the most correct, and also furnishes a much finer field for the display of characteristic passion. After thus acknowledging his general excellence in this trying scene, we will notice one or two instances in which he does not accord with our ideas. Before his entrance, Glenalvon says, "His port I love." "He's in a proper mood to chide the thunder, if at him it roared." Cooper enters with his back to Glenalvon, as still gazing at the troops that crowned the summit of the hill. We doubt the propriety of this manner. Again—in the course of their dialogue, Norval, in reply to some highly insulting charge of falsehood, says, "If I were chained, unarmed, or bed-ridden old, perhaps I might revile," &c. Mr. Cooper's mode of expressing this seems merely to account for his not spending time in the use of reviling language—which surely requires no explanation. In our opinion the author intended a bitter reproach at the conduct of Glenalvon, who had been menaced in the most pointed and unequivocal terms—yet had retorted by the use of injurious epithets. We shall take the liberty of objecting to Mr. Cooper's manner in another part of the character. In recounting his history, he relates the conquest of his friends over a band of robbers—"We fought—and conquered." The latter part of the sentence Mr. Cooper delivers with a modest air and disclaiming bow—thereby taking to himself all the credit of the victory. When he speaks of his own exploits this modest demeanor is correct; but he need not hesitate to exult in the triumph of his friends. We also think there was a little too much fire diffused generally through this narration. With these trifling exceptions his performance gave us the high satisfaction we have already expressed. It exhibited throughout that attention to character and that originality of conception, which we particularly noticed in the contest with Glenalvon.

Mr. Hodgkinson's Old Norval possesses no common degree of merit. The mellowness of his tones in assuming the voice of tremulous age has ever arrested our attention. But there are few situations in which it is as advantageously exhibited, or as firmly relieved, by a contrast with other characters, as in Old Norval. His alarm at finding himself a prisoner, and the plaintive accents with which he supplicates Lady Randolph's interference to protect him from the torture, were given by Mr. H. with an earnestness that awakened much interest:—Nor were we insensible to the solemnity of his appeal to heaven at hearing himself charged with a crime of the darkest dye. The feebleness of age, the sense of conscious guilt when questioned respecting the jewels, and the affectionate fidelity of the Scottish peasant, with his wild expressions of grief at the death of Douglas, the most striking circumstances in the character of Old Norval. They were all faithfully and ably delineated by Mr. Hodgkinson. We had but one failure to complain of. In the latter scenes of the piece he did not sufficiently preserve the tone of voice adapted to his advanced years; but allowed, in several instances, his natural accents to reach us. K.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The following anecdote is extracted from a work of Madame Genlis, entitled Souvenirs de Felice:—During the early part of the reign of Louis XV. the young Count de Thiers was at Fontainebleau with the Court; he was lodged in an apartment of the palace under that of Madame de Mailly, who was not at that time the declared Mistress of the King; she was not then even suspected of having an intrigue with him. The funnel of the chimney of the Count de Thiers' room opened into that of Madame de Mailly's, so that what was spoken near the fire-place in the lower room could easily be heard in the room above. One night the Count de Thiers was retiring rather late to bed, and going along the corridor, he met the Count de Bissy, his brother, who walked with him to his room. It was the latter end of autumn, and the night was cold: the two brothers drew near the fire and began to converse about the King, whose character they treated with the utmost severity. Their conversation was however suddenly interrupted by a dreadful voice, roaring down the chimney, "Hold your tongues, insolent wretches." It was the King's voice.—The two brothers remained for some moments silent and motionless; they gave themselves up for lost. When the first moments of surprise and terror were past, they began to consult about the means of securing their safety: at last they agreed that they must wait the event with patience and courage. They went, pale and trembling, to the King's Levee next morning, expecting at least to be sent to the Bastille. The King looked at them with great sternness. Before this period the two brothers had been great favourites with the King, from that time till the period of his death, which was thirty years afterwards, he never spoke to them, or took the least notice of them: they obtained no favours from the Court, but never experienced any other mark of the King's displeasure.

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.

A certain Clergyman, meeting one of his parishioners who was very aged, said to him, friend C. you are now got to be very old, and cannot expect to live but a few days longer: No, said the old gentleman, I shall soon die, and go to Heaven, and never shall see you any more.

[Farmer's Museum.

The following article will operate as a tonic to the drooping mind. "If it were necessary to find any new instance in support of the precept, that man should never despair, the history of Barthelémy would afford it. After living to the age of forty, amidst all the conveniences and luxuries requisite to one born and educated in the first class of gentlemen; after a residence at the court of London, first as Secretary and then as Charge des Affaires for the King of France, he negotiated at Basle the peace with Prussia and was then elevated (if elevation it can be called) to a place in the Directory of the French republic. Amidst the pomp of this unhappy greatness, this miserable grandeur, he was seized on the 4th of September, 1797, by order of his colleagues, and others, and on the 8th, was placed in an iron cage on a carriage something resembling a gun carriage, and was thus removed, with several other persons, in seventeen days, to Rochefort, passing the night in the worst dungeons of the towns, in which they stopped.

"The next day, they were forced into the hold of a small vessel, and, when thirty-six hours had elapsed since they had eaten or drunk, a pail of water was let down amongst them, accompanied with two of the crew's loaves. Barthelémy, with 3 others, were afterwards placed in a mere dungeon of this hold, infected with exhalations without a hammock to lay their heads upon, though unable to keep themselves upright. Their food, during a whole voyage, which carried them across the Atlantic, was refuse biscuit, with boiled gourganes, or beans, without seasoning, and in such insupportable quantities, that, at times, when they were not affected with sickness, they felt the most excruciating torments from hunger. One of his companions, the unfortunate Dessonville, uttered such cries of rage, that, says Ramel, "we were afraid, he would bite us."

"On their arrival at Cayenne, Barthelémy, and his companions were confined in a prison in the dungeon of Sinamary, each having a hammock to himself, but neither table, chair, or any piece of furniture, or utensil. Their food was prepared by a cook, taken from the house of correction, who twenty times threatened to poison them, and their bread was often too full of worms and ants to be eaten. Their dens were over-run with scorpions, millipedes, gnats, mosquitoes, and many other species of insects and reptiles, not excepting serpents. They were tormented also with a species of bug, called Chicha, which enters the pores of the skin, and if not carefully removed, breed there, and destroys the flesh so rapidly, as to render amputation necessary. Their whole prospect, even from the ramparts of the fort, was "a vast and impenetrable forest. The mournful howlings of tygers, that came within musket shot of the fort, the shrill and piercing screams of monkeys, the discordant notes of parots and the croaking of venomous toads, of which the fosses and the muddy banks of the river were full, rendered this scene a wilderness of horror." Here died the brave General Murinais, one of his companions, a man of the most accomplished character, and of a large fortune, all sacrificed in a Revolution, which he himself had promoted, in its first stages. Here "Barthelemy, though so sickly, and so ailing, that even his existence, was a miracle, in the continuance of which he had himself believed as little as his proscribers, possessed an internal principle of life and a strength of mind, which the calmness of his external appearance would scarcely have given room to suspect; but which shewed itself with energy on every occasion."

In this prison Francon de Coudray and Lafond, two of the 'deported' were poisoned. These two victims lay in the same room in their hammocks, which were their death-beds, opposite to each other. "The cries, their tortures forced from them, re-echoed to our rooms and far beyond them. Nothing could appease their fatal vomiting. Lafond cried out with vehemence; he raised his hand towards heaven, and called aloud upon his wife and children.—Their torments continued twenty-five days, at the end of which they expired;" and when the others complained to Aime, the Commander, who, before the revolution, had been a footman, he told them "they ought to know they were not sent to Synamary to live to eternity."

The preceding circumstances are collected from the narrative published by General Ramel, who was transported at the same time with Barthelemy, and who with him effected an escape, of which an account was published some years since. It is sufficient to the purpose of this article to add, that on the 20th of September, 1798, one year from the commencement of this series of sufferings, Barthelemy entered the British Channel; that he was protected for some time in England; and that after being restored to his native country, he is now in one of the best situations, which it affords, and may thank GOD, that his "principle of life and his strength of mind" never were subdued by despair.

The following sensible remarks upon the new translation of Juvenal are from the New-York Evening Post, a paper, which though it is generally replete with Political truth, and lucrative advertisements, is by no means vacant of elegant Literature. "Gifford's Juvenal.—The lovers of literature have now an opportunity of enriching their libraries with one of the most admirable productions which has appeared for many years. It has long been felt and regretted, that no good translation of the works of the Giant Satirist had been made into English. Dryden's, though far the best, is essentially deficient. Doctor Johnson in his partiality to that poet, says that his translation of Juvenal wants the dignity but preserves the wit of the original; yet it is certain that it wants the kind of wit that was Juvenal's, still more than his dignity. The broad buffoonery, the loose jokes and clumsy levities of Dryden, are indeed the very reverse of the bold, grave, severe, manly wit of the Latin satirist. It was supposed that Churchill possessed many requisites for improving on the attempts of Dryden: But when it is considered into whose hands the task has at last fallen, it is not to be lamented that his dissipation his indolence, or his private avocations prevented him from the undertaking. No poem in any modern language displays so much of the spirit of Juvenal, as do the Boviad and Macviad.—Those who, after entering into the marrow of Juvenal, had perused those poems, could not but entertain a wish to see a translation from the pen of the same author. That wish is now abundantly gratified. For, exclusive of a genius naturally congenial to that of the Roman poet, Mr. Gifford has an evident advantage over Dryden, in the possession of that which poets often want; a perfect knowledge of the world as it is, and a keen penetrating insight into the passing vices, foibles and follies of the day; this with his long study of the author, has enabled him, without departing essentially from the original, but merely by a happy selection of synonymous words and phrases, to bring home the satire written in the time of Domitian to "men's business and bosoms" at this day."

The prevailing mode of printing books of intrinsic value in England, (a mode suggested by pride and avarice) precludes persons of moderate fortune from the enjoyment of them. Mr. Gifford's translation is in quarto, superb, and of a discouraging price. We feel, in common with every scholar in America, that much is due to Mr. Sargeant of this city for his proposed edition in a cheaper form. And we hope for the honor of our country, that his praise-worthy intentions may be encouraged and adequately rewarded.

The Valetudinarian and the frugal old Batchelor will read the following advertisement from a London paper, and fancy how invigorating and how cheap it is to live upon soup newly discovered. "Vegetable Soup Powders, a new and valuable Discovery, salubrious, and aromatic; forming a cheap, nutritious, and agreeable food, calculated for all ranks of society, particularly adapted for the seaman, traveler and soldier, on a march or in garrison. Schools and public institutions will find singular advantage in its use; private families will find them essentially beneficial, enabling them to make good soups with or without meat; fish, with this powder, will make fine soups of the most nourishing nature; salt beef and pork, boiled in the common way, by adding half a pound of the powder to each gallon of the liquor, will make good soup. Price only 1s. 6d. per pound."

The purple votaries of the jolly god will read the following English advertisement of a sale of Wines, and with smacking lips, will wish themselves in the cellar of the convivial Member of Parliament. "The genuine and sole property of a Gentleman, a Member of Parliament, of known taste for selecting Wines of most superior quality, the entire Collection of most choice Wines in bottles, with Wines in the wood, of the finest vintages, and best flavour, being the whole contents of his invaluable Cellars, in Grafton-street, and at Keston, in Kent; consisting of Clarets of La Fitte and Chateau Margau vintages, Sillery Champagne, Old Hock (vintage 1726), Burgundy, India Maderia, Barsac, Schiras or Persian Wine, Constantia, China Sherry, Malmsey, Madeira, Spanish and French White Wines, and a very considerable quantity of old Port, three, five, and six years in bottle; old Jamaica Rum, a variety of Liqueurs, with India Madeira, Port, and Claret in the wood.

The following is from that ingenious paper The Farmers' Museum. There was once a young man, in some of the northern states, who affected the loathsome singularity alluded to by the witty editor. "The writings of Shakespeare are of so various and multifarious a nature, and describe such a variety of character, and so many scenes of life, that it has been remarked, that excepting the volume of inspiration they contain a greater diversity of characteristic traits than are to be found in any other volumes extant. We felt the force of this observation very sensibly, on reading what Shakspeare puts into the mouth of Edgar, in the 3d act of his King Lear, and hearing some account of a person of the present day whose curious taste is gratified by a dish of frog or rat, we could not have described his epicurean appetite better than in this extract."

"Poor Tom, that eats the swimming frog, the toad, the tad-pole, the wall-newt, and the water-newt; that, in the fury of his heart, when the foul fiend rages, eats cow-dung for sallads; swallows the old rat and the ditch dog; drinks the green mantle of the standing pool," &c. &c.

"But mice and rats, and such small deer,
Have been Tom's food, for seven long year."

The character Juvenal gives of Matho, a loquacious lawyer, is confirmed by Martial, who speaks of him as so pertinacious a bawler, that one almost wonders how he failed.

A country clergyman, who wished to prepare the children of his parishioners for saying their catechism, asked a simple lad, "what his godfathers and godmothers did for him?" "Truly, (replied the boy) I know not what they will do, but I am sure they have done little enough for me yet."

It has been said that the Chief Consul has forbidden the introduction of English newspapers into France. Such a report seems highly improbable, as the Chief Consul would hardly deny himself the advantages resulting from such important sources of political instruction.

Madame du Boccage died lately in France, aged ninety-two. She preserved, to the last, that gaiety and equality of temper for which she was distinguished. The principal works which have merited her the rank she enjoyed in the republic of letters are, her Parades Perdu, in imitation of Milton, a poem entitled the Colombiade, and her tragedy of Amazones, which were played with success in 1794.

The author of the Pursuits of Literature has been censured for his prodigality of notes. I can see no good objection to the liberal use, either of notes or quotations. They variegates our speculations. They inform. They amuse. I read notes with pleasure. I shall continue to employ them with profusion. Dr. PARR has completely vindicated the right of quotation; and the example of BURTON, and the authority of GIFFORD, are decisive. The latter says, in his preface to Juvenal, "Of the borrowed learning of notes, which Dryden says he avoided as much as possible, I have amply availed myself. During the long period in which I have had my thoughts fixed on Juvenal, it has been usual with me, whenever I found a passage that related to him, to fix it on my memory, or to note it down. These, on the revision of the work for the press, I added to such reflections as arose in my own mind, and arranged in the manner they now appear. I confess that this was not an unpleasant task to me, and I will venture to hope, that if my own suggestions fail to please, yet the frequent recurrence of some of the most striking and beautiful passages of ancient and modern poetry, history, &c. will render it neither unamusing nor uninteresting to the general reader. The information insinuated into the mind by miscellaneous collections of this nature, is much greater than is usually imagined; and I have frequently been encouraged to proceed by recollecting the benefits I formerly derived from casual notices scattered over the margin, or dropped at the bottom of a page.

The following notice of a poet's independence will please the literati.

Juvenal had a competence. The dignity of poetry is never disgraced in him, as it is in some of his contemporaries, by fretful complaints of poverty, or clamorous whinings for meat and clothes. The little patrimony his foster father left him, he never diminished, and, probably, never increased. It seems to have equalled all his wants, and, as far as appears, all his wishes. Once only he regrets the narrowness of his fortune, but the occasion does him honour; it is solely because he cannot afford a more costly sacrifice to express his pious gratitude for the preservation of his friend; yet "two lambs, and a youthful steer," bespeak the affluence of a philosopher.

The celebrated satire against the sex begins in the following manner, in Mr. Gifford's delightful version. The translator thence takes occasion to quote a striking passage from the old dramatists, and to follow it up with a most acute sarcasm upon the present degraded state of English comedy.

Yes, I believe that chastity was known
And priz'd on earth, while Saturn held a throne;
When rock, a bleak and scanty shelter gave,
When sheep and shepherds throng'd one common cave,
And when the mountain wife her couch bestrew'd
With skins of beasts, joint tenants of the wood.

This passage is charmingly imitated by Beaumont and Fletcher, in their tragedy of Philaster.

Phil. O, that I had but digg'd myself a cave,
Where I my fire, my cattle, and my bed,
Might have been shut together in one shed;
And then had taken me some mountain girl
Beaten with winds, chaste as the harden'd rock
Whereon she dwells; that might have strew'd my bed
With leav's and reeds, and with the skins of beasts,
Our neighbours; and have borne at her big breasts
My large coarse issue.

Thus did the reading of the OLD DRAMATISTS enable them to enrich their works with passages, that charmed alike in the closet and on the stage. The reading of the present race of Bartholomew fair farce mongers seldom, I believe, extends beyond the nursery, and their productions are, in consequence of it, the disgrace of the one, and the contempt and aversion of the other.

The following, from a London paper, will be attentively meditated by some:

London Times, August 28.—The American papers express loudly the apprehensions they entertain from the French occupancy of Louisiana. The subject has been so much discussed in this country as to admit of no new illustration. It is singular, however, that in the United States there should prevail a hope or an opinion of this country taking up arms again in their defence. How America has deserved this at our hands, we shall be glad to hear explained by the statesmen of Philadelphia or Washington. For the rest, in the present state of the French navy, and her own resources, America is fully able (if fully resolved and united) to defend herself from encroachments; and if she is not, it will be as hard to find political reasons for our adventuring in the cause of a factious and half organized federation of discordant sects and interests, as it will be to produce moral motives in any part of the system and conduct of America towards this, its parent country. The treatment England has received from her own colonies is without a parallel in the history of ingratitude.

The good taste of the editor of the New-York "Daily Advertiser" has selected a very pretty copy of verses from the French, to which a very tolerable imitation is subjoined.

VERSES,

WRITTEN TO A CHARMING POETESS, BY A GENTLEMAN WHO MENDED HER PEN.

Un Emule de MASSILON
Charmoit un nombreux auditoire.
Par un pathétique Sermon;
Attentif en son coin, le Marguillier SIMON
Interrompit tout-à-coup le chef d'œuvre Oratoire,
Et tirant par le bras son voisin étonné:
"C'est moi (dit-il) qui l'ai sonné!"
Du subaltern employé que vous m'avez donné
Ainsi ma vanité tirera quelque gloire,
M'associant à vos succès;
Car j'entendrai vanter ces charmants essais
Aux quelles, en se jouant, votre plume travaille!
Je dirai, "C'est moi qui la taille!"

IMITATION.

An orator of much renown
Was preaching in a country town,
And moved his audience well.
The Sexton, list'ning 'mid the crowd,
Of the attention justly proud,
Jogg'd his next neighbour, calling loud—
"I was I that rung the bell!"
My underling employment, then,
May have its share of credit;
And, when I hear extoll'd again
The charming flowings of your pen,
I'll boast "I was I that made it!"

The following sentence from "Percival," is not merely a brilliant metaphor, it is a wholesome truth. "Equality in Government is like the level of the ocean, which is at the mercy of the winds; whereas the distinction of ranks is the firm earth, of which the acclivities, and declivities, the hills, and the vallies ensure the verdure, fertility, and beauty."

HUME, who is excellent authority on this subject, speaking of the acquiescence of the Royalists themselves under the protectorate of Cromwell, says, "and all men harassed with factions, were glad to see any prospect of settlement; and they deemed it less ignominious to submit to a person of such admirable talents, and capacity, than to a few ignoble enthusiastic hypocrites, who, under the name of a republic had reduced them to a cruel subjection."

It is imagined by an English politician that the friends of the lawful Sovereign of France would aid, with all their influence, the exaltation of Buonaparte, as Consul for life, and even the ulterior measure of proclaiming him Emperor of the Gauls. It would be much easier for a Bourbon to succeed to the throne, vacated by the death of an usurper; it would be much easier even to snatch the reins from his hands, than to raise the throne upon an existing republic. The Emperor of the Gauls will eradicate the last remaining roots of the regicide principle of republicanism; and when that is done the road to restoration is by no means rugged.

In the beautiful poem of Richard I, by Sir James Bland Burgess, whose politics are as correct, as his verse is elegant and melodious, we find the following picture of a demagogue.

He aim'd at power, but not for public good,
Though this pretext in each insidious speech,
He used to cloak his plans jejune and crude;
On stages and in taverns he would preach;
Insult the laws, the government impeach,
The people's sovereignty he would avow,
The holy right of insurrection teach,
And how to bring their lordly tyrants low,
And how to make the crown before its vassals bow.

Of the last speech of Lord Grenville, on the definitive treaty, it has been justly remarked that his arrangement was new and uncommonly perspicuous; his language was elegant, his manner dignified, and his arguments were irresistible. If the whole nation could have been assembled to hear that speech, the example of the ministers would not have extorted an illumination, even from the ignorant and cowardly people of London and Westminster.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"BRUTUS" is a Jacobin. His errors are corrigible only by the beadle.

"The creature is so sure to kick and bite,
"A muleteer's the man to set him right."

The Editor has new reasons for applauding the versatile powers of his friend S. He is profound in the morning, and playful at eve. He can direct his piercing eye through the maze of jurisprudence, and then cast a sportive glance to every willing muse. The compliment from HORACE to Julius Florus may be appropriately applied.

Seu linquam causis acuis, seu CIVICA JURA
RESPONDERE PARAS: Seu condis amabile carmen;
Prima feres edere victicis premia.

V. has lost himself in a wood of obscurity. A vein of humour sometimes appears in his essay, but:—

'Tis under so much filthy rubbish laid
To find it out's the cinder Woman's trade,
Who for the wretched remnants of a fire,
Must toil all day, in ashes, and in mire.

A distant Correspondent is utterly unintelligible. He appears like a huge leviathan, to "lie floating many a rood," in the Black sea of the Bathos. We called for a diving bell, and, in the language of the modern Greeks, endeavoured to be down upon him, but, like the cuttlefish, or like "Nigrina black, and Merdamente brown," in the Dunciad, he was soon lost to sight, amid sable obscurity.

"Remarks upon the prevalence of false Philosophy" deserve attention; but it has been already observed that doctrines the most absurd and contradictory to common sense, and the experience of mankind from the creation, are advanced by modern French Philosophers; Les Nouveaux Philosophes, and their imitators in America. They advance paradoxes, for the sake of procuring distinction by singularity. Such philosophy may be called in the words of HORACE, insaniens sapientia, Philosophy run mad.

* A just and lively portrait of these pretended philosophers is drawn by the sprightly MARMONTEL, in one of his dramatic narratives. He describes one of these pragmatic mountebanks, under the name of Aristus. Our Philosopher finds himself amid a rural party of frivolous women, and begins with great pomp, to be oracular. In the true spirit of the new school, he immediately vaunts of his freedom from prejudice, of his sour unsocial independence, of his study of Nature, and all that. Of his consistency, the reader will find a very edifying account in the following passage. The description is rigorously just. We all may remember a very noted philosopher of this class who could blubber over a dead butterfly, and then leave his natural children to perish in a hospital of Foundlings. "On annonce le dîne, il donna la main à Clarice, se met auprès d'elle à table. Je veux, lui disoit elle, vous reconcilier avec l'humanité.—Il n'y a pas moyen, Madame, l'homme est le plus vicieux des êtres. Quoi de plus cruel, par exemple, que le spectacle de votre dîner? Combien d'animaux innocens immolés à la voracité de l'homme? Ce boeuf, quel mal vous avoit, il fait, et ce mouton, symbole de la candeur, qu'il droit aviez vous sur sa vie? et ce pigeon l'ornement de nos toits, qu'on vient d'arracher à la tendre colombe? O Ciel, s'il y avoit un Buffon parmi les animaux, dans quelle classe placeroit, il l'homme? Le tigre, le vautour, le requin lui cederont le premier rang parmi les espèces voraces. Tout le monde conclut que le Philosophe ne se nourrit que de légumes, et l'on n'osoit lui offrir de ces viandes qu'il parcouroit avec pitié. Donnez, donnez, dit-il: puisqu'on a tant fait que le gorger, il faut bien que quelqu'un les mange. Il declamoit ainsi, en mangeant de tout contre la profusion des mets, leur recherche, leur délicatesse: Ah l'heureux temps, disoit il, où l'homme brutoit avec les chèvres. Donnez moi à boire, je vous prie. La Nature a bien dégénéré! Le Philosophe s'enivra en faisant la peinture du clair ruisseau où se désaltèrent ses peres". Se Contes Moraux, tome second page 6, dans l'édition à Amsterdam, chez Key.

The moral reader will be delighted in the sequel of this story with the ludicrous punishment inflicted upon a selfish scoundrel. Though for a moment credulity may believe, and folly may applaud the doctrines of the audacious innovator, yet he will soon leave the stage of painted exhibitions, the mask will fall, and the Knave or the Fool appear.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

[The following lines were written in 1800—If they are not wholly out of season, and are not too much below mediocrity, their insertion will oblige C. O.]

PARODY ON COTTON'S FIRE SIDE.

THE FAITHFUL PAIR.

Dear —, while a numerous croud
Of virtue's influence vainly proud,
Her fustian cause advance;
Though madness, anarchy, and pride,
Our choice be call'd, we'll step aside
And join the cause of France.

Unknown, unseen, we'll oft retire,
And in our wretched huts conspire
To mend our hapless lot.
Tho' bailiffs fill our minds with fear,
They cannot gain admittance here,
To blast our deep laid plot.

If ere we hope to gain the prize,
Which ever strikes our longing eyes,
We must be very dumb;
Few of the world our plans must know,
A constant firmness we must shew,
Bless'd with a little rum.

Of peace was T——'s mind bereft,
When with inconstant heart he left
The road to revolution.
Giving his vain endeavour o'er,
The trimming, changing fool once more
Now damns the constitution.

Let fools love tranquil virtue's reign,
We who in peace no wealth can gain,
But too well know the case is,
That anarchy alone can give
Those spoils on which we long to live,
Power, pensions, bribes and places.

Our plans shall constant riches bring,
If they're well laid, they'll prove a spring
On which we long may revel.
We'll gull the mob with studious care,
With many a promise false, tho' fair,
And fit them for the devil.

While they our constant care engage,
We'll ever strive to guide their rage
Against the great and good.
They'll grow more servile ev'ry day,
And thus at last our pains repay
With riches, power and blood.

Our talents are not great, indeed,
But lies alone are all we need
To cheat the vulgar crew.
And here the art of lying lies,
To tell no more than will suffice,
But stick to them like glue.

With cautious care we must pursue
The glittering prize we have in view,
Nor aim beyond our power.
If now our means are very small,
We must with skill improve them all,
And haste the wish'd for hour.

We'll ask, at first, no splendid treat,
Lest the gull'd mob our hopes defeat;
But when the storm is o'er,
Above the servile herd we'll rise,
And all their silly claims despise,
In want of them no more.

Thus, while the prize shall be our own,
Our plans and motives are unknown,

So gilded o'er with lies.
Ye monarchs tremble for your fate,
Ye vainly good, ye proudly great.
Death soon shall close your eyes.

Should bad success our prospects blast,
And foes discover us at last,
And all our crimes exhibit,
'Tis useless to deplore our fate,
For we must meet with, soon or late,
A jail, or else a gibbet.

Thus through the paths of vice we tread,
By revolution's genius led,
Without a sigh or tear,
And when the world we bid farewell,
No hope of Heaven, no dread of Hell,
Say what have we to fear?

While Volney's precepts shall attend,
And all the aid they can, shall lend,
Our minds serene to keep;
We'll strive to sooth our dying breath,
With this belief, tho' vain, that death,
Is an eternal sleep!

[Mont Lewis has parodied himself; and his ballad stile has been travestied by others very humorously. We have read scores of merry imitations of "Alonzo the brave, and the fair Imogene," but they were the production of British bards. The following is from the "Anti-Democrat," and is a proof that, amid the dulness and malignity of the times, we can sometimes discover good natured wit, and sportive humour.]

FROM THE ANTI-DEMOCRAT.

SAM SNIP AND BETTY BLIGHT.

A parody on parodies.

A tailor so smart, and a damsel so tight,
Drank gin, as they sat on a bench:
They push'd round the bottle as long as 'twas light,
Sam Snip was the name of the tailoring wight,
Betty Blight was the name of the wench.

And now, says Sam Snip, since to-morrow I go
To kick for some trade out of town,
At a certain church meeting, to which you oft go,
You may tumble in love with some quill-driving beau,
And repay all my smiles with a frown.

Do you mean to affront me? fair Betty Blight said,
You must think very meanly of me;
For if you be living, or if you be dead,
I swear by the gin-bottle, none in your stead
Shall the husband of Betty Blight be.

And if e'er for another my heart should decide,
Forgetting my Sammy so civil,
God grant that, to punish my falsehood and pride,
Your ghost, with a large pair of shears at his side,
May come to the wedding, there claim me as bride,
And carry me off to the devil.

'Twas cucumber time, and away went poor Sam;
His doxy she cri'd, to be sure;
But scarce had a fortnight elaps'd, when behold
A quill-driving beau, with his silver and gold,
Pick'd her up at a meeting-house door.

His features, his cash, and his sweet pretty name,
Soon made her untrue to poor Sam;
The sight of his shiners bewilder'd her brain;
She declar'd that the tailor had woo'd her in vain,
That she did not care for him a d—n.

And now they got marri'd, and sent off the priest,
For they knew that he drove away fun:
The tables all smok'd with a plentiful feast,
Nor yet had the singing and dancing quite ceas'd,
When the watchman went by bawling—One!

Then first, with amazement fair Betty Blight found
That a stranger was stuck by her side;
His hair was quite stiff, he utter'd no sound,
He spoke not, he mov'd not, he look'd not around,
But star'd with both eyes on the bride.

His hat was three-cock'd, and his coat button'd tight,
His stockings, one red, t'other blue,
His coat, just like Joseph's, was patch'd left and right,
'Twas so motley the dogs ran away from the sight,
'Twould not sell for old clothes to a Jew.

This wonderful figure threw all in dismay,
For he look'd like a Hottentot savage;
At length Betty spoke, while she trembled—I pray
That your coat and your hat, Sir, aside you would lay,
And partake of our bacon and cabbage.

At the sound of the last word, the stranger complies,
And his trappings he quickly unclos'd;
When oh! what a sight met fair Betty Blight's eyes,
What artist can paint her dismay and surprise,
When a large pair of shears were expos'd.

All present then roar'd—'twas a general shout,
That the tailor's poor hide they would tan,
But in turning him out, why he ran farther in,
And seizing a glass, toss'd it off full of gin,
And address'd Betty Blight like a nun.

Behold me, pot-wrestler, behold me, he cri'd,
You have brought on yourself this here evil,
God grants that, to punish your falsehood and pride,
'My ghost, with a long pair of shears at his side,
'Should come to your wedding, there claim you as
'bride.
'And hoist you away to the devil.'

Thus saying, his arms round poor Betty he wound,
And in spite of what'er she could say,
He cut off her head, and then sunk thro' the ground,
Nor ever again was poor Betty Blight found,
Or the tailor who took her away.

The quill-driver died too, and none since that time,
At the meeting-house door do presume,
To make free with the girls, for by orders sublime,
There Betty Blight suffers the pains of her crime,
And sends forth a brimstone perfume.

At midnight twelve times in each year does hersprite,
When mortals with slumber are dead,
Array'd in her bridal apparel of white,
Appear on the pavement—Oh! dear, what a sight,
And scream while Sam cuts off her head.

There nine tailors are seen, with a hop and a skip,
Dancing round this most horrible sight;
They drink out of thimbles, their liquor is flip,
And this is their toast, 'here's success to Sam Snip,
'And the devil take false Betty Blight.'

EPIGRAM.

THE CONCLUSION OF THE CENTURY, BY MR. PATRICK O'PHELIM.

If this century ends in the one year or 'tother,
While thus you continue to argue away,
Arrah, my dear jewels do now cease your pother,
And hear what O'Phelim is going to say:
Perhaps you may think I can't judge of an end,
But this is my opinion, and don't let it gall,
If the close of the long hundred years must depend
On the length of your logic, they'll not end at all.

CHAPTER IX.

Sugar maple-tree—Short account of the soil in the several states—Coffee-tree—Cotton plant—Wildrice—Rivers—Fish.

The culture of the sugar maple tree ought to have been pursued with more attention. It grows properly in great quantities, first, westward of the Allegany, and in the Genessee district. But it is found also frequently in some of the vallies not far from that mountain, particularly in Penn's-valley, and Sugar-valley. Where it is not already, the farmers should plant it, as Mr. Jefferson proposes in his book. This tree should be transplanted into Europe; for although sugar can be made from the European maple tree, it yields but little, and after several tappings is drained. Tapping produces a directly contrary effect upon the American maple. To bring this branch of manufacture to its highest perfection in the American states, the most useful measure would be to increase the impost upon West-India sugar. An entire prohibition of that article, would be still better calculated to answer this purpose. The balance of trade with the West-Indies would then be still more advantageous to America. But the speculators, who care nothing about the advantage of the country, would raise an outcry of oppression, and they will never allow the sugar-manufacture to thrive in any high degree. The people in the western states, will, however, be obliged to make their own sugar, that which is imported from abroad being by the length of the necessary transportation over land, rendered too dear for them.

The Atlantic Americans, will finally be obliged to resolve upon the cultivation of silk and wine, because the fertility of their land, in the production of grain in general, rapidly declines, after the new ground has yielded a few good crops, and because the greatest part of the surface inhabited by them, is either altogether bad, or at best has a very indifferent soil. In all New-England, excepting westward of Connecticut river, and through the whole northern parts, where there is some better land, than in Pennsylvania, though only along the large rivers and in smaller quantities, no wheat can be raised. All is rock and gravel. On Connecticut river there lays some good land, but the valley is quite small. The state of New-York is almost entirely rocky, the Genessee country and generally the neighbourhood of lake Ontario excepted, which is very fertile but pestilentially unhealthy. The Mohawk flows through a fruitful but small valley. More than half New-Jersey is a barren sand-hill, without sufficient water. On the Rariton, there is a small strip of fertile land. The hilly regions to the Blue Mountain have a tolerable soil, excepting where there are too many arid gravelly hills. This moderately good soil, does not, however, constitute a third part of the state. Among the Atlantic States, Pennsylvania has the greatest proportion of good land. Whoever has seen Pennsylvania has at this time seen the best part of North-America. But there are great quantities of sandy loam mixed with gravel, and it may be assumed for a certainty, that one third part of this state, owing to the numerous barren mountains, can never be cultivated, and that the greatest part of the remainder is very indifferent land, which the farmers further ruin by manuring it with plaster of Paris. The soil is somewhat better for grass, on account of the abundant moisture combined with heat: but when the trees shall be extirpated, the moisture will also decline. Yet, with all their pains, with all their watering and manuring, the land in their meadows produces not more hay, than in those parts of Germany, where the soil is tolerable.

The fertility of the western country is indeed much greater. The Ohio particularly, the Po of the new world, which with improved cultivation, will bear an extraordinary resemblance to Lombardy. Nothing can be objected against the beauty of the whole western territory. It may be mentioned as a characteristic feature of that country, that even in cold climates, it brings forth the productions of the south, or at least substitutes for them. Sugar, I have already mentioned. In the northern and coldest parts of this country, a sort of wildrice grows in its waters. It produces a species of the coffee-tree; of the cotton plant, &c. All these it would be proper to transplant into the north of Europe. The wild vine is said to produce a much finer grape there, than in the Atlantic states. Fruit and vegetables thrive there much better. These last are indeed much worse in the Atlantic states than in Germany, and in general the gardening is in its infancy. The Dutch colonists, in New-York, have, however, done some service in this particular. The healthiness of this western territory is yet very problematical, fine as the country may be in other respects; at least the latest accounts are, upon this point, very unfavourable; and it may generally still remain a question, whether this boasted country can be set by the side of Italy, Greece, or other fair portions of our hemisphere.

All the southern Atlantic states, Maryland included, have a very miserable sandy soil. The violent heat of the sun, and the moisture, are alone competent to produce any thing here. But they likewise produce fevers, which prevail here every year, and frequently, only cease to make way for the dropsy. What can there be found attractive, in a sandy plain, interspersed with marshes, covered with pine forests, and inhabited by tar-burners? The Virginian tobacco grows along the rivers, where a small piece of ground fit for planting is to be found, which is carefully raked, round the tobacco plants. The dreadful heat makes rice and indigo thrive in South-Carolina and Georgia. Shocking as those countries are, therefore, they are of the greatest value to the United States; for these always important articles of exportation. They alone can maintain the credit of the United States in Europe, in some sort independently of circumstances. These southern countries are uncommonly well provided with serpents of all kinds, whereas in my frequent journeys on foot and shooting parties in Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New-Jersey, I scarcely ever met with one. The western mountainous parts of these southern states, contain, indeed, some fruitful vallies, but a great proportion of the surface consists of stony hills, which will never be susceptible of cultivation.

The puny trees in Pennsylvania, which are so slender, that to a newly arrived European they have the appearance of growing wood, furnish one, among many other proofs of the wretchedness of the soil. Most of the trees are not much thicker than a man's arm, and very few of them are twelve inches in diameter. They appear very despicable to a person who has seen the noble oaks on the banks of the Elbe.

The American forest trees are, however, very handsome, but they are already known in Germany. Among the handsomest may be reckoned the plane and locust trees. They are tall enough, but the thinness of the bed of earth, which covers the rocks under the soil through the whole country, and which is only a foot deep, or not so much, prevents them from attaining a greater thickness.

America has hitherto been cried up for its beautiful rivers; but I should be glad to know, which of those can be compared with the Rhine, for the beauty either of its banks, or of the river itself. The coast of the United States is as extensive as the distance between Lisbon and Riga. Between those two places in Europe, there are more large rivers, which pour themselves into the sea, than upon the coast of the United States. Excepting the Connecticut, Hudson's, and Delaware rivers, all the rest in America, are far inferior to the Dwina, the Vistula, the Elbe, the Rhine, the Seine, the Garonne, the Tagus, &c. most of them even in the length of their course. They are on account of their falls, not navigable so far inland as those European rivers, except, when very much swollen. When they have a majestic appearance, owing to their width, like the Susquehannah. They are usually not deep, and at low water are fordable. I do not see, therefore, how, in travelling through the United States, it is possible to think, Nature, with her mean rivers, paltry trees, and small hills, more grand and sublime, than in Europe with her great rivers, majestic oaks, and mountains tending to the skies. It will be understood, of course, that I speak only of the Atlantic United States, and not of South-America, nor of the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, &c. There is, however, in the United States, owing to the numerous rivers and brooks, more water, than upon an equal extent of country in Europe.

The banks of the Connecticut river are well cultivated; those of the Delaware, especially in the neighbourhood of Wilmington, give an advantageous idea of North-America, to a new comer; those of Hudson's river, are, indeed, in some places, romantic, but barren.

These rivers are not supplied either with such a variety of fish, nor with so good ones, as those of Europe. A sort of alosa, called shad, which is really excellent, comes every spring into the rivers, though not further northward than Hudson's river, and is caught in great quantities. But on the other hand, salmon, though not of so good a quality as the salmon of the Rhine and Elbe, are caught to the north ward of the Hudson. The stock-fish is peculiar to the American waters, and is very good. There are, in the Susquehannah, good salmon-trout, and carp, so called, which cannot, however, be compared with those of Europe. There is no American fish comparable to several sorts of fish, peculiar, as I believe, to the Elbe and the Weser. The oysters are very large, but not so well tasted as those of Europe.

POLITICS.

[The following extract from the sensible speech of the Governor of Connecticut, will please and convince every discerning politician, and every manly mind. It is entitled to the highest approbation. It declares nothing but the truth, respecting that faction, which has usurped the power of France; and, in its remarks upon the visions of Philosophers, it more than obliquely censures the mad schemes of some of our American statesmen, who are trying injurious experiments upon the country, and who audaciously would treat man, as a Priestly would a mouse, in his exhausted receiver.]

When we reflect on the situation of most parts of the world at the present day, disturbed with political agitations, and perplexed with revolutionary pursuits; and compare them with the circumstances of our own state—enjoying a like measure of tranquil and general happiness as heretofore experienced, our hearts should expand with gratitude to the Divine Author of all mercies, who gives us this continuance of his favour.

If we turn our eyes to Europe, there amidst scenes of trouble and distress, we behold a nation which has been tossed on the tumultuous ocean of revolution for more than ten years past—violently agitated during that period, with the conflicts of contending passions, in pursuit of imaginary and delusive ideas of liberty and equality, and which after suffering almost every species of calamity in their wild career, are now under the influence and policy of a fortunate leader, just returning to the point from whence they started: with this exception, that instead of rallying under their ancient Royal Family, they seem disposed to form a new Dynasty, under a foreign Head. To the civilized world, the course of events which in this period has been exhibited by that nation, is peculiarly interesting and instructive; more especially to surrounding nations, does this result of their pursuits, present a serious and impressive lesson of instruction against plunging inconsiderately into the vortex of revolutionary practices, or being deluded into vain and philosophical reveries of untried forms of government.

With this recent example before our eyes, in addition to the numerous instances recorded in history, of similar issues to revolutionary pursuits—the people of this state may be taught the expediency and necessity of adhering with firmness and stability to their ancient habits of political government and religious institutions, as the surest means of social happiness and general prosperity. They may also learn to venerate the long tried forms of civil regulations, which have been wisely devised by our revered ancestors, and which have hitherto beneficially continued in practice by successive generations. They will moreover be led seriously to reflect how dangerous the attempt is whenever, and by whomsoever proposed, to put to hazard the existing prosperity and happiness of the great community, for the uncertain pursuit of visionary scenes of greater happiness, however decorated by specious recommendations, which will most probably fail them in the grasp, or flit before them like the passing dream of the night.—And may they always bear in mind, that lessons of practical good sense, as applied to governmental administration, are immensely more useful to the world, than all the fine-spun theories of visionary Philosophists, or the delusive projects of Closet Politicians.

MISCELLANY.

PARLIAMENTARY ELOQUENCE.

[The topic of the following debate will appear trifling and ludicrous, at the first glance of every reader. But though Bull baiting is apparently not an object of sufficient magnitude to require Legislation, or to excite eloquence, yet a cause so frivolous has produced much Parliamentary effect, and the weakness of Sir Richard HILL, a well meaning but blind fanatic, has called out all the strength of Mr. WINDHAM, who, in the course of the debate, displayed that correctness of principle, that might of reasoning, those STABLE POLITICS, and those classical allusions, which we expect, of course from an accomplished, and dauntless disciple of BURKE and JOHNSON. It has been well remarked, by a spirited writer, that, as if it were to throw ridicule on the great and serious question of the non-residence of the Clergy, the Puritans, are pestering the Parliament, with petitions for a law to prohibit Bull baiting. Gloomy and factious, as they have already rendered the poorer classes of the people in England, they are not content with their gradual success, but come boldly forward to invoke the aid of the Legislature, to their insidious and destructive efforts. Those who are acquainted with the character of the Honourable Gentleman, by whom the matter in question has been introduced, will want no suggestion to make them perceive that he has been deceived. He certainly imagines that he is espousing the cause of order and morality, but, should his endeavours be crowned with success, he will, when it is too late, find that he has been labouring in the vineyard of FACTION and FANATICISM.

Long as the subsequent article is, it will be perused with interest by many. The remark of Mr. WINDHAM upon the danger of legislating upon every petty local circumstance, is fortified, if the Editor remembers correctly, by the authority of Judge BLACKSTONE, and it would be well, if it were attended to by our Statesmen of the new sect. The observation that moral improvement is not to be effected by converting men into sour, morose, and self-conceited beings; and that lively, open, honest dispositions are more compatible with the virtues, which we should inculcate, is not only of a generous and manly character, but is proved in all the rolls of History. A cheerful, happy, rational Piety receives no lessons from John Knox, that "ruffian of reformation," nor does she implicitly believe in CALVIN, who burnt Servetus; above all, this kind of Piety is neither plausibly hypocritical, nor rudely boisterous, she neither cants, nor whines, nor snuffles, nor roars. Erect, and dignified, and honest, as in the day, she 'never creeps into houses, leading captive silly women,' but ....."Looks aloft, and, with erected eyes, Beholds her own hereditary skies." DRYDEN.

It will be observed by the reader that the report of this Speech is extracted from the "Morning Post," a paper, conducted by the political enemies of Mr. Windham, and replete for many years with abuse of this vigilant detector of Jacobinical plots, and this manly opponent to Jacobinical warfare. Even in this paper his speech is extolled.

Neither Mr. Windham, nor the American republisher of his Speech, are advocates for the Bull feasts of Spain, nor cruelty to animals. In all the factious measure which led to the following sentiments, Bull baiting was the least of Jacobinical cares. While the French party of Democrats are striving to turn the eyes of the nation upon Bulls, and Bears and Bagatelles, they have no sort of objection to the baiting of men of rank, and riches, and virtue. He who would not trample on a grub, would assassinate a nobleman.]

BULL BAITING.

Mr. Dent moved the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Bull baiting Bill.

Sir Richard Hill said, he should trespass on the House in favour of a poor, friendless animal that could not speak for itself. He was sensible, however, that if common charity and humanity should not be sufficient to plead its cause, nothing from him could avail. He then proceeded to state various authorities against this practice, and cruelty to animals in general; including extracts from the Bury, Shrewsbury, and other newspapers, Sir Matthew Hale, King Solomon, and various letters. One of the latter, he said, was from a Clergyman, at Totness, in Devonshire, giving an account of a man killed there by a ferocious bull (bull) (loud laugh), who broke loose. There was another from Yorkshire, signed by the Magistrates of a district in that county; another from a great proprietor of works at Colebrook Dale. In short, he had letters and petitions signed by Magistrates, Gentlemen, and Clergy all over the country, praying that every exertion might be made for the abolition of this savage custom. The late Irish Parliament passed a bill unanimously to abolish bull baiting in Ireland; and he hoped the Irish Gentlemen, who had been so favourable to their own bulls, would not be unfriendly to the bulls of this country (loud laughing.) All the ladies, he was sure, would be on his side. He had received letters from several (laugh.) Some might, he knew, be of a contrary opinion, such as those who frequented the gin shops, or ride in a cinder cart, but he did not rank such among the fair sex. It could not be said of such—

"Grace was in all her steps—Heaven in her eye,
"In every gesture, dignity and love."—(A laugh.)

He next read an extract from a sermon that was preached at Bath, in 1801, against bull baiting, and stated, as his last authority, the story of Balaam's ass (Laugh).—He could not conceive that God, when he opened the mouth of that animal to complain of ill usage, did not mean to discourage it, and when the Deity became an advocate in the cause, he hoped it would meet respect in a Christian assembly. Sir Richard then proceeded to argue against the custom as not being conducive to courage, or supported even in so many a way as in Spain; and concluded with an assurance that care should be taken that the bill should not affect any chartered rights.

Mr. Windham, in a speech of great length, deprecated the introduction of such a subject at a moment of such extreme anxiety, when the country was so divided between hopes and fears, and there were so many things of importance to agitate men's bosoms. It was not an evil that had "grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength;" but, on the contrary, it had declined as they increased. In fact, it would be gone before the House would have time to legislate upon it,

Curremus precipites—
Dum jacet in ripa calcemus Caesaris hostem.

It was so little known in Norwich, that the people of that city did not remember two instances within these twenty years. This was the case nearly all over the kingdom, and in fact it was only within these two years he heard any thing about it. He objected to the custom growing up in the House of legislating upon every petty local circumstance. But, laying this objection aside, he had a great dislike to the increase of penal statutes. Every penal law was in its nature an evil, and creates a discretion which is liable to abuse, and consequently may be an increase of evil. The House had of necessity a great deal of little legislation. Every body knew what flights of cards of invitation were every day issued, requesting attendance upon private bills. He did not mean to insinuate any corrupt practice: it was nothing more than a man's voting according to the opinion of his friend in reliance upon his judgment, instead of taking the trouble to judge for himself. In all small business, this would be always the case. Every question that was not sufficiently large to excite the interest, and draw the attention of a large portion of the country, must be decided by chance, as was near happening to a bill of this kind, about two years ago. This was a general reason for legislating as little as possible, except upon great and general interests, for upon other occasions the decision would go by chance, on the sort of cabal already mentioned. He deprecated the mode pursued by the Honourable Baronet, of taking a microscopic view which only took in part of the subject, and made it appear different from what it would to the naked eye. He disapproved of putting the dog and the bull's flesh before the microscope, and looking at hunting, horse-racing, and shooting with the naked eye. The botanist or the painter would not examine a flower or a picture in this way. Take human beauty itself in all its charms, and what does the most soft and delicate face present when viewed through the microscope but ridges, cavities, and protuberances, as rough as a pig's back. He complained of that pharisaical humanity, that hypocritical justice, that would make war upon the sports of the poor, while they preserve the game laws for the rich. His next argument was, an argumentum ad hominem, but one which should have more weight as the homo was the house of commons. He certainly did consider this bill the first step of what was meant to be a reform in the manners of the people, and it was strange that they who were now aware of the evil consequences that would have ensued from a reform in Parliament, should pursue the reform in the country. This was the conduct of the puritans of old, now divided, into two branches, the jacobins and religious fanatics, both acting upon one common principle of hostility to what has been called "lewd and unchristian pastimes." When he talked of Sionites, Ezekielites, &c. he did not mean to discuss their particular tenets, nor to allude to any individual then present. He wished all men to be better than they are; but he was against working their improvement out by converting them into sour, morose, austere, and self-conceited beings. He thought lively, open, honest dispositions were more compatible with the virtues which we should inculcate. The modern fanatics however, must be hostile to the lively character of the people, because it unfits them for their purpose.—With respect to the Jacobins, strange as it might appear, there was no class of people on whom they had made less impression than upon the very lowest orders. The Methodists had made a much greater impression upon such persons, probably because they worked with harder tools. (A Laugh). He did not know but it might be a good plan to throw in some Methodist manure to cultivate them for Jacobins. (A Laugh). Now both these sects were pulling at the same rope only at different ends, and each twisting a contrary way. Their common object was to destroy the Old English character. There was not a single bull-baiter or pugilist in the Corresponding Society. The fellows who would cut off King's heads, and knock down thrones, would not trouble themselves about such a paltry amusement as bull-baiting. They were for nobler sports.*

"Nimrod was a mighty hunter, and his prey was men."

He should like to see a set of Jacobin Missionaries going into a town where there was a bull-baiting, and a methodist preaching, and to have a view of their conduct. There was an old story of a mode of trying Norfolk and Suffolk cheeses, by putting a mouse in, and the cheese of which he ate most was decided to be of the best quality. A Missionary in the present case might be as good a judge as the mouse, and in his opinion, would turn away from the one as a set of idle, thoughtless, disorderly fellows, and fix upon the gloomy, self-conceited set returning from the methodist chapel. It was an old saying, that a man who lives in a glass house should not be the first to throw stones. Now that house was glazed all over. No Melomman in the kingdom, with his glasses and conservatives, ought to be more cautious. An extract from a sermon in his possession, after describing a bull-baiter, concluded by saying, "such a monster would not hesitate to engulf his reeking blade in the warm bowels of a fellow creature." Now for the application. He did not know but it might be as Nathan said unto David. "Thou art the man," for all the upper classes of society were tormenters of animals. To estimate the cruelty of the practice, we should consider its intenseness, severity, and duration, in none of which was bullbaiting equal to hunting. He did not, however, mean to censure hunting on the ground of barbarity. No man could have the arrogance to set up against an amusement which had been a favourite in all ages, which had been the theme of the accomplished Zenophon, which inspired Virgil, who

.....Vocat ingenti clamore Cytheron
Taygetique canes, and enflamed the mind of Milton. Cruelty was not the object of the bull-baiter, if so, why not exercise it in some other way? on the contrary, his pleasure was more rational, and better understood than shooting, which was followed with so much eagerness. The bull-baiter could assign a more satisfactory reason. His amusement was a combat of animals, a favourite one in almost all countries. The pleasure consisted in the interest which he felt in the courage of the animal under his care; an interest as natural as that which a man takes in the velocity of his grey hound, or the scent of his pointer. Bull-baiting was formerly the amusement of the great in this country, even so late as in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It had, however, since gone down to the poor, and yet we would now take it off its last legs, while an honourable member present has proposed to extend the game laws to Ireland. If this sort of subject was to be taken up, the house should be ready to begin with themselves. However it might be questioned whether charity should begin at home, there was no doubt but that reform should begin at home. He had heard of a butcher who was looking through the market for his knife while he had it in his mouth (A Laugh). This was the case of an hon. member from Yorkshire (Mr. Wilberforce). He overlooked all the horse-racing of Yorkshire. Dr. Johnson said of hunting, "What must be the paucity of human pleasures when hunting is one of them?" To hunting, however, he (Mr. Windham) did not profess himself an enemy. As to boxing, he would not degrade it by putting it on a level with such a low, paltry thing as a horse-race; a scene of gambling that set the whole country madding for 20 miles round, stopping all travelling and traffic, occupying all the carriages and horses at every inn, and killing some from excess. It was a collection of riff-raff of every kind, black legs, markers at billiard tables, apprentices who embezzle their masters' property, and then commit forgery to supply the deficiency—raggamuffins from town and country, some hawking about gin and gingerbread, and others crying lists of the horses, and other lists for the edification of country gentlemen's daughters. (Loud Laughing). There were no fewer than nine of these exhibitions in Yorkshire, and yet the hon. member could take a tumbler's flying leap over them all, and light on his head upon a bull-bait in Staffordshire. He had no objection, it seemed to preserve the game upon his own manor, and poach abroad.—(A laugh). The poor could not enjoy your Balls, Routs, and Pic Nics. Their poverty excluded them from some pleasures, and the law from others. Suppose, a little dance, or a party of strolling players, the magistracy of the county was up in arms against them. An organ did not offend the ear of a puritan, so much as the sound of a fiddle did that of a magistrate, unless he was one of the party. A dance among the upper circles, was a most divine, delightful enjoyment, that inspired every idea of delicacy and sentiment; but call it a hop, and the exclamation immediately was "send for a constable, take away the fellow's licence." He remembered a case which happened some years ago near Berkeley-square; the whole neighbourhood was thrown into confusion, and he went in company with a gentleman, who had since sacrificed his life to his indiscreet generosity, the late Harvey Aston, to inquire the cause. On asking an officer, he exclaimed, "I have actually caught them in the fact; yes, they were dancing;" (A laugh), adding, as if he conceived it a great aggravation of the offence, "and to a black fiddler too." (Loud laughing). This, he feared, was one of the fatal causes of the system of poor rates, which made the higher orders look at the amusements of the poor with a narrow and jealous eye. He warned the house against the consequence, which he said would be to work a change in the character of the people, and drive them into the alehouse or the tabernacle, and thence into Jacobinism. He denied the cruelty of the exercise. The game bull, as he was called in the language of that sport, felt no terror, but voluntarily took his station. As to bull running, it was still less liable to the charge. It displayed the courage and velocity of our rustic youth, and though a dangerous practice, the accidents attending it were nothing compared with those of shooting. Mr. Windham then paid a handsome compliment to the character of the town of Stamford, which had petitioned against the bill, as an infringement of a title derived from the great Earl Werreyn. He also complimented the people of Stafford, where the practice of Bull-baiting was so prevalent, upon their courage and loyalty, as a proof of which, the Stafford Militia was the only regiment selected to do duty about the Royal Person. It was the knife set in oil that cut deepest. If we would look for dangerous and designing persons, we must not look among bold, boisterous sportsmen, and bull-baiters, but among your close, sly, thoughtful, and smooth fanatics.

"Tom struts a soldier, open, bold and brave;
Will sneaks a scrivener, an exceeding knave."

The Hon. Member here concluded a speech full of weighty argument, and sprightly humour, by saying, he could not vote for the bill, unless it should extend to all field sports whatever.

DIALOGUE II.

ON PAINTING AS A FEMALE ACCOMPLISHMENT,
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

R. But how could you procure subjects for such constant occupation?

L. There never could be want of subjects, as long as I lived in human society; while faces met my eye, there was always some among them, singular, and striking by their novelty, and their significance. If real faces were wanting I tasked my fancy, and forming a scale, which included every possible modification of features, had always a subject for my pencil.

My pictures were of several kinds. The first were such as were drawn at the request of my friends and for their use, as tokens or memorials of affection or respect.

The second were such as were executed for my own, either those whom I loved, and who sat while I drew, or others whom their characters, their adventures, or their countenances, rendered any wise remarkable, and whose faces were drawn either from casual inspection or from memory.

A third kind consisted of imaginary faces. As my favourite employment always was to feign characters and incidents, I, of course, was prone to create suitable forms and faces, and these frequently I pencilled with great care.

I perceive, intuitively, relations between the intellectual character and the outward form. My experience has supplied me with great numbers of materials to work with. Having always, particularly noted faces, being attentive to the demeanour and inquisitive into the history of those to whom they belong. I may, perhaps, rely with some degree of confidence on my physiognomical decisions at any rate, every face makes a strong and vivid and distinct impression on my fancy. I can trace the features upon paper, even in its absence, with tolerable fidelity.

* This remark demands the most profound attention. It is in the very spirit of BURKE, and is perfectly true. It has been verified by Experience. Note by the Editor.

My fancy is wont to exert itself in two ways. First to conjecture the history and character of those whose faces only have been seen, and, secondly, to conjecture the lineaments and form of one whose history and character only are known. These processes have afforded me many an instructive, or, if you please, many an amusing hour. Hence I have amassed a large stock of those images which revisit me in solitude, and give celerity and pleasure to those moments that would otherwise be vacant and wearisomely slow.

R. And what estimate do you form of the advantages flowing from your application to the pencil? Was the choice of this profession the best that could have been made? Was there no other pursuit in which the same application would not have produced more delightful consequences?

L. These are questions more easy to be put than answered. As a calling, I cannot hesitate to prefer this to any other. I could not make myself lawyer, physician, merchant, or divine. The necessary trades of building, tailoring and cooking, were only to be followed through necessity. Music, painting and needle work, were all that remained, and these were useful to subsistence either as being practised or taught.

To teach an art to others, is, without doubt, unspeakably worse than to practice it: more toilsome, more degrading, less favourable to cultivation of the understanding and the temper, and to liberty, and less gainful.

Needle-work and pencil-work have some things in common, but their differences are those which subsist between forming a statue with a wooden mallet and a steel chissel, between the sport of an hour and the task of a year. The pencil is alive, active, creative and a wonder-worker, but the needle is sluggish, inanimate, and dead; the enemy of all zeal; the obstacle to all progress; the mother and the emblem of plodding and stupid perseverance. I merely speak of the needle as the tool of fancy; the agent of embellishment. In all useful works, we cannot overrate its value, or the importance of every female being thoroughly mistress of it.

Music has its charms, but to gain a living by the practice is to shew ourselves at concerts and the theatres; to forfeit all esteem, and trample upon delicacy and to set at nought a good name.

R. But are music, needle work and painting the only paths open to ingenious females? You mentioned that you first designed to become an author. Your sex did not exclude you from this. Your education and your genius were remarkably adapted to it. The implements and materials were cheap, easy, and to be wrought up with less exposure to the world, less personal exertion and less infringement of liberty than in Eckstein's vocation.

The passion for fame, the fervours of pathetic, or the brilliancy of sportive eloquence, the sense of contributing to the benefit and pleasure of remote nations and distant generations, all invited you to take up the pen, and yet you took up the pencil instead.

L. I am not unaware of the manifold advantages which a moral fiction, has over a portrait. I regret, now that I look back upon the past, that so many hours were not given to books and the pen. My portraits have benefited and delighted me, but when I think upon the progress which a different devotion of my time would have enabled me to make in useful and delightful knowledge, I have no terms to convey the sense, not merely of my folly, but my guilt. How many volumes might I not have read, might I not have written. How might my knowledge of man and nature, of poetry and science have been enlarged, if all those days and all that zeal, which, during five years, were absorbed by painting, had been dedicated to the poets, historians and philosophers!—But, thanks to my wiser years, the infatuation is now at an end, and the pencil is laid aside forever.

R. Forever? Do you mean never to paint again?

L. Never: unless upon some very extraordinary exigence. The truth is, that the end of application, the ability to figure to oneself and to retain in memory, the features of another, was long ago accomplished. To form a definite image, it is no longer requisite to paint it. To recall it to view, it is no longer necessary to turn to my port-feuille. Having not to paint for subsistence but for pleasure, and every pleasurable purpose being attained without the actual use of the pencil, I must lay it aside.

But if its aid were as indispensable as ever, I would not use it again.

R. Why?

L. Because my time can be more usefully employed with a book. Formerly, I spent a precious hour stooping over a table, with eyes riveted to the whitened surface, my reason at a stand, and my fancy fixed upon a single set of features. If permitted to wander, it was only by fits, at random, through the maze of vague and disconnected recollections, whence my mind returned, exercised but not improved, weary and bewildered.

Now that hour enables me to traverse a league of this variegated surface; to cheer my mind and strengthen my frame by passing through an half score vallies and ascending an half score hills. I examine twenty faces or landscapes of Nature's forming, whose lines and colours I can never hope to emulate, instead of producing one uniform, perishable and imperfect creature of my own.

If I choose to betake myself to books, what a world is open before me; how worthy of minute and never tired contemplation! How many structures of poets and philosophers, may be examined in the time misdevoted to a picture. What insight may be gained into the mechanism of human society and the laws of human action, by pursuing the vicissitudes of individuals or of nations from their hour of birth to their hour of extinction.

I once, while living with a friend in Hampshire, employed three hours, one morning, in copying an head of Raphael. Having tired my fingers at this work, I went into a closet where there were a few books, and thought to amuse myself with whatever chance should offer.

I lighted on Dryden's Virgil, and opened at the fourth book of the Æneid. I read it through, in about an hour, and was so much pleased, and so conscious of the many things unobserved or unreflected on, at the first perusal, that I immediately began again. I went through it, and could not resist the inclination to begin it a third time.

It was a favourable moment, my mind was active and my attention vigorous. It is impossible to describe the number and vividness of my conceptions. My new views of composition, morality and manners and government, all rapidly flowing from this source. My enthusiasm prompted me to read aloud, and not my intellectual powers merely, but my physical and vocal powers, my eye and my ear, were beneficially exercised. The incidents, images, phrases and epithets, impressed themselves, with remarkable force, upon my memory. There are few of the lines contained in this book, which have not, many times, casually or in consequence of efforts to recall them, been repeated. The pleasures and benefits, flowing from the employment of these three hours, are indeed, endless in variety and number, and they form a sort of bright spot in the scene of my past existence, on which I meditate with a nameless kind of satisfaction.

On a similar occasion afterwards, I opened, accidentally, Robertson's Scottish history, and read, for three hours. During this time, I had deliberately perused the whole story of Mary's sufferings, from her flight across the Tweed till her death.

I cannot describe the effect of this narrative upon my mind, It deeply affected me, I wept pientfully, and yet my emotions were not painful; they were solemn, ecstatic, and divine. The sudden influx of new ideas, seemed like an addition to my mental substance. I began to live a new existence, and was sensible of faculties for virtue and happiness, of which, before, I had not had a glimpse.

How often have I since compared the occupation of these hours, with those assigned to painting, and regretted that I did not sooner awaken from my dream.

Then, however, these delights had no other effect than to make me attempt to draw, merely from fancy, a portrait first of Dido, and then of Mary. I afterwards met with a fine portrait of the Northern Queen, at Holyrood house, and with a bust of the infelix Eliza, in a gallery at Naples. The emotions with which I contemplated these pieces, were wholly owing to my knowledge of their history, and were so different from any which my own performances had given that I wonder at my still adhering to the pencil.

Now, instead of delineating the eyes, nose and lips of him or her whose adventures I have just read or heard, I put down all my reflections on the story upon paper, and where I formerly sketched the face of another, I now exhibit my own thoughts, enlightened, methodized, extended, by the very act of putting them into words.

R. But here, I may make the same remark which I formerly made as to your music. The mind necessarily demands relief from variety, and change. Why may not painting and music be admitted to diversity the scene, and, at intervals, however rare and brief?

L. I have no intervals to spare. I find no satiety, nor decay of curiosity or languor of spirits, except from the intermission of my favourite employments. I do not spend my whole time in writing or reading, or in lonely musing. I have personal and household occupations to attend to: I have visits to pay and to receive; conversations to sustain and rambles to take. My present and absent friends lay claim to some of my time, and I practise, I assure you, not a slight degree of self-denial, in withholding myself from the pen and the book so much as I do.

R. Prithee, tell me, exactly, how you distribute your time.

L. I will tell you how I wish to distribute; to what rule I endeavour, as far as circumstances will permit, to adhere. Now, that I am more mistress of my time, than I ever was, I adhere to it with considerable punctuality. But enough for the present. We have done with painting, I suppose, and we will have done for the present, with talk.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDE.

Though, in general, I deride the pastoral stile in Poetry, yet I make an exception in favour of CUNNINGHAM, and his followers. The following poem partakes of the pastoral style. It abounds in rural images, and presents very delightful forms of Quiet and Tranquillity. It is not a vulgar poem, and perhaps some of the impetuous racers in pursuit of pleasure will pause in their wild career, and listen to the bland accents of the Hermit.

INSCRIPTION FOR A HERMITAGE.

Stranger, where, so thoughtless by
Loo thy erring footsteps stray?
Stop, and turn thy curious eye
From yon dazzling dome away.

And, cool within this glimmering shade,
This hermit's haunted scenes retire
And mark the roof with osiers laid,
And, pure, his peaceful paths admire

And stoop beneath his humble door,
And view his walls with ivy spread,
Moss grown bench and grassy floor,
Hairy gown and wicker bed.

Nor his frugal meal despise,
Nor his cup with health that flows,
Beard, from age, of hoary size,
Age that Wisdom's wealth bestows.

Taste the draught my thirst relieves,
Eat the wholesome food I bring,
Honied cake of oaten sheaves,
Balmy fruits, and nectar'd spring.

You, who swim in sparkling wine,
In yon echoing hall may tell,
How its luscious baits incline,
What the pang, its charms conceal.

Folly's wit, and reason's war,
Stain the hours in mirth that roll;
Taste the dish these hands prepare,
Sip with me the simple bowl.

Taste, nor thus thy moments lose,
From the giddy rout remove,
Taste, and let thy prudence choose
Paths her clearest rules approve.

Shun the slaves of pleasure, shun
Fluttering life's fantastic crew,
Round in glittering orbits they run,
Fashion leads, and fools pursue.

Stranger cease; those toils forbear,
Wealth and all its cares resign,
Fame renounce, for fruitless are Mimic bust, and marble shrine.

or vain yon lonely Halcyon deem,
Though gold her azure plumes adorn;
She loves this dark sequestered stream,
Nor finds those favourite haunts forlorn.

And soft those bowers in silence trace,
And hear the midnight warblers song,
She hides in shades her blushing face,
She flies the noon day's babbling song.

And turn, and stoop within my door,
Taper light, and napkin clean,
Cross and saint and Virgin pure
On my turf-built altar seen.

Cup of life, and rapture high,
Books and fast, that vice controul,
Kiss and beads, and holy sigh,
Are the feast that feeds my soul.

Stranger, proved, regardless, where
Do thy erring footsteps fly?
Stop, and kneel in humble prayer,
Live like me and learn to die.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

[It is our intention to insert regularly, in this paper, Reports of curious cases, in the English and American Tribunals. But the lovers of amusing Literature need not revolt at this resolution, nor terrify their imagination with the dread of being wearied, by the dryness of Law. We shall be careful to admit nothing, but what may interest our readers, and both edify and amuse, either from the memorable nature of the case, or the logic and rhetoric of the pleaders, or the wisdom and propriety of the decision.]

YORK ASSIZES.

BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

STORY & EAGLE.

Mr. Serjeant Haywood stated the case of the Plaintiff; he observed, that of all the wounds which can be given the feelings of an individual, the one which is perhaps the most severely felt is that injury for which his client now sought for compensation. She was, it is true, in a very humble situation in life, a maid servant to Mr. Stockdale, of Knaresborough; but the feelings of the humblest individual are not to be broken without giving that individual a right to appeal to a jury for compensation adequate to the injury sustained. It was not merely to recover damages that his client brought the present action, but also to vindicate her character, which she found might suffer from so sudden and unaccountable a desertion as she had experienced from the man who had publicly professed himself her lover, and courted her for two years, and yet quitted her the day before that which was appointed for their marriage. The defendant in this action was also himself in an humble situation in life; he had been an hostler in the town of Knaresborough when first he began his courtship, but is now an Innkeeper in that town, and worth 600l. by his own confession. Among the letters which she had received from him lately, was the following:

Dear Mary—This is to you, whom I love more than life. I am as sincere in this, as if I was at the hour of my death, confessing to my Creator. But what nonsense it is to talk of death and my Creator when I am addressing myself to you, who are the centre of all my wishes? All that I have is yours, and all that I ask heaven to grant, is, that I may see the happy day, when I may call you mine.—I am your humble servant and most sincere lover,

ROBERT EAGLE.

The plaintiff, who was at first averse to his suit, certainly had consented to it at last; the day of marriage had been fixed, and preparations made for it, when the defendant suddenly, without reason changed his mind, married a girl, then resident at Harrowgate, and has now set up an inn at Knaresborough. When he should prove this case, he would in some degree compensate for the injury she had sustained.

Elly Sly was the principal witness for the plaintiff. She had known her for the last two years, as a servant to Mr. Stockdale of Knaresborough. The witness washed for Mr. Stockdale, during the whole of that time; and almost every washing day she had seen the Defendant by the side of the Plaintiff's tub, paying his addresses to her. He appeared to be sincerely in love with her, and often talked of marriage, but at length told her of his taking a house, and consulted her about the furniture and provisions he was to lay in, and whether it was best to get corn or flour. At that time the marriage seemed to be very near, when he told the witness that he was in a very distressing situation; there was a d—d girl at Harrowgate to whom he had promised marriage before two witnesses, and vowed she would prosecute him if he did not keep his promise. He accordingly went to Harrowgate, and on his return told the witness he had settled with that girl, and asked if Mary (the plaintiff) would marry him the next day. The witness bid him ask Mary; he accordingly did so; and the Plaintiff that day gave her mistress warning, and gave the witness a gown, petticoat, and a pair of stockings to be washed against the next day, and made some other little preparations for the approaching nuptials. Before the next day came the defendant disappeared, and in a day or two married the Harrowgate girl. About a fortnight after he paid a visit to the witness, with whom the plaintiff was then sitting; the plaintiff told him, "She would be glad to wish him joy, but his bad behaviour would not allow her." The Defendant said he was very sorry, and would make her any compensation in his power." Mrs. Sly said, he ought to give her thirty guineas; he replied, "She will never take that." Mary then burst out a crying and left the house; the defendant followed and overtook her, and the next day told the witness she cried a great deal, and he was extremely sorry for her.

On her cross-examination, she was asked by Mr. Pack, whether the plaintiff had not often, during the length of time she objected to the match, declared that the defendant was such a nasty ill-looking animal, that she would be ashamed to be seen walking with him? The witness declined as much as possible, answering that or similar questions; but said, that no girl had a right to say so of the Defendant, whom she always considered a very nice little man.

One Piercy, a servant of Mr. Stockdale's proved that the Defendant had applied to him to procure a licence, and that the plaintiff had made preparation for the marriage, and, in particular, had borrowed linen and other things from him.—On his cross-examination, he was asked, why those things were borrowed only? he answered, because the marriage bore a very numplush kind of appearance. Being requested to explain the meaning of the word numplush, he said, the Defendant did not know his own mind, and therefore it was a doubt whether the marriage would take place or not.

Mr. Park addressed the jury on the part of the Defendant. He said, that although this little ale-house which the defendant had taken in Knaresborough was for the purposes of this cause, swelled into a great Inn, and it was attempted to insinuate that the defendant was a man of property, yet, in truth, and in fact he was a poor man now, and had been an humble hostler when first he paid his devotions at the shrine of his adoration, the wash-tub of the plaintiff in this action. His client was a most unfortunate poor devil, and he trusted the Jury would not, by giving heavy damages in this silly case immure him in jail for the rest of his days.—For two long years his Client had paid his addresses, and offered his sincere love at the plaintiff's wash-tub; all that while the scornful lady of the suds refused his suit, and treated him with ineffable contempt: at length, wearied of her scorn in a moment of despair and vexation, he talked of love and marriage to the Harrowgate girl, and unfortunately for him before two witnesses. In the mean time, the scornful beauty who brought the present action, hearing that he was going to take a house and had some money she immediately relaxed from her wonted cruelty and consented to be his bride.—What was his poor Client to do in such a dilemma? On the one hand, there was a most unexpected consent from the scornful nymph of the suds, who exclusively possessed his heart; and on the other hand, that d—d Harrowgate girl, as he called her, with her two witnesses, threatened him with a prosecution and a jail if he did not marry her. Was ever man (to use the expression of the witness) in such a numplush? It had been doubted by many wise Philosophers, whether fear or love was the more powerful spring of human actions. Surely then, if it should appear that fear had most influence in a hostler's breast, the jury would not think he ought so to be punished by an endless imprisonment, which would be the consequence of their giving heavy damages. Indeed if the Jury were to give such encouragement to these actions, every maid servant in England would be bringing her action; for all of them have had, no doubt in their turn, nonsense talked to them by idle fellows, about love and marriage, and in the presence of some Mrs. Sly.—It appeared by the plaintiff's evidence that she had suffered no actual damages, as she still retains her situation in life, and her place at Mr. Stockdale's.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, that it had been clearly proved that the defendant had, both by his conduct, and by his express promise raised expectations which he had defrauded, and hopes which he had deceived: the Jury were, therefore, bound to give compensation in damages for the injury so received from the defendant by the plaintiff. There were however, no very aggravating circumstances attending this case, and in giving damages, the Jury should take care not utterly to ruin the Defendant. He had, himself admitted, that thirty guineas were too little; it therefore appeared that the Jury ought not to give less damages than what the defendant himself appeared to consider as an adequate compensation.

The jury after a few minutes consideration, found for the Plaintiff—Fifty pounds damages.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

How best to bind the flowing hair
With art, yet with an artless air;
In what nice braid, or glossy curl,
To fix a diamond or a pearl,
And how the purpled veil to choose
From silken stores of varied hues;
Which may attract the roving view
Pink, violet, purple, orange, blue,
The loveliest mantle to select
Or unembellish'd, or bedeck'd;
And how the twisted scarf to place
With most inimitable grace;
What skirts the mantle best may suit,
Ornate with stars of tissue'd fruit,
The flower embroider'd, or the plain
With silver, or with golden vein.

Sir WILLIAM JONES.

MRS. THELLUSSON'S MASQUERADE.

At Foley House, on Wednesday was given on city principles, and has created much conversation in the fashionable world. Many of the nobility and gentry of the first rank and respectability, as is usual on such occasions, applied for tickets; but the answer made by the Cerberus of the house, was, that none could be admitted who were not in the habit of inviting Mr. and Mrs. Thellusson to their parties. This was in the true spirit of traffic, to give and take; and the Thellussos were resolved to have the pull in their favours, as they would not stand the hazard of the gratitude of their guests and take their chance of being invited in return. They would issue tickets to no one who had not made an instalment in advance, leaving it to others to repent of having neglected them; and giving a salutary lesson for the future, that if they expect to participate in the fetes of Foley House, they must first establish a title by their hospitalities.

In consequence of this principle being laid down a great part of the fashionable world was refused, and Mrs. Thellusson for some days enjoyed the triumph of recounting the indifference with which she had treated their applications. But lo! when the night arrived, so many of the chosen few sent apologies (tickets not being transferable), many of them not wishing to go without their friends, or but in such parties as they could form agreeably, that the number present was diminished to a mortifying degree, especially with respect to the personages of the highest rank expected. Mr. and Mrs. Thellusson had, however, a very considerable company of their own class, though the assembly was shorn of its bright beams. The most distinguished persons were the Prince, and a party of about twenty which he took with him, and who had a private supper room assigned them. This party shed lustre over the whole, and kept up the dignity of the scene. The Prince was dressed as a Baron of ancient times, in scarlet, richly ornamented with gold. He wore an old-fashioned doublet of scarlet cloth; with slashed sleeves; a short cloak of scarlet cloth; the gold lace and fringe very deep and rich on both. Around the knees, the gold fringe was a quarter of a yard deep. A black hat with white feathers laid flat, and hanging out on each side; whiskers, and the face painted to disguise, formed the rest of the dress, which was prepared and put on under the direction of Mr. Kemble of Drury-lane Theatre, and did great honor to his taste. The dress was grand, and his Royal Highness made a noble appearance.

The preparations for the fete were in a very expensive style. The terrace next the garden was ornamented with oak and laurel in leaves, which formed an arched covering; variegated lamps were entwined, and the Prince's feathers appeared in the centre of the whole. A temporary colonnade was erected from the hall of the outer gate, in the court-yard, which was likewise lighted with lamps.

As, at these entertainments Religious characters appear as certainly as at church, so here we found the Marquis Townshend a Friar, and the Marchioness a Nun, the former preaching up abstinence and mortification; Miss Payne was also a Nun, and Mrs. T. Crespigny a Priestess of the Sun, mixing Paganism with Christianity. Among the devotees were Colonel Whitworth, Lady Fane, Sir J. St. Clair Erskine, and Serjeant Haywood, as Pilgrims, bound for the Holy land, and interrupted in their march by Mr. Jerningham, Mr. J. Manners, and Lord Henry Fitzgerald, as Turks, while the Turkish Ambassador, in his own proper dress, was highly entertained at seeing his countrymen, though he could not understand them. Among other foreigners we also found the Earl of Aboyne, as a Russian; Colonel Thornton, as a French Barber—tolerably well; Lord Charles Bentinck, a Swiss Peasant; Captain Munday, a Polander. The Spaniards were particularly numerous: among them were the Dukes of Orleans and Montpensier, Marquis of Winchester, Lords Templeton, Ossulstone, Westmoreland, Colonel Churchill; Messrs. Lascelles, Townsend, and Maitland. The native characters were not less numerous than those from foreign parts; and since the Prince appeared as a Highlander, that dress is coming into vogue. In it appeared Major Eustace, a Scotch Chieftain; Earl Temple, a Highlander; but certainly not from the land of starvation. Colonel Campbell, a Scotch Mendicant. The English Clowns were as numerous as usual, and consisted among others, of Mr. T. Skifner, Mr. E. Boldero, Lord C. Somerset, Mr. S. Thornton, Mr. H. Anson. The females of the same class were, the two Miss Manners, as Flower Girls; Miss Erskine, a Country Girl, Mrs. Erskine, a Cottager's Wife; Lady M. Montague, a Country Girl; and the most humorous of all, Mr. Champneys, an Old Welch Woman riding on Horseback with butter and eggs to market, admirably supported. Of the Clowns superiors, there were besides, the Prince, as an Ancient Baron, Colonel Montgomery, and Lord Edward Somerset in the same dress. To match the Ancient Barons there were Miss Strahan, Miss Baldero, and Mrs. J. Orde, as Old Maids. Lord and Lady John Thynne were in dresses of the last century, an excellent couple who ridiculed, by the covering our parents wore, the nakedness of the present day. The Jews were not numerous, and consisted only of Lord Limerick as Shylock, and Sir W. Sheridan, a Money Lender. We only noticed one Harlequin, Mr. Herbert, the weather being too warm, perhaps, for feats of agility. The Sailors were Captain Upton, Mr. Pierrepont, and Count Beaujolois. Among the more singular characters were the Honorable Mrs. Wynne, as Night, and Mr. Wynne in a dress comprehending the costume of all nations (not very clearly). Gen. Lenox as a Coachman, and Captain H. Townshend as the Brazin Mask, were both very good characters; Prince William of Gloucester seems very adverse to any character, as he again appeared in a coloured domino; Mr. Erskine played the part of a Boarding School Miss, paying morning visits, very well; Lord Milsington was a little noisy as Punch; Lady Smith Burgess was well dressed as a Ballad Singer; The two Miss Fordyces, as Fair Slaves, were very beautiful; Miss Eglintown accompanied them as a Hermit; Lord Paget was admirably dressed as a Hussar, and made an elegant appearance; Lady Paget looked beautifully; Lady Dungannon was also one of the most beautiful women in the company, and the most elegantly dressed in black lace, with silver and diamond chains; Mrs. Fitzherbert, and Lady Haggerstone, were in the Highland dress of the forty-second Regiment. Among the others, with hands and fancy dresses, were—the Duchesses of Buccleugh and Beaufort; Marchionesses of Winchester, Headfort, Bath, Donegal, and Salisbury; Ladies Liverpool, C. Jenkinson, Campbell, M. Taylor, three Thynnes, Harrington, A. M. Stanhope, L. Manners, Mildmay; Mrs. Malcolm, Mrs. and Miss Thompsons. Mr. Thomas Wynne was in the character of Charles A. with a beautiful woman hanging on his arm. Speaking of beautiful women, we should not omit to notice Ladies C. Campbell and Copingham, Mrs. Champneys, and A. M. Taylor. Mrs. Thellusson herself was magnificently dressed in blue and silver without a mask.

At one o'clock, when mirth began to flag, the great hall was opened to the motley groupe, having been fitted up under the direction of Mr. Thellusson, with an inn and shops of every description; each of which was filled by the undermentioned gentlemen, supporting their several characters with a degree of wit and vivacity scarcely ever equalled.

Sir W. W. Wynn and Mr. Thellusson the Landlord and Landlady of the Hotel; Mr. Champneys, as Doctor Galan Aesculape; Mr. Wrottesley, as Caleb Quotem; Colonel Armstrong, Jemmy Jumps; Lord Cranley, a Jew Broker; Mr. T. Sheridan, a Methodist Preacher in a Tub, highly entertaining; Mr. Giles, a Barber; Mr. Cox, Jobson; Mr. Wm. Fitzroy, Snip the Taylor; an Irish Gentleman, with an excellent song in character, dealing out whiskey. This party, for nearly one hour, supported a constant succession of mirth and good humour; and altho' many of them early in the evening had exerted themselves in other characters, particularly Mr. Champneys, as an Old Welch Woman on horseback, with butter and eggs, wit and repartee did not slacken. The supper succeeded, disposed in seven different rooms, and at three o'clock the Phantasmagoria opened, and filled up that vacant moment which the departure of night, and the arrival of the morning dawn, might otherwise have rendered dull; at four the gardens opened, and displayed all the freshness of spring. It was five o'clock.

Many of those who would wish to be considered young men of wit, as well as fashion, were as simple in mask as they are in general when unmasked; and because they are not equal to the support of a character, think it sufficient to ornament the rooms with their pretty persons.

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

[Your Peter Piper, and his peck of pepper, have recalled to my memory the following jumble of words.]

On Sintac tap, there is a cap,
And in that cap there is a drap;
Take up the cap, drink out the drap,
And leave the cap on Sintac tap.

On the top of Sintac, a high mountain of the south of Scotland, there is a large stone, in the form of a cap, which generally contains a quantity of water. A Scotch traveller, viewing this curiosity, his muse produced the above lines. It is for you, Mr. Oldschool, to determine whether they be poetical or logical. Yours, P.

THE DRAMA.

The tragedy of The Revenge was performed on Covent Garden Theatre for the first time these fifteen years. Cooke seems determined to pursue Kemble through the entire range of his characters. Zanga is not one of those in which he encounters him with most success; yet it is a source of high pleasure to the public that talents so respectable should be tried in every thing, though they may in some instances fall short of the perfection of the Roscus of Drury-lane.

Cooke expressed the stronger passages with much force, but he appeared to us to fall short in the more delicate. In the bold, direct sarcasms no man could surpass him, and his exultation at the accomplishment of his design was truly grand; but he did not appear to enjoy the previous and subordinate mischiefs as he went along. Our conception of the character supposes it proper to appear delighted with every new wound given to that peace which it is the ultimate object totally to destroy. In the fulshood and dissimulation preparatory to the great entanglement, in the arguments urged to induce Carlos to resign Leonora and Alonso to receive her, great art and judgment were displayed; but the principal excellence was in Zanga's explanation of the extent of the injuries done to Alonso, and the declaration that he was the author of them. Thus there was much to admire, as there must be in every thing that Cooke attempts, unless he entirely loses sight of himself. Yet we cannot bestow that degree of praise on the performance altogether that Cooke is intitled to in his best characters.

Mr. Siddons, in Alonso, acquitted himself admirably. He displayed with feeling and correctness the successive emotions of friendship, honour, confidence, love, jealousy, and remorse. If not entitled already to rank with our best actors, he is at least one of the fairest hope of the stage. Mrs. Litchfield sustained the part of Leonora with great propriety, with much strength of colouring and happy discrimination. Mrs. St. Leger, in Isabella, did not enter with sufficient earnestness into the business in which she took so active a part. Mr. Brunton in Carlos was in general languid; but he shewed sufficient interest and animation in the scene in which he resigned Leonora to Alonso.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

It is supposed that if the duty of residence were generally observed by the clergy, in England, that the schism shops, as they are nervously called, of the puritans, would gradually diminish, and that true religion would gradually increase. When our remarker observes, from the top of any hill, in the happy little island of Great-Britain, we behold the numerous churches, which, by the wisdom, the piety, and the liberality of our forefathers have been scattered around, we are naturally astonished, not that puritanism and its inseparable concomitant disloyalty should not be destroyed, but that it should ever, for a moment, have existed.

A living poet, whose admiration of Edmund Burke led to the composition of a poem entitled Innovation, thus apostrophizes that sublime genius.

O thou, in whose emphatic page we trace,
The glowing beauties of each sister grace,
As prompt to crown the patriot's ardent vow,
They lift the veil from Wisdom's awful brow;
O thou, whose toils, with equal scorn, defy
The smooth perversion and the shameless lye;
The sorry ridicule, which fools impart,
And the cold sneer which speaks the canker'd heart.
While, blest, by all their country's weal, who prize,
While, blest, by all the good and all the wise;
If, in some moment of reluctant pause,
Which toiling Virtue yields to Nature's laws,
When rustic arts, and rustic converse charm,
And the light labour of thy cultur'd farm,
When social trifles smooth the brow of care,
The Muse shall claim their grateful task to share:
Oh! meet her homage with no cold distrust,
Severely grateful, as severely just.

The following epitaph on a great arithmetician and accountant, I find in a very pleasant work, entitled "The Meteors;"

Truth could not add unto his honest fame,
Nor malice dare subtract a jot from same;
Peaceful his life, no strife he ever made,
And ditto of his death was justly said
Division he ne'er cast 'tween man and wife,
He lov'd to multiply, as he lov'd life,
For simple interest he had many rules,
But left all compound unto knaves and fools.

The Editor of the Farmer's Museum always writes sensibly, whenever modern France is his topic. His sentiments are correct and prophetic. "The revolutionizing spirit, which has characterized the French nation for some years past having subsided, a new system has commenced under the reign of the first Buonaparte. Such a catastrophe from such tragic scenes, was to be expected. All the articles of optical deception are now dispensed with, and with his wand and word, the chief juggler commands presto begone; and the real monarch for life appears, with a power and splendor which eclipses that of any of the Bourbons. The people were dissatisfied with the government of a mild prince. If they had a log for their monarch, like the frogs in the fable they mounted on his back and insulted him, till Heaven has at last sent them one whose little finger is as thick as the loins of the former. We hear occasionally of conspiracies against his life, many of which we presume are forged for some political or speculating purpose. Still, it is pretty certain there are many restless principals of the revolution who are dissatisfied with the political Colossus who strides over them. The existence of these characters makes it probable that,

"—Short will be his reign; his rigid yoke
And tyrant power will puny sects provoke;
And frogs and toads and all the tadpole train
Will croak to heav'n, from this devouring crane."

Boswell informs us, that Dr. Johnson once repeated to him with the utmost energy of applause, the original of the following lines, translated from JUVENAL. The sentiments are wonderfully noble, as will be perceived, in Mr. Gifford's version.

Be brave, be just; and when thy country's laws
Call thee to witness in a dubious cause,
Though Philaris place his bull before thine eye,
And frowning, dictate to thy lips a lie,
Think it the height of baseness, breath to choose
Ere Honour; and Life's end for life to lose.
Life, I recall the word; can he be said
To live, who merits death? No, he is dead;
Though Gauran oysters load his sumptuous board
And o'er his limbs all Vossio's sweets be pour'd.

The following extract from a London print, is recommended to the very serious attention of some of the Courts of Justice in Pennsylvania, and, indeed in many of the other states. The noise, and want of decorum in our Tribunals remind every blushing stranger of the bear garden and the brawling streets. There are regions, where the insolence of the vulgar, and the boorishness of clamorous crowds are tamely suffered. There is a country too from which we derive our laws, where Justice is not only righteously administered, but has a voice of dignity, which makes itself heard, and exercises a strong arm of power to repress the tumultuous movements of the rabble*.

* The Editor is very happy to find his opinion on the subject corroborated by the good sense of Dr. V. Knox, a writer who is far from being a foe to rational liberty.

The existence of society confessedly depends upon a regular subordination. What deranges or disturbs this regularity, even in the idea of the subaltern ranks, shakes the basis of society. All, who are raised by civil distinctions above the level of natural equality, are under obligations to preserve an appearance of dignity, adequate to their situation and correspondent to their real importance. Respect should be decently exacted, wherever it is due, not from a principle of pride, or from a littleness of mind; but because it facilitates the due degrees of necessary acquiescence; because it regulates the complex movements of the political machine. Even formality and dress, though futile in themselves, when abstractedly considered, have been preserved with care, in the flourishing period of an empire, because they tended to promote tranquillity. They excited an awe among the rude and the refractory which ensured a ready submission to legal authority. Let Philosophy boast its pretensions, we are yet so constituted, that not only the uncultivated, but the enlightened also, are powerfully affected by external appearance. He, who is in the useful and sacred office of distributing Justice, must endeavour to appear awful to the rude ruffian and the miscreant of society. There is a beauty in decorum, which renders the assumption of external dignity, when it is supported by mental and official importance, agreeable as well as venerable.

I find in looking into Clithero's Life of Judge BLACKSTONE, that "after he became a Judge, he thought it his duty to keep strictly up to forms, and not to lessen the respect, due to the dignity and gravity of his office, by any outward levity of behaviour."

An accomplished character of antiquity, skilled in every part of forensic duty, and of forensic dignity, thus describes the decorum of a magistrate.

Est proprium munus magistratus intelligere se gerere personam civitatis, debereque ejus dignitatem et decus sustinere.

Let the following article be read, and, for the sake of decency, for the sake of dignity, for the advancement of business, and for the promotion of justice, let us hope that all indecorous tumult in our Tribunals may hereafter be legally quelled.

"The audience in Guildhall was yesterday (14th June) very noisy, and interrupted the proceedings of the court of king's bench several times;—at length the Chief Justice inquired whose duty it was to keep silence, and being informed it was the sheriff's he immediately stopped the proceedings in the cause, until the under sheriff made his appearance. His lordship then informed him, that it was fit that they should be able to administer the justice of this country without interruption. "I understand, sir," said he, "that it is your duty to order silence kept; I therefore fine you 5l. for your negligence; and unless silence be hereafter observed, I shall have recurrence to the same means to enforce your attention to your duty."

Another circumstance is sufficiently momentous to deserve the attention of our law officers, in general, and the writer of this article hopes that none will be so uncharitable, or so incorrect, as to suppose the remark is invidious, when he calls upon all concerned to reflect how little regard is paid to what may be called the costume of the Court. Men of great talents and of incorruptible integrity who administer Justice from many an elevated bench with equal ability and uprightness, are too careless of their exterior. They are negligent of dress; they are not always awake to their dignity. Now, as man is modified, and especially as society is modified, in this country, it is not merely pleasing, but of singular utility, that Justice should be decorously arrayed. An ermined robe, or sable silk are things trivial in themselves, but if the magistrate, thus invested, command the respect of the crowd, or inspire awe in the criminal, then is dress itself a subject of no trivial interest.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

A very general objection to the plan of this paper is occasioned by our sometime neglect of Political Disquisitions. These shall have their turn. Perhaps, the Editor is inordinate in his love of Literature. But his attachment to topics of a permanent, rather than of a fleeting character may be justified by the classical Dr. KNOX, who has exercised his pen, in the service both of the Nation, and the Muses. Though Politics, a subject adapted to raise the passions, engross the thoughts of most men, yet Reason informs me a community may be most permanently and importantly served, by the peaceful labours of the Student. I will not derogate from the glory of arms, or the merit of political conflicts, but I will say that he effects a durable and substantial good to society, who labours to diffuse the light of Literature. He sows seeds of excellence, which, if the soil be not ungrateful, may spring up to aggrandize empires; and of virtues, which may, in future ages, bless and exalt human nature. When temporary subjects shall have passed away, like the morning dew, those which are intended to promote a real and universal good, will continue to diffuse a beneficial influence.

BIBO quotes the example and the precept of Sir William Jones, to justify his Invocation to the bewitching Powers of Madeira and Melody, and hopes that some of the maladies of the mind will yield to a charm, like this,

If Wine and Music have the power,
To ease the SICKNESS OF THE SOUL:
Let Phœbus every string explore,
And Bacchus fill the sprightly bowl.

The Imitation of Cotton's "Fire Side" is perfectly to our taste. The politics which the poet ridicules, the Editor detests.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

SONNET TO ELIZA.

Tho' love has often sway'd this heart,
And bade it glow with all his fires,
Yet ne'er before did he impart
Such gentle thoughts, such soft desires.

I do not feel that ardent flame,
Too fierce for reason to controul;
But passions far too sweet to name,
That sink in languishment the soul.

Eliza, language is too weak
To say how fully I was blest,
When the soft blush o'erspread thy cheek;
And clasp'd in transport to my breast,
I heard thy voice, in words divine,
Tell me each trembling wish was mine.

FROM THE ITALIAN.

How fortune deceptive was smiling of late!
Now dark are the clouds that o'ershadow my fate!
Such gloom hides the scene that once teem'd with delight,
That hope has not radiance to banish the night.

The mind of refinement may anxiously try,
The arrows of grief and misfortune to fly;
But vainly shall try, if th' attempt to oppose,
The bosom of beauty partake in its woes.

AN EXPOSTULATION.

Shall Orpheus be forever prais'd,
Because a shade from hell he rais'd,
And I neglected here remain,
Whose fute could drive it back again?
Tho' Pluto wept (so great his skill!)
And snakes round furies' heads grew still;
His charms I'd break, make Pluto roar,
And snakes, entwining, hiss encore!

TO A RINGLET OF HAIR.

Dear relique of the gentle maid,
Who rules unrivall'd in my heart;
Oft round her polish'd brow you play'd,
Or careless, unconfin'd by art,

O'er her white bosom's graceful swell,
(Unconscious of the blissful scene,
Where lurking loves delight to dwell)
Have lain, in apathy serene.

Alas! like me, dissever'd now
From where you would forever grow;
No more to wreath around her brow,
Or, careless, on her bosom flow,

What is your worth?—Oh! ever dear,
While fancy, living on her charms,
Can recollect the standing tear,
When fortune from her circling arms,

With scowling mien, and brow severe,
Tore me—alas! from her so true—
For then Eliza plac'd you here,
And strove, but could not say adieu.

FROM THE ITALIAN.

Where shall I go, dearest Zaira?
What shall I do, far from thee?
Maid beloved! maid adored!
O, speak thou—speak thou for me!

How does fortune joy to sever,
Hearts that feel a mutual glow!
Blight each bud of promis'd pleasure,
And plant deep the thorns of woe!

TRANSLATION OF A FRENCH GLEE.

Of old, Philosophers declar'd
From any thing without them
No happiness could e'er be found—
And which of us will doubt them?

Then since this wine, which smiles so sweet,
And strives so much to win us,
Can give no happiness without,
Let's try its power within us.

SELECTED POETRY.

A FAMILIAR EPISTLE FROM THE SHADES BELOW, GIVING AN ACCOUNT OF THE STATIONS AND OCCUPATIONS OF DECEASED POETS.

Why how now, friend Richard? Because a man's dead,
Will you break off acquaintance? d'ye think he can't read?

Had you sent a small packet by Charon, post paid,
It had safely arriv'd—he's a trusty old blade;
However, I hate to be churlish and crusty,
Or stand upon forms—so resolve to write first t' ye.

Know then that my will was first finish'd—that done,
I had nothing to do, but to die and be gone.
Well, in due form of law, then I fairly departed,
And quickly and safely was hither transported.
As I know you are curious in search of things strange,
I'll relate what I found by my whimsical change.

The poets, both Grecian and Roman of old,
Of whom we so many fine things have been told,
Live here in great state, are grandees of the court,
To whom all the moderns most humbly resort,
Yet few find admittance, or favour with those,
So poor their appearance, so shabby their clothes;
Some, indeed, a small pittance, or place, may obtain;

But the rest are a sad ragged crew in the main:
In short, the whole tribe are at best, but so so,
As you'll find by their state and employment below.

Old Chaucer and Drayton I found in good plight,
And Shakespeare and Spencer appear pretty tight;
They've each a small freehold, tho' troth bounded in sore,

And live not unlike to our poor knights of Windsor.
Ben Johnson sells ale on the side o' the hill,
And Beaumont and Fletcher go halves in a mill.
But Denham enjoys a small post in the state,
And Dorset and Juvenal's grown very great;
Whilst poor sir John Suckling is but a knife grinder,
And Cowley, poor Cowley's a lacquey to Pindar.

Friend Wilmot's a mountebank, Villiers his droll,
Charles Sedley their toad eater, Howard their fool.
Old Milton still blind, but much in request,
With Homer and Virgil, and most of the best;
And Addison lately assign'd for his guide,
Enjoys a small place and a pension beside:
Old Naso and Waller most hugely agree,
But Ar'stotle t'other day cudgelled poor Lee.

But Butler of all looks the best let me tell ye,
Has money, good clothes, and can now fill his belly;
Is lately prefer'd as his highness's jester,
For which he per diem has two and a tester.
In troth I was glad to see Butler so mended,
Who had suffer'd so greatly before he descended.

Old Dryden sells nectar, an excellent dram,
And Shadwell is kept by a wealthy old dame;
He was always a lover, you know, of the same.

Rough Wycherly sells penknives, razors and scissars,
And Otway pincushions, essence, and tweezers.
Tom Brown's a black shoe boy, and carries a link,
A sad dirty whore's bird, and lies in a sink;
Joe Haines and Dick Estcourt are poor, but yet
merry,

And Philips for's highness makes cyder and perry;
But Plautus and Terence, both wealthy and able,
Have taken friend Congreve to wait at their table.

Behn, Manley, Centlivre, I found in the stocks,
It seem'd they'd purloin'd the Muses' foul smocks;
By washing and scouring, they are now forc'd to live,
No wonder, poor devils, they sought thus to thrive.

Johnny Crown keeps a raree show, Farquhar's a sutler,

And Horace has made Matthew Prior his butler.
Nat Rowe waits on Sophocles, has a good place on't,
But Hughes still is poor, though he puts a good face on't.

Tom Durfey sings ballads and cobbles old shoes,
And honest Dick Steele runs about with the news.

Here are more, but so ragged, so poor and so sad,
'Twere a shame you should know, their condition's so bad.

As for me, I am just advertis'd to be let,
So what will become of me, cannot tell yet.
I can rhyme, comb a wig, shave, pick up a w.,
And few of the moderns I think can do more.
When once I am settled, I'll write you again,
Till then your old friend, honest Dick, I remain.

PARODY OF SHAKESPEARE.

.....How crowd the numbers to yon bark!
There will we go and let the sound of money
Chink in our ears; such bustle at high noon
Delight, the griping trade of usury;
Look at the notes; see how the heavy desks
Are thick o'er laid with eagles of bright gold:
There's not the lowest clerk, whom we behold,
But in his station like an angel talks!
Still issuing out the cash to keen-eyed claimants,
Such glee is in receiving dividends;
But, while these humble cots of Poverty
Do vilely close us in, we cannot share them,
Come, ho! and "in a new attempt to please"
What duteous touches pierce your grandam's ear
To draw out from her stock; for what the poets—Did feign that Orpheus drew trees, stones, and floods,
Is nought to bills made payable at sight.
The man that hath no money in his purse
Nor cannot meet with credit, on his name—
Is fit for treasons, mobs, equality;
The motions of his spirit are sly as theft
And his affections dark as treachery—
Let no such man be trusted.

CHAPTER X.

American small game.

I shall say only a few words about the game, and those, only of the smaller kind of game. The larger sort, such as deer, bears, elks, moose, bison, or as they are commonly called, buffaloes, are to be found, the three last only westward of the Allegany mountain, and deer and bears only westward of the Blue mountain. There are however, some deer upon Long Island, and in the barren parts of New-Jersey. There is in America, thank God, no turning out of stags, to hunt for mere pleasure. Whoever can take the deer by surprise, shoots him. It is not much to the honour of the naturalists, that they have not yet ascertained, whether the Virginian deer, be a roe-buck or an hart, or the connecting link between the two.

The wild turkey might likewise be reckoned among the large game. They are to be found only in the western regions, or near the Allegany mountain.

The small game is as follows. Hares, which appear to be an intermediate species between hares and rabbits; they are much smaller than the hare, and not larger than the rabbit of Europe. They are scarcely seen at all, the whole summer through; they must bring forth their young in holes under ground. Their flesh is white, like that of rabbits, and insipid; excepting the legs, which are good. They always sit in a bush, and being surrounded with much prickly shrubbery, the dogs cannot well start them. Spaniels will not answer the purpose; hounds are the best for it, and fox hounds in particular excellent. They sit so firm, that the bush may be beaten a long time before they will start. They run like hares and not like rabbits. They are but thinly strewed about the country, and are seldom to be found in the fields. This chase can by no means be compared with the European hare hunting. On account of their smallness and swiftness, they are harder to shoot than the European hares, and owing to the same smallness, many of them must be killed, to make a tolerably good chase. They are sometimes shot likewise in their holes.

Foxes are very scarce. There are racoons only in the large forests. Squirrels constitute a considerable branch of this small chase. They emigrate in autumn. They are shot upon trees. There are dogs trained for the purpose; which stand still and howl under trees upon which squirrels are perched; whereupon the hunter shoots them down.

The woodcock broods in Pennsylvania, and draws to the southward in October and November; it returns again in March, to Pennsylvania, and the other middle states. The American woodcock weighs five and an half ounces, and is only half as large as the European, which weighs eleven ounces. It has a reddish grey breast and belly. Its back is brown and spotted. It has a deep red glittering appearance, as it flies, and has a shrill piping note in the air. It flies straight forward, and is easy to shoot upon the wing, though very hard when in the bush. The young ones may be shot as early as July: they keep at that time in the meadows, and may be killed in great numbers, as the young ones have not strength to fly well. In August, however, they retire into the bushes. I have been told that the old ones often take the young brood upon their backs, and fly away with them. Their taste is various: many are excellent; others have a dry, tough flesh, and are very lean, according to what has been their food. They are found along the brooks, in the bushes, and are hunted with spaniels.

The American partridge is smaller than the common grey one of Europe, and not much larger than a quail; it seems to be an intermediate bird, between the quail and the partridge. It has however all the habits of the partridge; and is found in flocks. It is affirmed that the whole flock lay their eggs in one nest, and relieve one another in brooding over them by turns. They are commonly found in bushes along the water. They have much more red in their colours than the common grey partridge; they have instead of a red, a yellow circle round the eyes. They fly swifter than the European partridge, and being also smaller, they are hard to shoot. Their flesh is very tender and has an excellent taste.

The snipe is exactly like that of Europe, and appears in Pennsylvania as in Europe, in the spring and autumn.

The Pennsylvanian pheasant, properly belongs to the woodcock species; there is however nothing black in its feathers, but brown, grey, and whitish waving lines; all these colours are not clean, but dirty. This is the finest feathered game in the middle states. They are always in the woods, along brooks and rivers, but are likewise to be found upon the most arid rocks. They are uncommonly fond of bilberries, which I believe are likewise called blackberries. M. de Buffon calls them collared hens. They make a great noise when they take wing. They fly astonishingly swift, though straight forward, so that they are very difficult to shoot in the bush. Their flesh is white and tender, and uncommonly well tasted. Their young may be shot as early as the month of July, and are then extremely delicate food. Some few of them are still to be found not far from Philadelphia, westward of the Schuylkill, as also round Germantown; but only a few. Not far from Lancaster too, there are some: but they are in great numbers, only westward of the blue mountain, and especially along the Susquehannah. They are not much larger than the grey partridge. They have a collar of black feathers round the neck. They make a noise like a drum, whereby they betray themselves. The Americans who can shoot nothing flying, shoot them when they settle upon trees after being started; they do this, where they are still numerous, and have not grown shy. They may be hunted with spaniels; but then the dog must search for them close before the hunter, because otherwise he would see nothing in the wood, when the dog should come to a stand. The American partridge likewise settles sometimes upon trees. From all this it appears sufficiently clear, that a man must be a very good shot indeed, to kill much game in America.

It is proper to observe further for the information of hunters, that the pheasants commonly keep together in pairs, so that when one has taken flight, he may hold himself ready to shoot at the other. The finest of all the wild fowl in America, is the species of woodcock, called by Buffon the snow mercury, on account of two feathers which look like small wings at the back of its head. I believe it is also called the Pennsylvania woodcock, or woodcock of Hudson's Bay. It is called in English a grouse.

It is altogether as large as an European woodcock, or as a capon. It is found only upon Long-Island, in certain barren plains in New-Jersey, not far from Bethlehem in Pennsylvania, on the blue mountain, and to the westward of it; in short, wherever there is dry, barren land. On the Susquehannah, and to the westward of that river, there is not one of them to be seen. They are fondest of dry, barren plains, grown over with what are called in America, ground-acorns. This shrub is but three, or at most four feet high. They brood in these bushes, and are found together in coveys, like partridges. Such a flock of them often amounts to the number of twenty. It requires a strong spaniel to beat them up in these bushes. The flock lays very much dispersed about in the morning, and in the evening, when they feed. After many of them have been shot, there are others often remaining, which keep still: they must therefore be carefully hunted up. The dogs must not chace, after the shot, for if they do, the hunter, while reloading, will have the mortification to see the birds starting up on all sides. They are likewise shot sitting, in the evening and morning in autumn, after the buckwheat harvest has been gathered in; for they are very fond of buckwheat fields. I have at such times seen them come in flocks of twenty and thirty at a time. The hunter conceals himself in such a field, behind a fence, or digs himself a hole in the ground. After a shot, the birds flew back to the bushes, but within five minutes, one of the male birds appeared, as the leader of the troop, and perched upon the fence to reconnoitre, and call the others. Hereupon they came altogether, and the ground was quite strewed with them; more of them were then shot: upon which they once more disappeared, to return again after a few minutes; and thus the sport continued, until it was dark.

They are esteemed in America as the finest tasted game. Their flesh is black. They are said to be poisonous in the month of February, because they feed at that time upon the kalmia berry. The pheasants are likewise said to be poisonous at times.

The plover is a very delicate bird. A bird of passage. They are plenty in September. They are shot flying, for they draw nearer, when they are whistled after.

The wild pigeons, are not so abundant in the Atlantic states as they have been heretofore. They take their flight now, through the less inhabited western parts.

There is a greater variety of wild ducks in America, than in Europe. A very large sort of duck, with handsome plumage, is called by them in English, the canvass duck. Wild ducks however, are not very plenty upon the rivers of the Atlantic states, and are therefore more abundant upon the north-western lakes. Wild geese are principally found in considerable numbers, only upon the sea coast; they are larger than those of Europe.

In the thrush kind, America is poor. There is only the red breasted robin, which is very common, that can be accounted of that number. These brood in Pennsylvania, and their young, which have a very good taste, are shot in July.

The black bird, so called, belongs properly to the starling tribe. They are in excessive quantities, and do much damage to the corn; on the other hand, they devour many insects, which, since they have been thinned away, constantly grow more troublesome, and do great injury to the trees. There are no sparrows. What in America they call a lark, has a yellow breast and is larger than that of Europe. But it neither soars into the air, nor enlivens the fields by its song like its European namesake; I do not believe it belongs to the lark tribe. But it has a very good taste. Very few birds are met in the woods. A solemn stillness prevails throughout them, interrupted only by the screaming of crows. The only singing bird in America which can be compared with the nightingale is the mocking bird, which is however in Philadelphia very scarce.

I must further inform the lovers of hunting, that in America their dogs are subject to very dangerous distempers. The climate is very adverse to them. Dogs must be imported from Europe, for they degenerate in America. Madness among them is frequent. And they perish, when they overheat themselves.

CHAPTER XI.

Neighbourhood of Philadelphia. Road to Lancaster. Neighbourhood of Lancaster.

By adding here, the remarks made in my several excursions in America, most of which were made on foot, I propose to illustrate most of the opinions, which I have expressed. But first, I must say something of the neighbourhood of Philadelphia.

This neighbourhood is very handsome, though not that which borders upon the city. You must go half a German mile (two English miles) from the city before you find any thing interesting. Close upon the city, the English have cut down all the trees. All is bald, and full of filth from the city. It is only on the Schuylkill that the neighbourhood is truly enchanting. Gently rising hills, crowned with elegant country seats border on both sides the bed of this romantic river. Five English miles above the city are the falls of the Schuylkill, where it flows through a range of Granite. The neighbourhood here is romantic. A large brook pours into the Schuylkill, not far from the fall. Its banks are naked rocks, out of which trees, however, grow.

A mixture of hills, vallies, clear streams, meadows and agreeable shrubbery, make the neighbourhood round Germantown very charming. Some elegant villas, and still more pretty country seats, further encrease the beauty of this enchanting picture. Germantown is a village handsomely built, and consisting of one very long street. It lies at the back of a high hill, and enjoys a very clear and wholesome air. The banks of the Delaware, on the other hand, are very flat and uninteresting. The opposite shore of New-Jersey, is a flat sandy plain, grown over with bushes.

The neighbourhood around Philadelphia, to some distance, is however, by no means fruitful. They can raise upon it scarcely any wheat, on account of the quantities of garlic with which the ground is filled. The land is somewhat better for grass.

Westward of the Schuylkill the land is barren and dry. The road to Lancaster which runs directly west, (Lancaster being only about five minutes northward of Philadelphia) is, as far as the village of Downingtown, very uninteresting. Downingtown, is half way to Lancaster, and thirty-three English miles from Philadelphia. At Downingtown you come near to the chain of mountains, which bound the valley of Lancaster on the south eastern side. The south eastern side of this mountain would be uncommonly well adapted to the cultivation of the vine. Not far from Downingtown, flows an arm of the Brandywine. The civilization of a people may be recognized in the name of their rivers. The Indian names are mostly well sounding, such as Susquehannah, Allegany, Ohio, &c. But by the name of Brandywine, you discover at once what sort of people they were who gave it to this beautiful river.

At Downingtown, the first inn, is kept by a quaker family. They entertain you pretty well, but make you pay well too, and the people of the house have the disobliging manners common to quakers. I can however, recommend to travellers the second inn.

There are two ways over the above mentioned chain of mountains; the old, and the new made road. In travelling by the old way, you have an excellent prospect from the top of the mountain upon the valley of Lancaster. Nothing but water is wanting to the landscape seen from that spot, to give it an extraordinary degree of beauty. Fields, meadows, small groves, good looking farms, hills, vallies, are all here, and at a distance, the horizon in blue obscurity, bounded by an high mountain top, called the south mountain. It is the nearest hill top to the blue mountain.

Upon the turnpike road you have no such fine prospect, though it crosses alike, the mountains. But on the other hand this neighbourhood has its appropriate beauties. A torrent rustles over the rocks by the side of the way, with its clear, though foaming stream. On both sides of the road rise mountains, or rather rocks covered with wood.

The chain of mountains is very broad, and when you have ascended them, they sink very gradually again, on the Lancaster side, so that you form at first no advantageous idea of the fertility so much celebrated, of the county of Lancaster; for the neighbourhood is very arid. But you soon come to the fruitful loam, which distinguishes the county of Lancaster above all the rest of Pennsylvania.

One English mile distant from Lancaster you cross over the great Conestoga, upon a bridge. This river has rocky banks, and meanders between woody hills until it falls into the Susquehannah. The country here is high. The Conestoga pours itself between two woody mountains into that superb river, which here, is very wide: on the opposite western shore, the blue mountains rise in picturesque forms, and it is here interspersed with numerous islands.

The little Conestoga falls into the larger river of that name, five English miles above the mouth of the latter. The banks of the great Conestoga are romantic; those of the little Conestoga have a soft, pleasing beauty. They exhibit the image of plenty. Luxuriant meadows adorn its banks, and their beauty is further ornamented with rose bushes. In other places its clear silvery waters rolling over gravel, are overshadowed by hedges of willows. It is divided into numerous canals, to improve more extensively the fertility of the meadows. Here it murmurs in slight water falls. There it flows so lazily along, that the eye can scarcely perceive the motion of the water. Here at the proper seasons of the year, the red breasted wood snipes may be shot. The plover, the cooing turtle dove, and the pretty American partridge, delight also in these pleasant fields.

The strong scented meadows, are bounded by gently rising small hills, on the sides of which, fruitful fields and small groves alternately succeed one another, and which being beautified by well built country seats and fruit gardens, exhibit a variegated landscape to the eye. This is an Arcadian region, but its inhabitants are by no means of that description.

Between the great and the little Conestoga, and nearly at an equal distance from both, stands the city of Lancaster, built upon the side of an hill. In travelling to it upon the turnpike road from Philadelphia, the finest prospect is upon the high hills along the great Conestoga, where woods and fields appear in a picturesque reciprocal succession, and well built farm houses in romantic situations enliven the picture.

The German Lutheran church in Lancaster, has an handsome steeple which gives a charming appearance to the city. In general the red and white colours of the houses, together with the green of so many gardens, forms a smiling picture, when you look down upon the city from the neighbouring hills. This place would be very good for the cultivation of the vine. The little Conestoga yields good eels. The numerous mill dams prevent the shad from proceeding up the Susquehannah into this little river.

This neighbourhood is at least for the present, on account of its high cultivation, the Paradise of the Atlantic states, and for this cultivation it is indebted to the Germans.

CHAPTER XII.

Journey to the branches of the Susquehannah.

In May, 1796, I made an excursion towards the north west, up the Susquehannah, to Sunbury, Northumberland and the western branch of this river, upwards, to Derrytown which is also called Lewistown. From Lancaster to Elizabethtown, at the foot of the south mountain, at the northern boundaries of Lancaster county the land is continually ascending; it is uninteresting, and the nearer you approach to Elizabethtown, the more barren it grows. Elizabethtown is a dirty village, inhabited by cut-purse inn keepers. From Elizabethtown to Middletown, a distance of eight English miles, you cross over the south mountain, which is here not at all high, but very broad. After passing over this mountain, you come upon the banks of the Swatara, a river not inconsiderable, but which in the morning and evening is covered with unhealthy vapours, which give fevers and fluxes to the inhabitants. Middletown is rather a large village, built of log houses. Here are numerous mills upon the Swatara. From Middletown to Harrisburg, the road goes along by the Susquehannah. The soil is sandy. On the western bank a chain of mountains joins close upon the river and runs parallel with it.

Harrisburg is a place for fevers, and indeed for the yellow fever. I fell here into the clutches of one of my own countrymen, a Magdeburger, who keeps an inn, and made me pay half a guinea for a meal. Shortly after, he stole and ran away. I dined in company with some merchants of Philadelphia, who would not hear a word of what I recommended, if there must be an aristocracy at all, the aristocracy of the wise and virtuous.

In the afternoon I proceeded as far as Mr. McAllister's, who being mentioned in Mr Cooper's book, is known in Europe. Cooper has extensively, and as I found, accurately described his plantation, as a model. He is really one of the most intelligent farmers in America. He likewise keeps an inn, the American inns a well provided table must not be expected. They generally give tea or coffee for supper. Here, at McAllister's, we had coffee white turnips and bread and butter, for which I paid two shillings. It must not be supposed that the cheapness will increase with the distance from the sea-ports. Here, in the mountains, I found every thing enormously dear.

M^r. Allister lives in the gap where the Susquehannah flows through the Blue mountain. The country is wild and romantic, but barren. The river makes a fall where it divides the mountain; this happens at every chain of mountains through which it flows. The rocks are there always in the same direction with the summit of the mountain.

Harrisburg is situated on a plain, close upon the banks of the Susquehannah, which forms here several agreeable islands. This boasted region has otherwise nothing remarkable. The place is over-run with lawyers; a class of men who have shewn themselves so devoted in Europe to democracy, but who are, in America, wholly aristocratic. They inveighed incessantly against the forced loan in France. "A fine freedom! forsooth!" was their exclamation.

From Harrisburg to M^r. Allister's, a distance of seven English miles, the road proceeds along the level banks of the Susquehannah, which here flows in tranquil majesty along. The Blue mountains extending like a wall from north-east to south-west, form here an handsome prospect. These banks are interspersed with well-built houses; the soil, however, is a sandy loam; and is not fertile.

At M^r. Allister's we met a certain Mr. W— with his young, and interesting daughter, who seemed not to have so much regard for her betrothed lover, Mr. M. as he had for her. Mr. W— is a land speculator, suddenly grown rich; who resides at Sunbury on account of his speculations. The most favourable period for land speculations was from 1791 to 1796; in many instances 100,000 dollars were made in two months time out of 100. The astonishing rise in the price of produce, occasioned by the European war, and pushed on by usurers, naturally gave a rapid appreciation to lands. I speak only of uncultivated lands. Suppose for instance, one hundred thousand acres are purchased for as many dollars. The purchaser pays not more than two thousand dollars immediately down in cash, and for the remainder gives a bond, promising payment by installments of the whole sum; part in four years for example, and the whole in six. The land rises, and the purchaser, for his two thousand, or his twenty thousand dollars that he has paid, sells it again for two millions. These great sums will, indeed, never be paid, because the fall of lands, which, in 1797, has already begun must draw after it numerous bankruptcies among the land usurers. But, in the meantime, they have, during five years, warmed their imagination with the pleasant prospect of enormous sums, and have made large profits upon small sums by the appreciation of the purchase monies. A man who purchases one hundred thousand acres for as many dollars, and sells them again for two millions, makes in his own fancy, a profit of eighteen hundred thousand dollars: but if he paid five thousand dollars earnest money, and receives twenty thousand his actual profit is only of fifteen thousand dollars; for as to realising the remaining enormous sums, that will be out of the question. These successful land speculations, and the speculating spirit kindled by them, have had, since 1791, a prodigious effect in corrupting the morals. People, who were formerly poor, and who without labour, without doing any thing useful, have grown suddenly rich, wallow in the filth of sensual pleasures. Hence arises, throughout the whole people, an eagerness to be rich without industry, without useful labour. Such a national spirit must very soon cease, or hurry the nation into the most wretched condition. This monstrous evil, which every one surely will acknowledge to be such, might have been cut up at once, by the roots, if a tax had been laid upon uncultivated lands. A settled medium price for the produce of the land, which the farmers themselves wish, would have been likewise highly advantageous to productive industry. As soon as this medium price was exceeded, the exportation should have been immediately prohibited, as in all tolerably well governed countries is always practiced. The consequences advantageous to agriculture from this, would have been, that lands would have risen in price, solely and exclusively, by the improvements and ameliorations which intelligent farmers should have made upon them, and of course by an augmentation of their intrinsic worth; but in no sort whatever, by the mere circumstance that the Europeans are cutting one another's throats, or by the like external accidental occurrences, which occasion merely a momentary artificial price, the sinking of which will cause an unavoidable overthrow of the national wealth.—But I return to the relation of my journey. Miss W—, the daughter of the speculator abovementioned, inquired of Mr. M^r. Allister, the landlord, who that gentleman was; meaning my travelling companion:—"You are very lucky," said M^r. Allister to my fellow-traveller, upon telling us of the lady's inquiries, "but it is all over; for I told her, that you are married." Hereupon my friend was very angry. Indeed I remarked at supper, that is, at the afore-said white turnips and coffee, to which, in honour of Mr. W—, were added some very good tasted small fried fish, here called sun-fish, certain looks veiled, however, by that virgin modesty which is so unusual in America. They kindled an Ætna in my fellow-travellers breast.

The next morning at six o'clock, after breakfasting, we departed. In America the breakfast makes at least as good a figure as the dinner and supper. With the coffee we had broiled meat, radishes, cucumbers, fish, &c. to eat. The coffee, which they swallow by quarts, is commonly very weak, here, and in many other houses, it is good.—A servant maid stands by the table, and fills the cups.

Mr. M^r. Allister being one of those men who know how to make the most of their time, took care not to send us without breakfast into the morning air. Upon rising from breakfast, Miss W— cast another languishing look, half concealed under the shadow of her long eye-lashes, at my companion, and we set out upon our way; Mr. W— and his family in a carriage; my friend and myself, provided with our guns and pouches, on foot.

(To be Continued.)

POLITICS.

FROM THE PALLADIUM.

LESSONS FROM HISTORY.

It is of the very nature and essence of despotism to make use of the rabble, and to depress the middling class of citizens. In old Rome Marius, for the first time in the annals of that Republic, enlisted his soldiers from the sixth class, or those who had nothing. Whereas, until that time, the armies of Rome were composed of those who paid taxes. The honour of bearing arms was confined to the Freemen, as they would be called in Connecticut. They alone held the political power, and the right of voting. For, although the rabble or sixth class was not wholly excluded from suffrage, yet those who take the pains to read Livy or Dionysius of Halicarnassus, will perceive that the exercise of their right was very effectually guarded from abuse.

As ambition advanced, the rabble were courted. Marius admitted citizens from the cities of Italy, in familiar phrase, he naturalized every body that would come to Rome, and vote armies and provinces to him. Accordingly, the eternal City, as Roman vanity denominated it, the conqueror and sovereign of all nations, was herself subdued by a crowd of strangers. They were naturalized in troops, and rushed in to make the native Roman, strangers and servants in Rome itself! This very work is going on in America. Every ship from Ireland brings to Philadelphia more citizens than wharf rats—and a pest as hard to endure or to get rid of.

The ruin of Rome followed. Liberty fell first, for strangers came in to betray it. Then Roman glory faded, for the armies were composed of rabble who were too base to feel the inspiration of patriotism, and they had too much power in making Emperors, for discipline to have any power over them. Too corrupt for freedom, a mongrel race too democratic for arms, at length they could neither sustain the weight of their own glory, nor even of their chains. The Goths, and other barbarians, extirpated the descendants of the Scipios as too cowardly and base even for slavery. They peopled Europe anew with swarms of hardy savages of the north, who loved liberty because it was glory, and despised arts and letters because they were Roman.

Much might be added to this short history, to prove that the lowest class in Rome, was always made the dupe of the arts of demagogues, in order to be their convenient instrument. But never was the good of this rabble the object or the effect of the harangues and intrigues of their flatterers. It would lengthen this paragraph too much, to pursue the course of these remarks any further. Perhaps it may be attempted hereafter.

In Paris we have seen the rabble assembled, harangued, fed, paid and armed, and then suppressed by the regular troops.

In order to have the assistance of the rabble, the Roman and French demagogues gave, or pretended to give them political power—really gave them bread, sometimes arms, and often feasts and sports. For almost five hundred years, the Emperors distributed daily three pounds of bread each, to a lazy crew, who loitered from morning till night in the circus or amphitheatre. This kept idleness in a state of dependence on the prince; but it increased the number of the idle. At the same time, it augmented the burdens that the industrious middling class of citizens had to bear. These at length became so heavy, and the military government, while it was obliged to court the base, needy and vicious multitude, was so discouraging to the holders of property, that the Empire fell into a consumption. The people diminished, the lands became vacant, and the sound population perished. Its place was supplied by the barbarians, who settled by tens of thousands, and at length subverted the Empire: A fate which we are doing our utmost to inflict on our country.

In like manner the French revolution leaders flattered, assembled and paid the half naked mob of Paris. The burdens on property were immense in their amount, and arbitrary in their principle. The change of the landed property of that country was greater in five years of the revolution than was made of old by Attila, who was called the scourge of God. Nothing ever equalled it in Roman or modern history.

Why is this uniform alliance of demagogues with mobs; and why is it that usurpers are so sure to depress if not to extirpate the middling class of citizens: the class that holds, in every nation, a large part of the property? The answer is easy. The indigent rabble is every where turbulent. Having nothing to lose, a tyrant does not look to them for spoil. But their numbers and restlessness of spirit make them formidable to him. He naturally therefore, snatches something from those who have property, to keep the rabble quiet, by giving them small gratuities and extravagant hopes.

It is easy to see that a tyrant will squeeze the middling classes excessively. Their property tempts his desires and those of his soldiers, while their care of it inures their tameness. Like the sea-otters, their fat prevents their flight, and they are knocked on the head to save powder and shot. Octavius and Antony gave one third of the lands of Italy to their soldiers, and turned the farmers out.

Hence it is that revolution is forever fatal to property. The very stimulus to revolution is the hope that property will shift hands.

Power, it is said, follows property: and as those who hold it will desire protection—which confusion and violence will not give and could not insure—their weight and influence will ever be anti-revolutionary. The revolutionists, therefore, will spring up among the destitute, who want spoil, and the daring ambitious, who seek dominion. The success of these latter, puts all property at their mercy, and their own security demands that it should shift hands, in order that the power it confers may be taken from enemies and placed in the hands of associates.

What has all this dry discourse to do with our affairs! says Dives, the great farmer, who has many thousand dollars lent on mortgage. The answer is, it has a great deal to do with them. The Worcester "Farmer" says, very fairly, "Liberty must be ransomed a second time from the hands of the opulent." The public funds and banks are openly threatened in the Jacobin Newspapers. A whisky mob would borrow very freely from the vaults.

Indeed what is there beside to tempt our needy Patriots to so much exertion? Surely more citizens come over in every ship than we can elect consuls for life. They expect humbler and more accessible rewards. A few great Democrats may expect office; but the only lure for a restless destitute multitude is plunder; and those who have been used to it in St. Domingo and in Europe, are coming here to set up their trade.

Let the real people, the house holders and possessors of small property, rest assured, on the evidence of dreadful and invariable experience, that the revolutionists of this country, the avowed admirers of the French revolution, are no friends to the people: They may, indeed, form a league with the vicious and destitute of our cities, but they try to deceive and will certainly betray, oppress and enslave the middling class. Let them then mark the Jacobins as the People's enemies, the enemies of virtue and of true Liberty.

MISCELLANY.

[The springs of Milton, or as they are vulgarly called, Ballston waters, are famous in the records of many a valetudinarian, and even in the memory of the Idler, and the Man of Pleasure. A good description of this salubrious retreat we read in the New-York Morning Chronicle.]

BALLSTON OR MILTON SPRINGS.

This agreeable place of summer resort has been extremely well attended this season. The company came and departed earlier than formerly. Whether it was owing to the peculiar quality of the water, or to the determination of cheerfulness which the visitors bring with them, castists may decide; but if we may judge by countenance and deportment, there are few heavy hearts at the springs. Good humour and sociability are ever the order of the day; and if the animal spirits have as great an influence over the health of the body, as some physicians affirm, we need not employ the use of chemical re-agents to ascertain the analysis of the water; nor need we look far for their good effects on the constitution of the valetudina-rian. Through mistake the springs have always been called Ballston, though situated in the township of Milton.

The place itself is totally destitute of natural advantages. In a dreary and marshy hollow, surrounded by high and barren hills, it presents little to invite the curiosity. With the exceptions of its clear and sparkling chalybeate water, which experience has pronounced beneficial in an innumerable variety of maladies, its attractions are all adventitious. Yet it furnishes an additional support to the observation, that where a number of persons are collected, determined to make each other happy, they will rarely miss their object.

To this inviting spot we find drawn, during summer months, the gay, the brilliant and the fashionable from every quarter of the union. The eastern and the southern states vie with each other in transmitting their brightest beauties to enliven this barren valley. Under the reviving influence of its waters the roses of their cheeks, which the dissipation of winter had faded, are taught to resume the florid tinge of health: Their languid spirits to revive, their wasted sprightliness—and their enfeebled forms to regain their pristine spring and elasticity.

Riding, walking, reading and fishing, constitute the usual amusements of the day: music and dancing generally lead their attractions to enhance the pleasures of the evening. Two spacious houses of entertainment being competitors for the public favour, every season witnesses in improvement of accommodation; but the increasing resort has, as yet exceeded the arrangements provided for the reception of visitors.

Saratoga springs, about 8 miles from Ballston, forms one of the most customary rides. They are superior in situation, and waters more various in their qualities. An excellent public house has lately been erected for the reception of company; and as they have been considerably visited this summer, there appears a prospect of their rivalling the former.

Fishing parties from the springs to Lake George, (about 50 miles) have been more than usually frequent this season. The lake affords plenty of sport, and furnishes a variety of picturesque scenery. The accommodations are still indifferent, but, if this exertion continues, the rage will doubtless rapidly improve them.

A few parties, fond of romantic prospects, have lately chosen the following route: from Albany they proceed to the springs, either through the flourishing towns of Troy and Lansingburg, or by the way of Waterford, visiting the celebrated Cohoes falls: from the springs to Schenectady, and from thence up the bank of the Mohawk to Utica. The ride from Schenectady to Utica is one of the most delightful in the United States. It is turnpike the whole of the way—now winding along rich flats, now gradually climbing eminences that command extensive and variegated prospects. The eye embraces at one view abrupt and rugged uplands—gently swelling hills—and a richly cultivated valley, enlivened by the serpentine wanderings of the Mohawk. Travellers of taste, who have pursued this route, express, in animated terms, the pleasure they have received from the jaunt.

USEFUL ARTS.

[The subsequent article is from a New-York paper. It is a very just tribute to the genius and enterprise of many of our Printers. The elegance of Philadelphia typography is generally admired; and some works have issued from the American Press, which, in splendour, if not in correctness, nearly rival the elegant printing of Europe.]

It has formerly been matter of much regret to the friends of the Typographic Art in the United States, that most of those literary productions which have been issued from the American press, have been executed in so slowly a manner, as to be truly disgusting to every reader of taste. Works of the most celebrated reputation have been printed on the coarsest paper and an old worn-out type, while, at the same time, so little attention has been paid to the important article of typographical correctness, that the force and beauty of some of the most elegant observations have either been entirely lost, or, at least, in a great measure obscured.

So long as the business of printing was conducted in this manner, it is by no means surprising, that imported books were preferred to those published in our own country. But an era of improvement in arts and manufactures, particularly in printing has, within these few years, commenced in the American States; and unless some untoward circumstance should occur to impede our progress, we have reason to hope, that before many years elapse, our artists and mechanics will be able to vie, in the neatness and excellence of their workmanship, with the most celebrated of their brethren in Europe.

To promote so laudable an object, patriotism requires, that we should, with pleasure, encourage every successful effort of our citizens towards improvement: for it is by such patronage alone, that they will be emboldened to proceed in their respective undertakings with spirit; being well assured that their exertions will be finally crowned with an adequate and proper reward.

I have already hinted that, though a rapid improvement is visible in different arts and manufactures, yet, perhaps, it is more apparent in the business of printing, in all its various branches, than in any other. I have, accordingly, seen books published within these few years, in this city, in Philadelphia, and in other places of the United States, which would do no discredit to any of the printing-offices of Europe.

To particularize all the works of merit which have, of late, been published in this country, with neatness, elegance and accuracy, would be too tedious: indeed it would be almost impossible to procure a correct list of them, as they have now become so exceedingly numerous.

POLITE LITERATURE.

[The following elegant essay we copy from the "New England Palladium." We have occasion frequently to admire the correct sentiments and manly style of a gentleman, whom we not only love as a friend, but respect as one of the most acute critics in America. The good sense and the elegant expressions of this Author, who has long and attentively studied the finest models of Attic grace, are decisive proofs in favour of CLASSICAL LITERATURE.]

ON THE PROSE OF COWLEY.

I mentioned in a former number, that the prose of Cowley was remarkably elegant, for the age in which he lived, and read well even at the present day. It has, indeed, as I think, Dr. Johnson observes, never met with its due commendation; and there are few, who know any thing of Cowley's writings, beyond the productions of his Muse. I shall make a few short extracts, which may excite the curiosity of some to the perusal of his works, and which at the same time, will be more worthy the public perusal than any original matter of my own.

"The liberty of a people consists in being governed by laws, which they have made themselves, under whatsoever form it be of government; the liberty of a private man, in being master of his own time and actions, as far as may consist with the laws of God and his country. Of this latter only we are here to discourse, and to enquire what estate of life does best seat us in the possession of it. This liberty of our own actions is such a fundamental privilege of human nature, that God himself notwithstanding all his infinite power and light over us permits us to enjoy it, and that too after a forfeiture made by the rebellion of Adam. He takes so much care for the entire preservation of it to us, that he suffers neither his providence nor eternal decree to break or infringe it."

Essay on Liberty.

"The first wish of Virgil was to be a good philosopher; the second, a good husbandman: God, (whom he seemed to understand better than most of the most learned Heathens) dealt with him, just as he did with Solomon; because he prayed for wisdom in the first place, he added all things also, which were subordinately to be desired. He made him one of the best philosophers and best husbandmen; and, to adorn and communicate both these faculties, the best poet. He made him, besides all this, a rich man, and a man who desired to be no richer. To be a husbandman, is but a retreat from the city; to be a philosopher, from the world; or rather a retreat from the world, as it is man's, into the world, as it is God's."

Essay on Agriculture.

"There are two sorts of avarice; the one is but of a bastard kind, and that is, the rapacious appetite of gain; not for its own sake, but for the pleasure of refunding it immediately through all the channels of pride and luxury. The other is the true kind, and properly so called, which is a restless and insatiable desire of riches, not for any further end or use, but only to hoard, and preserve, and perpetually increasing them. The covetous man of the first kind, is like a greedy ostrich, which devours any metal, but it is with an intent to feed upon it, and in effect, it makes a shift to digest and excrete it. The second is like the foolish chough, which loves to steal money only to hide it. The first does much harm to mankind, and a little good too, to some few; the second does good to none, no, not to himself. The first can make no excuse to God, or Angels, or rational men for his actions; the second can give no reason or colour, not to the devil himself, for what he does; he is a slave to Mammon without wages. The first makes a shift to be beloved; ay, and envied too by some people; the second is the universal object of hatred and contempt."

Essay on Avarice.

But the following passage, which contains the character of Cromwell, may vie with almost any, ancient or modern, in eloquence and beauty. It will probably bring to the mind of the political reader, that fortunate freebooter, who, like Cromwell, has furnished the world with an admirable commentary on the Utopian text of Liberty and Equality, and now rules with despotic sway the free and pious inhabitants of France.

"What can be more extraordinary, than that a person of mean birth, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body, which have sometimes, or of mind, which have often, raised men to the highest dignities, should have the courage to attempt, and the happiness to succeed in so improbable a design, as the destruction of one of the most ancient, and most solidly founded monarchies upon the earth? That he should have the power or boldness to put his prince and master to an open and infamous death; to banish that numerous and strongly allied family; to do all this under the name and wages of a parliament, to trample upon them too as he pleased, and spurn them out of doors when he grew weary of them; to raise up a new and unheard of monster out of their ashes; to stifle that in the very infancy, and set up himself above all things that ever were called sovereign in England; to oppress all his enemies by arms, and all his friends afterwards by artifice; to serve all parties patiently for a while, and to command them victoriously at last; to overrun each corner of the three nations, and overcome with equal facility both the riches of the South, and the poverty of the North; to be feared and counted by all foreign princes, and adopted a brother to the Gods of the earth; to call together parliaments with a word of his pen, and scatter them again with the breath of his mouth; to be humbly and daily petitioned that he would be pleased to be hired, at the rate of two millions a year, to be the master of those who had hired him before to be their servant, to have the estates and lives of three kingdoms as much at his disposal, as was the little inheritance of his father, and to be as noble and liberal in the spending of them; and lastly, (for there is no end of all the particulars of his glory) to bequeath all this with one word to his posterity; to die with peace at home, and triumph abroad; to be buried among kings, and with more than regal solemnity; and to leave a name behind him, not to be extinguished but with the whole world; which, as it is now too little for his praises, so it might have been too little for his conquests, if the short line of his human life could have been stretched out to the extent of his immortal designs."

Essay on the government of Oliver Cromwell.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

"If venerable time,
S'ain at the foot of pleasure be no crime,
Then, with his silver beard, and magic wand,
Let Comus rise, Archbishop of the land;
Let him your rubric and your feasts prescribe
Grand metropolitan of all the tribe."

The subsequent article though at the first view it may startle the Idler, will be read though without one yawn of Lassitude. It is the most fascinating description of the nocturnal delirium of a Masquerade we have ever perused. The narrator has the vivid fancy, and the copious expression of a Radclyffe; and in his florid page he has marshalled the gayest groups of a Fairy land. All is frolic, fanciful and volatile. Like the "quaint revellers" he describes. What is deformed he conceals with roses of decoration, and he so artfully arranges the false brilliancy of midnight exhibition, that they sparkle with tenfold lustre. An additional reason for us to contemplate this article is the curious picture it presents of the dissipation, consequent upon a Pease. This magnificent display of Asiatic excess appears to be made by the declaimers against a war with France, and these moral guardians of British economy appear on this occasion, whether they were "Scratchers," or rent by the war, to be no unwilling advocates for lavish expenditure. The Earl of Maira, no more solicitous to facilitate the descent of his French friends in Ireland, or to vaunt of the loyalty of Ballynabinnich, now "smooths his wrinkled front," and

He capers nimbly in the Ladies' chamber,

To the Lascivious pleasing of the lute

The first fruits of a hollow and short lived accommodation with a nominal Republic, appears to be like the Sodom apples, alluded to by Bolingbroke, of splendid exterior, but of internal corruption. The giddy metropolis is transformed to a sort of Enchanted ground, on which the inebriate mob, whether in the street, or the Saloon drench themselves in the cup of false joy. To martial sounds succeeds the masquing scene, and grave Senators exclaim to the melting fair

Braid your locks with gossy twine,
Dropping odours, dropping wine,
Rigour now is gone to bed

And Amor, with scrupulous head

Strict age and sour Severity

With their grave saws in slumber lie

We, that are of purer fire,

Imitate the starry quire.

Now to the moon in wavering morrice move.

LONDON, June 2.

MASQUED BALL AT CUMBERLAND HOUSE.

This magnificent Fete was given on Monday night, under the patronage of the Union Club, and management of Earls Moir, Landaff, and Cunningham, and Lord Cahir. The history of our amusements presents no period that abounds so much in this species of spectacle as the present. For weeks past we have had to notice a series of them, vying with each other in splendour and variety. That, however, of which we are now speaking, appears to have been a chef d'œuvre, produced by the delirium of the day, leaving us little hope of ever finding an equal. The industry of the town, which always forms the vanguard in the army of pleasure, long since gave note of preparation. The whole host of tailors, mantua-makers, and milliners, have been for a month in requisition. Cooks, painters, carpenters, and confectioners, were levied en masse, and supplies raised to great amount, for this extraordinary service, destined to mark the commencement of our pacific campaign with every lustre. At about half after eleven all the fashionable world began to be in motion. The effect of such a mass of coaches and carriages collecting from all quarters, and pouring upon the spot, may be easily conceived. The first had scarcely reached Cumberland-House before the neighbouring street presented a long and uninterrupted cavalcade. The line that descended by Bond street extended from the top and the whole length of Piccadilly, and Pall-Mall, two lines deep. Instructions were given to the coachmen to set down and take up with their horses' heads toward St. James street. By this arrangement all crossing and jostling were avoided: but from the necessary slowness of the procession, three hours had elapsed before it reached its destination. It was consequently three in the morning before the whole company arrived. Had indeed the persons in every carriage waited for their turn, it would have been still later; but the impatience of many who were far back in the line, or came in other directions, was so great, that they abandoned their carriages and made their way on foot through the croud in their masks and characteristic dresses.

To the capacious means which the regular establishment of the house affords were added several temporary accommodations. One of these was a long and beautiful Allée-vert or green walk, extending from the centre window in the rear through the Prince's garden to the Mall in St. James's Park. It was covered in and hung with numerous festoons of variegated lamps and terminated by a transparency of a female figure, representing peace ascending to heaven, after having destroyed war, and his attending fiends. Pomona and Vertumnus themselves might be proud to acknowledge it for their favourite garden. The finest flowers of every species blooming in beds along the sides of the walk, and behind them, and close to the walls, rose in great abundance; the most beautiful shrubs and dwarf fruit trees, consisting of oranges, cherries, &c. growing in a state of nature. It is impossible to convey by any description, the beauty of this scene, either upon close examination, or in perspective view from the principal room in Cumberland House. The entrance of the Allée-vert was from a covered promenade, running along the back of the house, and extending at one end beyond it, adorned with flowers, and shrubs, and lamps. Seven doors at equal intervals opened into it from the body of the house; and on the eastern end it communicated with the ball-room. These two walks were rendered peculiarly grateful from the freshness of the air, the coolness of the ground and the odour of the surrounding flowers and shrubs; they consequently afforded a happy retreat to all who, in the course of the night suffered from the heat of the ball-room and interior apartments, which was excessive. They consequently presented a constant ebb and flow of persons retiring from the busy scene with fatigue, or returning to it with recruited spirits. Here too a groupe of travelling gypsies pitched their tents, lighted a fire and made several excursions to collect provisions. They had an ass, with panniers, between which were placed two fine chubby children of the Egyptian breed. Many a credulous fair one resorted to these oracles to learn her destinies; and many a fair promise was held out in future lovers, husbands, and numerous progeny. The lovely Miss Pigot supported the Principa Sybil, and Lord Charles Bentinck was the head of the tribe, consisting of Miss S. Pigot, Mr. Smith, and several others. They intended to sing catches and glees; but from the pressure of the crowd collected from the interest of the scene, the vocal part of their plan was abandoned. The ball room, the third temporary structure upon the occasion, was 70 feet long, by 46. It was ornamented with paintings, representing views of London, and lighted up with five magnificent chandeliers. The dances commenced about two, but the Goddess of the light fantastic toe was not very successful in her inspirations. The number that joined in the dance was a very small part of population, and yet never was the ear assailed by more delightful and animating music. The band, all dressed in green, played in an arbour. It consisted of thirty of the first performers of Scotch music, ably led by Mr. Gow. The reels and strathspeys were given in true stile. This apartment was also ornamented with flowers and shrubs, for the supply of which in such abundance all the nursery gardens round town have, for some days past, been pouring forth all their sweets. At the opposite end of the house was another temporary building, as a tea and coffee room, communicating with the three great rooms upon the ground floor, which constituted the grand scene for the exhibition of the masks and characters. All the upper rooms to the attics were laid out for supper, they amounted to 20, in which covers were laid for 1400 persons. The most remarkable of them, was the Prince's supper-room. It was in a stile of superior splendour, and the plateaux down the middle of the table were beautiful in the extreme. Every chair was arched over with a garland of roses, which gave each row, when viewed in profile, the appearance of an avenue of rose trees, or as the company leaned forward, of a series of beautiful heads crowned with chaplets. There were four of these avenues. The room accommodated 60 persons, who composed his Royal Highness's select party. At half past 3 the Prince sat down to supper. Over his head appeared a canopy of rose coloured silk, with the feathers and other heraldic ornaments. Equal to all these in brilliancy of artificial ornament, but far exceeding in natural beauties, was the apartment in the body of the house, on the ground floor, and on the same side with the temporary ball-room. It was surrounded with a gradation of benches for the accommodation of those who chose to be calm spectators of the busy scene, and safe from the range of all the artillery of wit, which played upon the centre. Whether it were owing to a power in beauty to attract beauty, or whether a fortuitous concurrence of circumstances could produce the effect, we do not pretend to decide; but certain it is, that so many beautiful women as took their stations at one period of the night upon these benches, were never before assembled together in the same room. It would be impossible for the coldest imagination to describe the tout ensemble without giving an air of extravagance to the picture. Contemplating the surrounding circles, fancy one moment regarded it as the temple of beauty, in which some second Charles had enshrined all the loveliest women of his age, as the proudest records of the glories of his reign. Looking at the lively contrast and animation of masks and characters, it appeared an Olympic Theatre, to which the Goddesses were invited as judges to award the prize of wit, spirit, and gallantry. In this most interesting circle we noticed the Marchioness of Hertford, in blue and silver; the Marchioness of Headfort, in white and silver, with a profusion of diamonds; the Countess of Cunningham's dress black lace and silver; her sister, Lady Lawley the same. A group of Fairy Queens, consisting of Ladies Anne and Susan Hamilton, daughters of the Duke of Hamilton, and Lady M. Taylor; the Countess of Keitrim, and the Ladies Clements, in elegant embroidered white and silver dresses; the Countess of Lenmare, and Lady C. Brown, Gipsies; the Countess of Melborough, a Gipsy; with whom the Prince shook hands; in return for which compliment, she generously offered to tell his fortune, but Lady Hunkle coming up in the character of Mother Shipton took away the Royal customer. Mrs. M. A. Taylor, in yellow and silver, Mrs. Fitzherbert and Lady Haggerston, grey and silver; Lady Allen, and her two lovely daughters, Irish Peasants, in green dresses, with green foil, sh-mocks, and silver; the hon. Mrs. Knight, white and silver; her sister, Mrs. Portman, slate colour and silver; Lady St. Clair, black and gold; Lady Smith Burges, black and silver; Lady Hill and Miss Beresford; Mrs. and Miss Clements, Fair Slaves; the Marchioness of Townshend, white and silver; Miss Pepper, an angel, dress white and silver, blue scarf and wings; Miss Rydley, yellow and silver, the Lady Seymours, white and silver; Mrs. Lawrell, white satin, pearls and Diamonds; the Countess of Aldborough; Lady S. Stratford; Miss Vaughan; Miss Courtney; Dowager Marchioness of Donnegal; Lady C. Jenkinson; Miss Lewes, Miss Manners, and Miss Fordyce's, were also in fancy dresses. Lady Sarah and Miss Bayley appeared in the Turkish costume; their robes and turbans were of blue satin, which attracted general notice for their elegant simplicity; the turbans did the inventor great credit. The beautiful Lady Elizabeth Villiers attracted the admiration of the motley groupe; her dress was formed of black lace and gold, the effect of which was strikingly novel and elegant. Among the most conspicuous characters were—the Prince, as Harry the Eighth, in a very rich appropriate dress; Lady C. Campbell was a most beautiful Raphael, in scarlet and violet dress, accompanied by her brother, the Marquis of Looze, as a Pilgrim; Col. Doyle, an Irish Peasant boy, admirably supported, who adhered the whole night closely to Col. Dillon, as Bacchus; Lord Valentia, a Spanish Royal Life Guard; Mr. O'Brien, a Grey Monk; Mr. Tierney a Courtier; Lord Cravan, a Waterman; Mr. Taylor, a Clown; Mr. M. A. Taylor, a Physician; the hon. Berkley Cravan, a Ginger Bread Nutman; Mr. Kein, a French Hair Dresser; Mr. Walsh Porter, the Phantasmagorie, a most excellent mask, the body silver, covered with azure tiffany. Mr. P. Methuen, Jun., a Collector of Characters for the Morning Post; Col. Baldwin, a Cardinal; Mr. Orde, king John; Mr. Windham Quin, Fauconbridge; Rev. Mr. Dolphin, an Old Maid; Lord Dillon a Pilgrim; Earl of Mountnorris, old English dress; Countess of Mountnorris, a Pilgrim; Mrs. Clive, a Gipsy, with a child at her back; Col. Montgomery, a Countryman; Col. Brown, a Roman General; Captain Clifton, Caieb Quot'em; Mr. Beckett, a Peasant; Lord Montford, a Turk; Captain Graham, a Clown; Mr. Morse, an Old English Baron; M. Boldero, a Pilgrim; Mr. Hilliard, a Friar; Marquis and Marchioness of Winchester, Pilgrims; Mrs. Powell, a Highland Dress; Mr. Champneys, an Old English Dowager; Mr. Wrexham, a Highlander; Lord Downe and Mr. Penn as Pilgrims; Col. Brook, with a groupe, carrying an ensign on which was written Baronets Budgered; Mrs. Champneys, as Mrs. Ford, looking lovely; Miss King, a Country Girl; Mr. Erskine, an Orange Woman; Mr. Lawrell, a Taylor; Mr. Peacock, Fallstaff; Mr. Green, a Quaker; Mr. Smelt, the Braken Mask; Mr. G. Thornton, a Turk; Mr. Heath, an Old Maid; Mr. Wilbraham, a Spaniard; Mrs. Dickson, an Indian Princess; Miss Brook, as Mother Shipton; the two Miss Lloyds, Country Girls; Mr. Sheridan, a Lusty Friar; Col. Macleod, of Colbecc, a Fishwoman; Mr. Pierrepont, a Sailor; Lords Ussulstone, Temple, Colonels Churchill and Thornton, Lords Courtenay, Mount Edgumbe, Yarmouth, C. Somerset, Mr. M. Lewis, Mr. E. Walpole, Spaniards; Marquis of Abercorn in the Windsor uniform; Marchioness of Abercorn, and the ladies Hamilton, Flower Girls; Col. Campbell, a Highlander; Mr. J. Manners, a Turk; Lord Cairn, a Pilgrim; Lady Cairn, a Highland Lass; Mrs. St. Leger, a Witch; Lady and Miss Bonveries, fancy dresses; Lord Templeton, a Pilgrim; Mr. Ogilvie, a Highlander; and Juniper Jenny, Mr. Dighton; Messrs. Conoanen, Smith, Beverly, the Banditti. Though every body was there, Nobody was certainly one of the best characters in the room; a beautiful female as a Virgin of the Sun, who did not unmask the whole night, was asked by the Prince, "Will not the sun appear during the whole morning from under that black cloud?"

Some ladies of distinction, lately from the Continent had prepared a Phantasmagoria, upon a very superior scale; but it was not possible to exhibit it. A group of French Ladies deserves notice, for the taste and elegance of their dresses as Egyptian Females. Mr. and Mrs. Otto, and Mr. Kccamien, were of the party.

Among the vocal groupes were one consisting of Viganoni, Rovedino, and Morelli, as Bailed Singers. Another composed of Kelly, Miss Dixon, Miss Jacobs, and Miss Tyler, and another of Lord Barrymore, Mr. Methuen, &c. One singing groupe, comprising only ladies and gentlemen amateurs, (among them was the Duke of Orleans,) as Italian Gondoliers, with mandolines, &c. were admirably dressed, and had some charming music got up for the occasion. Many excellent groupes, prepared at a great expence, did not appear at all. One groupe indeed set all pressure at defiance. It consisted of eight men representing a boarding school mistress, with her scholars. Not content with shocking modesty by the unseemly sight of black bearded misses, with bare and tawny arms and shoulders, they under pretence of supporting their hoydenish romping characters, pushed and forced their way in every direction with insulting rudeness, and in their assumption of names, had no regard to private character.

It would far exceed our limits to mention all the names, and therefore we are obliged to pass without notice many hundreds of characters equally deserving of praise as those whom we have described. For the same reason we must decline an attempt to describe the flares of wit and merriment, in the collision of so many ardent spirits and enlightened minds. The company in fact embraced the whole fashionable world, and formed an object too large for the eye of the mind to take in one view. Another disadvantage which attended the vastness of the assembly, was also the necessary compression by which the characters were rendered unable to exert their powers. They were consequently locked up like militia men, and could not be considered a disposable force for the annoyance of their neighbours. It contained, however, all the elements of the completest and grandest fest of the kind ever exhibited; and the company, possessing heart, spirit and gallantry, wanted only a more enlarged theatre, and an opportunity of extending their services, to enable them to make it the brightest achievement in the annals of pleasure. While the troops were distributed over the whole field of action, the want of sufficient room to manœuvre was not so perceptible. But when the hour of supper arrived, and the charge was made upon the tables, the whole body was thrown into confusion. There were two staircases but the company in general were only aware of one, and there consequently prevailed a severe struggle for precedence. The foremost of course poured into the rooms, and all the seats were occupied in an instant; but though the most delicious fruits and wines were placed before them, their fate was no better than the sufferings of Tantalus. In the struggle up stairs, a crash was heard, as if the stair-case was giving way. All were alarmed, terror prevailed over all respect for sex or decorum. Those who were upon the stairs, finding it impossible to fall back, rushed with increased eagerness forward, and forced into the supper rooms already crowded to suffocation. The rooms now presented an alarming appearance. Twenty ladies might be seen fainting at the same moment in the same room. In this state some of them were placed upon the table among other forbidden fruits and flowers. Others were laid out in the balcony to recover among the bow pots. The females of firmer nerves, were all the time busily employed in taking the diamonds from their head dresses, and putting them and their other valuable ornaments in their pockets. Thus all the labours of the toilette were lost in a moment, and all the economy of beauty deranged. The dresses, which upon an average cost from thirty to forty guineas, were torn to pieces, and wigs, of the most exquisite taste and fancy, forced from their foundations. Strange that it never occurred to our creative artists to invent fainting wigs; if so, we should not have seen so many bare headed beauties deserted by their inconstant Titus, Brutus, and Caracalla.

The Prince's supper room was an exception to the general confusion of the night: while disorder, crushing, shrieking, and fainting, prevailed in every other apartment, all was harmony and concord of sweet sounds in the presence of his Royal Highness. Here the Miss Abrams were sweetly singing "The Sailor Boy," "Shelter the way-worn Traveller," and other favourite airs, accompanied by some gentlemen amateurs. There were not fewer than 3000 persons in the rooms. They began to depart at 5 o'clock, many of them not only without a taste but even a sight of the supper. The great proportion of them, did not however, leave the house until half after seven, and many had not retired before ten o'clock yesterday morning. The circumstances of their departure corresponded with the confusion of the preceding scenes. The carriages could not, from their great number be brought up to the door; and therefore, not only those who depended upon hackney coaches but those who had coaches of their own, were obliged to go on foot. If the streets then presented a view of Rome or Venice in the time of the Carnival, during the time the company were going at night, the resemblance was still stronger as they returned in the morning. All the streets were filled with characters, scampering home, and as the reign fell pretty freely, any little remains of female dress that escaped the tempest of the night, were entirely spoiled. For a list of coughs, colics, and rheumatisms, acquired upon the occasion, we must refer to the Doctors and Apothecaries. A great proportion of the carriages were broken, three horses were killed, and several servants sustained fractures. A milk woman fainted in the street from the pressure of the crowd, and was nearly killed.

Several gentlemen were very ill treated by the mob; one Turk had his turban taken from his head by force, and his Camel-Hair pelice torn to pieces.

Subscriptions to the club, to the amount of fifteen hundred pounds were paid within the last ten days, by members who had been in arrear. This was done to have the privilege of purchasing tickets for the Ball.

From this circumstance some idea may be formed of the expectation which the fete had excited, and the universal eagerness in the fashionable world to partake of its pleasures.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extract of a letter from a Friend.

Let me recommend to you strongly and seriously to read and to meditate XENOPHON'S treatise upon the Athenian Democracy. It is a great consolation to me, in the vicissitudes of our public affairs, to find that we are not conducting worse than others have done in similar situations. It is the infirmity of our natures; and no wise man would suffer his composure to be ruffled by the fickleness and injustice of the popular voice, when he knows there is a safe appeal from it to the impartial justice of posterity.

In the experience I have had of the world hitherto, I have convinced myself that the only path in politics, as in every thing else, which ought anxiously and ardently to be sought and pursued, is the path of right. But whether that path will be popular or not, is not to be inquired. It must be left to chance, or to Providence. If success in this world were the test of virtue, the axiom that honesty is the best policy, would be a lie.—Honesty is the best policy, because it has the richest resources in adversity—Because it consoles itself in its own consciousness, and because none of its enjoyments are essentially in the power of others.

I have recommended Xenophon's Athenian Democracy to you, because it shews, in the clearest light, what the spirit and the effects of Democracy were, among the most enlightened and most ingenious people that ever existed upon earth. Their universal practice was to disgrace, and their common practice was to put to death, every man, among them of extraordinary virtue, or who had rendered them extraordinary services. Xenophon expressly founds his defence of the Government upon this principle, that Democracy is, in its nature, the institution, best calculated to raise the worst men in the community to power. Now, says he, as the Athenians love to have the worst men in power, Democracy must, of course, be the Government best suited to their purposes!

But a man, who has any concern with public affairs, ought never to despair. Perseverance and Fortitude are among the most essential requisites to the supporter of a good cause. True it is that Federalism is irrecoverably ruined in this country—I have long been fully convinced of it.—True it is that the present administration are going on with a strong gale, and a rapid tide full in their favour. But winds change, tides turn, and the popular voice will infallibly prove fickle, sooner or later, to them as well as to others. They have built upon the vulgar heart, and upon nothing else. Do you think they will not find their habitation giddy and unsure? The laws of nature and of man will not change at their bidding. Their policy is weak and wicked. It may, doubtless, prosper for a time; but it cannot prosper long; and the more mischief they do, the more violently will it recoil at last upon themselves.

Have you no faith in this doctrine? Reflect upon what is passing at this moment before your eyes.—Look into the heart of the man at the head of the union.—Glamis, Condor, King, he has it all, and he play'd most foully for it! But has he not been laid open to the inmost recesses of his soul, within the last three months? Has not his meanness, his hypocrisy, his falshood, his gross sensuality, been proclaimed in a voice of thunder over this whole continent? Is there a hovel throughout the union where he has not been the theme of scorn and contempt? You say no! for his parasites and pimps still cry him up, more loudly than ever, as a prodigy of virtue.—But every body knows they are his parasites and pimps.—And after what has been, or what will be proved upon him, they, who clamour the loudest in his praise, will despise him as much as his greatest enemies. Think you all the praise of his Smith's, Cheetham's, and Duane's, can administer consolation to him, under that consciousness of universal execration, which his infamous vices, thus blazoned to the world, have drawn upon him? Alas! all the perfumes of Arabia would not sweeten his little heart. The votes of the whole human race to make him Emperor of the world would not speak peace to the agonies of his soul! And what has been the instrument to inflict upon him this insupportable scourge? Why, one of his own tools! The very mildew'd ear, with which he poison'd his wholesome brother, within a little month has eternally blasted himself.

Will not one example suffice you? Look at the man, next in power to the first. See him tortured by a scourge of the same kind—see his reputation and character torn to pieces by some of the agents of his own elevation. See him, after a long and involuntary silence, dragged at last into a public denial of facts, which are immediately fastened upon him, and clinched, beyond all his powers of extraction. See him almost universally deserted by the party, whose triumph he secured. Examine his letter, lately published; mark the violence of his agitation, lurking under the external colour of affected indifference.—Contemplate the real situation; imagine to yourself the necessary feelings of these two men, and then ask yourself whether they are not most dearly paying for all the success they enjoy.

To make a mighty declension, and come to the insidious author of your Pennsylvania philippics, to animate the torpid sluggishness of each German boor, and to agitate the confused mind of each wild Irishman, I read the address to which you allude, and despised it. But I think no other of the author than I thought before. If, in walking across the fields, you unwarily place your foot too near a rattle snake, you will, of course, hear his rattle, and may chance to feel his tooth, but you know no more of his nature, than you did before. This man promises us the blessings of future Thomases at the head of the union, and at the head of your state sovereignty, and the names are most happily coupled together. It reminded me of a line in Virgil, who, to pronounce the severest of curses upon any man, who did not hate the poetry of Bavius, wishes that he, may love the verses of Mævius.—I wish nothing worse to the man who now thinks of a Democratic President without contempt, than that he should consider a Democratic state governor, as an object of veneration.

A buxom widow complains, in a Provincial paper, that a young man has run away without paying for his bed and board with her. [M. P.]

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.
HORACE, BOOK II, ODE 4.
TO XANTHIA PHOCEUS.

IMITATED BY THOMAS PAINE (NOT THE BOSTON POET, BUT THE SOPHIST OF THETFORD,) AND ADDRESSED TO THOMAS JEFFERSON.

["Young as we are, and with such a country before us to fill with people and with happiness, we should point in that direction the whole generative force of nature, wasting none of its efforts in mutual destruction." Jefferson's notes on Virginia, page 257.

See also the same sentiment repeated in the President's first message to Congress.

Ancillam amare, heroum exemplo turpe non esse.

That he had no occasion to be ashamed of being in love with his maid; for that had been the case with many great men."]

Dear Thomas, deem it no disgrace

With slaves to mend thy breed,

Nor let the wench's smutty face

Deter thee from the deed.

At Troy's fam'd siege the bullying blade

Who swore no laws for him were made,

Robs, kills, sets all in flame—

A SLAVE in petticoats appears,

And souse! in love! head over ears

The Lion's heart is tame!

Lord of the world, when Nero reign'd,

When fires were his delight

A SLAVE the Tyger's bosom chain'd,

That slave indeed was white.

Lo! at his feet the fawning train,

His Smith, Blake, Cheetham and Duane,

Howling his praise are seen!

Vice turns to virtue at his nod;

Imperial Nero, grows a God

And ACTE* grows a Queen.

Speak but the word! alike for thee

Thy venal tribe shall swear

PUREST OF MORTALS thou shalt be

And SALLY shall be fair.

No blasted brood of Afric's earth

Shall boast the glory of her birth

And shame thy daughter's brother,

To prove thy panders shall conspire

Some king of Congo was her sire—

Some Ethiop Queen her mother.

Yet, from a princess and a king

Whatever be their hue,

Since none but drivelling idiots spring,

And Gons must spring from you.

We'll make thy Tommy's lineage lend;

Black and white genius both shall blend

In him their rays divine.

From Phillis Wheatley we'll contrive

Or brighter Sancho to derive†.

Thy son's maternal line.

* For the history of Acte, the Emperor Nero's Sally, and the methods taken by him to correct the procedure of her genealogy, consult his life in Suetonius.

† It appears that Paine before he wrote this incomparable Ode or Epithalamium, had attentively studied his friend's Notes on Virginia. Phyllis Wheatley and Ignatius Sancho are there mentioned as the two prodigies of African intellect. There is to be found a learned and ingenious comparison between the blacks and the whites, both in a moral and physical point of view. The immovable veil of black, the scented bosoms, and sundry other properties of the negroes delicately alluded to here, are all noticed in that immortal work. It contains moreover the important discovery that "the difference between the black and the white complexion is as real as if its seat and cause were better known to us."

With respect to the amatory propensities of the blacks, the Notes on Virginia remark, that "love seems with them to be more an eager desire, than a tender delicate mixture of sentiment and sensation." And again, "Their love is ardent, but it kindles the senses only, not the imagination." Upon this point the Author's testimony is beyond all exception. Gratia capienti.

Though nature o'er thy Sally's frame
Has spread her sable veil,
Yet shall the loudest trump of fame
Resound your tender tale.
Her charms of person, charms of mind
To you and motley scores confin'd
Shall scent each future age;
And still her jetty fleece and eyes
Pug nose, thick lips and ebony
Shall blacken Clio's page.

Nay, Thomas, fumble not thy head,
Though Sally's worth I sing,
In me, no rival canst thou dread,
I cause no horns to spring.
Besides my three score years and ten
I was not form'd like other men
To burn for beauteous faces—
One pint of brandy from the still
My soul with fiercer joys can fill
Than Venus and her graces†.

AD XANTHIAM PHOCEUM ODE IV, LIB. II.

Ne sit Ancillæ tibi amor pudori,

ANOTHER IMITATION OF HORACE, BOOK II. ODE 4.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ADDRESSED TO A CERTAIN GREAT MAN.

Nay hang not Tom, your nether lip;
Tho' you with Quashee made a slip,
Your fame it will not blight;
Ajax a captive maid admir'd;
Achilles by a slave was fir'd;
Both damsels tho' were white.

Who knows but Quasheba may spring
From some illustrious sable King;
And mourns her chang'd degree:
Odsbodikins, if this were true,
And son-in-law t'a monarch, you,
How devilish proud you'd be.

Certes, a wench, though strait and tall,
With lips so large and teeth so small,
Though lively plump and mellow,
Descended of ignoble race,
Would ne'er be suffer'd to solace
The sage of Monticello.

† For a full explanation of the last stanza, the curious reader is referred to the life of Thomas Paine, published in London, by Francis Oldys, about the year 1791. Paine in one of his pamphlets, subsequent to this period, has noticed the book, without denying any part of the instructive narrative it contains.

N. B. By the editor. The pretence, that Thomas Paine wrote this Ode, is mere poetic fiction. To my certain knowledge he did not write it, and indeed to speak in the Gallic idiom, he is incapable of writing such verses.

But banish, Tom, all vain alarms,
Altho' I paint each witching charm
That grac'd your sooty bride;
The heyday of my blood is o'er;
For I am verging to three score,
And have a wife beside.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. DACTYL & CONMA.

Of all the "arts of able" Poetasters, I know of none more universally practised, or which is attended with finer success than the art of Amplification—of drawing from a subject which appears scarce capable of affording matter for a single couplet, volumes of poetry.

The modern dabster in Parnassian wares, can draw, beat out and twist an elastic trifle, to a most astonishing length. A rolling eye or a dimpled chin, are an inexhaustible fund for songs, while the death of a favourite lap-dog or a catarh in an "angel of a monkey" are arguments for elegys as long as "Grays," or even epic poems as lofty as the Iliad.

How fortunate is it for the lovers of poetry, as original ideas are so very scarce, that the poet is able to produce so much from a single word—I can compare it to nothing but the ingenious artist, who is able to hammer out, and spread a small piece of Gold to almost any extent he pleases—Our poet has likewise another advantage, that in treating upon so indifferent a subject as the glance of his mistress, or what Pug, might have said, if he wanders from his subject, and writes a little infinity of nothing as unintelligible as nonsensical—'tis easily pardoned by the good natured reader, who could hardly have expected so much from so barren a soil.

Although not much given to this mode of spinning out "wire drawn poetry," yet to gratify the taste of a few amateurs of the art, and as a rich treat to those, who prefer a nonsensical trifle, dressed up in verse to a "plain tale plainly told," we have invented a machine for carding and spinning to what length the author pleases, say, one line or five hundred—as a specimen, we cast the following couplet into our mill.

The dog will bite
A thief at night.

And upon turning the crank only once—out spews,

The faithful tray, tho' every day he roam,

And rove a thousand flow'ry climes among,

Will seek each night with rapturous joy his home,

And to the moon attune his evening song.

Should then some wretch, by pale-eyed famine led,
Beneath the dusky mantle of the night,
Approach his master's humble, low thatch'd shed,
To fish therefrom for Bread or Dollars bright.

Our watchful dog, still mindful of his trust,
Flies at his heels and lays him low in dust;
Fond trusty Cur, our noblest strains are due,
And we with joy this tribute give to you.

To my pocket my friends' ever free,
If fortune assist, let him share half the prize,
'Tis as open to him as to me.

And your cash has been always so sparing,
Had your friend claim'd his part, I could safely

CONTINUATION OF PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER XIII.

Mr. McAllister—Peter's mountain—The prospect—Bad Inns—Indecent custom of quartering two strangers in one bed—Sunbury—Northumberland —Buffalo Valley—English Emigrants—Priestly—Cooper.

Mr. McAllister, without being a genius for farming, that is, without having made any new discoveries in the art, or practising it upon a system of his own invention, is an industrious follower of the farming modes of proceeding in use among the most intelligent farmers of his nation. He likewise reads many English books upon the subject, and here and there makes an application of what they teach. He seems to have some mechanical genius, for he has invented a new sort of cyder mill to grind the apples before they are shaken from the press. He raises, perhaps, more clover than any other farmer in America; but no Lucerne, or Saintfoin, though the high arid hills, of which his plantation consists, would probably be good for that purpose. They would likewise be good for a vineyard; but he has no thoughts of planting one. He keeps his orchard in perfect order; but his kitchen garden is insignificant, though the best I have seen in the country, in America. What distinguishes him, however, chiefly as a farmer, is the care which he bestows upon his cattle, and the rich feed which he gives to his beasts.—The culture of the animal kingdom is the great object of farming.

We crossed over the Peter's mountain, which runs parallel with the Blue mountain, and is separated from it only by a valley hardly three miles wide. From the summit we had a beautiful prospect backwards, to the south-east. The Susquehannah, where it flows through the Blue mountain, has the shape of a lake, with islands. You can see through the gap, as it were through a spy-glass, into the neighbouring country. Towards the north-west, at the distance of about ten English miles, was to be seen a woody valley, bounded by a second chain of less lofty mountains. Fir trees abound in this valley, though none are to be found eastward of the Blue mountain. These woods were very desolate; not a bird was to be seen; still less to be heard, though it was the singing season of the year. Nothing but the screaming of jays, interrupted the solemn stillness of the woods, and the hollow whistling of the wind in the tops of the firs—of murmuring brooks there was plenty; my companion, whose imagination was, by the tender looks at McAllister's, turned to romantic melancholy, began to talk in the usual strain about clear streams, when I made him observe that they rolled along among poisonous plants. In fact the kalmia is so abundant that it constitutes almost entirely the underwood. This remark killed his poetical imagination upon the spot.

We next reached Halifax, a village on the banks of the Susquehannah, consisting of twenty or thirty log-houses dispersed along upon the side of an hill. The river here forms several islands handsomely covered with wood. Most of the huts here are inns, and most of the window sashes are broken. Almost all modern travellers have remarked, that the inhabitants of beautiful countries are not worthy of the charms which Nature displays around them. This is rather humiliating for our present generation, which has so high an opinion of itself. The country of which I now speak, cannot, indeed, be reckoned among the most beautiful; yet it is not bad; not uninteresting; with a more varied cultivation it might produce many things, which at present are not thought of, such as wine and silk; and its inhabitants are worse in proportion than their country. My fellow traveller maintained that Gessner would have written American Idyls. He thought it highly entertaining to compare the real objects with the ideal beauties of an Idyl. In his opinion if the ladies here were to be idylized, they must be called idyl-wenches. He was extremely delighted in thinking what a figure the Pennsylvania names would make in an Idyl, as for instance the Arcadian Tulpehacken, or that other Tempe the Sowswamp, or a third called the Schimohkin, the river Brandywine, &c. not to mention the whisky, instead of nectar.

We took, in a log-house, our dinner, which consisted, as it always does here, of eggs and bacon, for which you have to pay nearly as much as for a dinner at the red house in Frankfurt. Our fellow-travellers in the carriage came long after us, and wondered at the briskness of our walking, which they thought would have made an American's tongue hang out of his throat in such hot weather. For just then it was really hot. In the course of the morning there had been, according to the custom of the country, two or three alternate transitions from heat to cold.

After we had eaten our eggs and bacon, and swallowed a couple of draughts of whisky, we took up, not our staff, but our feet, and proceeded. The land, through the whole day's journey, of thirty-three English miles, could not be reckoned among the most fertile parts. The greatest part of it, owing to the quantites of stones, and the rocky ranges of mountains, was never susceptible of tillage. The Susquehannah has evidently been wider than it now is, for in many parts it forms a small valley, the soil of which is fertile.

The last five English miles we passed on the high rocky banks of the Susquehannah, shaded with thick rows of trees. A thunder shower overtook us as night came on. We wandered about among the woods, and at length reached the house of Mr. White, who keeps a sort of half and half inn; that is, he takes in travellers for good stout payment, and at the same time gives himself the airs, and his wife still more, of granting thereby a favour. Such kind of equivocal houses have always been my aversion. From McAllister's to Sunbury, a distance of forty-six English miles, there are, however, only two or three inns, excepting Halifax, so highly favoured in this respect, and they are beneath all censure. You have eggs and bacon to eat; whisky to drink; a bag of straw for your bed; and have the unceasing noise of drunken peasants to endure, and pay for all these enjoyments a great deal of money. There is, behind the Blue mountains at least, nothing at all to be seen of the so highly boasted prosperous condition of Pennsylvania.

It is not considered here, nor indeed throughout all America, indecent to quarter in one bed, two strangers unacquainted with each other. There are chambers containing ten beds, and into which even ladies are ushered to sleep in them. I have met, not far from Philadelphia, a girl of eighteen in bed with a young fellow who was not her brother. This may be called simplicity of manners: it may be so: but it is national coldness of constitution too.

From White's we continued our journey the next day, through the hilly, rocky, woody, barren country, about ten miles to Sunbury. It was hot and rained, and consequently was unhealthy weather. We breakfasted with an industrious German peasant family, upon bacon and eggs, indeed, but with the addition of honey, apple-jelly, &c. These people furnish a proof that those who are not so lazy as the rest, can even in this country have a greater variety of eatables. We travelled along the side of the river. The highway turns off from it and is further. At the mouth of the large brook, called here Shima-kin creek, we were obliged to row in a boat round a mountain which comes here close upon the river. Hereupon we came to the plain surrounded by a semi-circle of mountains, in which Sunbury is situated. The soil is fertile, and when the hills shall be adorned with villas and planted with vines, it will be a charming spot. Sunbury lays along the banks of the Susquehannah, which are here flat: on the opposite banks of the river there are steep mountains, and as the place is on all sides enclosed by them, there are vapours resting over it, even when the sky of the neighbouring country is clear, which make it very unhealthy.

Northumberland is much more beautifully situated upon the isthmus, where the Susquehannah, which here flows from the north-west, unites with its western branch. This last comes directly from the west, and falls just opposite the northern end of Sunbury into the proper Susquehannah.

Northumberland lies upon the gradual descent of an hill, which rises like an amphitheatre, and in the back-ground joins upon a woody mountain, which bounds the horizon to the northward. This natural amphitheatre is exposed to the rays of the sun, and protected more than other places from cold winds, and appears consequently admirably calculated for the cultivation of the vine.

On the southern side of the western branch, rocky hills join close upon the water, and first lose themselves six miles higher up. Where they finish, the low land of Buffaloe valley, expands, and has a soil uncommonly fertile. It is, however, yet too thickly covered with wood, so that the prospect is no where thoroughly cleared. Land altogether uncleared costs here no less than seven pounds an acre.

This western branch of the Susquehannah is an handsome still flowing river, free from rocks. Its banks are mostly flat and fertile. There is more level land upon its banks, than in any other part of Pennsylvania.

Derrytown is a village close upon the western branch, where more houses would, ere this, have been built, had it been possible to ascertain the true owners of the lots—Speculation has thrown all into confusion.

It is surprising that this part of the country is not yet more settled; as it is one of the most fruitful parts of Pennsylvania. Northumberland is the place of refuge for many English emigrants, the most celebrated of whom are Priestley and Cooper. The people there, now and then, when you speak of them, call them "English dogs."

Cooper has purchased a plantation in the neighbourhood of Northumberland; but when he found upon visiting his workmen, to whom he was obliged to pay enormous wages, that they were always resting themselves, and drinking; and heard himself called an English dog, whenever he made any objection to this; he grew weary of the thing, sold his plantation, and gives no credit at present to farming projects in America.

When Priestly wrote to his friends that Northumberland was an earthly paradise, it was only putting a good face upon a bad bargain. Northumberland is prettily situated, and the land is good, but far from being a paradise.—The climate is especially not paradisaical: no more than the drunken barbarians by whom it is inhabited.

I returned by water. Though it was the 25th of May, a north-west wind made it very cold. In sailing from Northumberland upon the river, the prospect is truly enchanting. In future times, when Northumberland and Sunbury shall have grown to be large cities, and the hills which surround them shall be adorned with villas and vineyards, the country must exhibit an uncommon richness and magnificence, when the radiance of the sun shall gild so varied a picture.

The raft upon which I floated down the river, was steered by three persons, who came from the sources of the western branch of the Susquehannah, and two of whom were young lads, who had never before left their home, and were admiring the houses, which, in comparison with their huts, were so large. The boards, which formed the raft, were destined for Havre-de-Grace, on Chesapeake bay, at the mouth of the Susquehannah. In those western regions, which are still thickly covered with wood, the trade in boards is the principal means of subsistence, and a saw-mill the most important property. These people say, that each of them shoot from forty to fifty deer annually, and as many as twenty elks. They had dried elk's flesh with them, which I thought had a very good taste. They had likewise a large and superb pair of antlers, not shovel-formed like those of the elk, but perfectly resembling the branches of an European stag.

We travelled on the raft at the rate of about four English miles by the hour, which shews exactly the rapidity of the river. It was now high water so that we could pass over the falls without danger. At low water the Susquehannah is throughout innavigable.

The banks exhibited nothing but barren rocky mountains covered with bushes, and here and there romantic situations. In the evening we found ourselves a couple of miles below Harrisburg, and as a fog began to rise over the river, we fled by the advice of the experienced steerman of the raft, over head and ears, to get away from the river, and escape a fever. The next day I arrived again by the way of Elizabethtown at Lancaster.

CHAPTER XIV.

Second excursion to the same neighbourhood—Asylum.

In the course of my journeys in America, I was never, indeed, so lucky as a certain writer of travels, whose name I do not remember, and who declares that in Armenia he had seen the devil Asmodeus. One seldom has an opportunity to make such interesting acquaintances. I think, however, that the reader will not find here such remarks as the following "when I went out early in the morning, I saw little puddles of water frozen over; but by the time it was eleven o'clock the ice had thawed all away." I made, at the beginning of September 1796, another excursion into this same neighbourhood upon business. The road being the same, I have little further to remark. I found every thing at Mr. M'Allister's in as good condition as before. He was then busied in building a new house upon a small elevation close to the river, from which there is a delightful prospect. His whole plantation is of his own creation, effected, I believe, in the course of twelve years. Mrs. M'Allister, though an excellent hostess, is fond of reading. I found here an English translation of Zimmerman upon Solitude, and Mrs. M'Allister said it was extremely fine. Mr. M'Allister gave seventeen pounds an acre for his land which was then uncleared; an enormous price, to which the favourable situation on the high road, and on the river contributed much. In Northumberland I met with an Englishman of my acquaintance, who could not find words to express his astonishment at the great and unexpected corruption of morals prevailing in that neighbourhood.

Higher up on the eastern branch of the Susquehannah, French emigrants from St. Domingo had formed a settlement which they called Asylum. I carefully inquired after the condition of this establishment; most of my informers assured me that it was already at an end. But I could not, upon this subject, obtain a full certainty. Mr. Noailles and Mr. Talon are the founders of this little colony. They sold the land to the colonists. But the people say, that clearing land was by no means the talent of these French planters, who understood much better giving concerts, balls, and plays among themselves. Hunting was said also to be much to their taste, and they profaned even the Sunday by their hunting parties, which, especially in the eyes of the New-Englanders, whose neighbours they are, Asylum being situated not far from Wyoming, was an abomination. They were likewise for having fine houses all at once. I returned by the road on the western banks of the Susquehannah, where there is much more good level land than upon the eastern side. The land upon Penn's creek especially is very good. It is a black, light, rich earth, mixed with sand. The trees here have also a respectable size. The good soil seems to be considerably deep. This is one of the fertile spots of the Susquehannah valley. The settlements of Wyoming and Wyolusing, celebrated for their fertility, are likewise upon the Susquehannah. In Wyolusing this fruitful soil, which has probably been gradually washed up by the water, is said to be fourteen feet deep. Every thing grows upon it to admiration, and particularly flax. In this hilly and stony country it is agreeable for once to meet with a plain, by way of variety.

This fruitful plain is, however, of small extent. To the westward it is bounded by hills, as barren as in this country is usual. It would form a beautiful landscape, if these hills were planted with vineyards, while the plains, bounded at the eastward by a beautiful river, should be decked with meadows and corn fields.

In requiring a higher degree of cultivation upon these regions, I shall be accused by persons of very youthful views, of wishing for the harvest before seed time. To this I shall only answer, that large commercial cities like Philadelphia, &c. and generally all foreign commerce not having its basis in the agriculture and manufactures of the country, may very properly be compared to harvests without seed-time. Let the hands be given in America to agriculture which foreign commerce and sea-ports withdraw from it, and especially let laws be made to encourage industry and promote the migrations from Europe, and there will be no occasion to complain of the want of hands for labour. The Americans might profit by the previously acquired knowledge of the Europeans, and carry the tillage of the land to an higher degree of perfection than any European nation. They might compare the various methods of the Europeans with each other, and chuse the best. Thus they might learn for instance from the provinces of Champagne and Burgundy the best method of making wine, &c.

Middle creek, a pretty considerable stream, flows likewise through this plain. These little rivers have plenty of fish. The people hereabouts were all employed in shooting squirrels.

CHAPTER XV.

Journey from Philadelphia, North westerly to the Blue mountains. Remarks upon the mountains, and upon the modern systems of geography. Great Line valley. Diet of the farmers. Game. Mr. Weiss. White hares.

I have nothing material to observe during the remainder of my journey back to Lancaster; I shall therefore make some remarks, resulting from the small tours which I made in America, in the years 1791 and 1792; chronological order being in no wise necessary for my purpose.

In October 1791 I travelled north westerly from Philadelphia to the Blue mountain. The road is continually ascending. The distance is sixty-six English miles. There is a succession of hills running parallel to one another. The country is plentifully supplied with brooks, whose waters grow continually clearer in proportion as you approach the mountains. The road goes through Germantown and White-Marsh, where Washington had in December 1777, his celebrated camp, upon a range of hills. Trout are found in the brooks, not far from the mountains. The land in general is of indifferent fertility, except upon the first long range of mountains, where it is fruitful. I mean that chain which is the nearest to the Blue mountains in descending towards the sea. It is longer than the Blue mountain itself, which joins to the Alleghany in North Carolina; but this first chain continues to run parallel with the united Blue and Alleghany mountains into West Florida, and extends as some suppose, as far as Mexico; which appears to me to be very probable.

But that this, as well as the Blue mountain terminates upon Hudson's river, I question, upon very good grounds. In New England, chains of mountains make their appearance again, running like this, north east and south west. The Blue mountain breaks off suddenly, where it is very high, (2800 feet above the surface of the water) close upon the Hudson, and the continuations of the mountains on the eastern side are not so high; but even though the chain should be altogether interrupted, the ridge of the mountain may be continued under ground, and when after such an interruption, a chain of mountains arises again, and follows the same course as the others, it must be considered as a continuation of them.

The various names given to the same chain of mountains, often lead to an erroneous opinion that they are not the same. Thus for example this first chain of mountains is called, I think, in New-Jersey Muskiriko; in Pennsylvania near Bethlehem, the Lehigh hills. Further on, the Olive hills. Then, the Iron mountains. In Virginia, the South mountain, probably because it lays south of the Blue mountain, &c. &c. This confuses the physical geography of a country, which ought always to keep pace with its political geography. A geographer should for instance remark, whether several mountains with different names belong to the same chain or not. If he means to instruct, he must know this. A mere compilation of what is contained in other books, if the author adds nothing of his own, can at most prove nothing more than unwearied industry. Such compilations are of very little use, when the mighty compiler admits errors as well as truth into his volumes. Inasmuch as materials variously dispersed, may be found collected in his massive volumes together, they are convenient; but they should contain no errors; which however it is scarcely possible to avoid. When men of genius busy themselves with geography, it assumes quite a different shape. Thus for instance we are better acquainted with ancient Germany and Britain, by the little which Tacitus wrote of them, than by all the heaps of undigested crudities, called among the moderns, systems of geography.

A geographer should likewise elucidate natural history. Thus, for example, he should not say, in America, there are roe bucks, elks, &c. merely because the inhabitants call them such, but should examine whether they belong to the breed or not. It is likewise to be wished that he would name expressly all the known sorts of animals and of birds, and not, after mentioning several kinds, add in general terms "and the like." The term "in short," likewise, often used by bad writers is insufferable in systems of geography. For instance. "In short, the country produces all the necessaries of life, &c." In a system of geography it is not general expressions "that are required, but details." In all these respects, professor Ebeling's system of geography is very advantageously distinguished above others. It is the best work of the kind, which has appeared in modern times.

This first chain of mountains, is distant fifty English miles from Philadelphia, to the north westward. Philadelphia is itself situated fifty-five miles distant from the sea, in a direct south east line, which meets a point upon the coast of New-Jersey. Consequently the distance of this mountain from the sea, is one hundred and six English miles. In the southern states it is further distant from the coast, and in the northern states nearer to it.

The Blue mountains are every where about sixteen miles distant from this first chain. These two ranges of mountains enclose the most fruitful part of the Atlantic states; for the other fertile spots eastward of the Allegany mountain, along the rivers and in some vallies, bear so little proportion to the whole surface, as to deserve no consideration. This valley seems to be well qualified for producing wine.

On the west side of the mountains, there is a tract of very good land, running parallel to them, which is not very broad, and chiefly level, and comprises the fertile townships of Maxetania, Magunthy, and others. I went to Maxetania. The soil was blackish, and appeared to be of a very good quality. The farm houses and barns were built of very good common stone; as was generally the case from Philadelphia to this place. In such a stony country indeed, stones for building, chiefly sand stones, are very easy to be had; but notwithstanding this, the country would not have such a flourishing appearance, if the farmers were tormented with European feudality, with recruiting, with quartering of troops, with supplies of provisions, of horses, of waggons, as much as in our part of the world. When we reflect that there is here no army at all to maintain, we must wonder that the situation of the farmer is not still more prosperous; and we cannot avoid the thought, that with equal advantages the German peasant would advance far beyond the American, considering that in spite of the various oppressions which he suffers, he can very well compare with, or even surpasses him, in many parts of our country, with respect to the comforts of his personal existence.

The Blue mountains are not very strikingly lofty, but are remarkable by their resemblance to a regular wall. As soon as you leave the fertile township of Maxetania, which is not large, the wretched log houses begin, and the landscape becomes again as barren, and as hilly as before. In general, this whole valley, excepting a few spots, distant from seven to eight or ten miles from the Blue mountain, is not fruitful. The high hills are gravely, and dry. There are scarcely any vallies at all between them, or none wider than the brooks, which enlose almost all of them. Only one half of the valley, that which lies nearest to the first range of mountains, is fertile. I must further remark that Lancaster is situated not in this valley, but eastward of the first range of mountains. But Carlisle lays in it, as do Harrisburg, Bethlehem and Easton.

I ascended the Blue mountain. The prospects on the two sides, in some measure contrasted with each other. To the eastward, in the above mentioned valley, was to be seen more cultivation; to the westward was almost an uninterrupted forest, only interspersed here and there with spots of green fields, while a second range of mountains bounded the horizon.

Westward of the Blue mountain, the land is more barren than in the valley to the eastward, I stopped here at a farmer's who was born in Germany, and had the reputation of being a good huntsman. We went a hunting together, and saw two stags, but missed them both. We shot several grouse in the morning and in the evening, as they passed. The people here live badly. They have not the least furniture in their huts. You must sleep upon bags of straw. They have neither beer nor wine; but have brandy, and when the apples succeed, bad cyder. They seldom have fresh meat unless it be game. Salt meat is almost their daily food. They have in winter, no other vegetables than potatoes and a bad preparation of sour kroust.

A certain Mr. Weisse passes in this neighbourhood for a gentleman. I found him before the door of his house dressed in ragged clothes; this is usual among the Americans in the country. He persuaded me to pass the night at his house. It was a log house, well furnished. He gave me for supper, tea and buck-wheat cakes. He had been an inhabitant of Philadelphia, and his daughter was pretty and very agreeable. He had purchased here some bad land, which would have reduced him to bankruptcy, if he had not discovered a coal mine upon his estate.

Mr. Weisse lives upon the Lehigh, seven miles above its passage through the Blue mountain. The Lehigh joins upon the Blue mountain one mile south of the gap, where it flows through it; after running thence parallel with the mountain, it runs through it where it is at its greatest height. Where the mountain first touches the river, it is much lower. How is this to be explained? Along the Lehigh, before its passage through the mountain, there is a small valley, surrounded by hills and bounded at the eastward by the Blue mountain, which, by the concentration of the sun's rays upon it, would be well adapted to produce wine. This region is indeed romantic; but the soil is poor, and the inhabitants are coarse barbarians, chiefly of German origin.

I amused myself here for a time, with hunting. The Pine Swamp, so called, is yet full of game, and contains particularly a white kind of hare, larger than the hare of Europe, and having exactly the same flesh. Their fur is very soft, and the end of the tail black. The hair is excellent for hats. I could not learn whether their colour continues white in summer. How little versed are we still in natural history, notwithstanding the labours of a Buffon and a Daubenton, since this species of hare has been hitherto unknown! It is remarkable, that this animal has been extant in Pennsylvania, only a few years; it was first seen in 1788.

CHAPTER XVI.

Journey from Northampton county in Pennsylvania through New-Jersey, to New-York—The Lehigh—Bethlehem—Easton—The Rariton—Boundbrook—Washington's camp in 1777—Elizabethtown—New-York—General Steuben—The Result.

From this place, I made a journey through New-Jersey, to New-York. The distance to Easton is sixteen miles; nine miles of which, the road runs along the Lehigh, which here winds along between very high and arid mountains, not well adapted to produce corn: the country is afterwards more level and more fertile; but according to what I have before remarked, the north western tract which runs parallel to the Blue mountain, in a long valley, (the longest valley indeed in the world, since it certainly extends through all the Atlantic United States) is barren. The width of these barren hills is nine miles, reckoned from the Blue mountain. But of course it is not every where the same. The nearer you approach to the first chain of mountains, the more fruitful is the land. Bethlehem is surrounded with a fertile soil. It stands on the first chain of mountains, on the borders of the valley. It is remarkable that the Lehigh joins upon the chain of mountains, in like manner as upon the Blue mountain, and then flows in a northern direction parallel to it, until it falls into the Delaware near Easton. Easton is ten miles to the north eastward of Bethlehem, the Moravian town, which stands in a very romantic situation upon the side of an hill, at the foot of which flows the charming Lehigh, and a large trout brook falls here into that river.

Easton is romantically situated on the western banks of the Delaware. The Lehigh rushes with a loud noise into this river. Mountains, rocks, clear streams, and brooks, meadows, fields, and groves, all concur in forming here an enchanting landscape.

The banks of the Delaware are here very high. On the opposite side from Easton stands Philipsburg, a village inhabited by a dissolute crew, as may be known at first sight by the paper windows, and the huts threatening to fall in ruins. The journey through this part of Jersey, was at this season very agreeable: it was the beginning of May; all the fruit gardens were in blossom: this, connected with the verdure of the corn fields, gave great beauty to the landscape. Not far from Easton, but in New-Jersey, I saw in the midst of a smiling cornfield, an high rock, which strongly contrasted with the softness of all the surrounding natural objects, and on that account produced a finer effect.

The same valley above mentioned, between the Blue mountain and the first range, is more fertile and pleasant, as it approaches nearer to them, and bears a great resemblance to certain mountainous parts of Germany. To the eastward of the first chain, here called Maskiniko, the land is dry and barren, as I found it throughout almost all my way to New-York. I never saw worse rye, even in the sandy regions of Brandenburg than in New-Jersey.

Along the Rariton there lies a little good land. In the neighbourhood of Elizabethtown it was likewise tolerable. The rest was altogether bad.

The Rariton rises from two rivers, the east and west branches, which unite together ten miles above Boundbrook. Their banks are agreeable. From the point of their union until the Rariton falls into the sea, its banks are fertile, and present smiling landscapes to the eye.

Not far from Boundbrook is the celebrated camp of Washington, in the campaign of 1777. It was situated upon woody mountains. The woods in front, and upon the flanks, were adapted to the American mode of warfare; for they know very well how to lay upon the belly, to fire at an enemy without being seen, and then to run away. This mode of fighting, however, is not dangerous to those who know how to take the necessary precautions against it.

Elizabethtown, sixteen miles distant from New-York, is a very handsome village, or if you like it better, city, where several palace-like houses, belonging to wealthy inhabitants of New-York, give a striking appearance to the place. From thence I went in the packet boat to New-York. This city is in my opinion more beautifully situated than Philadelphia, and was reputed healthier, until in the autumn of 1795, the yellow fever gave a violent shock to its reputation for healthiness. In the summer of 1796, considerable symptoms of a prevailing fever again appeared, though it was denied to be the yellow fever. New-York and Philadelphia hate each other to an inexpressible degree. When the people of Philadelphia die by thousands, the New-Yorkers rejoice, and vice versa. The Philadelphia gazette makers describe New-York as the basest of all cities. In New-York, they say nothing better of Philadelphia. "The New York state is a nasty state" say the Pennsylvania Germans in their vulgar jargon. So it is, in societies composed of egotists; every one against all, and all against every one.

New-York has some handsome buildings. The front of St. Paul's church, with six porphyry pillars, is very elegant. There is in Philadelphia no street so handsome as Broadway in New-York. The prospect upon Hudson's river is admirable. The square upon which the governor's house stands is handsome, and that building is truly a palace.

I visited general Steuben, who is here called the Baron. So that whenever a person spoke of "the Baron," Steuben was universally understood to be meant. He was a violent enemy to the French revolution. He is fond of comparing himself with those generals who, in our days, have commanded and organized armies of insurgents, and with reason; since this parallel always turned to his advantage. He laughed a little at general Schonfeldt for his expedition in Belgium. The Americans are indeed much indebted to general Steuben, and they acknowledge it; and generally name him next to Washington, for his services during the revolution; for Washington, they think, was never qualified to discipline a body of troops, and practise them in the art of tactics. Steuben wrote a very good military book of exercise, which the Congress wished to introduce among the militia, but which is not attended to. He received from Congress a pension of 2,500 dollars a year. He appears by his will, to have considered himself richer than he was; for he estimated the lands which had been given him as a compensation, in the wildernesses of America, much too high; and his nephew, Mr. Kanitz, inherited from him no great estate. The reputation of an excellent officer, possessed of great knowledge of the world, and of mankind, belongs incontestably to general Steuben.

From New-York, I returned by the same way to the place whence I had come; and from thence to Philadelphia. You find in general more civility in New-Jersey than in Pennsylvania. They pay more attention to the education of children.

Upon my return from the Blue mountain to Philadelphia, I passed through the agreeable and fertile district of Moguntshy, where clear brooks, with shelvy banks, wind round among meadows and fruitful fields. An hurricane had here torn up most of the apple trees. This township is bounded at the eastward by the first chain of mountains. Millerstown is the principal place.

I shall now here comprize the result of all my remarks upon the land of the United States of North America. Excepting the Ohio and Mississippi vallies, and in general the western country, the land is upon the whole inferior in fertility to Germany. Germany enjoys a much milder climate than the Atlantic states, and perhaps, than all North America, because not subject to so great extremes of heat and cold, and the changes of weather are not so sudden. That Germany is healthier was never doubted.

MISCELLANY.

[We hope our countrymen will read the following article attentively, and that each city in the union will remember that there are other buildings, beside Banks, which contribute to the magnificence of a nation. Liverpool is a great Commercial town too, but a fostering and affectionate nurse to every man of genius, and to every liberal Institution.]

LIVERPOOL LYCÆUM.

This magnificent room, which was opened on July last, at the bottom of Bold Street, forms the principal part of a most elegant structure, to be designated by the name of the "Lycæum." Several professional men of the first eminence, who have seen this building, have concurred in declaring it to be, in many respects, the first architectural ornament of Liverpool. There is a chasteness and simplicity in the whole design, both external and internal, for which the works of Mr. Harrison (the Architect) are so particularly distinguished.

The Lycæum is a building of one floor only, above a sunk basement, consisting of a coffee room, library, and other necessary appendages.

The coffee-room, both with respect to size, situation, elegance, and convenience, is absolutely unrivalled. It is an oblong of nearly 70 feet by 38, with a recess on the side opposite the window, of 46 feet by 10, making its whole width 48 feet. It is the only coffee-room with which we are acquainted that possesses height in due proportion to its other dimensions, being 31 feet from the floor to the centre of the ceiling, which is finished in the form of a flat arch, divided into large compartments by plain mouldings, the recess has also an arched ceiling in the same style of finishing, and there are no columns to separate it from the main body of the room. The noble sweep of this latter arch has a striking and sublime effect on the eye from every part of the room.

There are five large windows on the side towards Church-Street, commanding an open view, which can never be obstructed, down that spacious and principal street, and one large three light window, at the end towards Bold Street.—The bar is very commodiously situated near the principal entrance, and there is a convenient apartment corresponding to it, intended for a repository of papers, pamphlets, &c. communicating with the upper end of the room.

The library is a rotunda of 45 feet diameter, and about 40 feet in height, finished with a dome, and lighted only by a central sky-light. The lower part is divided into 12 recesses for books, supporting a gallery of 6 feet wide carried all round the circle, which will also be shelved for the reception of books to the height of 9 feet. In the angles are stair cases, and closets for the Librarian. The reading room, or lesser Library, is 33 feet by 21, and over it is a committee room, of like dimensions. In the basement are apartments forming a convenient dwelling for the master of the coffee-room.

The principal front to Bold-Street, is in extent, 132 feet. In the centre is a recessed portico, forming a handsome and most convenient entrance both to the coffee-room and library, consisting of 6 columns, 25 feet in height, of the pure Ionic order, (supporting an entablature which is carried quite round the building) and a noble pediment, the whole extent of the portico or colonnade; on each side are large windows of three lights, divided by Doric columns, and terminated with flat arches. The front to Church-Street, is ornamented with four semi-columns of the same ancient Ionic order, over which is an attic with four pedestals, intended, to support so many appropriate statues. Over the three centre windows, are compartments, decorated with three bas so relievos of Apollo, Geography, and Commerce, which were designated and executed by Mr. Lege, an ingenious sculptor of this town.

The effect of the two front, when viewed together, on approaching from Church-street, or from the top of Hanover-street, is peculiarly striking and impressive. From these places the beautiful proportions of the colonades, and the majestic simplicity of the artist's plan, are distinctly comprehended. Both fronts of the building are finished with handsome hewn stone.

The workmanship throughout is executed in a manner which reflects the highest credit on the contractor, Mr. Slater. The flooring of the coffee room is particularly worthy of attention, from its uncommon firmness and compactness, as well as the excellence of the wood. We are afraid Mr. Slater will derive more honor than profit from his contract, which has certainly been fulfilled "to the spirit as well as the letter."

LEVITY.

["The Spectator" has exhibited the most beautiful models of every species of mock and ludicrous Journals. We have Chronicles of Loungers, of Rakes, and of Snorers. The following, from a recent print, is the diary of a drunkard. In a strain of delightful drollery it describes the progress of intemperance in the revels of one who might challenge as his motto the epitaph of Bonosus.

"Here lies not a man, but a bottle."]

DIARY

OF MR. THOMAS NOGGIN, AT THE BULL AT —

MONDAY.—Set off from my house in — street, on my own gelding; rode slowly on, determining not to overheat myself, for that makes me drink; arrived at the Bull at two o'clock; ordering a snug little bit of dinner; a boiled towel and oyster sauce; in my own room; determined to see no-body; dine alone for the first time these six years; did not drink before dinner; dinner served up; ordered some excellent ale, and one pint of wine; dined and began to smoke my pipe; room pleasant; over-looks the water; saw my friend Joe Trimsh arrive, called to Joe to ask how he did; Joe very glad to see me; took a couple of glasses of my wine; and when it was out, insisted on calling for his bottle; could not refuse him; drank that; he offered to pay; could not think of letting him do so; called for another bottle; Joe recollected an old wager betwixt him and me, which I had lost; something about the length of the Ball-room at the — tavern; had the bottle in; Joe went to town, and I went to sleep; waked about nine, very queer; a glass of brandy and water to wash down; ordered a veal cutlet for supper; and determined to see no more company; must call for something, a pint of wine; smoked till I fell asleep, and in the morning.

TUESDAY.—Plaguy sick; could eat no breakfast; took a ride, and called on an old acquaintance six miles off; must taste his shrub; excellent; asked if he had any commercial brandy yet; said no; but he had some which was better; a glass of it; left him; head ache much better; ordered a trout and two pigeons; resolved to see no body; stepping across the yard, met Joe again; said he came to ask me how I did; could not but ask him to dine; added some steaks, drank three bottles with Joe; would not taste a drop more; Joe promised to bring a few friends to take a chop with me; went to sleep as soon as he left me; plaguy hot when I awaked; ordered some eggs and spinage with a rasher; a pint of sherry.

WEDNESDAY.—Complaints in head and breast worse; wondered the country air had no better effect; began to think the Doctor an ass; just thought of a Doctor: and had a pint of rum and milk; Joe and four more came down; told them I was very ill, and they must excuse my drinking; agreed; proposed a walk to an aunt of Joe's, obliged to taste the old Lady's water; carried off much wind; proposed to hide the horse for some Lisbon and bitters before dinner; won; bitters did me good; sat down to dinner; they all drank my health, could not but drink theirs; asked for my toast; a bumper; went on by degrees; and drank two bottles a man; all left me asleep; as soon as I awoke, ordered a rabbit for supper; a pint of port; went to bed.

THURSDAY.—Nobody at dinner; all snug; a few mutton chops, and a pint of wine; smoaked and slept till supper; hungry; ordered a roast duck; landlord came in; said the house was full, a gentleman wished to sup in the same room, if agreeable to me; consented, as I could fear nothing from a stranger; who should it be but Tom Tossopot; drank two bottles a piece, and went to bed.

FRIDAY.—Worse and worse, wondered what the Doctor could mean by saying the country air would do me good; received an invitation to dine with Joe, who was at an inn two miles off; determined not to taste any thing before dinner; arrived just as the dinner was serving up; a fine pig; partook very heartily; and was going to call for a bottle of wine, when Joe told me this was but a luncheon, as we were not to dine till four o'clock; cursed him for a mad wag; took a ride with him; and returned to dinner; a fine haunch, could not resist; drank three bottles a piece; as the landlord was a friend of Joe's; parted, somehow got home to my own inn; ordered a supper, very hungry and dry; drank a pot of ale and a pint of wine; determined never to exceed a pint of wine, went to bed.

SATURDAY.—Awoke at six o'clock; my head at the foot of the bed, and my heels on the pillow; could not think how it happened; went to sleep till twelve; drank two basons of tea; could not eat; took a ride, ordered dinner, but could not eat; landlord came in; begged pardon, but asked if my name was not Mr. Noggin, if so, he remembered my father in——and all my friends; pleased to hear of all my relations, could not but call for a bottle of wine; landlord offered to pay his share; would not let him; but he ordered a crown bowl of rack punch which he begged to treat me with; said it was better for the stomach than wine; saw it out; very sick; determined to stay no longer, as the country air was of no service; the stage passing went into it and came home at ten o'clock, went to see my friends in——street, drank two bottles and went home.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

[The following article is curious, as it shews that if an assault follows up the insolence of Democratic abuse, some juries will give no damages. The circumstance alluded to by Mr. Garrow, of the manly spirit of Mr. WINDHAM will afford pleasure to the admirers of that cavalier.]

An action for an assault (Warner v. Smithson) was tried at Hertford assizes, which was no ways worthy of remark, but for the ludicrous turn it took. The plaintiff is a farmer, and was returning from a profitable adventure, having been at market, when he came at the Red Lion, at Hockerill, otherwise stiled Sot's Hole. Here he quarrelled with all the honest dealers in grain he met, and was at last so imprudent as to intimate that the defendant, who was one of them, was a d——d liar; the defendant very naturally felt that his character was at stake, and that if he passed it over slightly, the public could not believe him at the next market day, when he should tell them he had brought all the grain he was in possession of to market, and that he felt no desire to keep up the price of corn; he, therefore, replied, that if he repeated the same obnoxious expressions, he would "knock his d——d head about." The plaintiff very imprudently did so, and the defendant was as good as his word.

Mr. Garrow defended the action in a strain of infinite humour, contending that Mr. Smithson had done no more than any other man would have done in his situation. The laws of courtesy, he said, were infallibly the same on the subject; "if a man calls me a liar, I must knock him down." To prove which he cited many cases that had come within his recollection; among others, that of a very great man, whose talents he said, would do honour to any country, he meant Mr. Windham, who chanced to be in company, after his unsuccessful struggle for the city of Norwich, where an elector told him he had not voted for him, and as they were met he would tell him the reason why: in the first place he did not like him; and in the second, his aversion arose from his being a turn-coat, and many more observations equally affronting. Mr. Windham replied very coolly, "you do this sir, to put me off my guard, but I am collected, and though the laws of courtesy bid me knock you down, yet, as you have before voted for me, and as I think it may teach you how to behave in future, I shall only pull your nose," which he did, said Mr. Garrow, by wringing it well. He had no doubt that transaction would be brought into a court of justice, and if it was, he doubted not it would be treated in the same manner he hoped the present would; namely, by a jury giving a verdict of two pence damages, to enable such a plaintiff to buy enough of soft soap to protect his nose at least for a week.

The jury gave a verdict of sixpence damages, when Mr. Garrow observed to the plaintiff, who was in court, "there, sir, the jury have been more bountiful to you than I should have been, for they have given you soap enough for three weeks."

FESTOON OF FASHION.

[I believe it is remarked by the sprightly Colman and Thornton, in a merry Canonsaur, that the winter fashions of London reach the country, in sufficient season to be in full bloom at midsummer. Our coats, on this side of the Atlantic, are copied from the London model generally after the original has become quite faded at home. If an early autumnal scheme of dress can be of any use now, let the beau of Philadelphia copy the following, taking especial care, however, to avoid the old hat.]

FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

The following is now all the rage with the fashionables in London—

Gentlemen.—Blue coat made very scant with pockets in the skirts, blue velvet cape, high up in the neck; pantaloons of mix'd broad cloth made very loose, with pockets; Suwarrow boots all the vogue. An old black hat with a narrow rim, constitutes the Gentleman.

Ladies.—Cambric Muslin Gown, scant, with full sleeves; black chip hat with coloured ribbands, and white veil, some wear white ostrich feathers in their black hats, which has a janty air, and gives a handsome appearance.

The following is a very pleasing essay, the stile is pure, the satire bland, and the wit comic. It is extracted from the New-York Morning Chronicle.

MR. EDITOR,

If the observations of an odd fellow are not wholly superfluous, I would thank you to shove them into a spare corner of your paper.

It is a matter of amusement to an uninterested spectator like myself, to observe the influence fashion has on the dress and deportment of its votaries, and how very quick they fly from one extreme to the other.

A few years since, the rage was; very high crowned hats with very narrow brims, tight neck-cloth, tight coat, tight jacket, tight small-clothes, and shoes loaded with enormous silver buckles: the hair craped, plaited, queued, and powdered:—in short, an air of the greatest spruceness and tightness diffused over the whole person.

The ladies, with their tresses neatly turned up over an immense cushion; waist a yard long, braced up with stays into the smallest compass, and encircled by an enormous hoop: so that the fashionable belle resembled a walking bottle.

Thus dressed, the lady was seen, with the most bewitching languor, reclining on the arm of an extremely attentive beau, who, with a long cane, decorated with an enormous tassel, was carefully employed in removing every stone, stick, or straw, that might impede the progress of his tottering companion, whose high-heeled shoes just brought the points of her toes to the ground.

What an alteration has a few years produced!—We now behold our gentleman with the most studied carelessness, and almost slovenliness of dress; large hat, large coat, large neckcloth, large pantaloons, large boots, and hair scratched into every careless direction, lounging along the streets in the most apparent listlessness and vacuity of thought; staring with an unmeaning countenance at every passenger, or leaning upon the arm of some kind fair one for support, with the other hand cramm'd into his breeches pocket. Such is the picture of a modern beau: in his dress stuffing himself up to the dimensions of a Hercules, in his manners, affecting the helplessness of an invalid.

The belle who has to undergo the fatigue of dragging along this sluggish animal, has chosen a character the very reverse: emulating in her dress and actions all the airy sprightliness of a sylph, she trips along with the greatest vivacity. Her laughing eye, her countenance enlivened with affability and good humor, inspire with kindred animation every beholder, except the torpid being by her side, who is either affecting the fashionable sang-froid, or is wrapt up in profound contemplation of...himself.

Heavens! how changed are the manners since I was young!—then, how delightful to contemplate a ball-room: such bowing, such scraping, such complimenting; nothing but copperplate speeches to be heard on both sides; no walking but in minuet measure; nothing more common than to see half a dozen gentlemen knock their heads together in striving who should first recover a lady's fan or snuff-box that had fallen.

But now, our youths no longer aim at the character of pretty gentlemen: their greatest ambition is to be called lazy dogs—careless fellows, &c. &c. Dressed up in the mammoth style, our buck saunters into the ball-room in a surtout, hat under arm, cane in hand; strolls round with the most vacant air; stops abruptly before such lady as he may choose to honour with his attention; entertains her with the common slang of the day, collected from the conversation of hostlers, footmen, porters, &c. until his string of smart sayings is run out, and then lounges off, to entertain some other fair one with the same unintelligible jargon.

Surely, Mr. Editor, puppyism must have arrived to a climax: it must turn; to carry it to a greater extent seems, to me, impossible.

JONATHAN OLDSTYLE.

CRITICISM.

[It gives us much pleasure to find room in the Port Folio, for the following article from the Frederick Town Herald, a paper not only conspicuous for the soundness of its politics, but for the purity of its style. On the miserable verses of the "Boston Chronicle," a dull democratic gazette, intolerably tedious, egregiously stupid, audaciously false, and unspeakably absurd, criticism, as invoked by the ingenious writer below, appears armed, both by wit and power. An article of this nature is of singular utility. It serves as a new proof, that the Republican faction not only think erroneously, but write incorrectly, and that genius, learning, and taste, as well as truth and virtue, have no connection with democracy.]

FROM THE FREDERICK TOWN HERALD.

"In his closet pent,
He toils to give the crude conception vent,
Abortive thoughts, that write and wrong confound,
Truth sacrificed to letters, sense to sound,
False glare, incongruous images, combine
And noise and nonsense, clatter through the line."

GIFFORD.

Between false politics and false literature there seems to be, at the present period of the world, a closeness of connection, never so remarkable in any past age. This general observation is particularly applicable to the state of our own country. The faction, to which the people are subjected, appear no less conspicuous for weakness and poverty of literary intellect, than they are for the folly and depravity of their political principles. The example of superficial thinking and spurious language, has been completely set them by their great leader, who now lolls in the seat of sovereignty. Its influence has extended through all the ranks of the scribblers, devoted to his service. It is really astonishing, when we consider the multitude of democratic prints scattered over the continent, to observe how extremely rare are the instances they afford of any thing like good writing. In prose they are bad enough in all conscience; but when they pretend to invoke the muses, they are sure to produce such trash or trumpery, as is hardly sufferable by human patience. And, as if determined to expose one another to the utmost of their power, the publication of one press immediately runs through a thousand congenial channels. We have been led to these reflections by a set of verses, which we see re-printed in the last democratic paper of this place (the Hornet) from a New-England one. The writer of them is a candidate for the post of Poet Laureat to the President, and he may flatter himself with the hope of being a successful one, when he discovers the notice his production has met with, thus far from home. As it is perhaps esteemed a master-piece of poetic compliment, we shall lay the whole of it, verbatim et literatim, before the reader, and for want of better amusement, we shall then point out a few of its most choice beauties

From the Boston Independent Chronicle.

STANZAS,

ADDRESSED TO THOMAS JEFFERSON, PRESIDENT
OF THE UNITED STATES.

O'ER the plain in beauty smiling,
See the stormy clouds arise,
Which, as if the light reviling
Hang with black the azure skies.

But ere yet another morning,
Drink the cold earth's dewy tear,
Light, in brighter brilliance dawning,
Shall the dark horizon clear.

Thus with falsehood's vilest story
JEFFERSON, in vain they try
To obscure the beams of glory—
Sun-like beams that ne'er can die.

Furious fiends, with secret slanders,
All their noisome vapours pour,
While around in rapture wanders
Every insect of the hour.

Haggard envy, prone to languish,
Hate, from disappointment born,
Vex'd ambition vents his anguish;
Malice smiles, affecting scorn.

All in vain—sublimely rising,
Truth shall dart her fervid ray,
And the summer cloud desisting,
Chase the envious gloom away.

To thy active genius owing,
That which dar'd proclaim her free,
Still with fire of freedom glowing,
Blest COLUMBIA bends to thee.

Like thy own Potomac winding,
Through the variegated plain,
And between the mountains finding
Health and beauty in his train.

So, by godlike truth protected,
Shall thy fame, thy mind its guide,
Flow with every charm collected,
And remain the PEOPLE'S PRIDE.

Firm and tow'ring as the mountains,
Crowned with virtue's virgin snow,
Pure as nature's fairest fountains
That with sparkling brilliance flow.

Clear as light, when first created,
Chaste as Angels guardian love,
And on wings of time elated,
Deathless as himself shall prove.

THE SIBYL.

What strikes us most forcibly, at the first glance over the above lines, is the strong resemblance which "The Sibyl," as the author of them "bears to the far-famed heroes of the Baviad and Mæviad." Not 'Laura Maria,' 'Edwin,' 'Tony Pasquin,' 'Mit Yenda,' nor even 'Berty Greathead's' self, could force together more delectable nonsense than has been collected in a very narrow span by this potent 'Sibyl.' The Sibyls of old used to place their prophetic verses on detached pieces of paper at the mouth of their cave; from whence they were frequently blown away and lost, by a rude and untimely blast of wind, to the great disappointment of their votaries. How happy should New-England feel, that the labours of her 'Sibyl' have been exempt from any such destructive casualty; that they have been finished and put together entire, without the coming of a single gale of sense or spirit to agitate or disturb their mellifluous lullaby. 'Stormy clouds,' 'light reviling,' 'dewy tear,' 'brighter brilliance dawning,' 'sun-like beams that ne'er can die,' 'furious fiends,' 'secret slanders,' 'noisome vapours,' 'haggard envy prone to languish,' 'fervid rays,' 'summer cloud desisting,' 'envious gloom,' 'virgin snow,' 'fairest fountains,' 'sparkling brilliance,' and a galaxy of other excellencies, follow each other in smooth and uninterrupted succession, and must serve to mark the poet as one of the true breed of Cruscan geese. We regret the want of time to examine and illustrate the various merits of his composition. We cannot help remarking, however, that from the second of these notable stanzas we should fear, lest not America, but Ireland, has had the honour of giving birth to this mighty genius. He says,

"But ere yet another morning
Drink the cold earth's dewy tear,
Light in brighter brilliance dawning,
Shall the dark horizon clear."

Now, how 'light' can be made to dawn, and to 'clear the horizon' before 'morning' or sun rise, is a thing conceivable only, we think, by an Hibernian understanding. Again, the poet seems a little out in his natural philosophy, when he makes the dew come out of the bowels of the earth—'Cold earth's dewy tear,'—As if the earth were shedding tears, because it was 'cold.' After this marvellous fine conceit, we may expect, on getting up, the first frosty morning of this winter, to hear the ground crying out with anguish, and perhaps borrowing the very words of Mad Tom in the play of King Lear, 'Poor Tom's a cold—a cold.' Not noticing many trifling licences in grammar, such as learning 'haggard envy' and 'hate' in the 5th stanza quite destitute of any verb to depend on, let us contemplate towards the conclusion, the amazing Protean power of changing its form and nature, which the poet gives to Mr. Jefferson's 'fame.' In the 9th stanza, the President's 'fame' is made both to 'flow' like a river, and yet to 'remain' like a column.—In the succeeding stanza this 'fame' is 'firm' and 'towering' like 'the mountains,' then again it is 'crowned with snow,' and then again it is 'pure' like 'fairest fountains of sparkling brilliance.' And in the concluding stanza, this same 'fame' is 'clear' like the 'light when first created,' next it is 'chaste' like 'angel's love,' afterwards it takes 'wings' to fly up like a bird, and last of all it is 'deathless,' or like 'time,' never to die. Verily, to be learned is a main pretty thing: Moreover it is a right useful thing; for, were it not for this poet's great knowledge, how should we ever have been able to find out, that 'light' is now nothing to what it used to be, and that the nearer we go back to the moment when 'light' was 'first created' the more, 'clear' we shall behold it to have been. We have nothing to say against the political attachments of 'the Sibyl.' Viewing the piece itself as being, on the whole, the strongest concentration of absurdities and folly that we have lately seen, we are ready to allow, that the doggrel rhymester has been fortunate in fixing on a fit object for the praises of his verse. The subject is worthy of the Eulogist.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

On a topic, so trite as the danger of Intemperance, it could hardly be expected that the pen of Genius could communicate any thing, which could detain vagrant attention. The following extract from a Baltimore paper will please all, and may reform some. "Intemperance is the positive enemy of all solid enjoyment. It is honey in the mouth, but bitter ashes in digestion. It is the father of unnumbered vices.—What errors, what pains, what miseries does it not produce? And what are its benefits? They are known only to the apothecary, doctor and undertaker.

He, who has been long used to his rich wines, his spices, his creams and costly meats, looks with a degree of horror on the virtue of temperance. But he, who has tasted the cup of excess; has experienced all the unreal enjoyment of luxurious poisons; and has become wisely simple and regular in his diet; in full possession of cheerful spirits and vigorous health; would not exchange his happy mood of mind, his gay and quiet hours, for the morning headache, the forenoon mental vacuity, the afternoon nap, the hypochondriac hours, the uneasy rest of the night, with much turning on the bed, the indigesting stomach, the trembling hand, the bloody eye, the choleric, palsy, gout, distress, despair, that accompany the bacchanalian, no, not if Andes in gold attended the barter.

Neither talents, wealth nor fame can supply the want of prudence and temperance. Let every man who prefers happiness to misery, engrave on the tablet of his memory the following excellent lines from Milton, and never forget them when he eats or drinks."

"There is, said Michael, if thou well observe,
THE RULE OF NOT TOO MUCH, by temperance taught,
In what thou eat'st and drink'st, seeking from thence,
Due nourishment, not gluttonous delight,
Till many years over thine head return;
So may'st thou live, till like RIPE FRUIT thou drop
Into thy mother's lap; or be with ease
Gather'd, not barely pluck'd."

FROM PARIS, AUGUST 1.

"Mr. Fenwick, the late Consul at Bordeaux, lately applied to President Jefferson for another appointment; the President told him, the public voice was so much against him, that he could not give him a public appointment; but observed at the same time, that the Treasury would take care of him. Accordingly Mr. Fenwick is sent to Amsterdam, as banker of the United States, with a promise that all the monies paid in Europe by the United States, shall go through his hands. Thus a Minister resident of 4500 dollars, is displaced to make way for one, who will make out of the United States at least 20,000 dollars!! Such is modern economy.

"I am informed, that a number of our countrymen have celebrated the 4th of July at Bordeaux, in a truly democratic style, with the American Consul as President, and the American Consul for Lisbon, as Vice President. After dinner, a number of democratic toasts were drank; and the President with a torch, blew up a ginger-bread bastille erected for the occasion, while the music played Ca-Ira, Carmagnole and Marseillois. The day happening to be on the Sabbath, it was proposed to postpone until Monday the celebration. This, however, was overruled by the men of the "Age of Reason."

The subsequent record of an Hymeneal union is copied from that classical paper, The New-York American Citizen, edited by a fugitive foreigner. The poetry is one of the finest specimens of democratic harmony, with which we have ever been indulged.

MARRIED,

Last Evening, by the Rev. Mr. Strebeck, Mr. Ralph Bogert, to the amiable Miss Sarah Bonte, both of this city.

Long may they in hymen's bands be blest,
And crown'd with wealth and happiness.

The Irish are frequently ridiculed for their propensity to those absurd or illsorted phrases, commonly called blunders, or bulls. This charge is often unjust, and many an Irish scholar expresses himself, with as much purity and precision, as his criticising neighbours. At any rate, not many American Aristarchuses have a right to sneer at any of the incongruous forms of vicious diction. One of our morning papers, published during the invasion of the Yellow Fever, describes advancing motion by a retrograde step. Of such a progress the mind even of those, whose judgment is most acute, and, whose fancy is most fruitful, cannot have any adequate notion. We copy the article, and then leave our classical readers to determine, whether the following paragraph may be considered as a kind of mystical response from the oracle of Delphos, or only an enchanting specimen of that American idiom, which, thanks to our love of French models, thanks to our ignorance, and thanks to our Patriotism is daily triumphing over the barbarity of pure English. "From the two reports of the Board of Health and the Burials given below, as well as the inquiries made since their meeting, we have reason to draw the most favourable conclusions; and, if the disorder that has alarmed the citizens should progress in its present retrograde motion! we shall, by the latter end of the week, have little occasion for reports on the subject, and less for alarm."

From a wise and worthy writer we copy the following sentiments with the fullest approbation. "Nothing can be more despicable than to flatter the mob. When I see a man of education and fortune put himself upon a level with the dregs of the people, mingle with the lowest vulgar, feed with them at the same board, and drink with them in the same cup, flatter their prejudices, expose himself to the belchings of their beer, the fumes of their tobacco, the grossness of their familiarity, and the impertinence of their conversation, I cannot help despising him, as a man guilty of the vilest prostitution, in order to effect a purpose, equally selfish and illiberal.

Perhaps the following may explain the cause of the giddiness of many a democratic upstart. If negro drivers and hucksters should become suddenly rich and powerful, they know not how; if speculators, militia officers, town meeting bawlers; men of low birth and no breeding, should find themselves suddenly elevated to rank in the Commonwealth, no wonder that their brains should be intoxicated with pride, vanity, and presumption.

Curious Alliteration.—Last week died Sir HUNGERFORD HOSKINS, of Harewood Hall, Hertfordshire.
[London paper.]

A correct writer speaking of one of the upstarts of revolution, describes him as one of those obscure men, whom the hands of the populace have lifted into notice. We ought to apologize for taking any notice of him, if the example of France did not show to what heights such low fellows are raised in a general fermentation.

No man possesses such a Genius for the palpable obscure, as the Attorney General of the United States. His essays are of a most rueful length, and it is impossible to tell their meaning. "Plunging from gulf to gulf a vast profound" seems to be a good motto for this shallow politician, and mere attorney.

In a satiric Poem, which I have lately read, whose object is to lash the political absurdities of the day, and, above all, to add new contempt to the silly theory of The rights of Man, I find the following passage.

Convinced that Providence mistook her way,
And proud to mark the errors of her sway;
Let all be equal, FOLLY shouts aloud,
Be equal all, responds the mad'd'ning crowd.

In New England, it is a vulgar proverb, as beautiful and as true, as any in Dr. Franklin's works, that "nobody knows who is governor, till election day be past," but the worthy republicans of New Jersey have lived to falsify this adage; even an election day still leaves them inquiring, who shall reign over us?

We read the following in a morning paper, and extract it with alacrity, because we hope it will be incentive to farther improvement. It is amazing that the road from this city to New-York should be so shamefully bad, as to excite not only fatigue and terror among our own travellers, but the just sarcasms of every foreigner. "The improvement of the roads, in this state, merits distinguished approbation. Every where we see proofs of attention to this object. In every direction we see new turnpike roads opening, and the spirit of repairing the public highways diffusing itself more widely. The advantages resulting hence to agriculture and commerce, are more and more known and felt. When the improved roads of this State are compared with the road that connects the two largest and most populous cities of the United States, (New-York and Philadelphia) a traveller is astonished at the difference. Perhaps there is no road in any part of America that would so well bear the expense of a turnpike as the road in question—yet there is, perhaps, no highway, in any part of our country, in so deplorable a state. When the ground is perfectly settled, it is passable—but if the winter be open and wet, and invariably when the frost first leaves the ground in the spring, it is oftentimes so obstructed that it is with difficulty the mail can be transported from one city to the other. When will some public spirited character take up this business, and devise a plan for securing to the citizens of the United States, a safe and agreeable road, at all seasons of the year, between two of the richest commercial cities in the union? The man, or association of men, who shall accomplish this object, will, indeed, deserve well of their country.

A gentleman inquired of one of the performers who was engaged at Mr. Stopford's late Benefit Concert at Halifax, in honour of the Peace, how the Manager could conceive so strange an idea as to introduce the Dead March in Saul, on a rejoicing occasion? "What could be more proper," replied the son of Orpheus; "were we not burying all animosities?"

Painter, the Waterman, who saved GEORGE ROSE, has obtained the name of Salvator Rosa. [ib.]

My arrival, says Tom Paine, in his first letter to the people, has struck it, (the faction in the agonies of death) as with an hydrophobia; it is like the sight of water to canine madness.—A gentleman, on reading this, pleasantly observed, that Paine's simile would have been much stronger had he said, it was like the sight of water to himself.

Was the Calcutta pole, which makes so lofty an appearance in the annals of Duane, a liberty pole, or was it a catch pole?

THE DEMOCRAT AND TURTLE....A FACT.

A democratic candidate for *Congress, speaking to a large congregation, who had assembled to hear his sage reasoning, after exhausting the whole fund of abuse which the Aurora had furnished him with, against John Adams, the sedition law, gag law, &c. &c. in a very lofty tone of voice said, "let us, my fellow-citizens, imitate the turtle, draw our heads within our shells and be secure from all our enemies." Shortly after this famous harangue was delivered, a new created self-conceited politician in company with many more of the stamp, (who had met in a public house, to regale themselves with a little of the celebrated Gallatin Cordial) was very loud in praise of the Hon. Candidate's speech, particularly that part, which he conceived, contained such wholesome advice for our safety, in imitating the Turtle. An old gentleman, who had for some time remained a silent spectator of his folly, at length got very deliberately up, and thrust his hand behind his neck. Much surprised at the old gentleman's conduct, he inquired hastily "what he meant by it." "No harm, sir," replied the old gentleman, "I only wanted to feel if you had a shell on your back," "Shell on the devil," exclaimed the fiery politician, "who ever saw a man with a shell on his back?" "I never did," replied the old gentleman, "but concluded you must have one on yours, from your commending so highly, the honourable candidate's advice, which can be of no service to you without one." The poor demo, brought to a sense of his ignorance by this reply, slunk out of company, and perhaps never before or since, stood so much in need of a shell to protect him from his enemies, as he then did, to hide his confused and brainless head.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ON THE DEATH OF A TAR.

A SONG.

FRANK FID was a tar d'ye see,
As true, as e'er handed a sail,
Though the ship's gunnel in, yet still he
Would laugh at the noise of the gale.
With his grog 'gainst the storm he prepar'd,
And squirted the juice of the quid,
Now below, now toss'd high on the yard,
'Twas all just the same to Frank Fid.

One day, off the Cape of Good Hope,
As head to the wind lying to,
His foot took the bite of a rope,
And bilg'd poor Frank's skull on the fu:.*
The Doctor was sounding his brain,
While the blood from his scuppers ran fast;
"Avast!" he cried, "caulking's in vain,
For Death has sheer-hulk'd me at last.

"Come, mess-mates, no longer deplore;
What's life? but a squall at the best!
And tho' I can cheer you no more,
I mount to the truck of the blest;
I never fear'd danger, nor toil,
While an inch of life's brace stood the shock,
But now the last flake of my coil
Is rec'd through eternity's block.

"Through life's stormy sea as I sail'd,
By the compass of Friendship I steer'd,
And ne'er by Distress was I hail'd
But my lockers still open appear'd;
And whilst, with a shot they were stor'd,
None ever unaided went by,
When prog they no more would afford,
I gave all I had—'twas a sigh!

"I feel I must weigh—while I speak
Death's Capstan heaves short on my heart—
My anchor is almost a-peak—
What then! I have acted my part:
Safe birth'd in Felicity's bay,
I shall ride by the Kedge of Delight!
Gi's your hands then"—No more he could say,
His soul went aloft in our sight.

SELECTED POETRY.

FROM AN EASTERN PAPER.

[Among the numerous accomplishments of a certain wise and virtuous Great Man, the public have not yet been informed that he possesses the fire and the soul of a poet. Scarce a day now passes, without developing some new and unexpected excellence in the character of that incomparable man; and the following song will abundantly prove, that his poetical powers are not less conspicuous than his philosophical acuteness, and his capacious and his minute acquirements as a statesman. It was indeed written under the immediate and omnipotent inspiration of Love; but its inimitable beauties of sentiment amply demonstrate, that its author has a genius of universal application. The lovers of the muses will regret that the cares of the NATION have deprived us of "so sweet an Ovid."

O! fomose puer! nimium ne crede colori!
Alba ligustra cadunt, vaccinia nigra leguntur,

A PHILOSOPHIC LOVE-SONG.

TO SALLY.

Let poets sing, and striplings sigh,
For damsels bright and fair,
The ruby lip, the sapphire eye,
The silken, auburn hair:

My philosophic taste disdains
Such paltry charms as those—

* The Sailor's abridgement of the Fluke of the anchor.

Scorns the smooth skin's transparent veins,
And cheeks that shame the rose.

In glaring red, and chalky white,
Let others beauty see;
Me no such tawdry tints delight—
No! black's the hue for me!*

What though my Sally's nose be flat,
'Tis harder, then, to break it—
Her skin is sable—what of that?
'Tis smooth as oil can make it.

If down her neck no ringlets flow,
A fleece adorns her head—
If on her lips no rubies glow,
Their thickness serves instead.

Thick pouting lips! how sweet their grace!
When passion fires to kiss them!
Wide spreading over half the face,
Impossible to miss them.

Thou, Sally, thou, my house shalt keep,
My widow'd tears shall dry!
My virgin daughters—see! they weep—
Their mother's place supply.

Oh! Sally! hearken to my vows!
Yield up thy swarthy charms—
My best lov'd! my more than spouse,
Oh! take me to thy arms!

ON THE DEATH OF A BELOVED ONLY SON.

BY T. CAMPBELL, ESQ.

Can mortal solace ever raise
The broken pillar of my days;
Or late restore a form so dear
As that which lies unconscious here.

Ah no my, Darco, latest given
And last reclaimed gift of Heaven!
Possessing thee, I still could bless
One lingering beam of happiness:—
My lov'd, my lost, my only care,
I vainly thought with thee to share
Thy heart's discourse, so gently kind,
And mould to worth thy pliant mind,
Nor warn'd of all my future woe,
Presum'd on happiness below!
But, losing thee, my blooming boy,
I cannot lose another joy;
For all that stay'd my earthly trust
With thee is buried in the dust!

Nine charming years had fraught with grace
Thy sprightly soul and lovely face,
Where harshness had not planted fear
Nor sorrow wrung one silent tear;
But frank and warm my Darco flew
To share each welcome and adieu—
Each word, each thought, each look to 'tend,
My child, my scholar and my friend!

Oh, when his gaily—smiling talk
Endear'd my sweet, my summer walk;
Or when I sat, at day's decline
And clasp'd his little hand in mine,
How many woes were then forgot—
How blissful seem'd his father's lot!
And breathing love, my bosom said,
Thus, on a dying couch when laid—

* In Addison's Cato, we find a warm advocate for African beauty. Syphax, when observing Juba to be enamour'd with the Roman maids, thus speaks to his Prince of the beautiful damsels of Numidia: "The glowing dames of Zama's royal court, have faces flush'd with more exalted charms. Were you with these my Prince, you'd soon forget the pale unripen'd beauties of the North."

Thus shall I bid thee, Darco, stand,
And grasp thee with my failing hand!
Cold, cold, thou pledge of future charms,
As her who gave, thee to my arms,
My buried hopes your grave is one—
And Mary sleeps beside her son!

Now hush, my heart!—afflicting Heaven,
Thy will be done, thy solace given;
For mortal hand can never raise
The broken Pillar of my days,
Or earth restore a form so dear
As that which lies unconscious here!

THE DIRGE OF WALLACE.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL, AUTHOR OF THE PLEASURES OF HOPE.

They lighted a taper at the dead of night,
And chanted their holiest Hymn;
But her brow and her bosom were damp with af-
fright—

Her eye was all sleepless and dim!
And the lady of Elderslie went for her Lord,
When a death-watch beat in her lonely room,
When her Curtain had shook of its own accord,
And the Raven had flapp'd at her window board,
To tell of her Warrior's doom!

"Now sing ye the death song and loudly pray
"For the soul of my Knight so dear;
"And call me a Widow this wretched day,
"Since the warning of God is here!
"For a night-mare rides on my strangled sleep:
"The Lord of my bosom is doom'd to die;
"His valorous heart they have wounded deep;
"And the blood-red tears shall his country weep
"For Wallace of Elderslie."

Yet knew not his country that ominous hour,
Ere the loud Matin Bell was rung,
That a Trumpet of Death on an English Tower
Had the Dirge of her champion sung!
When his dungeon light look'd dim and red
On the high-born blood of a Martyr slain,
No Anthem was sung at his holy death bed;
No weeping there was, when his bosom bled—
And his heart was rent in twain!

Oh, it was not thus when his oaken spear
Was true to that Knight forlorn,
And hosts of a thousand were scatter'd, like Deer,
At the blast of the Hunter's horn;
When he strode in the wreck of each well fought field

With the yellow-hair'd chiefs of his native land;
For his lance was not shiver'd in helmet or shield,
And the sword that seem'd fit for Archangel to wield
Was light in his terrible hand!

Yet bleeding and bound, tho' the Wallace Wight
For his long lov'd Country die,
The Bugle ne'er sung to a braver Knight
Than William of Elderslie!
But the day of his glory shall never depart;
His head unentomb'd shall with glory be palm'd;
From its blood-streaming altar his Spirit shall start,
Tho' the Raven has fed on his mouldering heart,
A nobler was never embalm'd!

CHAPTER I.

Emigrants....Emigration to America is advisable to swindlers....And to the lowest class of people in the south of Germany....Hessians....Swabians.

The most important object for an emigrant is the knowledge of the people among whom he seeks a refuge. The knowledge of the land is but of secondary importance; for the people with whom we have to do, are much more essential in the estimate of our happiness than the mere natural objects around us. But after having given the characteristic description of the people, and of the land, it is proper, for the information of those who are inclined to go to America, to treat in particular of the various classes of emigrants.

From what has been said, it appears sufficiently clear, that for the class of Swindlers, the United States of North-America are a country after their own heart. The facility of obtaining credit and making an advantageous bankruptcy there, opens a most extensive field to the usual animated activity of such gentlemen. The stupidity of the peasants, descended from parents who came from the southern part of Germany, enables them to appear as fortune-tellers, conjurors, preachers, physicians, or surgeons, and wipe the purses of their stupid dupes. Since the French, from the West-Indies, have introduced there Pharo and rouge et noir banks, these ingenious people make the green creoles and country boobies pay the tribute due to superior genius. Virginia was at all times the land of gamblers. Where every one speculates, and there is such plentiful occasion for speculation, a swindler must of course live and thrive in his element. A skilful European cheat finds, among the Americans, many competitors, but none but simpletons can be taken in by American cut-purses; they cheat in the face of the sun, and can beat or gull only people like themselves. But as the gentlemen-jugglers and cut-purses contrive to live, where honest folks starve, we need not be at all concerned about their success in America, where nobody starves. We shall not pursue them, therefore, through their windings in that country, but, to deliver our own from them, recommend to them a tour thither, and wish them a good voyage.

The lowest class of poor peasants, especially in South Germany,* the swineherds, the beggars, the poorest day labourers in Swabia, Franconia, and the Palatinate, may likewise be advised to emigrate to America, and join their cousins, brothers, &c. who in many instances have grown rich there by sylvania, wrote, when he was assistant preceptor of the school at Nordheim. He divides Germany into South and North, by a chain of mountains, which he supposes to rise at the white mountain, near Teschen, in Silesia, and which afterwards forms the boundary between Moravia and Silesia, and then between Bohemia, Moravia, Austria, the Upper Palatinate, and Franconia. He reckons Bohemia as a part of North Germany, because the southern boundaries form the separation of the waters, as the rivers rising there flow in opposite directions. This chain, which he calls the division mountain, then takes the name of Fichtelberg, then that of the Thuringian forest, afterwards that of Vogelberg, and he brings it on to join upon the Rhine, not far from Dusseldorf, too far north, as it should seem, seeing that the chain of the division mountains join that river between Bonn and Coblenz. He follows this chain of mountains again beyond the Rhine, where I will leave him. He divides North Germany into a mountainous part and a maritime part "Germania montana" and "Germania maritima." The first includes Hesse, Thuringia, Upper Saxony (not the whole circle of Upper Saxony) Upper Lusace, and the mountainous part of Silesia. He divides again the second into Westphalia, and Lower Saxony and Vandalia. By Vandalia he means Holstein, Mecklenburg, Pomerania, Brandenburg, the electoral circle and lower Lusace. His subdivisions of south Germany are, I believe, according to the rivers. His division of North Germany appears to me equally new and accurate. But he has not remarked as far as I remember, a second chain of mountains, which run nearly parallel to the division mountains. The Harz is certainly a part of this chain; to the westward of it, is the mountain which separates Hesse from Hanover. The duchy of Westphalia, according to all appearance, likewise belongs to it. Although this chain in many places sinks so low as to appear to be interrupted, it continues to run in ranges of hills, perceptible perhaps to the eye of an observer. It is well known, for example, that the natural boundaries of upper and lower Lusace may easily be distinguished. The division mountains and this chain include a long, beautiful, fertile valley, which comprises Hesse, Thuringia, &c. This valley, and country situated to the northward of the northern chain of mountains, may very safely contend with the finest parts of North-America. In South Germany, too, not only these regions, but also the beautiful countries of Holstein, Mecklenburg, and Lauenburg, are seldom equalled. In respect to fertility, there are certainly some districts upon the Elbe equal to the most fruitful parts of South Germany, if not superior. In respect to climate there can be little difference between the two halves of Germany. Mr. Hess remarks in his fugitive pieces that the catable chesnut thrives in the neighbourhood of Altona. The vine succeeds only in certain advantageous situations to any high degree of excellence in South Germany, and perhaps it might thrive equally well, in similar situations, in the northern division. It appears by documents that the Mark of Brandenburg formerly produced much wine. We are indebted to Mr. Professor Meiners for more correct ideas upon the proportionable goodness of south and north Germany. Before that respectable author appeared, Germany was in truth almost a "terra incognita;" for I make no account of mere general information. North-Germany is divided by the Weser, the Elbe, and the Oder, into three large portions, if the country to the westward of the Rhine and to the eastward of the Oder, be not taken into the account. The first between the Rhine and the Weser, the second between the Weser and the Elbe: the third between the Elbe and the Oder. Every one of these parts may be divided again into mountainous and flat lands. The division mountains are the natural boundaries to the southward, as the Baltic, the Eider, and the Northsea are to the northward.

excessive labour. It is remarkable that even the lowest class of northern Germans are never, or at most very seldom pleased with America. Perhaps the principal cause of this may be, because there are so many southern Germans there, and those two nations have a strong antipathy against each other. I met with a Brandenburger who shed bitter tears, because he could not return again to the old Mark, his native country. I told him he would be there exposed to be forced to enlist as a soldier, he answered that he had rather live as a soldier in Prussia, than remain here, though he could earn high wages for his daily labour. A Mecklenburger said the same, and added, that he was determined to return by the first ship to his dear native country.

Of the northern Germans, the Hessians alone are pleased with America. They emigrate thither in great numbers, and are glad to get to a country where, say they, "we shall be able to drink coffee." They take no notice of the hatred which the Americans bear towards them since the war. "A damn'd Hessian," is the name which the Swabian populace of Pennsylvania readily bestow upon every German. The causes of this Hessian emigration are well known.

Judging from what I have seen in Pennsylvania, I must conclude the South-German, and particularly the Swabian peasants to be much below those of upper and lower Saxony. Of the former, indeed, none but the dregs of the country people emigrated to America. But in the Saxon circle, even the day labourer is neither so coarse and ignorant, nor so ugly as the South-German emigrants to America, and their descendants. The language of the South-Germans is likewise much harsher; and hence Mr. Hess thinks that the south part of Germany should be called Deutschland, and the north Deutschland. The only objection to this is, that the upper Saxons, who are northern Germans, use the first of these expressions too. The language is certainly softer in the mouth of the northern Germans, and especially of the lower Saxons, than in the throat of the Swabians. The fine cultivation of the meadows in Pennsylvania is the work of Wurtembergers. They are all artificially watered, which is, however, here very easy, owing to the numerous brooks which issue from the hills.

A Wurtemburger by the name of Sager, who had practised as a physician at Charleston, and then came to Pennsylvania to buy a farm, but prudently forbore the purchase when he found that it would produce nothing, said to me, that Wurtemberg was a paradise in comparison with the rest of Germany, but a hell in comparison with America. This Swabian declared that North Germany was an hundred years behind hand of Wurtemberg in point of information and farming, and that we poor northern Germans were all despicable slaves. Upon my remarking then that America was to be sure an excellent place of refuge for emigrants of a certain class, he cried out with all his might, "No...but for every person who has learnt any thing." Hereupon I took the liberty to answer, that it was especially a good place for bunglers, every one

* The divisions of Germany into North and South, has in modern times become more and more general among writers. It has been at length remarked that there are natural boundaries which divide Germany into two equal parts. I have seen in America a Latin dissertation upon the natural geography of Germany, which a man by the name of Reichenbach, who now lives at Lancaster in Penn-

CHAPTER II.

Redemptioners....Cruelty of a ship-captain to certain persons of that description....A Russian captain.

These people are commonly unable to pay the master of the vessel for their passage, and, therefore, he generally sells them for three years upon their arrival in America. These kind of goods have grown very dear; twenty guineas are now paid for the three years. The owner of another man's powers for three years, must give him food and cloathing, or at least something that he calls such. The Pennsylvanians maintain that nothing honest can ever be made of these redemptioners, who by this slavery are immediately made homogeneous with the lands, and they think it would in general be best if no Europeans other than such redemptioners should emigrate. In such case they would, indeed, be secure from censure, and might live on, unnoticed in their stew.

The most distressing circumstance for these poor people is the separation of families. The children are often sold at a great distance from their parents. They are besides often ill-treated by the ship-captains; who beat them and give them stinking meat to eat. Hunger is still more frequently their lot. There are, in America, societies who inquire of these people upon their arrival, whether they have been ill treated by the sea-faring people. But the captains take care to supply them abundantly with every thing at the end of their voyage, to efface the previous ill-impressions, and the joy at seeing themselves relieved from the sufferings and dangers of a voyage, contributes to the same effect.

The American ship-captains often practice real cruelty upon these poor wretches, though more upon the Irish than upon the Germans; which no doubt proceeds from the circumstance that the Irish migrate in much greater numbers. Thus, for example, all the Philadelphia newspapers related, in the year 1796, that the captain of a ship, who had many hundred Irishmen on board, suffered two hundred of them to perish with hunger; that for several days successively he gave them no provisions at all, and that, upon his arrival in America, he sold to an house of ill-fame, a girl of fifteen, whom on the passage he had got with child. The ship remained at Wilmington, because an infectious distemper prevailed on board. Of the punishment of this sea-monster, the newspapers never said a word; and I myself dare not, for fear of the German Americomanes, express here my surprise at the impunity of such a wretch, who, as far as I know, was never called to any account; for they would say I blame the American administration of justice because it does not, upon all occasions, hang, and break upon the wheel. Joy, therefore, to the Americomanes, upon the impunity of the worthy gentleman ship-captain!! and long live the mild justice of the United North-American States!!!

Strong farming workmen or tradesmen find an easy sale. But sometimes an unsaleable article creeps in, and lays for a long time upon the owner's hands. Officers and men of letters are such articles. The captain who imports such goods knows not the market. I saw a Russian captain remain a whole week long as ballast on board a ship, and not a soul shew an inclination for him. He was a mere drug. The master of the ship constantly urged him to find a purchaser, and offered, in such a case, to let Mr. Captain off at 50 per cent discount; for it was easy to see that no use whatever could be made of him, &c. &c. He sent the captain round in the city to attract a purchaser; but no such thing as an amateur was to be found. The captain talked of nothing but running people through with bayonets, which he pretended to have practised very largely against the Turks and Poles. This spitting of people was in truth all he knew, when he was analysed in his first element. At length the owner and master of the vessel let him go, for a promissory note to pay his freight in six months time; hopes being given him of a place as schoolmaster in the country; this place he obtained. What he will teach the boys, and especially the girls, I know not: for as I have observed, he understands nothing but spitting. While he lay as dead goods on board the ship, he was continually writing threatening letters to the empress of Russia, who, he pretended, owed him money. When he inquired of me, how he should procure payment of this debt, I advised him to raise an army of two hundred thousand men.

CHAPTER III.

Of Redemptioners, in continuation....The best thing an European of education, and without money, can do there, is, to commence pedlar....Indifference towards the sciences....Schoolmaster Reiche.

The horrors of a winter voyage, for these redemptioners, who are heaped up together in what is called the ship's steerage, can be more easily conceived than described. They must endure every calamity. Hunger, cold, thirst, blows, vermin, filth, sickness, and often the plague. I know not whether the hope of earning, after a three years slavery, more than in Europe, by daily labour, can be equivalent for so many sufferings.

From all this it may surely be concluded, that a man of education must use all possible endeavours to avoid falling into the unhappy necessity of selling himself in America. If such a person can pay for his passage, but has no capital with which to commence business, I know nothing better for him than to turn pedlar. Should he have been even a field-marshal in Europe, he would do well to assume the part of a pedlar, rather than to learn a trade, or fell trees, a work for which well-educated gentlemen are not remarkably qualified. If he has no money at all, it will still be easy for him to obtain, upon credit, goods to a small amount, which he may sell at a profit of an hundred per cent to the farmer's wives and daughters: he can then return to Philadelphia, purchase more goods again, and proceed as before. This employment is, indeed, for a man of taste, not the most exalted. There is little dignity in playing the Harlequin before farmer's wives, to prevail upon them to purchase trash, at treble the price for which they might buy it in town. Yet, for an European fine gentleman, without money, it is the best thing to be done in America; for a schoolmaster is not only a much tormented creature, but is so badly paid, that he must follow some other business, besides the disgusting trade of schoolmaster, to procure a mere subsistence.

Tradesmen of all kinds can, unquestionably, get a living in America. But it is not so easy for them to attain a comfortable condition. If the price of labour be incomparably greater than in Europe, and they can, of course, earn much more, the price of every article, is in the same proportion higher, so that the balance is entirely restored. In this country every thing favours trade, and especially foreign trade. The working up of raw materials is rather impeded than advanced by the commercial and fiscal establishments of the country.

That artists, and men of letters, as such, are not received with open arms in America, and that treasures are not showered down upon them for the productions of their genius, is sufficiently known in Europe. "The country is too young for this," say Europeans and Americans. "We must not wish to reap before seed-time," say the European Americomanes; and if the advancement of the arts, not of immediate necessity, is mentioned, even the polished Americans inquire, "what is their use?" that is, "how can they bring us in money?" This infancy of the country so often alleged, to excuse so many things, may well be doubted, when we consider the state of morals which is exactly similar to those of the decrepid European states, which the gentlemen Americomanes so pleasantly style crippled; as they call poor Europe a crippled quarter of the world. It is highly unbecoming for youth to indulge itself so much in luxury, and to be more addicted to avarice, even than decrepid old age. It would besides be an insoluble problem, how the outcasts of societies altogether crippled, (I ask pardon, for the frequent repetition here of this favourite word of the gentlemen Americomanes) by vice, could have erected such a vigorous youthful state, if the fact were so. This absurd and false pretence of youth must no longer be adduced to excuse the Americans for their clownish contempt of the beautiful, and their barbarian indifference towards the sciences which do not immediately bring in money. They must not be held out as a philosophical people, while philosophers starve among them. It is insufferable to hear them called an ingenious, noble, feeling people, while a brewer's boy is more esteemed among them than a great painter, sculptor, poet, or musician.

It would be altogether intolerable to apply in favour of the Americans, the opinion of the Genevan philosopher, in respect to the influence of the arts and sciences upon the morals; the person who should do this, would prove that he did not understand that great man. He himself declares the cultivation of the arts and sciences, to be a palliative among corrupt nations, by the removal of which the evil would become still worse, and appear in its utmost deformity. The Americans greatly need such a palliative.

From the contempt in which the German language stands among the Americans, it is evident that German men of letters ought to be the last of all to go to America. The example of the schoolmaster Reiche,* who died here in wretched poverty, though he had been invited to Pennsylvania, to be minister of the church in Philadelphia, is discouraging enough. My advice, therefore, to men of letters and artists, is to stay at home.

CHAPTER IV.

Physicians—Surgeons—Apothecaries—Clergymen.

Physicians, Surgeons and Apothecaries find abundant employment in a country where fevers of all denominations and colours prevail, where rheumatism, palsy, gout, pleurisy, &c. are so common; where apoplexy, dropsy, &c. &c. offer up so many wretched victims to drunkenness, and America would really be a gold mine for persons of those professions, if the ability to pay, were in proportion to the general sickness. But this is not the case. A physician, whom I met with in the mountains of Pennsylvania, complained very much of bad payment. One half the sums which physicians, surgeons, apothecaries, all which professions are practised at once by the same persons in the inland parts, or which merchants have in their account books, they must consider as lost. There are however some richer neighbourhoods, where this is not the case; such as the sea ports, and the county of Lancaster. But they are obliged to give their attendance upon credit, excepting in the sea ports, or otherwise they have very little practice. The healing art however in all its branches is next to commerce, the most profitable business. A skilful physician, or surgeon, in a country where there are so many bunglers employed in keeping the boat of Charon constantly full, must soon have an extensive circle of operation for his art. There are able Europeans in this line, and Americans too, such for example as Doctor Rush, who are in great business. But the quacks, and makers of experiments "in anima vili" continue nevertheless to follow their own courses. When I went to America, I had one for a fellow passenger. He called himself a surgeon. Some days after my arrival in Philadelphia I met him in the street; and upon my asking him where he meant to go, he answered that he had been advised to go immediately into the western country, where he hoped to find something or other to cut up. I afterwards heard he had been practising tooth drawing upon dogs. Wherever he saw a dog he fell upon him and broke a tooth out of his head. After following this habit a while, he thought he might begin to do the same with human beings. How he succeeded I know not. I suppose however that he broke a couple of dozen necks, or at least occasioned sufferings inexpressible.

* He published a German gazette. It may be imagined how profitable this was, by considering that the payment in advance, for a whole year, was—one dollar!—No!—not the payment in advance, but the subscription—which the subscribers pay just when they please or can.

CHAPTER V.

Mr. Blanchard—Migrating manufacturers alter their plans, and turn speculators—Merchants must be acquainted with the peculiarities of American commerce—Delius the merchant.

Of the theological faculty, those who possess the art of assuming the mask of orthodoxy may be tolerably sure of obtaining a place as clergymen, among the German Pennsylvanians. The heterodoxy of schoolmaster Reiche, did him much injury. Even Mr. Muhlenberg himself, the clergyman at Lancaster, though otherwise very partial in favour of his countrymen, acknowledges that the Germans there, in respect to religious instruction, are fifty years behind hand with Germany. The Calvinistic and Lutheran societies reciprocally hate each other, and strive to give each other all possible vexations. They are attached to those religious systems, I believe, chiefly for the sake of the doctrine of exclusive salvation, a creed to which they are devoted in its fullest orthodox sense, or rather nonsense, and which is very convenient for them, because they think it relieves them from the troublesome obligations of active charity, and the performance of their duties. Orthodox divines therefore, may go to America, with a moral certainty of making their way; and I wish they would all go, together with the class of emigrants first mentioned in this part of my work.

The clergy are maintained by the voluntary subscriptions of their respective societies. Every individual gives what he pleases, or if he has no occasion for a clergyman, gives nothing. The public government, make it not at all their concern. The clergymen therefore, are dependent upon their flocks. There are commonly two parties; one for the minister, and the other in opposition. By the latter every action of the clergyman is blamed, and by the former, from party spirit, approved. A clergyman told me that he found it impossible ever to satisfy his opponents. If he rode his horse fast, they would say "the parson rides like a hussar." If he rode slow, they would exclaim "the parson is lazy, &c." These inconveniences are however compensated by a considerable income, collected by the subscriptions.

The clergy enjoy besides, the advantage of having nothing to pay at the inns when they travel; hence it is, that so many adventurers fall to preaching. I knew one, who was at the same time a joiner. Yet he preached as well as others upon an average. It does not appear that the clergy lose any of their estimation by this absolute dependence upon their society.

Among the emigrants who do not succeed well in America, are likewise included the air balloon gentry, if we may judge from what happened to Mr. Blanchard. Those who have read my letters from America, published in Mr. Archenholz's Minerva, must already know that Blanchard has sunk from the dignity of an air balloonist receiving presents from kings, down to the rank of a puppet show man, in taverns, of the class which in Germany we commonly call tippling houses. This trade is far from being so profitable, as in the north of Germany; for the Palatines and Swabians, and their American descendants, especially the Calvinists, are of a much more melancholy turn than the northern Germans, and probably from a mistaken or an hypocritical devotion, have no taste for such worldly amusements. The Irish, and the sots in general, would indeed readily support such exhibitions, but they have no money. Yet, as the wheel of fortune is continually revolving, Mr. Blanchard, before my departure, appeared to be rising again, for he advertised in the newspapers his intention to go up in a balloon at New-York. His ascension at Philadelphia, which was the first instance of such an experiment performed in America, he said had ruined him; for the Philadelphians had subscribed, but after seeing him in the air, kept their money, and many of the subscribers sent him only half a dollar each, to his lodgings. In this manner he lost the expense he had been at, and was ruined. Before his aerial tour, he called the Americans in a pamphlet a wise and happy people. But afterwards, whenever he spoke of them, instead of "Americans," he called them Americoquins.

Manufacturers who come with large capitals to America, and hope to reap great advantages from the establishment of their manufactures, will find themselves greatly disappointed in their expectations, as may be seen by what has preceded. General arguments drawn from the nature of things must lead us necessarily to conclude that America gives special encouragement to the migration of wealthy manufacturers, especially considering the numerous causes which urge them to leave England. But general reasonings devised in one's chamber, concerning an object, twelve hundred miles distant from that chamber, often bear wide from the truth, while so many single circumstances are unknown, which operate to produce an altogether different result. Very respectable writers have believed in such an encouragement of migrating manufacturers; and what could they else, while so many incredible circumstances altering so widely the calculation, were unknown to them? and these very incredible circumstances are the naked truth. In one word it is, that in America, the public good is not at all taken into consideration, in the administration of government; but as a speculative commercial interest, and if things are traced to their source, an English interest are there predominant, all the positive establishments are therefore in direct opposition to the success of manufactures. The principal obstacle is, not so much the want of labourers as the dearthness of labour, and of all articles, which are artificially created. But I have already sufficiently explained these things, for persons who know how to read; and it would be an useless expence of paper here to repeat what I have said. Most of the manufacturers upon arriving in America, alter their plans, and apply themselves to speculation instead of manufactures.

Merchants, who wish to settle in America, will do well first to study the market, and then to learn the method of trading peculiar to the Americans, before they engage in commercial business there.

For German merchants, who had been bred to trade, assured me in Philadelphia, that they paid dearly for the lessons they had received concerning these peculiarities. With regard to sending goods to America, and entrusting them there to American houses for sale, it must be sufficiently known in Germany, that German commercial houses, unable to obtain any accompts, have been obliged to send agents to America, to recover their debts, and that they have thought themselves lucky to recover after several years, twenty-five per cent. of their capitals. The adventures of the merchant Delius, which have appeared in print, written by baron Knigge, shew all this in its true light, and to the great mortification of the Americomanes fully confirm my opinions. This man relates his commercial sufferings in America, and the ill treatment occasioned by them, which he met with in Europe, and proves the whole by documents annexed. It may be established as a maxim, that commercial connections should be formed only with European mercantile houses, settled in America; but never with natives of the country.

(To be Continued.)

POLITICS.

FROM THE TRENTON FEDERALIST.

Mr. Jefferson, and his party, have, in the most wanton, lavish, and unconstitutional manner, wasted the people's money. To give a slight idea of this, I submit the following statement, which appears from the proceedings of Congress, from official documents in Mr. Jefferson's own papers, and from other authentic accounts:

The unconstitutional order for the repairs of the French ship Berceau, cost 32,838 54

The unconstitutional order to restore one half of the sales of the French schooner Peggy, by which, if complied with by the federal officer, the United States would have lost 10,000

The unconstitutional order for repaying the fine to Callender out of public monies 200

Mr. Jefferson and his party, during the last session of Congress, gave to Duane, four dollars a ream for four thousand reams of paper for the United States, which could have been bought, and which Duane did actually buy, of a paper maker, for three dollars a ream, by which the United States lost 4,000

Mr. Jefferson, without any cause but to gratify a favourite, recalled Mr. Humphreys, our minister at Madrid, and appointed Mr. Pinckney, a democratic senator from South-Carolina, in his place, with an outfit of 9,000

Mr. Jefferson, instead of ordering Mr. Livingston, our minister to France, to embark from Boston, where the vessel lay prepared for him, he ordered the vessel to wait on Mr. Livingston at New-York, which cost upwards of 2,000

Mr. Jefferson sent Mr. Dawson to France, to carry over the treaty, in a public armed ship, when at the same time Mr. Livingston had been appointed, and it was his duty to have gone immediately—but his own private convenience was preferred to the public good—This jaunt of Mr. Dawson's cost the United States 30,000

Mr. Jefferson discharged several hundred disciplined marines, who had received cloaths and bounty, and then, when they were wanted soon after to send against the pirates of Barbary, he was obliged to raise new recruits, and to pay a fresh bounty, and give new cloaths—

This cost the United States, extra

10,000

And to this last article, might, with propriety, be added the loss of our merchant vessels lately captured by the Tripolitans, by reason of Mr. Jefferson's saving policy, in not sending out a sufficient force, while the greater part of our navy is laying rotting in the docks at Washington

60,000

Add also for the ransom of nine seamen captured in the brig Franklin, at two thousand dollars a head, according to the customary rate

18,000

The expenses of the federal house of representatives, during the eight months session, from Nov. 13, 1797, to July 1, 1798, and which was the most expensive session that happened during the federal administration amounted to fourteen thousand and ninety eight dollars and sixty-one cents—while the last session, which lasted but five months, from 7th December, to May 1, 1801, amounted to seventeen thousand dollars, making a balance in favour of the federal, and against the present administration, notwithstanding the difference in the length of the session, of

2,901 49

The shares of stock, belonging to government in the United States bank, have been sold to Foreigners, Messrs. Baring and Co. merchants of London, by Mr. Gallatin, at ten per cent. below the selling price; by which the United States have lost, at the lowest calculation,

190,000

The present rulers have released to the French republic a debt due to our citizens, for depredations on our vessels, and commerce, and which our government will eventually have to pay, of at least

20,000,000

During the last session of Congress, the Salaries of the following officers were raised, viz.

Secretary of State, raised 1500	Register,	900
Secretary of the Treasury 1500	Post-Master General 600
Secretary of War 1500	Assistant P. M. G. 500
Secretary of the Navy 1500	Com. of Revenue 600
Comptroller of Treasury 1250	Account. of War 400
Auditor 1000	Account. of the Navy 400
Treasurer 1000	Attorney-General 600

13,250 00

Total amount of above expenses $ 20,382,191 03

Thus my countrymen, it appears, that in the short space of 18 months, the present rulers, which I have heard called "your most sincere—your best friends"—have destroyed the main pillar of our government, the Judiciary, which was our great bulwark against oppression and tyranny—That they have drawn monies from the Treasury, without the authority of law—That they have postponed the payment of the public debt, which, on the federal plan, would have been totally discharged in 1817—That they have authorised agents to borrow money at 10 per cent; and have, moreover, absolutely wasted and thrown away of the people's money, above Twenty millions, three hundred and eighty-two thousand, one hundred and ninety-one dollars. What think you of such friends?—Might you not, with equal propriety, call the robber, who has rifled your treasure, and set your dwelling on flames your sincere—your best friend?

MISCELLANY.

ADVENTURES OF CRITA.

SIR,

I do not at all question, that your gallantry will prompt you to step forward in defence of an unfortunate female—unfortunate, because she possessed a stronger mind and greater erudition, than most of her sex, who, to confess the truth, have little acquaintance with the sublime study and practice of philosophy.

You must know, Sir, that I am the daughter of a country gentleman of considerable fortune, who spared no expense in my education, which was both solid and ornamental. At ten years of age I was mistress of a tolerable share of universal history, both ancient and modern. At fifteen, to pass over the lighter parts of my accomplishments, such as a perfect knowledge of the French, Italian, and Spanish languages, drawing and music, I began to have some relish for the works of Locke, Malebranch, Bayle, and Hume, which latter, I will not hesitate to own, was always my favourite. By a continual reading of these authors, vulgar conceptions were banished from my mind; and I soon perceived, that most of the received opinions of the world originated in prejudice.

But how shall I describe the transports I felt upon the first perusal of the fascinating pages of Rousseau? Dear and lively painter of nature, we live over thy fancied scenes! When we read thy thoughts, our intellect wanders in the most delightful and rational elysium! But not to be hurried away by the violence of my admiration, from the immortal Rousseau I learnt, that the passion of love was so far from inimical to true philosophy, that it was absolutely necessary the mind should be unshackled by contracted notions, to taste that passion in its pure and unadulterated state.

From Rousseau I caught a refined taste in poetry; particularly for that tender and keen sensibility, which is so peculiarly remarkable in the Italian poets—for, though I never read any of the poetical effusions of that great man, I think his Nouvelle Heloise, not to mention his Confessions, calculated to throw a soft languor over the mind, more favourable to a love of poesy, than the works of any other writer whatever.

At this period a young gentleman, the son of a man of good fortune in our neighbourhood, returned into the country from the University of Cambridge, from whence he had been unjustly expelled by the illiberality of the Vice-chancellor; because, forsooth, he was reputed the author of an essay, displaying at once the most profound reading and elegance of style, and enlivened by a sarcastic vein of wit, worthy of the pen of Voltaire, which openly denied the divinity of a certain celebrated philosopher, (whom some, indeed, have exalted into a deity) and even expressed a doubt whether such a person ever existed!

Charles Mandeville, for that was his name, possessed a handsome exterior, and the manners of a man of fashion. We read together, and mutually diverted ourselves with the ridiculous prejudices of mankind. Our opinions instantly coalesced;—mutual sympathies soon attracted us to each other; and from friendship we insensibly felt the soft ties of affection influence our hearts.

No sooner did we discover the cause of our emotions, than we communicated our feelings to each other. Both loved, and both were sensible of the pleasure of loving; but as we were well acquainted how much the mind abhors restraint, and that

"Love, free as air, at sight of human ties, Spreads his light wings, and in a moment flies," we disdained to think of any other union than of nature and sentiment, when

".....All is full, possessing, and possest,
No craving void left aching in the breast,
E'en thought meets thought, ere from the lip it part
And each warm wish springs mutual from the heart.
This sure is bliss, it bliss on earth there be,
And once the lot of Mandeville and me."

The remnant of common usages, however, still hung upon our ideas; and we felt it to make our connection known. Thus for near six months we we enjoy the most perfect state of felicity and confidence that humanity is capable of, although in secret, by which you will see how difficult a matter it is to eradicate those ancient errors to which the mind hath been accustomed; and that the soul cannot emancipate itself at once from the constraint which hath been absurdly imposed upon it, but requires some time to regain its native energy and elasticity.

At the end of six months the affection of Charles Mandeville manifestly declined. I was far from being surprised at this, or upbraiding him for his inconstancy; for I knew too well the mutability of human nature to expect an everlasting attachment, as both Rousseau and Godwin have clearly shewn its impossibility. However, I did not fail to blame my confidant for informing me of the true state of his heart, and to acquaint him that I considered his conduct as an insult upon my understanding. He confessed his error, and solicited my pardon, which I gave him, and we parted in the most friendly manner.

Perhaps I should not so easily have forgiven this slight, had not my paramour been for some time indifferent to me. Nature pointed out to us our duty, and we fulfilled her commands; had we continued our connection, we should have counteracted her designs, which would have been at once irrational and disgusting.

My reason was now greatly improved, and I had acquired a strength of mind sufficient to enable me to despise the opinions of the world. I only waited, therefore, for some object who was worthy of my regard, to whom I might once more unite myself by the bonds of love; but I was diverted from my pursuit by the illness of my father, who shortly afterwards ceased to be—sunk in eternal sleep. Philosophy forbade me to give way to useless sorrow upon this occasion, and I soon removed to the house of an aunt, with whom I continued to reside for some time.

As my fortune was now in my own hands, I was teased by the addresses of several officers in the army; but I had resolved to preserve my independence. A young baronet, who had lately married an antiquated virgin in consideration of her great wealth, settled in that part of the country where my aunt lived. An intimacy soon ensued between the families, and Sir William's conversation presently convinced me he was a man of superior intellect and learning. His situation became the object of my pity. It was impossible he could have any affection for Lady —. Indeed he hinted as much to me in a confidential conversation.

This made me determine to offer him a share in my heart, and to propose a tour upon the Continent, by which we could at once gratify our love, and the thirst of beholding whatever the fine arts and antiquities of Italy should present to our notice. He instantly agreed to the proposition, and we left England upon our projected plan. As to Lady —, I am informed she was so ridiculous, as to take the infidelity, as it is called, of her husband so much to heart, that she repaired to Bath, where she died of vexation.

We remained in Italy three years, gratifying our laudable ambition of knowledge and research, during which time I twice became a mother. As Sir William's circumstances had become rather embarrassed by the unbounded profusion to which he had accustomed himself, when we arrived at Florence upon our return I advised him to offer his hand to a young lady of immense property, the daughter of a dry salter, who had come hither for her health, not doubting but the charms of a title would have a powerful influence upon both the old man and his child. I was not deceived in my conjectures. The marriage very shortly took place, notwithstanding the bad impressions which the character of Sir William must have made upon the mind of people of such narrow principles.

Having a sincere regard for Sir William, I would not suffer him to be exposed to any reproaches from his new relations upon my account. I therefore quitted Florence, and set off for Germany, accompanied by my woman and my children.

Not to detain you with unnecessary details, as I was passing through Franconia, my carriage unfortunately broke down at the foot of a steep mountain. To increase my distress, night was quickly coming on, when one of the postillions informed me that we were not far from the château of the Baron Von Erlichtenheitenberg, who was a nobleman of a very courteous disposition. I dispatched one of my servants to the château to inform him of the accident, and to request his permission to remain there that night. The man returned with a polite invitation, and was followed by the Baron and Baroness.

I shall pass over the compliments that took place. Suffice it to say, that I was equally charmed with the Baron and his Lady, and continued at the château for a long time.

The Baron was a man of sense, and one of the Illuminati: indeed, the conversation of both husband and wife was peculiarly pleasing. One morning as we were walking in the park belonging to the château, the Baroness, after a short preface, told me, that she suspected I was more than agreeable to her husband, and, therefore, provided I had no objection, she would be very grateful, if I would have the kindness to admit him into my affections, and to share him between us. Sentiments so exalted and noble, and moreover so congenial with my own feelings, darted through my frame like electricity. I embraced the Baroness, and promised to grant her request. During the eighteen months that I staid at the château, I experienced nothing but a calm philosophical joy; and I once again became a mother.

Man is a finite being, and all his pleasures and pursuits have an end. The Baron left Erlichtenheitenberg to attend the commands of the French Directory, upon some business of extreme importance. As I did not choose to accompany him and the Baroness to Paris I set out upon my return to England, whence I hoped all the Gothic impressions of false education had been entirely swept away.

But upon my arrival at London, to my infinite surprise, I found them as strong as ever. Would you believe it possible, that all my acquaintance avoid me? Nay, when I wrote to my aunt to tell her I would spend a few days in the country with her, she had the folly to return me for answer, that she must decline any intercourse with a person of my character and disposition; as if it were not a duty to follow the impulse of Nature, and laudable in a female citizen to have as many offspring as she can!

All I desire of you, Sir, is to place this matter in its proper light. If you will favour your readers with an Essay upon the subject, you will be entitled to the thanks of all people of enlarged minds, and particularly of, Sir, your humble servant,

CRITA.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEE.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

HAFIZ, the elegant poet of Persia, has not only been commended by Sir William Jones, but has been decorated by the excursive fancy of Burke with the most brilliant panegyric. The odes of this Persian warbler are as enchanting as the notes of the Nightingale, and while he charms the listening air, as he sings in the pavilions of Asiatic luxury, every Muse, Grace, and Love assemble, and crown the Harmonist with chaplets of the gayest texture. It has been considered as a sort of duty by every one, skilled in the idiom of Persia, to translate from this bewitching writer. The Persian miscellanies abound with his effusions; and every student of the East, as he touches the gay chords with no reluctant quill, blesses the memory of the bard.

ODE OF HAFIZ.

From Persian Lyrics, or scattered Poems from the Divine Hafiz, &c. translated by Mr. Hindley.

Minstrel, tune some novel lay,
Ever jocund, ever gay;
Call for heart-expanding wine,
Ever sparkling, ever fine
Sit remov'd from prying eyes;
Love thy game, the fair thy prize;
Toying snatch the furtive bliss,
Eager look, and eager kiss;
Fresh and fresh repeat the freak,
Often give, and often take.

Can'st thou feed the hung'ring soul
Without drinking of the bowl?
Pour out wine; to her 'tis due:
Love commands thee—fill anew;
Drink her health, repeat her name,
Often, often do the same.

Frantic love more frantic grows,
Love admits of no repose:
Haste, thou youth with silver feet,
Haste, the goblet bring, be fleet;
Fill again the luscious cup,
Fresh and fresh, come, fill it up.

See, yon angel of my heart
Forms for me, with witching art,
Ornaments of varied taste,
Fresh and graceful, fresh and chaste.

Gentle Zephyr, should'st thou roam,
By my lovely charmer's home,
Whisper to my dearest dear,
Whisper, whisper in her ear,
Tales of Hafiz; which repeat,
Whisper'd soft, and whisper'd sweet;
Whisper tales of love anew,
Whisper'd whispers oft renew.

In a summer retreat, I have given many of my summer evenings to reading and meditating the ANCIENTS. JUVENAL, PERSIUS, and HORACE, claimed and received a very continued attention. In studying these admirable writings, I have not disdained the aid even of the Dutch commentator; and I have courted the liberal society of such scholars, as GIFFORD and DRUMMOND. The following comparison, from the pen of the latter, appears to be critically just, and is composed in a sparkling style, which is marmore purior.

"In comparing the three great satirists of antiquity, I am inclined to give the first place to Horace, the second to Juvenal, and the third to Persius. Horace is the most agreeable and the most instructive writer; Juvenal the most splendid declaimer, and Persius the most inflexible moralist. The first is like a skilful gladiator, who vanquishes without destroying his antagonist; the second exerts gigantic strength in the contest; and the third enters the lists with all the ardour of a youthful combatant. If the style of Horace be chaster, if his Latinity be purer, if his manner be gayer and more agreeable, than either of the two Satirists, who follow him, he does not write finer verses than Juvenal, nor has he nobler thoughts than Persius. The poetry of the first resembles a beautiful river, which glides along through pleasant scenes, sunny fields, and smiling valleys: that of the second is like the majestic stream, whose waters, in flowing by the largest city in the Europe, are polluted with no small portion of its filth and ordure: that of the third may be compared to a deep and angry torrent, which loves to roll its sullen waves under the dark shadow of the mountain, or amid the silent gloom of the forest.

I hope the following remark will urge the classical reader once more to the perusal of the Fifth Satire, "ad Anneum Cornutum, cujus fuit auditor."

In directing the attention of the reader more particularly towards Persius, I might indulge my partiality for that admirable moralist, by pointing out many passages in his satires worthy of a great poet.—I cannot resist the inclination I feel of recommending his fifth satire to the examination of those, who have not already attentively considered that poem. The verses, particularly addressed to Cornutus, are beautiful and interesting: the explanation of the doctrine of the stoics, concerning liberty, is done in a masterly manner; and the description of the effects, produced on the human mind, by the insubordination of the passions, is deserving of serious reflection in every stage of life.

In the first part of the succeeding remarks, Mr. Drummond's theory of the passions will please by its ingenuity, and benefit by its wholesomeness.

"There is a knowledge of human nature, and of the constitution of the human mind, displayed by Persius, in treating of this last mentioned subject, which ought not to escape the observation of the reader. It must be evident to every man, who attends to the operations of intellect, that its energies are increased by the influence of passion; and that even what are called the worst passions appear to have been originally intended by nature only as stimuli to the mind, to impel it to exertion. Anger is implanted in our breasts, in order to enable us to resist injury; and fear is made to influence us, in order that we may attend to the preservation of our existence, by avoiding danger. It is then the excess of the stimulus; it is the extreme indulgence of the passions against which we have to guard, and which we ought to consider as noxious to our mental constitution.

"It seems to me, that the human passions may properly be classed under two heads; the first comprehending those, which are more temporary; the second including those, which are more durable in their nature.

"We may reckon, in the one class, anger, desire, terror, &c. in the other, envy, love, ambition, avarice, &c. The first may be called the acute, and the second the chronic diseases of the soul: the former occasion us the severest pangs; but the latter disturb, with little intermission, the repose and happiness of our lives. It is against the influence of these last, that Persius directs the moral part of his fifth satire. He endeavours to shew that, without vanquishing those tyrants of the mind, avarice, luxury, love, and ambition, the understanding will lose all its force, and at length sink in drivelling dotage into the vilest and most contemptible state of weakness.

"But, to return to the literary character of Persius. Though his sentiments are admirable, and deserve to be better known than they are, yet his poetry cannot be praised for its elegance, nor his language for its urbanity. It is one thing to esteem the excellent sense of an author, and another to propose his style as a model for imitation.

"The defects of Persius, considered with respect to composition, cannot perhaps be easily defended. Even Causabon, his fondest admirer, and most successful interpreter, admits that his style is obscure. If, however, any apology can be made for this first sin against good writing, it is in the case of a satirist, who dared to reprobate the crimes, and to ridicule the follies of a tyrant. If Persius be obscure, let it be remembered, he lived in the time of Nero.

"But it has been remarked that this author is not obscure, only when he lashes and exposes the Roman Emperor. It was very well, it has been said, to employ hints, and speak in half sentences, while he censured the vices of a cruel and luxurious despot; but there could be no occasion for enveloping himself in obscurity, while he expounded the doctrines of the stoics to his friend Cornutus, or expatiated to the poet Bassus on the true use of riches.

"But those who blame Persius for his obscurity, ought to reflect, that of all the various kinds of poetry, Satire is that, which loses most, by being read at a period very distant from the time of its composition. Just observations upon men and manners will indeed be esteemed in every age, when Taste and Literature flourish; and well described characters will always interest readers of judgment and feeling. But it is not the nature of satire to dwell upon general topics, without allusion to existing circumstances, or without reference to particular and even familiar examples. But it may be asked if vice and folly would not be exposed with perhaps greater effect by the delineation of fictitious characters and by general observations upon manners, than by dwelling upon the absurdity of a temporary fashion, or upon the guilt, or weakness of an obscure individual. To this question the satirist may justly reply, that his aim is not only to censure vice, but to punish those who practice it. If example teaches at all, it teaches most, where it applies best. The principle upon which punishment is justly inflicted is for the sake of example; and the punishment, which we dread, because it may be ours seems terrible even where it falls upon others. General and abstract reasoning upon virtue and morality may delight the wise and good; but it rarely corrects the foolish, or reforms the profligate. As the moralist treats generally of virtue and of wisdom, of the influence of reason and of the subordination of the passions; so the satirist remarks, and censures those private and individual deviations from good sense or good conduct; which it does not fall within the province of the moralist to observe. The moralist displays the variety of the human character, as it exists in all ages and nations: the satirist marks its shades and its defects in particular instances.

"While, therefore, I admit the charge of obscurity, which has been brought against Persius, I cannot allow it that weight, which it would have in most other cases. Indeed, we may as well complain of the rust on an ancient coin, as of the obscurity of an ancient satire. Nature, it is true, always holds up the same mirror, but prejudice, habit, and education are continually changing the appearance of the objects seen in it.

"The objections which have been made to Persius, in some other respects, are more difficult to answer. His unpolished verses, his coarse comparisons, and his ungraceful transitions from one subject to another, manifest, it is said, either his contempt, or his ignorance of elegant composition.

"It cannot, indeed, be contended that Persius displays the politeness of Horace, or that he shows himself an adept in the callida junctura. His poetry is a strong and rapid torrent, which pours, in its infracted course, over rocks and precipices, and which occasionally, like the waters of the Rhone, disappears from the view, and loses itself under ground.

"But although some critics have been thus far justly severe upon Persius, is it possible that they should be so prejudiced against him, by the imperfections of his style, as to deny that this excellent satirist possessed energy, acuteness, and spirit; because his language is rude, is not his bold and manly sense to be admired? What mind is so fastidious as to condemn just observations, and sound and wise reflections, because they are not expressed in the most elegant manner. The ancients, who must have seen the defects of Persius better than we can do, nevertheless admired him. All the philosophers and poets of his time, seem to have esteemed him; and the best critic, and the wittiest epigrammatist of antiquity, were among the number of those, who celebrated him. And then comes the elder Scaliger with all his offensive pedantry, to inform us that Persius was silly and dull. But Quintilian would not have praised a silly writer, nor would Martial have admired a dull one."

Having, at considerable length, exhibited from the Drummond gallery a pleasing portrait of Persius, we will now present a most brilliant proof of his gratitude to his master. It seems that this wise ancient had a very different idea of the character of a sage preceptor, and a man of learning, from that disgraceful and degrading one, which is so current in this enlightened country. The writer of this article repeats his fervent wish, that we had Palaces, magnificently devoted to learning; that we could see in America another Oxford, and another Cambridge, liberally endowed, and instructed by a long train of dignified doctors, who should be proudly and perfectly independent.

"Tis true on lofty themes I seldom dwell,
Nor love with empty sounds my verse to swell.
But now, my gentle friend, while thus the hours,
While even the inspiring Muse herself is ours,
Let me my heart unfold, and there disclose
The generous love, which for Cornutus glows.
An hundred voices now I dare to ask,
For praising thee becomes thy poet's task:
Nor think these words a flattering Muse has sung;
They fall not varnish'd from a faithless tongue:
They leave my bosom to thy view reveal'd,
And own the secret which it long conceal'd.
When first, a timid youth, I knew the town
Exchang'd the purple for the virile gown,
The golden bulla from my neck unstrung,
The sacred bauble by the Lares hung
From harsh restraint the first enlargement knew,
And crowds of parasites around me drew;
When the white shield, by youthful warriors worn,
Through all the streets of Rome by me was borne;
When too the martial dress forbade reproof,
And kept each friendly monitor aloof:
At that green age, when error most beguiles,
And Vice puts on her most seductive smiles,
Allures from Virtue unsuspecting youth,
And teaches folly to abandon truth;
To thee, Cornutus, I myself resign'd,
To thee entrusted my uncultured mind.
Thy gentle bosom, O Socratic sage,
Proved the best refuge to my tender age:
My young and pliant spirit clung to thine,
As to its guardian oak the shooting vine.
Train'd by thy hand, and moulded by thy will,
I was thy scholar, and companion still;
With thee I saw the summer sun arise,
With thee beheld him gild the evening skies:
Well pleas'd from feasts the twilight hours to steal,
And share with thee a philosophic meal,
On us, my friend, like fortune still awaits,
And stars consenting have conjoin'd our fates.
Whether by chance our lives were both begun,
When equal Libra had receiv'd the Sun;
Whether our lots the Twins between them share,
And those, who love like them, have made their care;
Whether malignant Saturn's clouded hour
Was cross'd for us by Jove's prevailing power;
The stars, I know not, which do thus combine
To regulate my destiny by thine.

Persius thus illustrates a well known paradox of the Stoics.

Some one there was, who finding strength to fail,
His body meagre, and his visage pale,
For the physician sent and told his case,
And show'd Health's roses faded on his face,
Three days repose the fever's force restrains
And cools the current boiling in his veins.
Once more desirous for the world to live,
And taste of all the joys which it can give;
He quits his bed, prepares to bathe, and dine,
And quaff the juice of the Surrentin vine.
"How wan, how sallow!" the physician cries;
"Ah, but 'tis nothing now," the sick replies:
"Nothing, my friend, the dire prognosis shews
"Disease productive of a thousand woes."
"Nay, pry thee peace,——I do not ask thine aid;
"My guardian in his grave long since was laid."
The doctor goes, the sick man's body swells,
And water gathers in a thousand cells:
His breath, sulphureous, taints the vernal gale,
And airs mephitic, from his lungs exhale;
At length unlock'd for, Death the wretch appals,
And from his hand the lifted goblet falls.
The trumpets sound, funeral torches glow,
Announcing far the mockery of woe.

On the state bed the stiffen'd corse is laid,
And all the honours, due to death, are paid;
O'er the sad relics new made Romans mourn,
And place the ashes in the silent urn.
"Thy well told tale does not to me apply
No fever rages, and no pulse beats high,
Lay thine hand here; my heart no throbbing knows,
And health for me uninterrupted flows."
Methinks thou may'st a few exceptions make,
Did loss of gold never cause thine heart to ache?
Does not a fever rage, whene'er by chance,
*A fond maid's soul is pictur'd in her glance?
Say dost thou sit contented at the board,
Which just a cake and cabbage can afford?
Come, try thy mouth—hah—there's an ulcer there
Too tender to be touch'd by such coarse fare.
Thou hast an ague, when heart-chilling fear
Bristles thine hair, and whispers dangers near:
And madness, horrid fiend, is nigh at hand,
When raging anger hurls his flaming brand,
And thou dost rave in such a frantic strain
As mad Orestes would pronounce insane.

This evening, as my studies and reflections have been unusually long, my readers must be yawning as well as myself. To relieve them, and send them to bed in good humour, I trim my lamp once more, and, by its fading light, copy the following.

When good King Arthur rul'd the land,
His jovial name old tales resound,
In merry mood he gave command
To shape the royal table round:
Then, when the Monarch freely din'd
Among his knights, so fam'd of yore,
Each guest at once his place could find,
Nor think of ceremony more.

From this arrangement it turn'd out,
As mirth and jollity soon found,
That, while they push'd the bowl about,
The liquor constantly went round:
From hence the modern custom rose,
For Arthur's sake, we'll hold it dear,
Still round and round the bottle goes,
Be tables round,—or tables square.

A circle is a wond'rous thing,
As sage philosophers repeat,
So perfect, nothing can they bring
In which all ends completely meet;
And where so well can end meet end,
As when our hours with wine are crown'd,
While glass meets bottle—friend meets friend,
And Pleasure's heartfelt smile—goes round.

Let Bacchanals sing rosy wine,
The summum bonum, as they think;
Another theme of praise be mine,
A poet owes much more to ink.

Dear fluid! what to thee I owe,
Without thee cannot well appear;
Ah! still thy ebon stream must flow,
Or all my visions flit in air.

Thou givst to half the world its fame,
By card, newspaper, or review;
Thou givst to airy nothing "name,"
And "local habitation" too.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

KING'S BENCH, GUILDHALL, June 16.

Mrs. Parker, v the Rev. Mr. Geldart.

Mr. ERSKINE stated the case on the part of the plaintiff; she is a Lady who has a large house in Kent, within seven miles of Rochester, which she lets in lodgings during the summer season to persons of rank, fortune and character. The defendant is a Clergyman of the Church of England who has livings and estates in Yorkshire.

The present action was brought for the sum of 64l. 7s. 6d. for the board and lodging of the de-

* DRYDEN, with his usual felicity, thus translates a similar passage,

If an alluring girl, in gilding by,
Should tip the wink, with a lascivious eye

defendant's wife and child, for near six months. The circumstances of the case were as follows:—The defendant, who is himself an opulent man, had received a considerable fortune with his wife, a Lady of great beauty and accomplishments, and against whose honor and character there had never been the slightest imputation thrown, even by the defendant. The violence and fury of his temper were such, that she now, for the second time, found it impossible to remain in his house, and was obliged to leave it. The defendant, forgetting the honour and humanity which became a gentleman, but more especially a person invested with the sacred character of his profession, suffered his wife to remain in London absolutely penniless; while she on her part, was obliged to institute a suit against him in the spiritual Courts, praying to be divorced from him, on the ground of cruelty and adultery, and also praying that alimony or separate maintenance might be decreed her. While this suit was depending, she wished to find a respectable asylum in country lodgings, and, by the recommendation of Mr. Brooke, of Grey's Inn, with whom she had been acquainted previous to her marriage, she went down with her child, on the 18th of April, 1801, to the plaintiff's house, where she continued for six months: the defendant, however, came at the end of three months, and took away his child; but at the same time expressed his satisfaction at finding her lodged in so respectable a house, and that her conduct was so unexceptionable. He also then expressly consented to her lodging at that house, in case she should refuse to return to his. Afterwards, in March 1792, a bond was executed between defendant, his wife, and her friends, wherein, it being mentioned, that the expence of the proceedings in the Spiritual Court might be injurious to their family, it was therefore agreed to put a stop to those proceedings, in consideration of a settlement of 150*l.* per annum, from the day of the date of that bond; after which, she also agreed that she would contract no debts with which he might be chargeable; this bond had neither by the words, or the meaning of it, a retroactive effect, so as to exempt the defendant from the debts his wife had incurred in 1801, when she was obliged to fly from his house, on account of his ill treatment, and being destitute of the necessities of life, contracted such debts for her lodging and maintenance, as were suitable to her station in life.

Miss Ester Smith, a lodger in the plaintiff's house, proved that Mrs. Geldart and child had lodged there for the time the plaintiff charged; and that the house was every way appointed for the reception of persons of fashion and fortune. She was present at the time that Mr. Geldart took away his child, and heard him then say, that if his wife would not return to his house, he was glad that she had taken lodgings in such a respectable house.

Mr. Brooke, of Gray's Inn, uncle to the last witness, said that it was by his recommendation Mrs. Geldart took lodgings at the house of the plaintiff; that the terms charged for her board and lodging were no higher than he had himself always paid for his niece (the last witness), and what was usual at that house; he had had many conversations with the defendant, respecting his wife, in which defendant said, he was much surprised and pleased to find her so comfortably and respectably lodged; and that if she would not return with him, he was willing to pay for her at the rate of 100*l.* per annum.

Major Stuart, of the Royal Marine Corps, lodged in the house at the same time, and remembered the visit of the defendant, at the time he took away his child: he had some conversation with him at the time: and upon the defendant's asking him some questions about Mrs. G—, he told him, that she had made herself universally respected, from the correctness and reserve of her conduct. "Oh! she had always too much of that for me," was the answer of the defendant.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH in the course of the trial, observed, that no agreement for separate maintenance could exempt a husband from paying the debts contracted by his wife, in a state of separation, unless the money agreed on was regularly paid; he observed that maintenance means food and cloaths, and not a mere parchment deed. The bond, dated March 1802, was proceeding to be read in evidence; when

Mr. GARROW, feeling such a weight of evidence, and his Lordship's opinion against the defendant, consented to a verdict against him—Verdict for the plaintiff 64*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CHURCHILL cherished a prejudice against THOMAS SHERIDAN, the author of some valuable tracts on Elocution. The satirical bard, thus derides one whom he supposed to be a mere duceps verborum,

"A word catcher, who lives on syllables."

He can instruct us how to use
Our A's, and B's, and P's, and Q's:
O'er letters, into takers, worn,
O'er syllables, defaced and torn;
O'er words disjointed, and o'er sense,
Left destitute of all defence,
He strides, and all the way he goes,
Wades—deep in blood—o'er criss cross rows!
Before him, every consonant,
In agonies is seen to part;
Behold in fumes not to be known,
The ghosts of tortured vowels groan.

Of all the multifarious advertisements we have ever seen, the following is the queerest.

LINES,

COPIED FROM A BOARD OVER THE DOOR OF JOHN GROVE, OF WHITE WALTHAM, BERKS.

John Grove grocer, and dealer in tea,
Sells the finest of Congou and best of Bohea;
A dealer in coppice, a measurer of land;
Sells the finest of snuffs, and the finest white sand;
A singer of psalms a scrivener of money;
Collects the land tax, and sells fine virgin honey:
A ragman, a carrier, a baker of bread,
And a clerk to the living as well as the dead;
Vestry-clerk, petty-constable, sells scissars and knives,
Best Virginia, and Buckles, collects the small tythes;
Is a treasurer to clubs, and maker of wills;
He surveys men's estates, and vends Anderson's pills;
Woollen-draper and hosier, sells all sorts of shoes,
With the best earthen-ware, also takes in the news;
Deals in hurdles and eggs, sells the best of small beer,
The finest sea coals, and's elected o'erseer;
Deputy-surveyor, sells fine writing paper,
Has a vote for the county, and is linen-draper;
A dealer in cheese, and the best Hampshire bacon,
Plays the fiddle divinely, if I'm not mistaken.

The editor of the Aurora wishes, that there were as many aliens landed to vote in every state as in this. Should any man, or number of men, who wore the appearance of poverty, ignorance, and vice so strongly marked, as did hundreds of the newly naturalized citizens of Pennsylvania, been landed in some of the towns in New-England, it would have been the duty of the civil authority of those towns, and this duty they would have strictly performed, to have warned such men to leave the town within ten days, and if the warning was not complied with, they would have thrust them out by force. Duane knows little about the people of New-England. Great changes must be effected in the laws, customs, feelings, and pride of that people, before they will submit to the degradation of being told, by the out cast of foreign nations, who shall sit in their councils.

[Gazette of the U. States.]

A southern gentleman lately paid a visit to Colonel Pickering, at his farm in Essex. He found this worthy, though much abused citizen—not superintending a set of ill-fed and worse clad slaves—not amusing himself with cock fighting, horse racing, or hunting for popularity, in a tavern or grog-shop—but literally, like another Cincinnatus, guiding the plough, while two of his sons were assisting him in his rural labours. Such is the reply which this celebrated citizen makes to the many slanders which the insatiate unrelenting malice of political enemies are ever uttering against him. Instead of retailing their invectives, he lives down their calumnies, and by his conduct convicts them of falsehood and malice.

[New-York Com. Adv.]

The following is a memorable proof of the political ignorance of the new fangled French. Of that cart load of constitutions, drafted by the rascal Sieyes, it is probable that neither he, nor his vulgar associates, knew even a letter. They understood them, however, to mean treason, sedition, and rebellion, and that to these upstart reformers was sufficient. "A few days ago Lord Holland asked Barthelemi, the president of the senate, for some explanation upon one of the articles of the new constitution, and that Barthelemi referred him to the person who drew up the constitution, for as to himself he was not informed upon the point in question. This reply is said to have surprised all the English who were present." [Lon. pap.]

General Vial is said to be an excellent bottle companion. [ib.]

Cheetham, the hatter, and bad editor of the New-York Citizen, left England, it is said, to cheer us benighted Americans, with the brilliant flame of his phosphoric patriotism. Alas! how unconscious of the danger of a warfare with federal wit. He has been so often lashed, of late, in COLMAN'S Evening Post, that the poor hatter looks as black and as blue, as if he had been immersed in one of his own vats among the lees of logwood and indigo. We have thoughts of writing a parody of Inkle's affectionate apostrophe to Yarico, and beginning with—

O say, simple Felt, have you form'd any notion,
Of all the rude perils in crossing the ocean?

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"Aurelia" has by no means "survived the age of invention and poetry." She is in the full bloom of mental youth. Let her remember the easy lines of Dr. Johnson,

Could philosophers contrive
Life to stop at thirty-five,
Time his hours should never drive
Over the bounds of thirty-five.
High to soar, and deep to dive,
Nature gives at thirty-five.
Lady, stock and tend your hive,
Trifle not at thirty-five.

The first imitation of the well known ode of Horace to Xanthias Phocæus is worthy of the classical scholar, the elegant poet, and the independent man, who has expressed his just contempt of the sable sensuality of Thomas the Lewd.

The second imitation, though too short, is humorous, and remarkably easy. We impute no fault, but its brevity.

"Frank Fid" rivals the "Poor Jack" of Dibdin.

"Dactyl and Comma" are alert and skilful.

"Frederick," both as a good poet and a sincere lover, deserves the fond regard of his fair one.

"Harley" is one of our most favorite correspondents.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

WILLIAM.

A SONG—FOR MR. CARR.

WILLIAM was young, and never youth
Possess'd a better soul than he;
To JULIA he had sworn his truth
His love from guile was ever free!
But war uprear'd the bloody tent,
And William to the battle went.

Why flies the rose my Julia's cheek!
Why fall those tears, my love? he cries,
Thy country's peace alone I seek,
Her liberty the darling prize:
With glory crown'd return'd at last,
We'll smile on all the perils past.

You go, she cried, and we must part:
Thus love by fate was ever crost!—
I see the weapon reach your breast;—
And Julia in the fight is lost.—
Ah! too prophetic were her words,
He fell, oppress'd by hostile swords.
FERDINANDO.

JULIA.

A SONG—FOR MR. CARR.

The ev'ning blush'd her latest red,
When JULIA to the shade repair'd,
Where, o'er her faithful WILLIAM's head,
The turf its heaving bosom rear'd.

The lily, planted by her love,
Its truest emblem flourish'd there,
The laurel o'er his tomb she wove,
And yew still sacred to despair.

While with her lips the stone she prest,
That told the story of his death,
The poison rankled in her breast;—
She sunk, she sigh'd, resign'd her breath!
FERDINANDO.

FROM THE ANTI DEMOCRAT.

[The argument of each honest Statesman, the invention of every Genius, and the sprightliness of every Wit are all in battle array against our French philosopher and his Democratic troop. The ensuing Parody of a drinking song, much in vogue, alludes to the "ardent" amours of Africa, so well understood, and so modestly prosecuted by a certain Great man.]

A NEW SONG,

BEING A PARODY ON AN OLD ONE,

LATELY INTRODUCED IN THE NEW OPERA OF THE CALEDONIAN DISCOVERY.

ACT II. SCENE I.

Discovers a modern philosopher seated in a negro hut, with a number of the African race round the fire; the younger part eating mush out of a frying pan: over the fire place hangs a Calendar, which tells the Merryweather and the sad: behind the door, stands a Mad'son chained to his brother, who was too Dearborn to be free; admiring the ingenuity of a Gullatin—in the chimney corner stands a Smith, who appears to be endeavouring to repair a broken nose.

When seated with Sall, with my brats all around,
Fol de rol de rol de ri do,
The banjo shall play and the song shall go round,
With a bumper then here's to you boy,
Come Sall, a buss, my yellow joy,
Here Tom, be merry, drink my lad,
The fed'ralists are all run mad,
And I've come here to be merry, girls and boys,
And I've come here to be merry.

Come strike up the banjo, Sam—Sal giv's your hand,
Fal de rol de rol de ri do,

Take partners, od zooks, ne'er shilly shally stand,
Lead up, cast down, hands across,
Now Tom, another bumper toss,
Here's to the man that I love most.
Join Sal and brats—my fav'rite toast (Tom Paine)
For I've come home to be jolly jolly boys,
For I've come home to be jolly.

In glee, jig, and merriment the moments shall fly,
Fal de rol de rol de ri do,
While whiskey in bumpers brightens Sally's eye,
Oh damme, charmer, giv's your hand,
My purse you know you can command,
In pleasure, joy and gay delight,
Another glass and then, the night
Will pass in extacy and carnal joys,
For I've come home to be jolly.

SONNET

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO HER WHO BEST UNDERSTANDS IT.

Friend of my heart! whom I have fondly lov'd
Who sought to lull my miseries to rest,
Whose smiles have sooth'd me, when with cares
oppress'd,
Whose partial friendship e'en my faults approv'd,

Friend of my heart! farewell—I wish'd to part
(If that were doom'd) as friends—In evil hour,
I mark'd the gath'ring storm begin to lower
To pang a bleeding, yet still faithful heart—

This cruel doom I could have silent borne,
And when at eve I sought my wonted rest,
In pleasing dreams have clasp'd thee to my breast
And told my heart that it was made to mourn—
Why then unkind, at parting should'st thou be,
Why say "to wound thy feelings, were most sweet to me."

SONNET

TO WINTER—BY MRS. OPIE.

Power of the awful wind, whose hollow blast
Hurls desolation wide! thy sway I hail.
If o'er the scene around can beauties rest
Superior far to aught that summer's gale
Bids in the ripening year to bloom awake.
To view thy majesty, the cheerful lake,
The dance, the festive song, I pleased forsake,
And through thy sparkling scenes I stray alone,
Now the pale regent of thy splendid night
Decks with her yellow rays thy snowy throne.
Richly her beams on Summer's mantle light;
Richly they gild chill Autumn's tawny vest
But ah! to me they shine more chastely bright
Spangling the icy robe that wrapt thy breast.

THE WITLING AND THE CLOWN.

A JEU D'ESPRIT.—BY AMBROSE PITMAN, ESQ.

A Witling of the dashing kind,
Ask'd Hodge if he had seen a wind.
"Yes, that I have (quoth Hodge) I vow,
I saw a mighty wind just now."
"You saw it, Hodge! it cannot be"— Replied the man of repartee.
"Pray, what was't like?"—"Like," quoth the Clown,
"Twas like—to have blown my cottage down."

WILL THE MANIAC.

A BALLAD.

Hark! what wild sound floats on the breeze!
'Tis Will, at evening fall,
Who sings to yonder waving trees,
That shade his prison wall.

Poor Will was once the gayest swain
At village wake was seen;

No lighter heart than his of pain
E'er tripp'd the moonlight green.

His snowy flock graz'd on the hill,
A finer ne'er was known;
And, but when died a kid, poor Will
Had never cause to moan.

But now poor William's brain is turn'd,
He cares not for his flock;
For when I ask'd "if them he mourn'd?"
I mark'd his vacant look.

Yet William does not mourn his fold,
For them he scarce would miss:
Some say a love he never told
Consum'd his form to this.

And others tell, as how he strove
To win the fair-one's heart,
Who mock'd his tears, and scorn'd his love,
And left him thus to smart.

Will wander'd then amid the rocks,
And left his flock to stray;
And oft would creep where bursting shocks
Had rent the earth away.

He lov'd to delve the darksome dell,
Where never pierc'd a ray,
There to the wailing night-bird tell
His mournful tale away.

And oft upon the craggy mount,
Where threat'ning cliffs hang high,
Have I observ'd him stop to count,
With fixless stare, the sky:

Then to himself in murmurs low
Repeating, as he wound
Along the mountain's woody brow,
"Till lost was ev'ry sound.

But soon he went so wild astray,
His kindred acri'd to see;
And now, secluded from the day,
In yonder cell is he.

Poor Will from all that pass along Claims but a tear; and then
Poor Will, the Maniac's, grateful song
Returns the gift again.

ANINTOR.

London, March 24, 1802.

ANACREONTIC TO DORIS DRINKING.

When, dearest Doris, you resign
One happy hour to mirth and wine,
Each glass you drink still paints your face,
With some new victorious grace.

Charms in reserve my soul surprise,
And by fresh wounds your lover dies.
Who can, resist thee, lovely fair
That wit, that soft engaging air,

Each panting heart its homage pays
And all the vassal world obeys.
God of the grape, boast now no more,
Thy triumphs on far Indus shore,

Each useless weapon now lay down,
Thy tigers, car and ivy crown.
Give but this juice in full supplies,
And trust thy fame to Doris' eyes.—

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXXIV.

"O digna conjuncta viro." Virg. Phædræutria.

I shake off to-day my usual lassitude, and, in the language of the modern French, hasten to amuse the imagination of my readers, by an allegory, sent me by an accomplished friend. I believe that all, who relish pure expression and elegant description, would wish my laziness a long slumber, provided, that while I was snoring in my arm chair, they could be enchanted with such harmonious sounds as might be heard from LOVE and GENIUS.

AN ALLEGORY.

In the early ages of the world, ere the rich had learned to domineer over the poor, or the poor to despise the rich, lived ADMIRATION and RESPECT. Their residence was in the vale of sensibility, where they had erected a small, but elegant, cottage...It was surrounded with a garden, where the wild and luxuriant beauties of nature received an additional grace from the judicious dispositions of art. The woodbine and the jessamine, twining their slender shoots round the humble walls, clothed them with the richest verdure, and filled the air with their mingled fragrance.

They had not long resided in this delightful abode, before their union was blessed with a son, whom they called LOVE. At first, the child appeared weak and delicate, but, by the persevering attention of his parents, he at length became lively and vigorous. He would frequently wander through the extensive Groves of Contemplation, which adjoined their lonely retreat, or ramble over the Mountains of Imagination, which surrounded the valley. But his highest gratification was to bathe in a pure stream, whose waters, transparent as the liquid crystal, dashing from rock to rock, at length collected themselves in the bosom of the vale, and winded murmuring away over sands of gold. This stream was denominated the River of Delight: Its banks were adorned with all the flowers which the hand of spring pours, in gay profusion, upon the lap of nature; and here, after the toils of a long excursion, the youth would frequently enjoy the sweets of undisturbed repose. By these means, his vigour and activity daily increased. His cheeks were blooming as the rose-bud glistening with the morning dew; his breath fragrant as the zephyr whispering over beds of violets; his eyes, though sparkling and animated, possessed a captivating languish, which rendered them still more interesting...they spoke intelligibly the language of a feeling soul. His hair black and glossy as the plume of the raven, hung waving in bushy ringlets over his shoulders. These charms of person and of mind, rendered him the delight of his parents, and the universal favourite of the nymphs who inhabited the Vale of Sensibility. Without feeling a particular inclination towards any, he had occasionally been the companion of all, for wherever he chose to appear attention awaited him.

One day, after an excursion rather longer than usual, he laid himself down to rest beneath the shade of a flowery alcove, where the rose and the myrtle intertwined their odoriferous branches. He had just sunk into the arms of sleep, when GENIUS, who had lately chosen this delightful valley for her residence, approached the spot. Never before had she beheld such beauty: The fervid glow of exercise had lent fresh lustre to his cheek, the brightness of his lip vied with the richest ruby of the east, and the exquisite proportion of his shape seemed to bespeak him an inhabitant of Olympus, rather than one of the frail race of mortals. She gazed in astonishment; but wishing to take a nearer view, the motion of the branches awakened him. He opened his eyes to a sight of wonder. The nymph was tall and of an elegant form. She was habited in an azure robe, her zone was of gold, and the robe itself studded with stars of the same precious metal. Her features were rather wild and irregular, but such was the intelligence, such were the inexpressible graces of her whole countenance as could not fail to engage the heart of every beholder. Her hair, which was of the brightest auburn, floated negligently on the breeze, and discovered a neck of the most exquisite proportion, and most transcendent whiteness. A wreath of glittering gems encircled her brow, which, when they reflected the beams of the sun, rendered her dazzling beyond description. He started up, and approached her with trembling steps. The first expression of their mutual feelings was silent admiration; but their hearts soon overflowed in the tenderest language of affection.

From that moment they were inseparable companions. Their dispositions were perfectly congenial. Whatever spot was a favourite with the one was sure to attract the frequent visits of the other. Often would they meet at the hour of sunrise, and fix their raptured sight on the great luminary of the world, as he tinged the tops of the mountains with his vivid rays. Often would they climb the highest of their hills, which commanded a prospect of the ocean, and behold him as he sunk away in soft and varying shades, till he entirely disappeared, and left them to enjoy the trembling lustre of the Queen of Night, whose milder beams now shed their silvery radiance over the placid waves.

Thus days, months and years rolled away, and seemed but as the vision of a moment. At length it was agreed, that the hand of Hymen should unite the two lovers in the flowery bands of connubial bliss. The marriage was celebrated with the greatest festivity and joy, in the palace of IMAGINATION, Empress of the hilly country which bore her name. MODESTY presided at the ceremony, GOODHUMOUR attended at the repast..... The Epithalamium was composed and sung by the MUSES, while the GRACES danced in all the enchanting variety of attitudes to the sprightly numbers of their golden lyres. The youth was enamoured with the beauties of his lovely bride, and, by this alliance with GENIUS, became not merely vigorous, but immortal.

PART THE THIRD.

CHAPTER VI.

Emigrants of the middle classes, possessed of some property....Motives which they have to emigrate.

I now come to a class of emigrants, who are neither swindlers, nor peasants, nor adventurers, nor men of letters, nor physicians, nor priests, nor air balloon men, nor manufacturers, nor merchants; these are the owners of small or moderate capitals, the most virtuous of all citizens, and the real strength of every human society. These people alone deserve to have a book written for them, to inform them truly concerning America; a country towards which, for some time past, they have anxiously turned their eyes as towards a blessed refuge for oppressed virtue. The Americans are incurable: nothing but a voyage to America, and a couple of years residence in their Eldorado, could a little cool down their madness; for shame would deter them from recanting their opinions, and acknowledging their cure. The rich already know that they cannot enjoy in America the pleasures of luxury to so high a degree as in Europe. The despairing beggar may go there; for mere change of place is in itself an alleviation of his sufferings. The traveller may continue to take up his residence for a while in the United States, to see their wonders with astonishment, and then return home with correcter ideas; but the man of the middle class of society, who seeks for happiness, must be furnished with more correct information concerning America, than he could draw from the scribbles of Americans and of their partizans.

The motives for emigration, of this class of citizens, are no where better unfolded than in a remarkable little English tract, written by Augustus Nordenskiöld, a Swede, which deserves to be more known in Germany, and from which I shall here translate a few suitable passages. The English title of this little work is, "Plan for a free community upon the coast of Africa, under the protection of Great-Britain, but entirely independent of all European laws and government."

"In travelling over Europe," says my author, "we find a great number of persons altogether dissatisfied with the condition of the society of which they are members. Their country, the place of their abode, is, in their imagination at least, full of so many obstacles to their happiness and internal contentment, that they incessantly and anxiously keep before their eyes, the possibility with which they flatter themselves of being happier in some other situation."

"The observing traveller is astonished at this phenomenon. The first thought which occurs to him is that some general giddiness of spirit has befallen the human race. But when he exerts his powers of judging, and begins attentively to observe these people, how much is he surprised to find, instead of the characters befitting vagabonds or worthless adventurers, as he naturally expected, such genius and talents, as belong only to the nobler portions of the human race. He finds among them many married men, and heads of numerous families, and their discontent is often in proportion to the excellence of the faculties which they possess.

"This appearance, which is in its nature very remarkable, certainly deserves the greatest attention in respect to the research of its real causes. We may have occasion to believe it originates from a certain instability with which the whole civilized part of the human race appears, in the present century, to be tormented; an instability which may be imputed to an extravagant irritability. But, when we consider the object with attention, we discover that this is a false conclusion, inasmuch as these persons voluntarily subject themselves to great dangers and many inconveniences of life, singly and solely in the hope of attaining a more extensive freedom than they now enjoy. In one word, when we seriously and honestly trace the causes of this dissatisfaction, we soon discover that the fault lays not in the discontented persons, but in the states of which they are members. Man is born for liberty, and, according to the measure of his capacity, and of his industry, is entitled to all the advantages which the state can bestow upon him. But liberty is restrained, and every real avenue to the enjoyments of life is obstructed. Every man suffers a sort of economical and political slavery. We find ourselves surrounded by rich men who have accumulated treasures, not conformably to order, but without labour or capacity, by marriage, inheritance, or by frequent dangerous and unlawful enterprises, not to mention many methods too abominable to be detailed. We likewise find the highest offices of the state every where in the hands of men who possess no sort of real merit, if we consider the qualities of their hearts, as well as of their understandings. On the other hand, we find directly the contrary, that is, persons of the finest capacity, and the most unwearied industry, to answer purposes of the highest utility, bowed down with insupportable labour, and not only obliged to spend their lives in the sweat of their brows, without enjoying the innocent superfluities, and even many of the necessities of life, but subjected to slavish servitude, under numberless monied tyrants: for it cannot be denied that many a man of the best heart, and most ardent activity for the welfare of the human race, is unceasingly oppressed beneath the painful yoke of an arrogant man in office, whom nothing but his wealth and his office authorises to show that indifference, contempt, and unmerciful insolence, which he showers down upon his inferiors, of his own species, and better men than himself. This is a melancholy spectacle; but we can turn our eyes to another still more melancholy by considering the condition of the marriage state, and seriously reflect how it is poisoned by an anti-matrimonial life in every part of Europe. Marriages are the real elements of nations, and every wedding represents in miniature the commencement of civil society. In every state we find a great number of marriageable men, who remain unmarried, and range about like robbers in society, contributing only to the promotion of anti-matrimonial life; and likewise a great number of women, destined, by their creation, for the happiness of man, entirely neglected by the state, and who pass their time in punishable indolence, many of them in the misery of licentiousness, without ever tasting the pure enjoyments of faithful wives and tender mothers. But this is not all. What do we discover, when we approach nearer, and reflect upon the present condition of marriage connections? Instead of being considered as they should be; as the strongest ties, as the true foundations of human society, we find them in general to be the most neglected of all, and viewed as the most unimportant and precarious of all engagements. It is a sure, though a melancholy fact, that marriages, like those of the present time, are the mere nurseries of a corrupt generation. Instead of that sincere friendship, which ought to be the soul of this union, we find nothing but indifference and dissimulation; instead of liberty compulsion; instead of tender love, cold disgust;—so that while many members of society live unmarried, or not conformably to regular order, and still more, in direct opposition to it, we may confidently foretell, without pretending to the spirit of prophecy, that the state approaches to its dissolution. Admirable as these fundamental truths may be, false religions and a false policy have concealed them in impenetrable darkness.

"Every thing is in the greatest disorder. Order would require that the culture of the animal kingdom should be considered as the first source of wealth and greatness to a state; the culture of the vegetable kingdom as the second, and that of the mineral kingdom as subordinate to both the others, and not, as it is at present, as the principal source of national power. Order would require too, that the production of raw materials in the three natural kingdoms should be respected as the noblest of employments in a state; that the working of them up, should hold the second rank, and that commerce, which derives its subsistence from the two others, should be in the third; instead of which commerce is now considered as the principal source of the public welfare and of its representative power. Order would require further, that the mass of money circulating in a country should represent the productions of industry, whereas at present it represents itself, that is the quantity of gold and silver, and not useful productions, in consequence of which foolish estimation of money, an extravagant circulation of paper money, far exceeding the real mass of gold and silver, has taken place, which is a mere chimera. Order would require that nothing but an activity useful to the public should furnish every individual with the means of growing rich, and not, that the welfare as well of nations as of individuals, should as at present be falsely grounded upon lotteries and chance, upon inheritance, wealthy marriages, gaming intrigues, and false speculations, &c. In a word, money is the representative of intrigue and of idleness, instead of being, as it should be, that of useful activity.

"Such is at present the corruption of civil liberty in all the European states; and we may draw from it the conclusion, that Europe is doomed to a terrible and lasting state of internal confusion. Its convulsions must be inexpressibly tragical and of long duration, seeing that vice and error have taken such deep root, that we may look forward whole centuries before they can be extirpated."

It is remarkable that the author of this extract wrote it before the French revolution. He went to the new English colony at Sierra-Leona, and there fell a victim to the climate. It will be acknowledged that he has very accurately given the causes of dissatisfaction, and motives which drive to emigrate from Europe many persons who are not in desperate pecuniary circumstances, and that he says many useful truths. In the sequel of this work he says, that in the last half of the present century a great religious liberty has begun to be spread over Europe, but that there is yet no prospect of true civil liberty; that religious liberty and civil liberty, bear in a state the same relation to each other, as the liberty of speech bears to that of action for an individual: that the religious liberty introduced into Europe, chiefly consists in a mere development of the powers of the understanding, and a liberty of the mind, connected with it, greater than ever before existed since the records of history; but that nevertheless civil liberty has not been restored, but on the contrary external slavery is evidently much greater now, than it ever was before.

CHAPTER VII.

Farming is not advisable, either to Europeans who wish to grow rich, or to persons of polished minds.

Such emigrants of some education and some property, whom an ardent desire for more civil liberty and happiness, and horror at the immoral condition of Europe, induce to abandon this quarter of the world, will not, in my opinion, by any means find their wished for better order of things in the United States of America—Religious liberty indeed exists there in the most extensive sense of the word; but it is very nearly as great in Germany. The liberty of following for a subsistence whatever business you understand, unrestrained by guilds, and the most extensive liberty of the press, are establishments which doubtless must correspond with their wishes. But they will find there again the monied aristocracy, at least in as high a degree as it could prevail in any part of Europe. The desire of wealth, and the veneration for it are certainly as great there as any where. Whoever is vain enough, not to be able to bear the luxury of the rich, because his fortune forbids him from displaying the same kind of glitter, will find himself still more mortified in America, where a yet higher value is set upon luxury of ostentation, than in Europe.

They are used to turn their views towards agriculture, and the enjoyment of the pleasures of a country life with an increasing capital. Their plan is to spend golden days of peace and liberty, in the enjoyment of rural pleasures, among enlightened neighbours. Cooper, by his book has spread still more these ideas abroad.—But Cooper himself has abandoned his farming projects in America, after he had made himself better acquainted with the true state of things. It is unfortunate, that people should write books, upon their first arrival, and afterwards observe a profound silence.

It can never come into the head of any European, who knows something of the country, to attempt an improvement of his estate by farming. Since the French war, lands have risen to their highest possible price, near Philadelphia an acre of bad land sells for sixty or seventy-five pounds Pennsylvania currency. Land holders have unanimously assured me it was impossible by farming, to obtain six per cent upon the capital employed. At Lancaster in like manner the price is fifty pounds and more, for an acre. To this must be added the dearth of labour, and that of horses, cows, farming utensils, in short, of every thing. Eighty dollars are paid for a bad horse, at least fifty for a cow, &c. American families, who work the farm themselves, without having to pay labourers, must have besides, an advantage.—This dearth is the consequence of a free exportation, and the bank-system. The worst of all, however, is the want of workmen, not because in general, there are so few people in America, but because they are in proportion to the population, crowded too much into the Sea-ports; because so many hands are employed in navigation, at the expence of agriculture, and because in general, every man, who finds it possible, prefers any other occupation, to that of tilling the ground.

Besides this, must be added, the insecurity of property, inasmuch as the seller was perhaps not the real owner; the latter, drives our friend of liberty, who came to seek in America, security for property, out of house and home, without making the least account of the poor European's American patriotism, and without paying him back a farthing of the expence he may have laid out upon the estate.

The neighbours of our polished emigrant, form the deepest and proper shade of the picture. If he resides among the Germans, he has the satisfaction of hearing himself reviled in Swabian German, as a "damn'd Hessian." Further, he will have as many law-suits as possible brought upon his shoulders, and will loose them all. An expedient against this is to pay the lawyers; but such is the faculty of these men for engulphing money, that they may properly be compared to a bottomless bucket; and it is neither wise nor delectable, to run one's self, for the sake of enriching lawyers.

Furthermore, his fruit gardens will be robbed; his fences torn down; nay, perhaps his cattle will be poisoned &c....For these descendants of Swabian and Palatine swine-heres, have, as it were an hereditary hatred, not against the nobility, of which they have only very obscure conceptions, but against every thing more civilly behaved, and better clad than themselves, and which they include under the denomination of gentlemen. This relaxation will probably be now and then an elegant ball, which they call a frolic, and where the ladies, barefooted dance jigs and reels, to the scraping of a discordant fiddle worked upon by a negro.

If he should escape unboxed, out of this ornamental dancing circles, he may esteem himself lucky. This emigrant, therefore, whose seach was for virtuous men, who came to live among a people equally free and enlightened, must renounce all social pleasures. Hunting might perhaps afford him some consolation; but in the most cultivated regions he may wander about a whole day after a partridge half as big as a German one, and unless he be remarkably skilful, must after all leave her unshot, for they fly like an arrow.

In New-England the people have much more of the human character; but they are for the most fanatics. Yet the most comfortable living would be among the New-Englanders. In the states, south of the Potowmack the planters, excepting perhaps the swine-feeders and pitch-boilers of North-Carolina, are better educated more polite and more hospitable than to the northward. But on the other hand the immorality there is excessive. There are among the wealthy, many pleasant families who live in elegance. But the people are devoted to gaming, drunkenness, gouging, (see above, an account of the gougers) &c.

The cruelties practiced upon the negroes, render those regions insupportable to men of feeling hearts. The relaxing, unhealthy climate which unites in itself the faults of Greenland and of the Libyan deserts, is a very discouraging circumstance to those who would settle here.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Western Territory, the best for farming projects;—But then Europe must be renounced forever.—Dissolute crew settled there—French colonies at Gallipolis, Kaskaskias, &c.

An European cannot be advised to go into Kentucky or the other western regions, however liberally nature has bestowed her blessings there, unless he is determined to renounce forever all connection with Europe. For after once making a purchase there, he can never get away again; it being very easy to lay out a considerable sum of money there, but extremely difficult to convert real estate again into cash. Another very important and disagreeable circumstance for a settler, is the vile set of people who swarm in that country: they may be called the worst among the bad. They are fellows, who by excursions against the Indians have habituated themselves to assassination and robbery. They are besides addicted to drink, and in the rage of drunkenness, often commit murders. It is dangerous to live among them.

But on the other hand these are the regions, the best adapted to farming projects. There is indeed a want of labourers, and if you carry any such there with you they run away; but in Kentucky, there are negro slaves, and the country is sufficiently inhabited, to afford some probability of recovering them if they run away. But when the negroes are well used they stay, and are better than white workmen. Amidst the majority of highwaymen who disgrace these western regions by their presence, there are many families of good morals, and habits of life, who constitute however a feeble minority and who came from the Atlantic states to settle there. They have been induced to remove by the offensive sight of the luxury displayed by worthless speculators, by the exclusively commercial principles of legislation, prevailing there, so unfavourable to the farmers, and by the nauseous view of an ulcerous moral corruption, constantly spreading further; and the Western Territory attracted them by the enchanting fascination of a milder air, a more fruitful soil, and a greater magnificence of nature, and discovered to them a blissful retreat, in the profound peace of rural happiness, heightened by the pleasures of nature in her beauty.

Many Europeans have settled in these parts, who were not persons of the lowest class. Thus for example, a number of Frenchmen have built a town called Gallipolis, upon the Ohio. It consists of about sixty log houses. Most of these emigrants are Parisians, and persons of good education. They too are victims of land speculations, and of the frauds of American speculators. For they had purchased their lands of one Duer at New-York, who became a bankrupt. His creditors seized his lands, and among them these which the Frenchmen had purchased. This happened while they were upon their voyage from Europe. Upon their arrival in America, they found that their capital was lost, and were obliged to hire a spot upon the lands which they themselves had bought, to build a sort of a town there, which is this same Gallipolis. Here they have employed themselves somewhat with gardening and with handicraft. They have planted vineyards, and may perhaps introduce there the cultivation of the vine. The situation of Gallipolis, on the lofty banks of the Ohio, is described as beautiful.

It is known that there are, on the Illinois, on the Wabash, at Post St. Vincent, and at Kaskaskias, old French settlements formed by Canadians in the time of Louis the XVth while those countries yet belonged to France. These Canadians are assimilated to the Indians by marriages, and lived with them very peaceably, until Americans settled among them, and by numerous murders provoked the Indians to make reprisals. The Indians have in general always lived in good understanding with the French; they could not do the same with the inhabitants of the United States, who deceive, annoy, and murder them as soon as they begin to settle in their neighbourhood. In almost all the wars, the Indians are first provoked, and the injured party. Their horror, and hatred mingled with contempt for the Americans, properly so called, whom they call "the long knife," is therefore as just as it is unbounded.

CHAPTER IX.

Stuart the traveller, and the Americans.

If therefore an European is willing to bury himself forever in Kentucky, or upon the Miami, the Wabash, &c. he may become a planter there. A huntsman too might gratify his taste, for a considerable length of time. He will find it easy to support mere animal life, but he must renounce all hope of finding society; and an enchanting patrichal life, is not to be expected, where vice prevails, where gougiers and horse stealers, murderers of Indians, and drunken handicraftsmen pass their lives. It would contribute much to the happiness of emigrants, if many European families should settle near together. But such a project is impracticable with Europeans at this day, when a segregating egotism makes an union of many for one object nearly impossible, unless this object be immediate gain, or some work of darkness. The Europeans do not think and feel sufficiently alike.

But, for an European to visit these parts as a traveller, is quite another thing; and may safely be recommended to every man of enterprize. Discoveries in the north west part of North-America, would in particular reward him with celebrity. It is astonishing that the Congress has not yet sent persons at the expense of the public, to make discoveries in the centre of the country. It is disgraceful to them, that the English government has executed such a plan, in their quarter of the world, while this Congress thinks of nothing but impost and excise. This government has the character of the nation. They are indifferent to whatever produces no immediate profit. Their measures have nothing noble in them. If the modern Israelites should found a republic, it would be like that of America.

This lethargic apathy of the Americans upon every subject but that of money making, was experienced by a Scotchman, who called himself Stuart the traveller. In the winter of 1796 he advertised continually, an entertainment under the comprehensive title of "Conversations upon the human mind." For every ticket of admission to this feast of reason, he demanded a dollar; and promised to deliver out four hundred tickets for each evening, provided so many should be paid for. His receipt would truly have been by no means contemptible. Do but consider; four hundred dollars for every evening, with the satisfaction besides of making others discourse for him; for as they were to be conversations, he contracted no engagement to speak alone. This was the ridiculous side of the affair; but Stuart had made extensive journeys on foot, in the internal parts of North America, and he might surely have talked of these, in his conversations. In his advertisement, he advised the Americans to raise their minds a little higher, and render them more analogous to the grandeur of nature in America. "Consider," said he "your stupendous mountains, and immense lakes." Now as we have hitherto no knowledge of stupendous mountains in North America, it might happen that he had discovered some. The originality of the idea, would at least have been worth a single dollar, to attend once at his conversations. In England they would have been crowded. But the Philadelphians were too much engrossed by the care of their bodies, to have much taste for conversations upon the mind. In general there is no people from whom the Americans differ more, than from the English; a circumstance which has indeed not yet been remarked, but which is altogether conformable to truth.

When Mr. Stuart found at length, that no inclination discovered itself to converse upon the human mind, he declared in the newspapers that the Philadelphians were the merest earthy animals that he had ever met with; not indeed in so many words; but he gave it very clearly to be understood; he added that he would go next and try his luck at New-York, and if he found the people there too, refuse to discourse with him upon the human mind, he would leave the United States, and excuse himself from all further esteem for their citizens, whatsoever. But I now return from this little digression to my subject again.

POLITICS.

[The following essay merits regard, and will cause some heads to meditate. It is the beginning of a short series which will appear in the Port Folio.]

ESSAY I.

NATURAL RIGHTS.

It is the fashion with all modern philosophers to lay down, as the basis of their systems, rights which they assert to have existed in a state of nature, before any societies were formed amongst mankind, and for the maintenance of which they pretend men entered into society; they tell us that such rights are inseparable from our nature, and can never be superseded by any institutions of the legislature. Upon these natural rights they build their pretensions to annul the most revered establishments of past times, and to overthrow at pleasure, governments that have been the work of ages, whenever the people can be brought to think fit to exert the authority that is inherent in them.

Surely it behoves us to examine carefully whether such rights did ever exist in a state of nature, before we allow the validity of them to invade every right which we claim in a state of society, and upon which depends every blessing we derive from the protection of law and government.

Now, I imagine, that if there ever was a proposition that was absolutely incontrovertible, it is, that in a state of perfect nature there can exist no right of any kind whatsoever. A state of nature, as considered previous to the institution of social connection, is exactly the state in which brute animals exist; and if you allow an instinctive assembling together in such a state, without law or controul over each other, like a herd of deer in a forest, it is all that can be allowed in a state of absolute nature.

Let me ask, then, what are the rights in such a state—rights, it seems, that are born with men, and are so inseparable from his very being, that he never can depart from them afterwards, or renounce them in any situation? If he has any rights in such a state, let him plead them against his fellow-brute, who is inclined to offer him violence, and he will soon perceive whether they are acknowledged to be valid. The truest definition of a state of nature, is a state, previous to the institution of rights; it is a state in which instinct and appetite have no controul, but such as they receive from the uncontrouled instinct and appetite of others. If this be the object to which our philosophers are aspiring in this enlightened age, I trust there is virtue enough left, and plain common sense, amongst the unenlightened, to counteract such a tendency, and to see through the fallacies of such dangerous innovators.

But, in fact, no such state has ever yet existed; it is a mere creature of the imagination; and it is whimsical enough to draw arguments for the subversion of every state in which man has existed from the beginning of the world, and in which alone he can exist to the end of it, out of a supposed state, which is so utterly incompatible with his existence. The long infancy, the wants and infirmities of man, render him dependent upon others, from the moment of his birth; and all his instincts and faculties that distinguish him from the beast of the field necessarily urge him to unite more or less under the bonds of society. Our common parents no sooner saw a progeny around them, dependent upon their care for their protection, than the origin of parental government was established. A colony of transported felons, cast upon an uninhabited island, would be exterminated by each other, if they did not agree upon some government and subordination for their mutual protection.

All the hordes of savages we have discovered are more or less formed into societies; and those who approach the nearest to a state of nature are, by far, the most wretched, as they are the most brutal, selfish, and unfeeling towards each other.

There are but two real pictures to be drawn from experience of the state of man in perfect independence of all controul. The one is a tyrant, who has got rid, at once, of the compunctions of his own conscience, and of the dread of his people. He lives, like every man, in a state of nature, possessing every opportunity of showing his disposition, by gratifying his appetites. The other instance is the patriot, who, like the tyrant, places himself beyond the reach of law, through his influence over the people, whom he misleads for his own purposes. He likewise is proof against the stings of remorse. In either instance the pictures bear the strongest resemblance to each other. Mad ambition, insensibility to the sufferings of others, injustice, violence, and rapine; blood, and cruelty fill up the measure of their despotic power, till it overflows; the excess of their iniquity arms the resentment of their country against them as a common enemy; and they fall buried under the ruins they have pulled upon their heads, by the destruction of every principle of security. It must be confessed, however, that the cruelties of Nero, and the proscriptions of a Triumvirate, fall far short of the honors and extensive persecutions which have been practised under the auspices of the advocates for the Rights of Man.

Half the disputes that men engage in, with most heat and animosity, arise, it is said, from not agreeing, in the outset, upon the precise sense of words. Perhaps an accurate definition of terms in dispute would convince the parties that they are nearly, if not entirely, of the same opinion; or, perhaps, that they are both engaging in a discussion of what neither of them perfectly understands.

It is this reflection that induces me, at a time when political controversy is carried on with so much fervour, not only in pamphlets, but in clubs and tavern meetings, as well as private societies, to endeavour to ascertain the meaning of some popular expressions, that are the most frequently sounded, and the least frequently examined, though they carry with them a sort of magic influence upon the imaginations of the hearers. Whether they produce the same sensations in the minds of those who use them, the conscience of these demagogues can alone determine. Amongst these sound words, "the Rights of Man," and "the natural indefeasible rights," seem to claim the pre-eminence, not only as they begin from the beginning, but as they appear to have the greatest weight with the proselytes to the new doctrines.

MISCELLANY.

Extracts from letters of an American Gentleman in Europe, to the Editor of the Philadelphia Gazette.

GLASGOW, AUGUST 26.

Glasgow is a considerable town, bearing the appearance of a great stir of business, and a thronged population. It is rapidly advancing in manufactures, and consequently, commercial importance. The old town bears but a small proportion compared with the buildings erected within the last 20 or 30 years. The modern houses are built in a style of superior elegance. There is one whole street, the houses of which consist of wrought stone, each about 50 feet front, with columns from the basement story, and pediments after the best Grecian and Italian models.

The cotton manufactories have done wonders for this place. I was this morning admitted to examine one of the largest of these establishments, the property of a Mr. Patterson. The impelling force of their machinery is derived from a stream, which is capable of working thirty-two thousand mule-spindles, and gives employment to 700 people. To behold this vast congregation of machinery all at one time in operation, is a sublime spectacle, calculated to excite the most exalted ideas of the powers of human invention.

EDINBURGH.

In proceeding from Hull, we were induced by a wish to see the celebrated Iron Bridge over the river Wier, to take Sunderland in our course. On its first opening to our view, the sight was at once a matter of astonishment and delight. Its immense arch, its light construction, and extraordinary height from the water, gave it the appearance of a bridge hanging in the air. The arch is 236 feet in the clear, and the under side of the crown 160 feet from the water. Three large barges, with all their masts up, were lying under it at the time. At Edinburgh we were gratified by many objects of magnificence and curiosity. The change of scenery, which is different from every other city in the world, the immense height of the houses, which are all of stone, and appear as you rise the hill to be built one upon the other with their gable ends to the streets, would lead us to suppose that we were in another world. The street where we are, exhibits a range of houses three quarters of a mile in length, with uniform fronts of brown stone in the most elegant style of workmanship, having rustic casements and areas, and palisades in front. The pavements are laid with flag-stones, about twelve feet wide. It is as handsome a street as any London can produce.

The castle at this place is a very ancient fortress. Every part of it is in a high state of preservation, and kept in excellent order.—The 42d Highland regiment are now quartered here. This is the regiment who did themselves so much honour in Egypt, by destroying Bonaparte's Invincible Legion, and capturing their colours. They are indeed a fine shewy set of soldiers.

We next made an excursion through Holyrood house, formerly the place of the kings of Scotland, and of the unfortunate queen Mary. Here is a long gallery of paintings of the hundred and ten kings of Scotland, from the foundation of monarchy to the last of the Stuarts. We were shewn the drawing room and bed chamber, occupied by queen Mary, with all the original furniture as she brought it from France. We were also in the room where queen Mary and her favourite Rizzio were at supper, when Darnly and his companions broke in and stabbed Rizzio, in her presence. There are stains remaining on the floor, said to be of Rizzio's blood.—At present this gorgeous palace is occupied by the Duc d'Artois, brother to the late king of France. It is said the English court allows him 120000l. a year. He is held in high estimation throughout Edinburgh, for his conciliating and correct deportment.

The ladies of Edinburgh have fine healthy complexions, but are not remarkable for elegance of person or the display of taste in their dress. They are extremely modest, domestic, easy in their manners, affable, intelligent—and an uncommon proportion of them possess highly cultivated minds, and are extensively acquainted with literature.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

PUBLICANS DANCES.

ARCHER V. WELLINGRACE.

This was a qui tam action brought by the plaintiff, who is a common Informer, to recover the penalty of 100l. from the defendant, who is a publican, for having public dances in his house, without a licence from four magistrates, as the act of the 25th of George II. requires.

Mr. Park, on behalf of the plaintiff, said, he could not point out in more forcible language the evils arising from those tumultuous receptacles of persons of all descriptions, than by reading the preamble of the act, upon which the present penalty was sued for. This preamble stated every kind of immorality and vice as likely to proceed from the temptation such houses held out to the lower classes to run into expenses they could not afford, and into irregularities that would lead them to ruin.

A great number of witnesses, summoned on the part of the plaintiff, proved that the defendant was proprietor of the public house, called the Coach and Horses, in Holborn, opposite the George and Blue Boar; that there were dances there every Monday and Friday, when any gentleman could obtain admission with a lady, on paying eighteen pence; the money was generally paid to one Clerk, who was door-keeper and fiddler. The defendant, who was the landlord, only interfered in selling liquor and refreshments.

The witnesses, who were persons, that had frequented the house for the purpose of dancing, all agreed that every thing was conducted there with the greatest regularity and decorum, and without any disturbances; but they differed most materially in this point; the male witnesses all insisted that most of the women, who frequented the house, were immodest, and that there was but little decency among them. The female witnesses, on the other hand, insisted that they were very modest and very decent.

Mr. Garrow, on the part of the defendant, endeavoured to shew that Clerk was a dancing master, and that this room was his school, but in this attempt he did not succeed.

Lord Ellenborough told the jury that the fact being clearly proved, that the defendant had, without such licence as required by law, established public dances in his house, he as judge, and they as jurymen were but instruments of the law, and bound by the law to declare that he had forfeited the penalty, named in the act of parliament, on which this action was brought.—Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 100l.

BIOGRAPHY.

[The lives of the ancients, as we find them in the Dauphin, and Dutch editions of the classics, have not much to interest the "elegant formam spectator," the accomplished gazer at beautiful models. The biography of the Romans, when exhibited by the dull diligence of a Dutchman, presents little more, than a meagre assemblage of names and dates. On an article, thus composed, the most eager attention will hardly dwell a moment; and when, for relief, we repair to Biography, expressed in the phrase of the middle, or the modern Latinity, our taste is offended, though curiosity may be gratified. From all offensive stains the following life of Persius, written by the learned Drummond is perfectly pure; and, what renders it still more valuable, the subject of it was not only studious, and wise, but affectionate and good. Gifford truly says that his life may be contemplated with unabated pleasure. The virtue he recommends, he practised in the fullest extent; and, at an age, when few have acquired a determinate character, left behind him an established reputation for genius, learning, and worth. Drummond laments that an early and untimely death, should have prevented this Poet from giving a more finished appearance to his works. His short day was so truly glorious, that it must ever be lamented it was closed so soon.]

Above all, the fate of Persius must have been mourned by the friendly Cornutus. It was his bosom, which had first received and cherished the neglected plant—it was his hand, which had long fostered it, with such fond and assiduous culture—it was his arm, which had already warded off a thousand dangers. Alas! the flower had just put forth its leaves in full blossom to the morning sun, when the day overcast, and this promised pride of the garden perished—by the relentless storm.]

THE LIFE OF PERSIUS.

AULUS PERSIUS FLACCUS, according to the fragment ascribed to Probus, was born on the day before the Nones of December, in the consulship of Fabius Persicus, and Lucius Vitellius; and died in that of Rubrius Marius, and Asinius Gallus, on the eighth of the Kalends of December. But as there were only twenty-eight years between these two consulships, the author of the fragment is afterwards guilty of a glaring mistake, in stating that Persius died at thirty years of age.

Persius was born at Volaterræ in Etruria. He was of the equestrian order, and was allied to some of the noblest families of Rome. The author of the fragment says, his father died when Persius was scarcely six years old. But the account given by our Poet himself, seems to contradict this assertion.

Sæpe oculos memini tangebam parvus olivo,
Grandia si nollent morituri verba Catonis
Discere, ab insano multum laudanda magistro,
Quæ pater adductis sudans audiret amicis.
Jure etenim id summum, quid dexter senio ferret,
Scire erat in votis, damnosæ canicula quantum
Raderet, &c.

What, could a child, not six years of age, have occasioned his father a sweating, because he could not repeat Cato's dying speech? And was this same infant, who was to have publicly recited the dying words of the Roman patriot, in the habit of playing at hazard, and of making calculations of chances?

Persius studied at Volaterræ, till he was twelve years of age. After that period, he was under the tuition of two masters at Rome, one of whom was a grammarian, and the other a rhetorician. The author of the fragment says, Persius did not become the pupil of Cornutus, till he had reached his sixteenth year. But our Poet tells us, his acquaintance with Cornutus did not commence till after he had taken the virile gown:

Cum primum pavido custos mihi purpura cessit—
Now the age at which the prætexta was laid aside, was seventeen years.

Among the number of friends and companions of Persius, were the poets Lucan and Bassus. The latter is mentioned with respect by Quintilian.

The author of the fragment says, sero cognovit (nempe Persius) Senecam, sed non ut caperetur ejus ingenio. By this I can only understand, that Persius could never relish the pompous eloquence, and declamatory style of Seneca. It is impossible that he should not have admired the talents, and respected the virtues of that philosopher, who was also a Stoic.

Persius was a person of the mildest manners, remarkable for the beauty of his form, and for the modesty of his appearance. His piety was exemplary, in discharging the relative duties of his situation. When he died he left a sum of money, together with his books, to Cornutus. The philosopher accepted the books, and delivered the money to the sisters of his pupil.

It appears that Persius wrote seldom and slowly. He forms one of the few examples of a young man, during the course of a short life, having acquired immortality for his name by his virtues, his talents, and his learning. His satires were much valued by his contemporaries. The poet Lucan particularly admired them. He is said to have died of a stomach complaint.

LEVITY.

[We extract the following, not merely because it is a humorous example of a power to puzzle, but because it has a close resemblance to the perplexed idiom of our Genevise calculator, and of our Attorney General of the United States.]

THE ART OF BOTHERING.

(FROM A LONDON PAPER.)

MR. EDITOR,

As it too frequently happens that, by an over-zeal to give minute directions, we bewilder those who execute our commissions, I enclose you a curious order, verbatim, as it was sent to a tradesman by a farmers' wife, for a scarlet cardinal,

"If you please to send me a scarlet cardinal, let it be full yard long, and let it be full, it is for a large woman, they tell me I may have a large one and a handsome one for eleven shillings, I should not be willing to give more than twelve, but if you have any as long, either duffel or cloth, if it is cheaper I should like to have it, for I am not to give more than twelve shillings, I beg you, sir, to be so good as not to fail me this cardinal on Wednesday, without fail, let it be full yard long,

I beg, or else it will not do, fail not on Wednesday, and by so doing you will oblige

"M. WINNS.

"P. S. I hope you will charge your lowest price, and if you please not to send a duffel one, but cloth, full yard long and full, and please to send it to Mr. Field's, the waterman, who comes to the Beehive at Queenhithe, pray don't send me a duffel one, but cloth, I have altered my mind, I should not like it duffel but cloth, let it be full yard long and let it be cloth, and not more than twelve shillings at most, one of the cheapest you have and full yard long, send two, both of a length, and both large ones, full yard long, both of a price, they be both for one woman, they must be exactly alike, for goodness and price, fail them not on Wednesday, and full yard long."

FESTOON OF FASHION.

....."Here, if a poet
Shin'd in description, he might show it.
Tell how the moon beam trembling falls,
And tips with silver all the walls,
Venetian walls, Palladian doors
Grotesque roofs, and stuccoed floors.
But let it in a word be said,
The Moon was up, and Cure abed."

[The following is from an opposition paper; but while we dislike the political sarcasms, we can applaud the ingenuity of the describer of the

"Topsy dance and Jollity."

SUBSCRIPTION MASQUERADE AT MARTINDALE'S.

A grand Masked Ball was given at Martindale's, in Bond-street, on Friday night, under the patronage of the club. It was one of the series of fetes in honor of the peace, which have added so much to the brilliancy of the present month. In happiness and harmony, the entertainment corresponded with the cause; but, in point of expence, it was completely upon a war establishment. It cost about 4000l: nothing that could give brilliancy to the scene was neglected. In addition to the extensive accommodations of the house, a temporary building was erected for the ball-room. It was nearly three hundred feet long by sixty feet in breadth, and fitted up in imitation of a green-house. Twenty-two waggon-loads of lilac and other shrubs were appropriated to this purpose; and the walls were trellis-work, with roses and other flowers of the finest quality in great abundance. An elegant room was set apart for the Prince of Wales, hung with festoons, supported by flying Cupids, Sylphs, Angels, &c. Finely contrasted with the lightness and brilliancy of this apartment was another adjoining, fitted up as a cavern, the ceiling of which was of shell work, resembling a grotto. The company began to assemble between eleven and twelve o'clock, and consisted entirely of masks in character or fancy dresses, to the complete exclusion of dominos. The number of tickets being limited, and disposed of only with the approbation of a committee, chosen by the club, consisting of the Marquis Headfort, the Earl of Besborough, and Lord Ossulstone: the company were of the first rank and fashion. It is of course superfluous to observe, that the enjoyment of the night was conducted with all the delicacy and decorum of the most refined manners, enlivened with all the combined effect of wit, taste, sentiment, and fancy, exerted to the utmost stretch, and devoted to the pleasure of pleasing. The Prince of Wales looked admirably in a highland dress; the Marquis of Lorn, Lord Villiers, and Captain Maitland, also, assumed the plaid with advantage, the last, particularly, the splendor of whose dress bespoke him the head of a Highland clan. Lady Charlotte Campbell, looked divinely in the character of Mrs. Ford, in The Merry Wives of Windsor; but, singularly enough, there was no Falstaff, on whom the fire of her eye might operate as a burning glass. Lord Nelson was in a Spanish Costume: this was not the first time he dressed the Spaniard well.

Lord Ossulstone, Mr. Skeffington, the hon. Berkeley Paget, Lord and Lady Yarmouth, Mr. Lumley Saville, Mr. Cassamajor, the three Ladies Bennett, Mr. Gosling, Mr. B. Simpson, Lady Warburton, Miss Croxton, and Lord Courtney, were also of the same nation. Among the isolated characters, Lord Valentia was a Grey Monk: the beautiful Mrs. Gardiner, a Quaker; Lady Hamilton, a Pilgrim; Captain Carter, a Servant in Livery; Sir John Riddell, a Courtier; Mr. Moore, a Tailor; Mr. Dennison, a Pilgrim; Earl of Besborough, a Monk; Miss Milner, as Miss De Camb, in Of Age To-Morrow; Mrs. Theellusson, a female beauty, in extreme fashion; Mr. Paul Methuen, one of Dr. Ollapod's recruits, in excellent discipline; Colonel Ponsonby, a Jew; Mr. Lambton, Cardinal Wolsey; Mr. W. Bagot, an old English Baron; Mr. S. Turner, and Mr. Heneage, Conjurors; Mr. Smith Owen, King John; Mr. Knight, Faulconbridge; Mr. Lloyd, Hamlet; Mr. G. Cowper, a Rustic; Miss Sober, in the character of Night, a very merry night, if we may judge from her dancing. Mr. T. Wynne, in an old dress coat, from the wardrobe of the late Lord Fauconberg; Major Eustace, a good Jew; Earl of Landaff, a Pilgrim; Sir William D'Arley, a Poisoner; Mr. Roach, a Witch; Mr. Thornhill, an Old Woman; Hon. J. McDonald, Sylvester Duggerwood; Lord Mountjoy, an Old Woman; Mr. R. Jenner, a Friar; Col. Armstrong, Lord Foppington, one of the best characters in the room; Mr. W. Lloyd, an Alderman; Sir Sidney Smith, an Egyptian; Mrs. Sober, a Nun; Sir Edward Ryan, a Hussar; Sir J. Wrottesley, a Countryman; Mr. Wall, Mother Cole, with a Male Young Lady; Major Locke, a Roman; Mrs. Wood, a Gipsy; Sir J. Coghill, a Turk; the Miss Cramers, Sultanas. In the rank of those who astonished by their whimsicality and eccentric humour was Mr. M. A. Taylor, in a dress composed entirely of Morning Posts, of course extremely entertaining and eagerly sought after by the fashionable world. The hon. Miss Moore, a Soldier's Wife, with a child in her arms, returning from the campaign, and Colonel Montague Matthew, a Wet Nurse, of Brobdignag, fresh from the straw, and wanted to take a child from the month. The Duchess of Devonshire, the Marchioness of Salisbury, Lady Harriet Cavendish, Lady Milner, Madame Recamier, Madame Barnard, the Countess of Harrington, Lady A. M. Stanhope, the Marchioness of Headfort, Lady M. Taylor, the Countess of Besborough, Mrs. Fitzherbert, the Miss Courtneys, Miss Lewis, and Mrs. Orby Hunter, were all in splendid fancy dresses. Lady Caroline Wrottesley, was also in a fancy dress of great taste and elegance. About four o'clock in the morning a masque of extraordinary attraction entered the room: it was a caricature upon the subject of the fete; the satire of which was forgotten in the ingenuity of the device. It was John Bull bending beneath an enormous basket upon his back; yet delighted with his burden, consisting of the three favourite subjects of the day, Union, Peace, and Plenty, all personified, the figures being kept in motion by a curious mechanical process, so as to be a perfect imitation of life. They were thus ironically represented, Union, by his coat half green half blue, his nose and chin having completely joined issue, and the head surmounted by an enormous pair of horns; Peace, a female Billingsgate, with a mob cap, a black eye, ready to return the compliment on any of the company, and a glass of gin; and Plenty, the figure of Mr. Pitt, as the starved Apothecary in Romeo and Juliet, with the motto, "My poverty and not my will consents."

It was allowed to be one of the best masks ever seen, and was imputed to many. We understand Mr. Walsh Porter, was the real representative. The Banditti who were to occupy the cavern adjoining the Prince's apartment, were to have performed an interlude for the amusement of their Royal neighbours; but the curiosity of the company defeated the plan, as they forced into the cavern, and took possession before his Royal Highness arrived. Among the banditti were Lord Headfort, Lord Ossulstone, Lord Cravan, two Mr. Manners, Mr. W. Porter, Mr. Carlton, Mr. P. Andrews, Mr. Concannon, &c. The five supper rooms were lighted up by chandeliers. The supper consisted of every delicacy, green peas, &c. Wines of the first quality in profusion, consisting of champagne, burgundy, claret, &c. The desert—cherries, strawberries, &c. The Duke of York's band played during the night at the foot of the stairs. The whole concluded about 7 o'clock, with the exception of one groupe that stayed until noon.

READING ROOM.

[Mr. Caritat, bookseller at New-York, has recently began an establishment intended as a sort of Literary Lounge for the studious, and the inquisitive. His literary assembly seems well filled with excellent company, and we wish that it may prove not only useful and pleasant to the public, but profitable to its projector.

LITERARY ASSEMBLY....Mr. Caritat's exertions to establish a room in which gentlemen who have a taste for literary subjects might associate, merit decided countenance and support. Though the inhabitants of New-York are much engrossed by commercial and professional avocations, yet there are some leisure moments which they might devote to other pursuits. The establishment of a literary coffee-room, in which strangers might meet those gentlemen with whose names and characters they are acquainted, is an object which, if effected, would be highly honorable to the city. For this purpose, it is not sufficient for gentlemen to give their subscriptions: their personal attention is also requisite.

The apartment appropriated to this use is provided with a judicious collection of the latest and most valuable publications; but it should also be understood that, at particular hours, when the hurry of business is over, the subscribers will frequent the room for the purpose rather of exchanging ideas by conversation, than of seeking entertainment or instruction in the perusal of books.

Such places of literary resort are not uncommon in Europe; but in this country a stranger has few opportunities of seeing the inhabitants collected, except for the purposes of eating, or for the transaction of business. The attempt to introduce an arrangement of this kind has been made with spirit; but is allowed to languish through the inattention of the gentlemen who have honored Mr. Caritat's subscription-list with their names.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

To counteract the views of the Jacobins, who strive annually to infect the minds of miscellaneous readers, with the poison of false politics, communicated in a book, published by the noted R. Philips, and called the "Spirit of the Public Journals," an ingenious publication has lately appeared in London from the pupils of the Oldschool called "The Spirit of Anti Jacobinism."

This is a duodecimo volume, consisting of essays in prose and verse, partly original, and partly collected from the daily, and other publications. These essays, some of which have very great merit, are for the most part of a political nature, and all have the recommendation of loyalty. The following is the Editor's Preface.

Superadded to the desire of rescuing from oblivion many pieces of merit, which appear in the fugitive publications of the day, the Editor of this volume has another object in view;—to provide an antidote for the poison, which has, for some time, been annually circulated under the title of "The Spirit of the Public Journals;"—a work apparently intended to corrupt the morals, and vitiate the taste of its readers.

But the principal part of the Spirit of Anti Jacobinism will ever consist of ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS, which some of the first poets and prose writers of the present day have engaged to supply. The Editor feels it necessary to caution the Public against the hasty adoption of an erroneous idea, which, though founded exclusively on the title of the book, great pains have been taken to encourage; namely, that this is merely a political and party publication. It is no such thing; political discussions will ever constitute a portion of its contents, but certainly not with a view to the support of any Party. It will contain Essays, Letters, Dissertations, and Poems, on subjects religious, moral, scientific, and literary.—In short, as JACOBINISM has demolition for its object, and depravity for its means; so is the object of ANTI-JACOBINISM preservation, and its means purity. Thus, while the votaries of the former seek, by poisoning every source of information and amusement, to deprave the taste, corrupt the morals, and to eradicate all religious principles from the mind, so destroying the cement which binds not merely man to man, but the creature to the CREATOR, for the attainment of its end;—the followers of the latter should labour to keep the channels of instruction pure and uncontaminated, to preserve the taste from pollution, and the mind from corruption, by providing it with such wholesome food as may at once afford pleasure and supply nourishment, fortifying it in its own good dispositions and strengthening it against the attacks of its most malignant, most inveterate, and most dangerous enemy.

JACOBINISM, then, is not merely a political, but an anti-social monster, which, in pursuit of its prey, alternately employs fraud and force. It first seduces by its arts, then subdues by its arms. For the accomplishment of its object it leaves no means unemployed which the deep malevolence of its native sagacity can devise. It pervades every department of literature and insinuates itself into every branch of science. Corruption is its food, profligacy its recreation, and demolition the motive of its actions, and the business of its life.—This "foul fiend" flourished both in France and Germany, long before it received its present appellation. Its hideous features may be plainly discovered, and will be easily recognized, in the multifarious works, profound and superficial, serious and comic, historical and scientific, in the poetry and prose, of the numerous philosophers who deluged both countries with their publications, during the latter half of the last century. Its perseverance is only to be equalled by its deformity, and its activity only to be exceeded by its malice. And, at no period, were its progress and its influence more to be dreaded, for reasons too obvious to require specification, than at the present. Consequently never were the efforts of ANTI-JACOBINISM more necessary to check that progress and to counteract that influence. To this object and to this end, will the vigilance and care of the Editor of the Spirit of Anti-Jacobinism be invariably directed; most anxious to preserve the religious and civil establishments of his country; with the character of his countrymen for purity of taste, depth of knowledge, correctness of judgment, and integrity of mind;—but most averse from the prostitution of talent to the mere purposes of party, or the support of political disputations, which have not a superior object in view.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

The following is a desperate effort at a pun. "Had Mr. Bullock set up for Ox ford, there is very little doubt but he would have met a friendly reception." [Morn. Post]

The Morning Post, of London, like gentle Dulness, sometimes loves a joke. "Mrs. Gibbs, and Mrs. H. Johnstone, being both in the straw, neither of them is of course to be found at the Hay-market.

Mr. Pitt has been recommended to the Bath waters; but he says wine agrees best with his constitution. [Ibid.]

Had General Vial been sent as Ambassador to this country, we could have fitted the French by sending them the Earl of Cork. [Ibid.]

The preparations making by the court of Spain, for the journey of the royal family, will cost, it is said, several millions. Upwards of four hundred carriages filled with the paraphernalia of the court were dispatched from Madrid the beginning of August. The feasts which are to take place at Barcelona, will recal by their taste and magnificence, the sports and tournaments of the ancient kings of Castile and Leon.

The Baronet, who is the subject of the following sneer, had the misfortune, sometime since, to be prosecuted for crim con, with Mrs. Dunnage. "Sir Thomas Turton intends giving a grand ball to the ladies of Southwark, by way of securing his election, and he proposes opening it with the dance to the tune of "Petticoats loose."

Sir Thomas Turton was strongly urged to call himself Sir Thomas Turtle, and set up for the city.

Bonaparte's election necessarily makes much noise, as the citizens of the department of the Roe are decidedly in his favour.

The post-office has been lately puzzled by a letter addressed to "Sir, All you read, Clerk." It has been at length determined, after much decyphering analysis, to belong to Sir ALURED CLARKE. [Morn. Post.]

The place in which George Rose took his unfortunate dip, has since been called Rose Water.

The Chronicle, no longer dares to repeat, with all its hardihood, that Mr. Pickering is a public defaulter. The tale of plunder so often told and so infamously persisted in, is now added to the long list of detected falsehoods. But who invented and propagated the slander? Who attempted to prolong its influence by the sanction of a report?

But, in the present extremity, something must be resorted to to fill up the chasm made by the ample and complete exposure of old lies. They have become unprofitable even to the cause of democracy, strange as it may appear; and as the invention has become lame, the difference of opinion between Mr. Pickering and the late President Adams, is brought forward with a view to create distrust in the qualifications of Mr. Pickering.

Mr. Jefferson has told us, that "every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle." Will not this silence the Chronicle? Common sense can decide without the authority of names, that differences of opinion may, and do often exist between men pursuing the same objects, without casting the shadow of reproach upon the integrity of either party, and if there is one serious thinking man in Essex who doubts whether Mr. Pickering is a whit the less worthy of his zealous support and confidence for such reasons, let him remember that so sharp was the contention between Barnabas and Paul, that they parted, and then ask himself if he can, on this account, distrust the virtue or goodness of either. [Palladium.]

Old poetry often exhibits sterling sense; and quaintness of expression does not, in the following curious lines injure the truth of the sentiment.

PARALLEL

BETWEEN BOWLING AND PREFERMENT.

Found in one of the Manuscripts in the British Museum.

"Preferment, like a game at bowles
To feed our hope hath diverse play:
Here quick it runs, there soft it rolls;
The betters make and shew the way
On upper ground, so great allies
Do many cast on their desire;
Some up are thrust, and force to rise,
When those are stopt that would aspire.

"Some whose heat and zeal exceed,
Thrive well by rubbe that curb their haste,
And some that languish in their speed
Are cherished by some favoured blaste;
Some rest in others' cutting out
The same by whom themselves are made;
Some fetch a compass far about,
And secretly the mark invade.

"Some get by knocks, and so advance
Their fortune by a boisterous aime;
And some who have the sweetest chance,
Their enemies bit, and win the game.
The fairest casts are those that owe
No thanks to fortune's giddy sway;
Such honest men good bowlers are,
Whose own true bias cuts the way."

The following is slightly altered from a British publication. The Federalist will determine whether it be well or ill applied.

Great TOM and B-RR, in dark divan,
At Washington were met;
Diamond cut Diamond was the word,
Each spread his wily net.

Each bow'd, and in most friendly guise
Be citizen'd the other;
And, giving the fraternal hug,
Call'd him his loving brother.

Each had his views, and strove to catch
The other in his gin;
Bold THOMAS wanted to get up,
Sly AARON to get in.

In his "minds' eye," B-RR was to TOM
"Ambition's towering ladder,"
And AARON meant, as a balloon,
To use this mob-blown bladder.

'Twas thus, deceiving and deceiv'd,
They made a coalition,
Each vowing, when he'd gain'd his ends
The other's sure perdition.

A few days since a gentleman in Shropshire observed two sailors very busy in lifting an Ass over the wall of a pound, where it was confined. On asking the reason, the tars, with true humanity and in character, made the following reply: Why, looksee, master, we saw this here animal a ground without victuals, d'y'e see, and so my messmate and I agreed to cut his cable and give him his liberty, because we have known, before now, what it is, to be at short allowance. [London Paper.]

The members of the corporation of New-York, we understand, are divided in their opinions respecting the plans which have been laid before them for the erection of a new City-Hall. That of Dr. Smith has excited general attention, and is thus defined to us by the author. It is left for public inspection at Mr. D. Longworth's, the Shakspeare Gallery, near the Theatre:

"It is in the form of an ellipsis, having a colonnade in the centre, in which are introduced the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders, with correspondent pilastres and wings, presenting a front of 300 feet, 63 feet in height, exclusive of the dome, commanding by an easy ascent a view of the city, the harbour, and the adjacent country; and the ornaments are such as can be executed in America.

"The dome being 145 feet from the ground, and having a large and higher object than a cupola, would give an air of grandeur and opulence, serve as a landmark to pilots for the safety of commerce by day, and at night facilitate the safe approach to the city, by means of a large lanthorn hung in the centre.

Suppose that a Federalist of direct views, and an independent mind should reluctantly submit to expose himself, at this time, to the dubious chance of an election, might he not thus soliloquize.

"I have so far acquiesced in a nomination, as not publicly and positively to decline it. My motives to the obtaining of a seat in Congress are certainly not those of personal ease, comfort, or interest. Most, even of the most sanguine and adventurous Federalists behold a choice in its true colours, and shrink from it, as from a burden. But I am prepared. If the Federal cause fail, I will submit with a good grace. I will thank the voters for me, for their good opinion, and the voters against me, for relieving me from a station for which I have no desire. If it succeed, I shall go to my post, as a slave to the galleys, with the resolution to act, as my conscience shall dictate, and the expectation of being treated eventually by my constituents as so many, in every republic, have been treated before me.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Votary of Hoyle," who, without many errors in orthography, has copied some novel laws of a favourite game from the "Sportsman's Magazine," might exclaim, could he remember the elegant couplets of the moral Bard,

O the dear pleasures of the velvet plain!
The painted tablets, dealt and dealt again,

but let him beware of

Spots quadrangular, of diamond form,
Ensanguin'd hearts, clubs, typical of strife,
And spades, the emblems of untimely graves.

The Editor is exhorted to "write poetry," by one of his correspondents. Alas! the rhyming powers are unpropitious. It is long since the Editor tasted a drop of Helicon.

Nec fonte labra prolui Caballino,
Nec in bicipiti somniasse Parnasso
Memini, ut repente sic Poeta prodirem.

The remarks of a correspondent upon the alarming increase of emigration to the United States deserve the most serious consideration. If "acquitted felons" continue to be poured upon us: if this land is to be considered as the Botany Bay of England, we shall soon have occasion for the makers of manacles.

The forge in fetters only is employed,
Our iron mines exhausted and destroy'd
In shackles; for these villains scarce allow Goads for the teams, and plough shares for the plough.

We shall be greatly obliged, if gentlemen will favour us, occasionally, with files of the London papers. The Editor at his literary bank, will repay the obligation with usury.

Our correspondents are requested to address their favours as usual. The pestilence which rageth at noon day, has grievously checked, but has not entirely arrested our business. Kindness is never more useful, than in the season of calamity.

Will Weathercock verifies his title. He is one of those, who go out into the market place, for an opinion; and, instead of consulting Truth and Conscience, consults the "rascal rabble."

How goes the mob? for that's a mighty thing,
When the King's trump, the mob are for the King.

Our subscribers at Savannah will notify us early if they wish to take the next volume of the Port Folio.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ALLITERATION.

The driest truths in fiction's garb when drest,
Steal on the ear and win the willing breast;
With fresh delight we read the thrice told tale,
Or hear the muse at wayworn follies rail.
Such are the charms in poetry we find,
To soothe the sorrows of the wounded mind;
At her sweet voice, the tear forgets to flow,
The Miser's bosom almost learns to glow,
The tortur'd wretch half ceases to complain,
And smiles, whilst vengeance shews the rack in vain.

Yet, whilst we own the power of verse divine,
And for the Poet's brow the wreath entwine,
We see with sorrow half her empire lost,
Her ends perverted and her meaning crost
By bold intruders, who in every age,
Assume her mark and venture on the stage;
Then false conceits their glittering tinsel shew,
And ranting rage contends with weeping woe.
Alliteration proudly rears her head,
And o'er the labour'd page her art is spread;
R's P's and Q's in every corner rise
And strike with ravishment our gazing eyes,
Yet, whilst we praise a science so profound,
We grieve that sense is sacrific'd to sound.

Are rural scenes the subject of the song,
The glittering stream must glide the glades along;
The homely hamlet rear its humble head,
And swallows swiftly sweep to gain the shed:
No lark must dare to mount the clear blue sky,
Because Alliteration is not nigh;
But chattering chaffinches may cheer the day,
Or roving red breasts run from spray to spray,
Or bulls may bellow, or a stag may stalk,
But for his life must not presume to walk,
For then to jingle there were no pretence,
And sound would quite be sacrific'd to sense;
In short, if they agree, 'tis well—if not,
Keep sound in view and let sense be forgot.

But if Alliteration's power is seen
To deck the meadows with a gayer green,
And adds new charms to cheer the darksome grove,
How much the more when winds unlicens'd rove;
When gloomy tempests wrap in clouds the sky,
And screaming sea fowls tell the storm is nigh,
Then with delight she shews her utmost power,
And leaves the bubbling brook and beauteous bower,
The shattering waves then shake the shelving shore,
And rending rocks re-echo to the roar.
The foaming froth bedecks the billows' brow,
And mourning mariners make many a vow,
Whilst livid lightnings shoot with glittering glare,
And ten fold horrors haunt the angry air.

Thus sings Alliteration—and her theme
To some, the height of poetry may seem;
Yet may we hope this taste at length will fail,
And common sense take up the pleasing tale;
Then shall Alliteration have less power,
Yet not be banish'd quite the muse's bower,
Since still her art may have the power to please,
If well employ'd, and introduc'd with ease.

ODE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE PERSIAN OF HAFEZ.

BY JOHN NOTT, ESQ.

The cup of the tulip with wine is replete,
Come, my boy, let thy office begin;

How many more scruples and doubts must we meet?
To be longer severe were a sin*.

Break instantly forth from this pride and this scorn!
For what more can old time wish to know?
It saw, mighty Cæsar, thy proud tresses shorn,
And thy diadem, Cyrus, laid low†.

Be wise; for the sweet bird of morning is found
Gaily drunken with love and desire!‡
Be watchful; for lo! that deep sleep spreads around,
Which shall last till the world must expire!

How graceful thou movest, thy shape how divine!
O thou plant of the spring's early bloom!||
May beauty's fresh blossoms uninjur'd be thine,
May'st thou 'scape the rude winter's cold tomb!

'Tis wrong in the bright beams of fortune to play,
On her favour too much to rely:
Alas! and alas! that the wisest will say,
"I am safe, and my mischiefs defy!"

With Eden's blest nymphs†† we to-morrow shall be,
Deeply drinking of Kuther's‡‡ pure stream:
To day mortal wine, and the hand maid we'll see
Whose fair lustre outshines the moon's beam.

The gale of the morn bids the morn of our youth
Yet once more richly glow on the mind:
Boy, bring us that balm which our senses will sooth,
Bring that balm which to sorrow is kind.

O, cease with delight to survey the proud rose,
Whose soft leaves must too soon feel decay;
For ah! the dark wind, which so churlishly blows,
At our feet all its honours shall lay!

* In this ode, much praised by Sir William Jones, as well for its superior beauty, as for the purity of its dialect, the Poet seems to address the hypocritical bigot—"Be not ostentatiously religious; for, in spite of all your severity, and abstinence from wine, death will at last subdue you, as he has subdued the most exalted characters history can boast."

† The Cyrus, or Ki Kosru, mentioned in this stanza, who in Persian is simply called Ki—the Monarch, was the third king of the Kaianian family: he was esteemed among the Asiatics as the very pattern of military glory.

‡ "Follow"—says Hafez—"the example of the nightingale, who, in the fair season, loves its darling rose even to intoxication."—Similar to this is the following distich, from a fable which must be familiar to every Persian learner. "The nightingale, if he see the rose, becomes intoxicated; he lets go from his hands the reins of prudence."

PERSIAN GRAMMAR.

|| In my opinion, there is a singular elegance and propriety in this paraphrase for his youthful cupbearer, who not only has a resemblance to the blossom of spring, from his tender charms, but also from his motion which is full of grace, like a flower gently waving in the air.

 The mutability of Fortune, is one of those subjects, which comes home to the bosom of every man—Hafez speaks of it so often, and so pointedly, that I am led to draw some comparison between him and the plaintive, the tender Petrarch—Alike they experienced the short lived joys of prosperity, and the bitterness of distress: they were both learned, both polite: they were both born with elegant desires, both were perhaps favourites with the fair: and they were alike protected by great men, whom they at once courted and despised.

†† The Houris, or black eyed nymphs, (for such is the meaning of the word Houri in Arabic) of more than mortal beauty, who are imagined to inhabit the promised Paradise, and with enjoyment of whose charms the faithful Mussulmans are to be rewarded.

‡‡ Kuther, or Cauther is a name given to the 109th chapter of the Koran, which, we read, was sent from heaven to Mahomet, to make him amend for the reproaches of his enemies. But it is commonly understood, by good Mussulmans, to be a river of the eighth heaven, the shores of which are pure gold, and its sand more fragrant than musk—its waters are white as milk, of that pure quality that whoever drinks of them is never to thirst more. The mystic interpreters of the prophet's law, make this river the symbol of the divine communication with the deity, which, they say, render us indifferent to those sublunary researches, that have their origin in ignorance.

The goblet then fill from the flask's purple store,
Unto HATEM of generous fame!*
But ne'er let us open the black volumes more,
That enrolls the mean niggard's poor name.

The wine which adorns the syringa† with red,
Does its nature so sweetly impart;
That quick from the cheek, where its glow was first bred,
The warm current flows on to the heart.

The garden's brisk songsters now pour their full throats:
Hark! methinks 'tis the dulcimer's strain!
'Tis the lute, 'tis the harp that now swell their clear notes,
'Tis the pipe that enlivens the plain—

Mid these sweets bring thy couch; for ready as slaves,
In the customs of service well tried,
Behold, where the cypress its head humbly waves,
And the reed has its vest duly tied.

From Rom,‡ and from Rei, the high fame of thy
song
Far as China, and Egypt is flown:
To HAFEZ such wond'rous enchantments belong,
He is honour'd wherever he's known.

His character was held in such high esteem, that, when the Arabians wished to praise any one for his virtues, they always called him HATEM TAJ. He lived before the Mahomedan era; but his son Adi became a Mussulman in the seventh year of the Hegira. Among several other instances of his liberality, it is related that he more than once killed forty camels, to feast his neighbours and the poor wandering Arabs. An ambassador of rank was once sent to him by the Greek Emperor, to purchase a very valuable horse which he had, Hatem, who knew of his arrival but not his business, and having nothing to entertain his guest with, from the extreme scarcity which then prevailed, had actually killed that very horse, precious as he was, to supply his table with food.

CHAPTER X.

Land speculations—Banking—Foreign trade; may all be carried on by foreigners.

After an emigrant has recovered from his projects of farming, he will certainly turn his eyes towards commerce, and soon find, that as, according to the common proverb we must howl, when among wolves, so when among Americans, we must speculate. If he has any taste at all, it will be impossible that shop keeping should suit it; and he will remark that the detail traders unless they import their own goods, only labour for the wholesale dealers. He will find three great paths of business open to him, which he may deliberate upon, and choose among them. First, land speculations; secondly, usury or money banking; and thirdly, import and export trade. The time for land speculations is past, inasmuch as at the end of the year 1796, all lands had reached their highest possible prices, and must fall again. I have no occasion here to observe that this price always bears a proportion to that of wheat, and of other productions. At the breaking out of the French war, when produce rose very rapidly in price, and when America by her neutrality obtained the carrying trade of West Indian produce, all which immediately drew floods of money from Europe to the United States, was the true point of time for land speculations. From that time until late in the year 1796, the price of lands has been constantly rising. The greatest American land usurers have notwithstanding, found themselves very much mistaken in their reckoning; for they expected the political convulsions of Europe, would produce emigrations of whole nations to America. This however has not happened; and the American speculators with their many millions of acres of purchased lands, are left in the lurch. They have no money left, and their land is without value.

The American speculators have besides, their mysteries, and have formed among themselves a junto, so that a mere layman, not initiated into the mysteries of this junto, could make very little progress. The art of cheating with lands must be learnt. An emigrant therefore cannot be well practiced in it, until he has resided there a certain length of time. Besides which, a certain innate address is required to excel in it. He will therefore in most cases do better, not to meddle with it at all; especially at this time, when the favourable period is past, and will probably not return again.

The discount business, or usury, offers itself to the emigrant as the second mode of improving his finances. Specie is so scarce that at the end of the year 1796, five per cent. by the month were given for it. He may entrust his cash to the money brokers, or discount with it himself. It is a rule never to discount any other than small notes or bills, because in a given number, there are always some, that are never paid; but the profits upon the others are so large, that they make such a loss unimportant. Care must be taken likewise, to discount none but indorsed notes. In this trade, which can be of little general utility, money may be collected; but not great treasures, nor even any considerable sums.

What the French call "commerce sur la place," that is purchases and sales made on the spot itself, may be very profitable to a person of a speculating genius. Thus for instance at the beginning of winter, muslins, or summer stuffs may be purchased at public auctions very cheap, and sold again in the spring, with a profit of twenty-five per cent. and the like in other cases.

The import and export trade, by which a man is in some measure useful to two countries at once, that is, to the country where the goods are manufactured, which as I should expect from all German emigrants would be Germany, and also to America, provided the objects imported should be useful articles, is then after all, what may be advised as most expedient for an emigrant of some property. He must however have studied the market before he undertakes it, and the market in America, changes every year.

On account of this instability of the market, it is advisable for an emigrant, when he goes to America, rather to take money with him, and no goods, unless he have a very good correspondent there; and the best coin he can take will be good guineas of full weight. He would indeed thus lose the expenses of his sea voyage, which are not inconsiderable, and also those of the first six months residence in one of the sea ports of the United States. But he who insists upon losing nothing often loses all. He would at least thus obtain the advantage of making himself sufficiently acquainted with the nature of the market. He might then send to Germany for goods, and fetch them not from the German sea ports, but directly from the manufactures. If however he chooses at first to carry goods with him from Germany, he will do well to apply for them to a known commercial house; but not to obscure traders of the third or fourth class, with whom there is much more danger of being cheated, and who have seldom good correspondents in America.

The bills of lading must be directed to himself and not to any merchant in America, who if they were, might dispose of the goods. Upon his arrival in America, he will do very well not to give his goods in commission, but to hire an house where he can store them. He may then advertise them in the newspapers, and not be over hasty to sell them, for the first essay of commercial fraud, which he will have to withstand, will be the statement of false prices, and attempts to debase the value of his goods. This is one branch of the little shop keeping policy. He may deposit at the custom house a sufficient quantity of his goods to serve as security for the payment of the impost upon all that he has imported. For a merchant already known has credit at the custom house for six months; but a stranger, as may be supposed, has not.

If he deposits money at the bank, he receives no receipt for it, but it is noted in the books of the bank, and he may command it, whenever he pleases.

In all these commercial occupations, it is necessary to reside in the sea ports, even to speculate in lands. In North-America, the sea ports are the centre of all wealth and all power. In these sea ports you live among mere shop keepers, excepting perhaps the adventurers from Europe, who give a little more variety to the insipid uniformity of the scene.

In a series of years, thus spent, wealth may indeed be acquired; but is it really worth one's while to vegetate away a great part of one's life, for such an object?

Whoever wishes to visit the United States, merely as a traveller, should be warned, that he must so order his purse as to reckon upon a weekly expense of at least twelve dollars, without taking into the account his expenses of travelling, or of removal from one place to another, and without including any disbursements for cloathing.

CHAPTER XI.

The Sea voyage.—Enormous expense of it.—The Steerage.—Nautical remarks.

It is not indifferent for an emigrant to read something concerning the voyage to America, seeing that this passage is not one of the most unimportant scenes of the whole drama. We shall first say something of its expense. Among the Americans, nothing is cheap, and their ship captains require large payment. On my first voyage, the price for a cabin passenger was twenty guineas, without reckoning coffee, sugar, strong liquors, wine, poultry, &c. On my second voyage it had risen to thirty guineas, for which however the captain, was obliged to provide those articles. Consider the cost of such a voyage for a whole family. In the steerage, a passenger pays ten or twelve guineas for his passage, and has the common sailor's fare. This steerage, is a part of the ship, between the captain's cabin, and the hold, where the sailors are sheltered. The passengers in the steerage are not however secure against the detestable company of these sea monsters; and therefore a decent family, especially if consisting in any part of females, must be reduced to the extremest indigence to acquiesce in this unbecoming, and excessively disagreeable way of crossing the Atlantic. The passengers in the steerage, are besides, exposed to the thefts of the sailors, the most thievish race of beings under the sun, as also to the coarse vulgarities of the captain, and the steerman, and lastly, they travel in company with that sort of rabble, and those vagabonds, who go to sell themselves in America.

I have not indeed been round the world with captain Cook; but as I have crossed four times the Atlantic, without reckoning several smaller voyages in Europe, I must know tolerably well what the ordinary occurrences of a sea voyage are. I do indeed regret that I cannot here entertain my readers with a couple of ship wrecks at my expense. I can tell them to be sure of three very severe storms and of four water spouts; and I once ran a ground upon the coast of Holland. We got afloat again however, before the ship had gone to pieces: it was not even damaged. The Americans are good practical navigators, but their ship captains have in general no mathematical or astronomical knowledge. They know not how to take the longitude by celestial observations. They go merely by what the English call, "dead reckoning." They heave the log every two hours, to find out how many English miles the ship sails in an hour, and that is all. They do not consider that the ship may vary twenty times the rapidity of its progress, in the course of two hours, and thus alter the length of the log-line. This would nevertheless be easy for them, inasmuch as the nautical books contain rules for the rectification of the log. But all this is not sufficient. In the English ships of war, they throw the log every half hour, and an officer is constantly observing the variations in the sailing of the ship. But in the trading vessels, at least in those of America, they throw it very carelessly every two hours.

In the voyages between America and Europe, the sailing is always from east to west, or from west to east: and the longitude may thus be ascertained sufficiently without observations of the moon, or of the satellites of Jupiter; but for East-India voyages it will not answer. Most of the American captains who go to the East-Indies, know therefore how to make those observations, which the others do not. On my last voyage the captain believed himself to be thirteen degrees distant from the British channel, but not being quite sure of his reckoning, threw the lead, and found soundings at sixty fathoms; that is, we were already at the mouth of the channel. And this captain was otherwise a skilful and active mariner. The danger in this case is, of running aground in the night, under the mistaken opinion of being yet distant from land.

Another very unpleasant circumstance is the bad steering. On board of merchant vessels, the sailors, however ignorant, take their place at the helm by turns. Now a ship is like a cannon, which if pointed but a single line to the right or left, bears wide from the mark. By bad steering, and by vibrating to and fro, from one point of the compass to another, the voyage is very much lengthened. Ships going from one quarter of the world, ought to sail upon the largest circle, and vary from it as little as possible.

In consequence of such bad steering, I was upon my last voyage twice witness to a very dangerous circumstance; that of the ship's falling behind the wind. In such cases the masts are very easily carried away, or the ship itself, pressed down at the stern until she sinks.

It is astonishing to think, how in sea voyages, one's life is every moment exposed; and generally by the fault of the mariners. Another danger, arises from sudden squalls, which very soon overset a ship under full sail. The Americans are very bold, and generally carry as much sail as possible. I have seen the ship on board of which I was, during such squalls, lay entirely upon her side; but she righted again, upon the captain's taking the helm, and bringing the vessel round before the wind.

The American sea captains are often very young, and many of them are pretty gentlemen. I performed two of my voyages to America with a Scotchman, who was directly the opposite of a pretty gentleman; but a good seaman. No man exceeded him, in braving the elements. During a tremendous storm, when he saw that no human power could avail any thing against it, and that the ship must be abandoned entirely to her destiny, he turned in and snored it away.

Most persons who never saw the sea, can have no conception of the uncomfortable circumstances of a sea voyage. Among which, sea sickness is the first. The cause of this singular distemper is not yet sufficiently known. I believe it is occasioned solely by the motion of the ship, which throws the blood into an homogeneous vibration. This unnatural motion hinders the digestion; and hence the stomach casts up again all that it receives. This vibrating motion of the blood likewise obstructs generally all the faculties of the body, and hence the incredible aversion against all motion. It is easy to judge, and experience teaches that this violent agitation of the blood clears away many obstructions from the body; especially as the disease often occasions two opposite kinds of secretion at once. The best treatment of this distemper, as far as my experience teaches, is to lay in an horizontal position as long as it lasts, and take nothing at all against it. It is folly to counteract the beneficent purposes of nature, and the consequences of this disease are beneficial. Walking about, and eating, which the sea captains always recommend, give no relief, and are a real torment.

That the motion of the ship occasions the sickness is clear, from the circumstance that you are twice subject to it; first in the North Sea, and then in the Ocean, where the motion of the water is altogether different. The ship is indeed to those on board, a second body. You feel every one of its motions. Hence the sea captains who speak English, personify their ships, and ascribe to them the feminine gender, though otherwise in the English language, all inanimate things, are neutral. "She is a beautiful creature," say the sea captains, when they look with delighted eyes towards a well built vessel.

The bad smells on board ship, do not produce sea sickness; but they are very disagreeable. The seamen perfectly disregard them. Under the bed places of the passengers, they stow away cheese, meat, which frequently is stinking meat, &c. This, for delicate persons, is not one of the smallest inconveniences at sea.

The table, is in perfect unison with all this. Among the Americans, at least those who sail from Hamburg for America, it is really very monotonous, and to say the least, far from being nicely selected. Always salt or smoked meat; once in a while a half famished fowl dead of disease; scarcely any vegetables except potatoes, &c. and all this, prepared by the worst sailor in the ship, whom they always employ as cook. It is well known to have been long a common proverb among the English sailors, that "the Lord provides food, but the devil cooks it." The favourite beverage is brandy and water, with which in Germany hogs are fed, and which they call grog. You have indeed besides, a little porter, and very bad wine, and for all this, must pay thirty guineas! Add to this, the unremitted noise which you hear every night over your head, so that a person upon his first voyage, must think the ship all the time, in the greatest danger; further, incessant curses and blasphemies in an inharmonious language; and finally the cruelties which one must witness, practiced by the captain and the steerman against the sailors, and against the wretched German fugitives who are going to be sold in America. All these things make the ship an abode, uncommonly resembling the ideas which we have of hell. The American sailors are flogged much more severely, than ever the soldiers were formerly in armies where the most rigorous discipline prevailed. The law, to be sure prohibits it, but of the law, no notice is taken. The sailors are indeed in general such a depraved class of men, that they can be kept under the rein only by the fear of punishment. I have also seen a captain nearly starve to death his sailors and the German slaves which he was carrying to America. He gave them only a biscuit and an half a man, by the day, so that they crept about the ship like corpses.

Other travellers have remarked before me, that during sea sickness, and in general at the beginning of a sea voyage, home sickness, is common. The traveller repents his determination to expose himself to so many dangers and inconveniences. He becomes excessively dejected, and longs for the flesh pots of Egypt again.

A voyage to America is among the most tedious of all voyages. The winds are almost always westerly, and of course adverse to ships sailing thither. It takes not much more time to go to the Cape of Good Hope, though much more distant. But hence on the other hand, the voyage from America to Europe, is the more quickly performed. The usual passages to America, take from sixty to ninety days; those to come back from thirty to sixty.

CHAPTER XII.

Vincit amor patriæ.

The object of an emigrant, as such, is to better his condition. Oppressions of every kind induce the poorest and meanest of all the inhabitants of Germany, to exchange that country which is unjust towards them, for North America or even for Russia or Hungary. These are not to blame; but there is another class of persons in good circumstances, who are no less ungrateful to their mother country, than the arbitrary and selfish governments of some oppressed German states, are to the unhappy tillers of the ground; who despising Germany, remove to foreign lands, where, seeing themselves disappointed in their expectation of finding things better than at home, they repent their rashness, to which nothing but shame at the failure of their undertaking, or the loss of their property, can chain them down.

To these I address myself in this chapter; not to the artist insufficiently rewarded in his own country, (such as Gluck, Gretry, Handel, Haydn, Angelica Kaufmann, the painter Hackert, Madame Mara, &c. &c.) who delights England, Italy or France by his talents; nor to the man of letters, contemned by ungerman Gothic governments, who by his discoveries in the abstract sciences, adds new refulgence to the light, spread over the most cultivated nations of Europe.* Nor do I speak, to the speculating merchant or the observing traveller; but those Germans, whose heads are heated by romantic ideas of foreign excellence, and who inspired by Anglomania, Gallomania, or Americomania, despise and desert their country, shall be now the objects of my animadversions.

This partiality for what is foreign, itself arises from a great irritability of imagination, which paints in too lively colours the distant objects, and which is a characteristic feature of the German nation so ridiculously cried down by the French, as a phlegmatic people. It is consequently an amiable failing, which foreigners at least out of gratitude ought to judge with tenderness, and which even has its foundation in a mental perfection. For this imagination, moderated and corrected by experience gives rise no longer to errors of conduct, but to master pieces of genius.

The love of geography, a science, in which by the confession of all nations, the German people excel all others, may likewise be a primary motive for the emigrating passion of polished Germans. But the German must look back upon his native land with true complacency when he perceives how well it can stand a comparison with others. The climate of Germany is less cold than the countries in the same latitude, to the east, and less damp, than those under the same parallel to the west. How highly favoured in respect to climate must Germany be; since it produces further to the northward than any other country, wines, which the English, the Hollanders and other foreigners prefer to the finest wines of France.

* Such as Herschel, Euler, &c. and Winckelmann, whose labours, though not devoted to the abstract sciences, taught Italy to discern and to appreciate the master pieces of ancient art.

But Germany is, in winter covered with snow and ice. I answer, this is the case, only in hard winters, which extend over the greatest part of Europe: does not the northern part of Italy itself often smart under the rigour of the cold? did not frost extend further south than Rome, in the years 1740, and 1789? and do not the inhabitants of those countries in such cases suffer from it, by so much the more, as being unprepared for it, they possess fewer means of defence against it. I wish not by any means to depreciate the natural charms of the three southern peninsulas of Europe; Spain, Italy and Greece; but the preference which the French and English give to their countries over Germany, can be founded only in egotism, and in the geographical ignorance of those nations. For the winter, which drives you from Germany, you will find again in those countries; but you will not find in an equal degree the fertility of the soil, or an equal proportion of good land to the bad, of which there is probably more there than in Germany; notwithstanding the Lunenburg heaths, the sands of Brandenburg, and other barren districts.

For, according to the opinion of the English geographer Guthrie, Germany would surpass every other European country in fertility, if the cultivation of the earth, were not, as he thinks in an inferior degree of perfection. He draws this conclusion from the proportionably low prices, and the abundance of provisions; a circumstance which must excite admiration; considering that Germany, is always the scene of action for enormous armies, in every European war, and that in peace it maintains more soldiers than any other country in our quarter of the world. Germany, says the same geographer, produces as many excellent fruits as Italy. Here then is the judgment of an Englishman, concerning a country, which many of its own inhabitants ungratefully despise; and it deserves the more attention, as proceeding from a nation, accustomed to undervalue every thing, in comparison with their island.

For healthiness of climate, and for variety of productions, in the three natural kingdoms, Germany is certainly inferior to no region of the earth. Yet, what avail all the natural advantages, to the happiness of man, if he must forego the sweets of love, of friendship and of society with polished and sympathising individuals? if he cannot enjoy the flowers, which an universally disseminated cultivation of the mind strew in the path of life? It is a characteristic feature of the sensuality of our times, to allow more importance to mere physical advantages, than to the intellectual enjoyments of the mind and heart. Internal delight is disregarded; external gratifications exclusively occupy us; and hence that overweening love of riches, which is the ruling passion of the present generation.

But how should a German expect to enjoy, out of his country, those pleasures, which arise from agreeable connections with his fellow creatures. in greater perfection than within it? For every man is homogeneous chiefly with his countrymen, and similarity, not so much of principles as of inclination is the connecting link of minds. Hence, I am inclined to believe that sympathetic love, such for instance, as Rousseau has drawn in his Julia, can take place only between persons of the same nation. Several powerfully operating causes concur to occasion heterogeneity between nations; and among them, the language is probably the greatest, inasmuch as the whole system of ideas is closely connected with it; and this organizes, not only the minds, but as no operation remains without effect, even the physical constitution in analogy with itself. Hence the influence of great writers upon the moral and physical improvement of a nation. Who can calculate the effects, which Addison, and others have disseminated by works of general utility?

Whence comes the uneasiness and melancholy which the traveller for the first time in foreign countries feels, but from the sentiment of heterogeneity towards every thing around him? Who has not upon his arrival in foreign cities remarked in himself a certain obscurity of conception, which does not clear up until a longer residence has made him homogeneous with the inhabitants.

A German may therefore expect with more probability to find in his own country a wife, and a friend suitable to himself, than in any foreign land. Moore, the Englishman, says in his travels, that the German fair, have a more placid look, than English, Italian or French women: here is another judgment of an impartial foreigner (for who is there, partial in favour of Germany?) which is the more flattering, as it appears to have been extorted by the charms of the objects themselves.

As there is less luxury prevailing among the German women, than among the fair sex of trading nations, this is another motive for a German to choose from his own nation a partaker of the sufferings and joys of his life. And, if a German is more likely to find domestic happiness in his own, than in a foreign country, Germany is likewise rich in romantic regions, where he can enjoy it, heightened by the pleasures of a country life. The beautiful banks of the Elbe, of the Saale, of the Weser, of the Mayn, and of the Rhine, exhibit to the wandering eye, the image of exuberant fertility, and their landscapes inspire the poet and the painter, with the master pieces of art. Here, surrounded by a pure and temperate air, you behold emerald meadows, obscure forests, golden wheat fields, smiling vineyards, rocks, and magnificent streams intermixed with enchanting variety, while distant cities glitter in the glowing splendour of a noon-tide sun.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Result.

My conclusion, with respect to the several classes of emigrants who go to America to spend their days, is this. The lower, and poorer these emigrants were in Europe, the more they will find their lot improved in America; but I speak not of mere poverty; for meanness of education must be combined with this indigence. Whoever has been bred to the coarsest daily labour, which is the basis of subsistence to every society; whoever has grown up, under the oppression and contempt in which this lowest gradation of society is unjustly indeed held, may emigrate to America, where the want of competition, gives an higher value to these labourers than in Europe, and where this class of men, can by labour raise themselves from a state of absolute nullity to a certain degree of independence, and of existence as citizens. A man possessed of mental endowments will probably sooner succeed in Europe than in America, where such abilities are in no esteem. A merchant may make great profits there, but still greater losses, if he has not studied the peculiarities of that trade. He will be swallowed up in the convulsions of those commercial earthquakes which America periodically suffers, if a too ardent thirst for gain prevents him from withdrawing in time, from the trade. But least of all is America the country for a farmer of education and property, who wishes to realize their projects of agriculture. Every thing is adverse to this; the dearth of labour; the scarcity of workmen; their bad quality; the dearth of cattle and of farming utensils; the want of cloathing, &c. and above all, the bad neighbourhood.

ESSAY II.

LIBERTY AND SLAVERY.

There being no such thing as rights in a state of nature, the next object of our inquiry is to know what are the rights which we acquire by entering into society.

Nobody would be presumed to give up his natural liberty of doing what he pleases, if it were not in exchange for a happier existence. Whilst he is in a state of perfect independence, it so happens that he is dependent upon every thing that surrounds him. He is at war with the elements—with the beasts of the forest—but, above all, with his own species.* If he seeks shelter in a cave, which he is to dispute with its savage proprietor, he is liable to be torn out of it by the first man who finds him in it, and who is stronger than he. His food he acquires with difficulties and hardships incredible, and eats in fear and trembling, lest it should be taken from him. Nothing is his own. His life is in perpetual danger, whilst his precarious existence depends upon the fraud or violence of every thing that approaches him; and his mental faculties, that should aid his individual and corporeal weakness, are uncultivated, and neglected for want of communication with his fellow-creatures.

If man, therefore, could have existed during the shortest period under such misery, he would soon have renounced a liberty so fatal to his happiness, the moment experience had taught him the benefit of union with others, though in the rudest elements of civil society. The enemy that one man was not equal to subdue, three might easily overcome; but then an agreement must take place amongst them, that the spoil should be fairly divided, or the two, who defrauded the third, would, in future, have no confidence in each other, and the common benefit could not be renewed upon another occasion. The laws of equity are so beneficial, and so obvious, that in some degree they force themselves upon us, whether we will or no; and there is no savage insensible to them, however interest may tempt him to violate the sense of justice in particular instances.

Establish once the principle, and there is deduced from it a string of corollaries which extend themselves wider and wider, till they form the most perfect institutions of human government.

The great object, then, of civil society, is to procure to us security in our persons and property.

It is proved then, that there can be no rights in a state of nature previous to the institution of society, and it may, with equal certainty, be demonstrated, that no liberty, properly speaking, could exist in such a state; for what is slavery, but the depending upon the will and passions of those more powerful than ourselves; and enjoying neither property nor security, but by the precarious tenure of arbitrary power? This must be the case where the law of the strongest is the only law, and is equally the case, whether in a state of despotic tyranny, or of natural, unconnected independence.

In the institution of society there is really no sacrifice made of natural liberty; for previous to the formation of society, a state of liberty cannot exist. Civil liberty is acquired into society, together with civil rights, by a convention which gives the protection of the whole community to every individual who is received into it.

What, then, is the object of civil society?—the acquisition of liberty—and what is liberty, but the protection of the individual against arbitrary power? that is, the secure enjoyment of every thing he possesses under the laws established by his society.

Liberty, therefore, and rights, are acquired, and not innate; they spring out of the conventions of

* Ferguson on Civil Society (a book on such hypothesis is totally false) says, that in a state of nature "the sight of a fellow-creature is the signal for slaughter, or for flight." EDITOR.

civil society, and must, consequently, be forever subject to the modifications of particular governments. All that can be said is, that the purposes of civil society are best answered in those governments where the public happiness is the best secured, whatever be their form or constitutions, which, according to circumstances, must eternally vary:—

"For modes of government let fools contest,
The best administer'd is surely best."

The most free of all governments would be that of a despotic authority in the hands of an Angel sent from Heaven to controul us, provided it were also administered by Angels.

It is, therefore, not essential to liberty that free-men must necessarily be governed by the elected representatives of the majesty of the people; by what forms it is actually administered; in whose hands the springs of it are trusted; or what are the elements that compose it. A Monarchy may be free, whilst a Republic may be a tyranny. A government, which has framed itself by experience, though reconcilable to no theory, may be more free than the wisest system of democratic maxims, written in letters of brass, as a Constitution. The true test of liberty is in the practical enjoyment of protection. Where the same laws extend to all the subjects of different denominations; where there is no dispensing power; where the poorest claims obtain redress against the strongest; where his person and property are secure from every insult within the limits assigned to him by the known laws of his country;—that nation is free. Under whatever form of government property is insecure, law uncertain and arbitrary, and the person liable to insult without proof of guilt, that country is in a state of slavery.—But if there be a spot upon the face of the globe, where, under the pretence of public convenience—nay, even of the public safety, whole classes of the community may be proscribed, their property confiscated, their persons pointed out as objects of popular fury; where, under the very eye of the Legislature, arbitrary imprisonment to an unlimited extent, rapine and massacre, prevail as a system of government—where terror dictates those laws which refined cruelty enforces—where the good citizen trembles in secret, whilst the murderer displays in public, day after day, the bloody trophies of his guilt—if there be any where such a country (to the disgrace of human nature) it is not enough to say they know not liberty—that they are in abject slavery to the vilest tyrants—we should say they were a people divested of every principle of reason, as well as virtue, and as devoid of the sentiments of honour, as of the feelings of humanity.

THOMAS PAINE'S EPISTLES, TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

A hoary drunkard, with each vice imbued,
Malignant, without wit, and without passion, lewd.
Country Gaz. U. S. Nov. 30th, 1802.

THE EXAMINER, No. I.

The question is often asked; why do the federal printers and Editors, so frequently notice the return of Thomas Paine to this country, and why is he made the subject of so many paragraphs and essays in our public journals? The answer is easy. Thomas Paine returned to the United States, "after an absence of almost fifteen years," in consequence of an invitation, sent by a public envoy, from Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States. In this view alone, should the arrival of this man, in this country be deemed important. As to any letters, he may write from Lovell's hotel or any other hotel, they can be of no consequence to the people of America. The government newspapers, are, however, striving hard to bring his letters into notice; they even undertake to vindicate his character; and it would be a pity to divert them, from so pleasing a task. Thomas Paine, his character and his writings are prolific themes for jacobinic eulogy. He is, notwithstanding his hatred of titles, the prince of jacobins, and therefore entitled to the homage of the whole sect.

There was a time when the people of America were infatuated with the low buffoonery of Thomas Paine. By the people, I would be understood to mean, the mob. This was at the breaking out of what is called, the American revolution. When the French revolution commenced, Paine, then in England, wrote two low comedies, which he called, first and second parts of the "rights of man." In his first epistle from Lovell's hotel, he tells the people, that the pamphlet "rights of man," was occasioned by a furious attack from the pensioned-pen of Edmund Burke, which brought him once more on the public theatre of politics. "It had the greatest run, of any work in the English language," not excepting, he should have said, Pilgrim's Progress, or Robinson Crusoe itself. These comedies took mightily with the pit and gallery, but the company in the boxes, hissed so incessantly, that the pieces were never acted, more than one season, and being once fairly off the stage, can never be revived with any chance of credit or profit, to the author or manager. These plays were also acted in America, by Jefferson's* company. But as Paine, the author has not informed the people, what run they had here; I think fit to do it for him.

It will be well remembered by numbers of people, in the United States, that the first copy of the first part of the "rights of man," was sent by the author to Jefferson, the manager, and that he gave this copy to Samuel H. Smith, the present Editor of the government newspaper called National Intelligencer, published at Washington. The manager, when he furnished the copy, wrote a sort of billet doux, to the printer, in which he congratulates him upon the early receipt of this new piece, from Europe; and informs him of his having obtained special permission from the author, to have it acted here; he goes on in a strain of lively anticipation, as to its success; expresses his hopes that certain political heresies, which had lately sprung up among us, would be speedily banished the country, and that our citizens would flock in crowds to the theatre to see the first representation of the piece, on American boards; or to use his own words; that "our citizens would rally once more round the standard of Common Sense."—Such were the auspices, under which the comedy "Rights of Man," was ushered upon the American stage.

It is true, that the fondest hopes of the author, and the most sanguine anticipations of the manager, were, for a season, completely realized. The piece had a surprising run. It was acted, rehearsed and acted again, by the strolling company under manager Jefferson, all over the country, during the spring and summer of 1791. The applause it received, was not here, as in Europe, confined to pit and gallery, for many of the company's friends, who were able to pay for box tickets, used to applaud as loudly as any in the sky-loft. This however did not last long, for a critic no sooner appeared, in the Boston Centinel, under the signature of Publicola, and in a masterly review of the whole piece, exposed its shallowness, its absurdity, its fallacy and the corruption of its moral, than the tide of success began to turn against it. Some faint hisses were first heard from the boxes, which however were stifled by the vociferation and clamour, which still parted from the pit and gallery; but after a few more representations, the boxes ceased to applaud, altogether; the pit became languid, but the gallery, for the most part, adhered to their favourite farce. Ex uno, disce omnes. This has been the fate of all Paine's comedies, from Common

* Not Jefferson of the New-York theatre; but Thomas Jefferson, who then had a company of strolling actors, under his management.

Sense down to his familiar epistles from Lovell's hotel. They take exceedingly with the gallery wherever they are acted—that is, with the vulgar; but men of education universally despise and hiss them.

But why did manager Jefferson, invite author Paine to come back to America? What use can he make of him here, any more, than when he was abroad? These inquiries are often made, and as I am not in the secrets of the green-room, I am unable to give a satisfactory answer. I indulge my own conjecture, however, on this head, and after some reflection it has occurred to me, that since the defection of J. T. Callender, the company's playwright, and manager's scribe, Paine is wanted to supply his place. This conjecture is strengthened by the fact, that Paine had been scarcely ten days in the United States before he began to write his familiar epistles to the people. Whoever has read these epistles, must have instantly recognized the spirit of the old dramatist Thomas Paine. It is what the French call unique; or as we should say in English, unmixed and unadulterated. It is, like all the rest of his effusions, extremely palatable to the vulgar. Some people however have been heard to say, that the author's prologue is so full of, I by myself I, that the public have little or no chance of participating in the entertainment.

The winter campaign is already announced in the Aurora of the 4th instant, as on the eve of being opened; but the "recreations" are expected to be very few, "excepting the performances of the great actors on the Capitol-hill." "On this theatre however, though there may be some spouting; it is not expected that the acting will be so much in the true comic and tragi-comic style as in former seasons; so many of the low comedy characters and mock heroes have forfeited their engagements, by mistaking the taste of the audience; that nothing is expected but a little sentimental comedy, and perhaps now and then, a tragedy speech." &c. &c. These low comedy characters and mock-heroes, who have forfeited their engagements, must allude, one would think, to J. T. Callender, and Matthew Lyon, or perhaps, the noted John Wood.

At the bottom of the play-bill in the Aurora, we find some interesting memoirs of author Paine, but as he is already sufficiently notorious, it would be superfluous to transcribe them. In a future paper, you may expect some further animadversions upon the familiar epistles.

Meantime I am,

CRITICISM.

REVIEW OF LYCEE, &c.

[The ensuing article, from one of the English Journals will inform and please the lovers of classical and political literature. Mr. La Harpe's interesting work, which has been perused with the greatest avidity in Europe, we have the satisfaction to announce, as proposed for publication in America.]

Lycee; ou, Cours de Literature, Ancienne et Moderne
Par J. F. La Harpe. 12 Tom. 8vo. A Paris, chez, H. Agasse, Imprimeur Libraire, Rue des Poitevins, An 7 de la Republique. i. e. The Lyceum; or, a course of Literature, Ancient and Modern. 1800.

This is a book which, we should think, could not fail to attract very considerably the attention of our countrymen. It is interesting on several accounts. The subjects, of which it treats, are those which draw the curiosity, and amuse the leisure of, by far the greatest number of readers. And it is impossible for any one not to feel curious in the highest possible degree concerning every thing of such a kind, produced in the circumstances in which we knew this work was composed.

It is the substance of a course of lectures delivered since the revolution in that institution in Paris, known by the name of the Lyceum, which was first established in 1788; was interrupted for some years during the horrors of that strange period, and was restored in 1794. The object of these lectures is, a critical and philosophical review of all the branches of literature which are addressed to the imagination and taste. This, according to our author, includes every kind of literary production, excepting only physical philosophy, and the abstract sciences. Few things, certainly, can be more interesting to us at the present moment, than to know what sort of instruction is given, and what species of man is permitted to give instruction on such subjects as those, to people of every sex and age in Paris, to all of whom the Lyceum is open.

The best method of giving our readers, within the narrow limits to which we must confine ourselves, any tolerably correct idea of the nature and merits of this work, which has not yet appeared in our language, seems to be to trace, as rapidly as possible, the plan of the author, enumerate the topics which he discusses, and mark, as we go along, our opinion of the merit or defect both of the plan and of the several parts of the execution.

The view which this author has taken of his subject is altogether a new one. And there is no work of the same kind either in ancient or modern language. We have books which investigate the nature of the different species of composition—poetry, history, oratory; and deliver the rules for composing in each, with many excellent criticisms on the different productions of each kind, which have appeared. The plan of Laharpe is different. He supposes the general rules of criticism, and the nature of the different species of composition, to be already known. And his purpose is to take the general principles and rules of judgment which have been established by philosophy and taste, and apply these to all the works of literature which are the object of taste from the time of Homer to our own. His book, therefore, is, to use his own language, “Une Histoire Raisonnée de tous les Arts de l’Esprit et de l’Imagination.” He ought, however, to have added something which restricted this expression to works of literature. For he does not treat of painting, or music, though these certainly are “arts de l’esprit et de l’imagination.”

This view is a mode of treating this extensive and important subject calculated to afford at once the greatest instruction and amusement; and when we add, that the plan has been executed by a very enlightened man, who joins solidity of judgment, and delicacy of taste, to a most accurate knowledge of the rules of art, and a mind in many respects truly philosophical; we certainly promise not a little both of profit and pleasure to such of our readers as shall peruse this work.

It is evident from what we have stated already, that the book is not intended for the young student. It is not an elementary work; but supposes the general rules of composition and criticism already known. To the student of polite literature, however, who has got beyond this elementary part, and whose judgment is mature enough to begin to exert itself, perhaps no book has yet been published more fit to serve as a guide, better calculated to exercise the judgment, to increase both the quickness and profundity of the discernment, and inure to habits both of just and refined decision. We speak thus highly on the strength of the old maxim, that example teacheth much better than precept. From this we conclude, that a book which examines, with the greatest minuteness of detail, every considerable work of taste from the earliest times to the present, and whose criticisms are generally not only very just, but very delicate and profound, cannot fail to be highly instructive—for it is nothing else but a great collection of examples of correct judgments in matters of taste.

The author divides what we would call his critical history of polite literature into three parts.

The first contains the ancient literature of Greece and Rome. The second, the literature of the age of Louis XIV. And the third, the literature of the eighteenth century. There is a preliminary discourse prefixed to vol. iv. which fills up the period between the literature of ancient Greece and Rome, and that of the age of Louis XIV. The method which he follows in treating each of these periods is, first, to examine the poetry of that period; second, the eloquence properly so called; and, third, the history, philosophy, and miscellaneous literature.

To the whole is prefixed an introductory discourse, in which he delivers some general observations on the art of composition. proves that it really is an art, the subject of precept, as much as any other art, that philosophy, instead of hurting the productions of taste, is that without the aid of which they cannot be brought to their perfection. Here too, he thinks proper to settle the meaning of the words genius and taste; the vagueness of which often occasions disputes; and gives a curious account of the variations of meaning these two words have undergone in the French language; being first terms of particular import, and at last abstract general terms. He then treats of ancient literature, in the following manner. Before he enters upon the subject of poetry he gives three chapters, one containing an abstract of the politics of Aristotle, accompanied with observations of the author's own, which shew him accurately to have studied and understood the critical writings of that great father of the critical art. In the second of these three chapters is, a not less sensible analysis of the treatise of Longinus, on the sublime. And in the third, a comparison of the French language with the Greek and Roman, in which we perfectly agree with his opinion of the great superiority of the ancient languages, but think he might have easily, by a few more well selected examples, rendered that opinion a good deal more clear and incontestible. In examining the poetry of the ancients, he takes the epic first. To his criticism of the ancient epic poems he prefixes some observations which are rather more of the nature of general and elementary writing, than for the most part he indulges in. He then gives a detailed and minute account of each of the epic poems by name, the Iliad, the Odyssey, the Eneid, and Lucan's Pharsalia. He successfully defends the Iliad against the charges of Lamotte, and justifies his own admiration of the poem by a great variety of ingenious and solid observations. Notwithstanding all that has been said concerning the character of Achilles, several of his remarks on that subject deserve here to find a place.

“The character of Achilles is the finest production of epic poetry. ‘Tis the effect of admirable address in the poet to have given that young hero the certainty that he was to perish before the walls of Troy. In vain is it for him to spread death all around him; he may find it at every step; and though he cannot meet a conqueror, he is sure of marching to death. His youth, his beauty, a goddess for his mother, all these advantages, which he sacrificed to glory, when he voluntarily accepted a premature and inevitable end, all serve to diffuse around him that lustre and that interest which belong to extraordinary men.—What a noble and sublime idea, to make of the repose of a warrior the action of an epic poem! That single conception would be sufficient to characterise a man of genius. Every event in the Iliad is disposed to aggrandise the hero; and every thing which is great about him elevates him still more.—Into what profound grief is he thrown by the loss of his friend, the companion of his infancy! Vengeance made him quit arms; vengeance alone can make him resume them. It is not Greece which he wishes to serve, it is Patroclus whom he wishes to revenge. He still weeps over Patroclus, while dragging in the dust the dead body of his murderer; and with the tears of friendship mixes the tears of rage. But he weeps also when restoring to the aged Priam the body of his unfortunate son; he melts into pity over that ill-fated old man, and still menaces even while he pities. From that mixture accordingly, of sensibility and fury, of ferocity and tenderness, from that ascendancy which we love to behold in one man over others, and those weaknesses which we love to find in every thing which is great, a character is formed the most poetical which has ever been imagined.”

We think this author rather too unfavourable to the Odyssey, which, though not equal in fire to the Iliad, possesses much poetical beauty, and is richly fraught with instruction concerning human life. He points out the beauties and faults of the Eneid with great judgment and taste; and his observations on this poem appear to us a very fine piece of criticism. He seems likewise to have appreciated Lucan very justly. An appendix follows concerning Hesiod, Ovid, Lucretius, and Manilius; concerning whom his judgment is not less correct than in most other cases.

The drama, which appears to be his favorite subject, is the topic to which he next proceeds. And what he has given us here certainly forms the fullest and most perfect criticism upon the ancient drama with which we have yet been presented. Not only does he fully detail the circumstances which rendered the object of dramatic representation considerably different among the ancients from what it is among us, but he enters with the most minute particularity into the merits of each of their dramatic poets, specifies their peculiar excellencies and defects, and compares them with one another, and with the moderns; singles out such of the productions of each author, one after the other, details its fable, follows minutely the conduct of the piece, examines the characters, the incidents, the tenure of the fable, the language, the sentiments, in short, every thing which is the subject of criticism in a play; and illustrates the whole by apt quotations from the piece, very well translated by himself. Such is the manner in which he examines the works of Eschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. His review of the ancient comedy is a good deal more cursory. He prosecutes the subject of ancient poetry by separate chapters on their lyric poetry, their pastoral poetry, and fable; their satirical poetry, and their elegiac and erotic poetry, as he calls it, what we would, perhaps, rather call by a plain name, love poetry. Each of these chapters contain a full and excellent criticism on every considerable production of each kind, whether among the Greeks or Romans.

On the second part of his subject—the eloquence of the ancients, he is equally minute and equally instructive. A very full abstract is given of the institutions of Quintilian, and the rhetorical writings of Cicero, accompanied with many just and enlightened observations. He shortly notices the orators who preceded Demosthenes. He describes the character of that great man's eloquence; examines the nature of oratorical invention, and oratorical reasoning, as exemplified in the harangues of Demosthenes; and he illustrates the principles here laid down, by an application to one of the Philippics and the two celebrated orations of Eschynus and Demosthenes, for the crown; all of which he analyzes minutely, and gives large quotations in a very elegant translation of his own. In the same manner he proceeds with the Romans. A short account is given of the orators who preceded Cicero. A comparison is instituted of the eloquence of Demosthenes and Cicero, and some very ingenious observations made on the conformity of the eloquence of each, to the people to whom it was addressed. He then analyzes minutely, and criticises with great judgment and taste, all the leading orations of Cicero: those against Veres; those against Catiline; that for Murena, for Milo, for Archias, for Marcellus, and several more. He includes under this head, too, his criticism on the two Plinies; and gives large quotations in his own language from each of the pieces which he analyzes.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

[It begins, at length, to be fashionable among the better sort of booksellers in America, instead of publishing the nonsense and impiety of Tom Paine, Volney, &c. to select books of an approved stamp, and of sterling value. It is pleasant also to discern the dawning of a CLASSICAL taste. Hence we give publicity to the ensuing proposals, and ardently wish both the bookseller and the public may be benefited by an extensive sale of La Harpe's book, one of the most learned and solid performances which has appeared within a century.]

PROPOSALS

By E. SERGEANT, & Co. No. 123, Water-street, New-York.

For publishing by subscription,

A CRITICAL REVIEW OF ANCIENT LITERATURE.

Translated from the Lyceum of La Harpe.

CONDITIONS.

I. The work shall be printed on fine paper, with a handsome type.

II. It shall be comprised in three 8vo. volumes, each containing about 500 pages, and shall be delivered to subscribers at the price of two dollars a volume, in boards. The price to non-subscribers will be considerably advanced.

III. The printing of the first volume shall commence, as soon as five hundred subscribers shall be procured.

It is the remark of a profound critic and elegant writer, that the attention paid to the authors of antiquity, may be regarded as the criterion of learning and politeness. Though we may refuse to admit this remark in all its latitude, it is yet certain that some acquaintance with classical learning is essential to the accomplishment of both the scholar and the gentleman. It is here unnecessary to dilate on the excellence of the ancient authors; none but those ignorant of their works have ever questioned it, and as the vanity of such is generally equal to their stupidity, it were useless to inform them that the most eminent men amongst the moderns have been the warmest admirers of the ancients. The almost universal neglect of classical literature in this country, has long been deeply deplored by all the real friends of learning. To inquire into the cause of this neglect would here be impertinent. Some have thought it a necessary consequence of our system of government, whilst others attribute it, with more probability, to the prevailing manners, to the indifference of parents, and the incapacity of instructors.

If any thing can be supposed capable of rousing us from our stupor, and of awakening in us a desire of improvement, it is the present work of M. La Harpe. It is a work singular in its kind. The idea was bold and original, and its execution acquits the author of temerity in its conception. M. La Harpe examines and analyzes the most celebrated productions of antiquity; he translates, with fidelity and elegance some of their happiest and most important passages; upon the truest principles of criticism he unfolds the art of their composition and explains the justness of their arrangement. With the pencil of a master, and in colours the most warm and glowing, he traces the propriety and displays the richness of their imagery. Nor have the interior beauties of style escaped his attention. The elegant selection of their words, and the harmonious structure of their sentences, receive a due share of notice and praise. The superiority of the ancients, in works addressed to the imagination, is seldom disputed; but to repair the wound our pride has suffered by such a concession, it is generally agreed that, where they attempt to enlighten, they but too frequently confuse and mislead the judgment: that the poets of Greece and Rome are unrivalled, but that he, who is in search of truth, must consult the philosophers of France and England; they alone, it is confidently asserted, have shewn the foundation of our moral duties. They alone have investigated with success the nature and operations of the human mind in the study of abstract truth. They alone can conduct us to certainty.

Such are the opinions commonly received; such are the prejudices from which few are exempt. M. La Harpe, to his honor, is one of those few. The nature of his work did not allow him to treat this subject with much extent; but in what he has written he has sufficiently proved, that however far the ancients excel us in poetry, they equally surpass us in philosophy. M. La Harpe is an admirer of the ancients, but his admiration is not that of a pedant; he laments their faults, whilst he extols their beauties. Lest their excellencies should induce us to an imitation even of their defects, he points out,

.....quas aut incuria fudit,
Aut humana parum cavit natura.

Yet he does not perform the ungrateful task with the asperity of a Warburton, or the contemptuous levity of a Voltaire, but rather with the delicacy of a friend, and the modesty of an inferior. As an evidence of the high estimation in which the Lyceum is held in Europe, it may not be improper to transcribe the judgment of the Anti-Jacobin reviewers, whose praise receives, from its rarity, an extraordinary value.

"The review which this author has taken of his subject is altogether a new one, and there is no work of the same kind either in ancient or modern language. We have books which investigate the nature of the different species of composition, poetry, history, and oratory, and deliver the rules for composing in each, with many excellent criticisms on the different productions of each kind which have appeared. The plan of La Harpe is different. He supposes the general rules of composition to be already known, and his purpose is to take the general principles and rules of judgment which have been established by philosophy and taste, and apply these to all the works of literature which are the object of taste from the time of Homer to our own."

And again—"This view is a mode of treating this extensive and important subject calculated to afford at once the greatest instruction and amusement; and, when we add, that the plan has been executed by a very enlightened man, who joins solidity of judgment and delicacy of taste to a most accurate knowledge of the rules of art, and a mind, in many respects, truly philosophical, we certainly promise not a little both of profit and pleasure to such of our readers as shall peruse this work."

"It is evident from what we have already stated, that the book is not intended for the young student, it is not an elementary work; but supposes the ground rules of composition and criticism already known. To the student of polite literature, however, who has got beyond this elementary part, and whose judgment is mature enough to begin to exert itself, perhaps no book has yet been published more fit to serve as a guide, better calculated to exercise the judgment, to increase both the quickness and profundity of the discernment, and inure to habits both of just and refined decision."

The three first volumes of this work may be safely recommended as a body of just criticism upon ancient literature, more full and minute than any which has yet been presented to the public.

The remaining volumes relate entirely to modern French literature, which they examine with such length of detail and minuteness of criticism, that they can only be intelligible or instructing to those who have made a particular study of the French authors. The volumes of which a translation is now offered to the public form by themselves a complete work.

There is a passage in the celebrated dialogue, de Causis Corruptæ Eloquentiæ, which, with some slight alteration, we may perhaps apply to our own country:—Quis ignorat ab Majorum gloria, nos descivisse non inopia hominum, sed desidia juventutis, et negligentia parentum et inscientia precipitentum, et oblivione moris antiqui?

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In this Port Folio we have deposited some papers, illustrating the plan and criticising the execution of the celebrated "Lyceum" of La Harpe. We now present an extract of a literary letter from an ancient scholar, in our own country, and are delighted to discover, that men of learning and genius, at home and abroad, are unanimous in favour of a learned and virtuous Frenchman, who, disdaining and abjuring the visionary theories of his modern countrymen, has carefully applied himself to the study of the ancients, and with equal taste and judgment has appreciated their incomparable value. The collateral remarks of the letter writer will not fail to give pleasure to all the disciples of the oldschool. They have long since learned to detest such illustrious scoundrels as Voltaire and the king of Prussia.

"I have read the six volumes of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, and was well paid for my time. I have perused also four volumes of Memoirs of the chevalier Ravannes, in the Bibliothèque Amusante, which, if it should fall in your way, I advise you to read, not only for diversion, but to learn the character of the school, in which Voltaire and Richelieu were formed; the court of the Regent Duke of Orleans, and his minister, the infamous Cardinal Du Bois. Voltaire could have been bred in no region more infernal, on this side the bottomless pit, nor in any more proper to inspire his philosophy. I have read of nothing more odious, except the court of Alexander the sixth, and his son, Cæsar Borgia. Even that produced nothing, so fatal to human happiness, as Voltaire. I wonder not that he said to marshal Richelieu, in his last moments, "Eh! Frere Kain, tu m'aves tué." I have read the life of Lorenzo de Medici, by Roscoe. This is useful to students in Italian Literature, next in taste to the Greek, and shews the causes of the resurrection of letters, that most transcendent blessing to mankind, provided Voltaire and his brother Gains are not permitted to convert it into a curse.

"The three volumes of the Studies of Nature, by St. Pierre, are amiable and ingenious, but full of superficial whimsies.

"But the greatest work of all is in fourteen volumes, under the title of Lycée; ou cours de Littérature, ancienne et moderne, par I. F. La Harpe. I have read nothing with so much pleasure, except The Pursuits of Literature. Vast as his plan is

I would advise every young man of letters to go through the whole catalogue of authors La Harpe criticises. Indocti discant, et ament meminisse periti is his motto, and never was any one better chosen. Most of all to excite our surprize is the style in which he speaks in Public Lectures, delivered before twelve hundred hearers of the French Revolution, in the midst of it in 1794, and since. There is scarcely any spot in America, where he could have read the same discourses to an equal number of hearers, without raising an uproar and a mutiny. He does ample justice to Voltaire's genius, talents, taste, and eloquence. But he spares not his immorality, his impiety, his mendacity, his perfidy, his brutality, his universal rascality. I do not believe there was ever any man, to whom were more applicable, his own words, or those of the king of Prussia, in their partnership commentaries upon Machiavel—"The most infernal monster, that hell ever vomited upon this earth." This comet has shaken from his horrid hair, pestilence, war, and death to the human race."

The following is a specimen of the American style of the "National Intelligencer," edited by the philosophic Smith. We do not mean the author of The Wealth of Nations.

"The militia legion of Washington county assembled on the parade ground. They were reviewed by general Mason, in the presence of the president, the secretary of war, &c. A standard was presented to the legion by general Mason, through Miss Murray, and Miss Paine, the former of whom delivered an appropriate address to the lieutenant of the guard, who returned a suitable answer."

REMARK.

Even a militia might assemble on a parade, though, God knows, they would make a very contemptible appearance there, but why they should assemble on a parade ground, can be answered only by the lovers of the True Indian style. We cannot help smiling at the awkward, not to say indecent, appearance which the militia standard makes, as described by this democratic editor. But the looseness of his expression is only a part of the Jacobinical character. The Innovator, grown grey in the Gallic school, as he exalts himself above the law, and sneers at the Gospel; as he laughs at prescription, and abjures authority, has a privilege to trample alike on the laws of language, as the laws of society.

In the "Zeluco" of Dr. Moore, there is an allusion to a machine similar to the following. It is often to be met in monasteries.

MECHANIC COFFEE-HOUSE AT PARIS.

The celebrated café mécanique exists no more; like a multitude of other institutions, that have novelty to recommend them, which at first attract great notice, are much frequented, and presently forgotten. The mechanism, however, of this coffee-house was pretty enough.

The tables in it stood on hollow shafts of columns, which had connection with the cellar below. Ask for what you would, and before you were aware, there sprung up an iron trap, horizontally level with the table, and through it entered a plate, with what you had called for, upon it. A speaking trumpet, fixed in the bar of the landlady, told the waiter below, what was to be sent up. The whole had a pretty effect; and, as long as it was new, drew a great deal of company to the house.

It is reported, that a misunderstanding, and a great coolness have arisen between Mr. Pitt and Mr. Addington; and the non-appearance of the latter at the sick-bed of the former, is instanced as a proof of the truth of this report; but it is, perhaps, the only ground of it. The public would be astonished, if they knew, and would not believe us, if we stated it, the extreme hostility, that exists between the personal friends of the late and present premiers; an hostility, which is only restrained from breaking out in public, by Messrs. Pitt and Addington themselves. Under these circumstances, a rupture is to be looked for; and nothing more prevents it, perhaps, than Mr. Pitt's present listlessness of disposition; he is tired of a public life, and disgusted with politics.

[London paper.]

The inveteracy of Buonaparte appears to be confined wholly to republics....When the "infuriated" general Lasnes, the late French minister at Lisbon, arrived at Paris, he received a severe rebuff from Buonaparte, who immediately put him in Coventry, at his residence in Normandy. A new minister is to be sent immediately to the court of Lisbon, who will doubtless be instructed to assure the prince regent, that Napoleon the First will not permit the freaks of a petulant minister to destroy the good understanding, which ought ever to exist between independent monarchs.

[Centinel.]

A young lady in a village of New-Jersey, who was cold in her temperament, and coy in her humour, was lately addressed in turn by two suitors, a Mr. Bread, and a Mr. Stone. As the damsel appeared quite insensible of the gallantry of her admirers, a witling remarked, that she reminded him of Lord Angelo, in Measure for Measure.

.....She is precise,
Stands at a guard with envy, scarce confesses
That her blood flows, or that her appetite
Is more to Bread than Stone.

We perceive, in one of the morning papers, that a Mr. William Goodfellow is notified by the sheriff to appear before the justices of the supreme court, to answer the libel of his wife, who prays for a divorce from the bonds of matrimony. We cannot refrain from remarking, that, in the opinion of the lady of this false husband, though he might be an excellent good-fellow, he was a very bad bed-fellow.

A boy, just got into his Latin grammar, made an équivoque, equal, at least, to many of our punsters, Observing his school-master riding up the avenue, he ran and informed his father. "Yes, child," said the latter, "your master is fond of a glass of hock, and is coming to drink a bottle with me." "Then sir," replied the boy, "my master is coming hic, upon his hœc, to drink hoc."

Every one remembers the well known Catch, "Which is the properest day to drink, Saturday, Sunday, Monday?" The ensuing parody, which is very happily achieved, is of American origin, and will be remembered by him, whose motto is "Sapias vina liques."

PARODY.

Which is the properest hour to drink,
One, two, three, or four, sir?
Each is the properest hour, I think,
Why should we name no more, sir?

Tell me but your's, I'll mention mine,
Fix but on one, pray do, sir;
Three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine,
Ten, eleven twelve, one and two, sir.

The London wits observe, that the sages of Oxford have had a long conference, whether they should or should not, elect Lord Nelson a Doctor of Divinity, as being thoroughly acquainted with the cannon law.

So audacious are our thieves become, that a gentleman at Walworth was robbed a few days ago of his spectacles off his nose, which a fellow snatched at, and ran away. We know not what precautions to recommend, if people are not safe who have all their eyes about them.

[London paper.]

We learn the important intelligence, in a London magazine, that two of the frail fair had a dispute lately, at Drury Lane theatre. The consequence was, they exchanged cards, and were to have fought, in Hyde Park, with pistols. The interference of some generous friends prevented the rencontre.

A clergyman, as a text for a wedding sermon, appositely chose the following; "Abundance of peace, while the moon lasteth."

A wag, observing a fellow steal a fish, at Billingsgate, and put it under his jacket, which was too short to conceal the theft, whispered the purloiner, in future, either to wear a longer jacket, or steal a shorter fish.

From an Eastern paper we copy the subsequent remarks upon the ability of J. Q. Adams, as a civilian and negotiator.

A great charge lately adduced against John Quincy Adams, in the Chronicle is, that in the treaty with Prussia, he did not insist that "free ships should make free goods."—"This doctrine, says the stupid Chronicle, is "essential to our prosperity." In this instance the Chronicle has stumbled upon a subject which the friends of Mr. Adams would be glad to see discussed, for this negotiation alone gives him many claims upon the gratitude of his countrymen. In the first place, in availing this new-fangled principle, he acted agreeably to the long established laws of nations; and in the second place, he secured and essentially promoted the interests of neutrals.

Every Farmer, Mechanic and Merchant, has been benefited by the admission of a rule, which permits nations at war to search neutrals: for if this was denied, and free ships were to make free goods, neutrals would become mere carriers instead of merchants. They would furnish bottoms and flags, or nothing but flags, to the belligerent powers, instead of furnishing them as traders with cargoes from the produce of their own country. Let every man who for the last ten years, has found employment upon high wages, or grown rich by commerce, remember that the principle contended for in the Chronicle, was supported by French plunderers, and that Mr. Adams in rejecting it, gave proof of his THOROUGH KNOWLEDGE OF THE LAWS OF NATIONS, while he promoted the true interests of his country.

"In the Palladium the following notice appears." The late master of the Topsham Beauty, informs, that the small sum of money which was loaned him is on the way to Portsmouth; and gives notice to the one-eyed gentleman, who composed the piece that appeared in the Palladium of the 28th ult. to call on said Master and pay a balance that is due him as per account rendered in.

One cannot help smiling at certain passages in the above advertisement. The master of the Topsham Beauty appears to be very fortunate in his mistress, whether she be a virgin, or a vessel. Nothing can be more agreeable than the intelligence of money being on the road to Portsmouth. The various beauties which adorn the concluding sentences of this admirable advertisement, cannot be too highly applauded. The "one eyed" gentleman will not have a single eye to his interest, unless he call on the master and pay the balance, which appears due, in the charming language of the shopkeeper, "as per account rendered in."

REFLECTIONS IN SOLITUDE.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

You will peruse the enclosed at your leisure—use the pruning knife, as freely as you please. It will not give me many pangs, if you should ornament the whole of my manuscript with what our friend Blackstone calls, lattice-work or cancelli. You will know to whom the concluding lines are addressed—Our regretted friend deserved more, but it is the widow's mite, all I have.

The night is cold, and I have clos'd the door
And windows of my wood-surrounded hut,
That by my own fire-side, (the quiet spot
Where he, who seeks reflection, loves to hold Calm converse with himself,) at noon of night,
Uninterrupted, I may dream away
A silent hour....In such a lonely hour
Who, that has feeling, but his heart will prompt
To dwell in sadness on the storms of life,
That rudely shatter'd his fair-weather bark.
And wreck'd the treasures dearest to his soul?
I once was happy as the mother bird,
An inoffensive gleaner of the field,
New-reap'd, that lightly flutters o'er her nest
To feed her chirping brood....The syren forms
Of Pleasure wanton'd in my path, and Hope,
God's chosen angel, with seducing notes,
Cheated the passing hour of half its pangs....
Riot and revelry had then no charms
For me....The summer day was far too short
To drain the bowl, that innocence prepar'd...
Sleep, sweet as sleep of babes, stole o'er my eyes
And clos'd my lids, resistless till the dawn;
While health, with golden hues, life's landscape
ting'd,
And added charms to each new-rising joy.
The fondest father lov'd me....From his heart
Streams of affection to his children flow'd,
Which, grateful they, with pleasing care return'd
Back to their fount, that it might stream anew....
As the warm blood, that, issuing from the heart,
Makes glad the swelling veins, and, circling round,
In ceaseless motion, to its source returns.
At such an hour as this, I may not chuse
But think on him....His venerable form,
Such as it was, when with his children's smiles
He mingled his; when they, in fondest gaze,
Hung on those lips, that anger never mov'd;
Through which the warmest heart, that ever glow'd

A parent's bosom breath'd the notes of love;
Such as 'twas then, (and such it often was,)
It stands before me, fix'd by mem'ry's pow'r.
How mild the beams of love that light those eyes!
How sweet the smile that plays upon those lips!
How soft the strain that fond affection breathes!
More musical than ever raptur'd bards
Of Orpheus fancied;....known not, save what hour
The mingled melody of thousand birds,
Warbling, first broke on Adam's ravish'd ear!....
Oh! I could sketch with mem'ry's brightest tints
Each little mark of fond paternal love,
But I should idly sketch....For who would bear
With me? Who, save the few to me most dear,
Who know, who feel that truth my pencil guides.
Death aim'd his arrow well, and more than one
That arrow pierc'd....He loves to disunite
The firmest link from fond affection's chain.
He did it then, and now the sever'd parts,
Torn from their prop, can only sigh to clasp it;
Who now shall bring the cement? Who shall pour,
In mercy, balsam on the bleeding wound?
He....God....who, with an eye that never sleeps,
Watches the wearied farm-boy, midst his flock
Browsing, asleep, what time the ven'rous snake
Glees by, and harms him not the charmer, charm'd.
He, who, unheeded, leads the truant child
Home, to relieve a mother's tortur'd heart,

And takes the mourner "*where the wicked cease
From troubling, and the weary are at rest.*"
Nor must I pass thee by, my parted friend!
At this still hour, to mild seclusion dedicate,
It were not wrong to think thy virtues o'er.
Thou too art number'd with the favor'd few Whom friendship mourns....I could not chuse but love thee,

And I have lov'd thee well....Among the tears
That warmly mingle on thy early tomb,
Mine will be found....And at that awful hour,
When life's pale taper shoots its last dim gleam,
When the last figure in the shifting scene
Of life flits by; may then the chosen few,
Whom I have lov'd, and who have cheer'd my path,
In silence seek my grave, with sighs as pure
As those, that we, who lov'd thee, heave for thee?

THE DISCOVERY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Whence these tumults in my breast?
Wherefore fly my pillow, rest?
Why do these unwonted sighs
Cause my panting bosom rise?
Swelling both with joy and pain,
Each contending for the reign;
Joy, extatic, pure, unknown,
Pain to hardest torments prone.
Why thus roves my anxious eye?
Wherefore wish, yet know not why?
All that late could give delight,
Now offends th' averted sight:
Still I seek, but find not bliss,
Tell me, Nature, whence is this?

Hence ye dreary fears away!
Mark some other as your prey!
Me let richest thoughts possess,
Such alone as truly bless;
Such as late, where friendship's throng,
Cheer'd the hours with mirth and song,
Mark'd not how the moments glide,
Seated by Maria's side.

Then I first beheld her face,
Form'd of each enlivening grace;
Saw those eyes enchanting beam;
Cheeks which rose and lillies seem;
Lips as yet untaught by guile,
Sweet Innocence, to check thy smile!
Heard the music of that tongue
On its sounds enraptur'd hung;
Sounds, that from the heart of youth
Flow with candour, virtue, truth;
Still their gentle force I feel,
O'er my mind vibrating steal.

When her hand I gently prest,
What emotions thrill'd my breast!
Still I gaz'd, and still I felt
Each dissolving sinew melt;
Melt with unconfin'd desire,
All was rapture, all was fire!
In vain to check the wish I strove:
Nature speak, can this be love?

Subtle God I feel thy art
Triumph o'er my vanquish'd heart;
All my soul is freely thine;
Let thy purest joys be mine.
Let again those hours return,
Let again my senses burn;
Once again, kind fortune, aid,
Bring me to the lovely maid,
Let me from her looks receive,
Transports they alone can give.

Nature, whilst such bliss I prove,
Never let me cease to love.

VERSES.

ADDRESSED TO THE AUTHOR'S SISTER WITH A PORTRAIT OF THEIR MOTHER

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Entic'd by Friendship to present,
Some gift, that might her wish declare,
Not from unmeaning compliment,
This present to your breast I bear.

Here, in these mimic strokes, you'll trace
What filial love should always prize:
Think as you contemplate the face,
What hid within the bosom lies.

A mother's heart!....Nor let your thought
View lightly what that heart contains;
With still unvalu'd treasures fraught,
In each reverse preserv'd from stains.

Whatever be in life your doom,
By troubles tost, or lull'd by rest,
Remember, when she's in the tomb,
You wear her image in your breast.

Should ever wav'ring thoughts entice
Your mind from rectitude astray,
Return to this your wand'ring eyes,
Let her example mark your way.

Thus mem'ry, from a well spent life,
Unpractis'd, uneduc'd by guile,
Shall arm the mind 'gainst fortune's stri
With virtue's ever-placid smile.

In this secure, though friends may fail,
And falsely turn when riches fly,
Though chilling penury assail,
The soul, regardless, tow'rs on high!

AN ADDRESS TO THE OCEAN.

OCCASIONED BY THE VISIT OF A BELOVED WIFE TO A WATERING PLACE ON ACCOUNT OF HER HEALTH.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Oh! thou (whate'er celestial name be thine)
Neptune, Oceanus, or Tethys fair,
To my fond suit a gracious ear incline,
And grant me, for thou canst, my fervent prayer.
Behold a gentle form, with languid eye,
And faded cheek, bends o'er thy briny waves;
Cool streams from thy refreshing urn supply,
And cheer her drooping spirits as she laves.
Its lustre to that languid eye restore;
To that wan cheek its wonted bloom impart;
My earthly treasure let me clasp once more,
In radiant health, to my delighted heart.
So may no tempests' rage thy tranquil breast
Deform and spread its howling whirlwinds wide;
But peaceful Halcyons on thy bosom rest,
And parting sun-beams kiss thy placid tide.
So may no hostile prow invade thy right,
And scatter fear the trembling shores along;
But the gay sea-boy, 'neath the moon's pale light
Awake thine echo's to the voice of song.

EPIGRAM.

As the priest was committing a corpse to the earth
To supply, in his mem'ry, an unlucky dearth,
He ask'd of an Irishman "pray, my friend, say
Do we bury a brother, or sister to-day?"
"What d'y'e mane, sir?" says Pat, "no, St. Patrick defend,
'Tis not one nor the other, 'tis only a friend."

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXXV.

"Those charms are greatest, which decline the sight,
That makes the banquet poignant and polite
There is no woman, where there's no reserve;
And 'tis on plenty your poor lovers starve."
DR. YOUNG.

I imagined, at the close of last winter, that my virtuous admonitions on painted faces, and white-washed necks, on ostentatious bosoms, and transparent muslin, had produced penitence in some ladies, and reformation in more.

Delighted with my censorial triumph, and gratified for the docility of my fair pupils, I was resolved, for the future, whenever my speculations led to the sex, to turn my thoughts wholly towards panegyric. I beg the ladies now to consider that this is my natural inclination; that I wish always to be chaunting their perfections in a sonorous strain of gratulation; and that satire and reproof are altogether foreign to the heart of their fervent friend. I anticipate, with the greatest eagerness, the news of the exemplary rectitude of their behaviour, and that each time I trim the lamp of my future lucubrations, it will cast the brightest gleam upon the feminine character.

MR. SAUNTER,

Among the many foibles, which mark the age in which we live, and which the pen of the satirist, and the voice of the moralist are frequently in vain exerted to correct, no one is more pernicious than the present eccentricity of female dress. The bold display of beauties, of which reason and delicacy demand the concealment; the looseness and thinness of the attire of many of our fashionable females, while they jeopardize their health, excite ideas and wishes in the breast of the other sex, on which morality must frown. Happily, indeed, this foible is not universal. Some ladies there are among us, over whom delicacy still holds her sway; whose manners are moulded by modesty, and whose dress is fashioned by propriety, who, abhorring this "harlot's custom," blush for, and pity the conduct of the other portion of their sex.

Reading the new edition of Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," I was strongly impressed with the truth of some observations on this subject, to which I entreat the attention of my fair, but deluded country-women. If a portion of gall flowed with the ink, with which they were written, the pen was directed by the hand of truth.

"The fondness for excessive finery is not so derogatory to the refinement and delicacy, which, particularly in dress and sentiment, ought to distinguish the female character, as the adoption of those fashions, by which young and old now expose their naked arms, elbows, shoulders, necks, bosoms, and themselves to every beholder! "The chariest maid," says Shakspeare, "is prodigal enough, if she unmask her beauties to the moon." Ariosto, after describing the dress of the beautiful Alcina, by which no more of her matchless charms were permitted to be seen, than the strictest innocence and modesty allow, concludes,

"Not Argus self her other charms could spy,
So closely veil'd from every longing eye;
Yet may we judge the graces she reveal'd,
Surpass'd not those her modest garb conceal'd,
Which strove in vain from fancy's eye to hide
Each angel charm, that seem'd to heaven allied.

"There needs indeed no crier, as Fredericus Maternecius observes, to go before those, who are loosely dressed, to tell us what they mean, for it is as sure a token to a young gallant, as an ivy-bush over the door of a tavern, is to a debauchee. The conversation and behaviour of such females, are, in general, as loose and meretricious as their dress.

"There's language in their eyes, their cheeks, their lips,
Their feet speak loud, and wantonness looks out
At every joint and motion of their bodies.
These fair encounterers are so glib of tongue,
Give such a courting welcome eye they come,
So wide unclasp the table of their thoughts
To every observer, that I set them down
For sluttish spoils of opportunity,
And daughters of the game.....

"The girl, who on beauty depends for support,
Must call every art to her aid;
The bosom displayed and the petticoat short,
Are samples she gives of her trade.
But learn not, ye fair ones, to copy her air,
Nor venture too much to reveal;
Our fancies will paint what you cover with care,
And double each charm you conceal."

I am, sir,
your's, &c.

MR. SAUNTER,

I am a plain old fellow, and the importunate nature of my business obliges me to trudge about a great deal in the streets and lanes of this vast city. Sometimes, when my eyes are divorced from their usual rivet on the ground, and my thoughts estranged, a moment, from my engagements, I look at the pretty figures, of females which glide by me. I like their faces, and their gait, well enough, but their naked elbows, though they often hit my side, or my shoulder, do not, I confess, at all hit my fancy. It certainly, Mr. Saunter, was reserved for the whimsical French, to discover the witchery of such an exposure. But to my old eyes, it suggests no resemblance either of beauty or grace. One of your ancients, in a musty Latin book, either long ago forgotten, or which nobody reads, says, somewhere, "Non datum est cuicunque habere nasum;" that is, not every man is privileged with a nose, or, as some sagaciously will have it, with a penetrating judgment. Now, as it is the misfortune of some men not to be endowed either with a Roman nose, or American acuteness, so it is incident to many females, not to have a handsome elbow. Of ten thousand agreeable women, who are interesting enough, from the expression of their features, or their grace of motion, not more than one has an elbow, sufficiently symmetrical, to be displayed. Besides, what advantage is it to a lady, to wear her gown sleeves curtailed? My father Shandy exclaims, what signifies how a man cocks his hat? And I may ask, what service can it be to a woman to shew her elbow?

A well turned arm, seen with, or without a covering, is an interesting object to a painter's eye, and to a lover's imagination. But, an elbow, whether idly dangling, or see-sawing a handkerchief; whether fiercely a-kimbo, or reposing calmly by the side, is not, my dear ladies, valued at the price of a nut-shell, even by your gallants. Here I suppose I shall be told of the dancing girls of Asia, and the Grecian nymphs, and the fine forms of classic statuary, which sometimes prodigally reveal, and, at others, give a shadowy glimpse of the elbow. I hope I shall not be accused of detracting from the beauty of my fair country-women, whom I indeed consider as very lovely, when I affirm that not many of them have the Grecian contour, the Grecian forehead, the Grecian nose, or, lastly the Grecian elbow. They possess and display much American beauty, and, in Philadelphia, in particular, it is striking and attractive. But it does not but very rarely resemble the ancient model; and though now and then a young lady, of an ardent temperament, and of a generous indiscretion, may be furnished with red, or classical hair, I doubt much, if the precision of arithmetical calculation could truly state the existence, in this city, of twenty classical elbows. From the changeableness and coldness of our climate, every exposed elbow sometimes looks too blue, and sometimes too red; and, with reverence be it spoken, is often rough and unsightly. Now, as many ladies, particularly those, who have faded fast, or have been married long, exhibit elbows, which are prominently ungraceful. I submit it to your consideration, Mr. Saunter, whether it would not be wise and politic, as well as correct and chaste, to lengthen the glove and gown sleeve, and let unprotected elbows be seen no more.

I am your's, &c.
SIMON SOBERSIDES.

The above is a pretty furious onset, and I had half determined not to be an auxiliary to such an attack. But my correspondent though "rude in speech, and little blessed with the set phrase of peace," is nevertheless tolerably correct in opinion, and not very weak in argument. For displayed elbows I have long since entertained a careless indifference; and I doubt whether in temperaments, much more combustible than my own, a flame, either lambent or languid, be ever lighted up, by looking at the bones of beauty. I hope the charming nymphs, who beautify the noon-tide walk, and splendidly glitter, in the horizon of gaiety, will still continue to enchant us, by the magic of modest smiles, flashing eyes and correct decoration. Redundant hair, polished arms, and the ingenuousness of a lovely face, may still be displayed, and every man of sensibility be pleased, and not a moralist frown. But, in this cold season, it is barbarous to expose the elbow and bosom, to the malice of FROST, and to the impertinence of the WINDS. We hope that the snowy sufferers, will in future be sheltered, both from the inclemency of the climate, and the severity of reproof. If the refractory should, in defiance of my gentle admonitions, sally out armed at all points, and darting sharp elbows against every one, in their way, I shall employ a sort of deputy lounge, empowered to give each fair offender a rap, either with a French fan, or a fashionable stickée. I observe that my illustrious predecessor, Joseph Addison, employs, in the Tatler, Pacolet, John Morpew and Charles Lillie, in the Spectator, a trunkmaker, and in the Guardian, a lion, sub-lion, and under roarer, all as subaltern agents, to carry on the work of reformation. This is a sufficient hint. Moreover, I find my labours, so thicken upon me, that an assistant is indispensable. Of late, my title is a perfect misnomer, and, far from being a lounge, I am in danger of becoming, one of the most laborious fellows, that ever plodded along the cart rut of constant occupation. This is so alien to all the habits of an indolent character, that a deputy lounge must be created. I accordingly appoint Lewis Listless, a distant, though decayed relation of the Saunter family, and one, who boasts of the pedigree of Old-school. This lazy kinsman of mine, dearly loves to loiter through the streets, and to look at the ladies. I have commissioned him to take all the affairs of the female world, under his immediate inspection. Not only elbows, but ankles are open to his criticism; and he is to take care, with a power, similar to that of the Roman consuls at perilous epochs, "Ne quid detrimenti Femina capiat." He is to see, that elbows and bosoms catch no cold, by being wantonly exposed, to the merciless winter; and he has it in charge to punish the trespassers, upon the close of MODESTY, and the inclosures of VIRTUE.

PART THE FOURTH.

FUTURE DESTINY OF NORTH AMERICA.

CHAPTER I.

It is not impossible, to foresee the future, in general.

I have no pretensions to a foreknowledge of futurity. I am by no means disposed to play the prophet: my only object is, to derive inferences from known facts, according to the rules of probability.

If man, could foresee the future with certainty, all the intellectual faculties, would be useless, and would die away by inactivity. But future events may often be foreseen, generally, by persons who have not given themselves out for inspired; thus in the writings of Rousseau of Geneva, may be found, not only obscure anticipations, but explicit presages of the French revolution; and this might easily be accounted for.

All things which are to happen in future, are truths. Why then should not a person who sincerely loves truth, not have forebodings of them, since they are homogeneous to that love?

Whoever knows the ruling passion of an individual, and should know it perfectly, might know beforehand, how he would conduct himself in any given case.

It is doubtless in such a manner, that the deity foresees the actions of men. As the deity knows in the utmost perfection the characters of men, or their ruling passion, that is to say, what they love above all things, he foresees in like perfection all their future actions; for in this ruling affection or inclination of the soul, they are all inscribed: they are there as it were, bound up in embryo.

In this manner the foresight of God, may be very well reconciled with the freedom of man; a problem which has always been deemed insolvable. In order to foresee all the occurrences in the world, so far as they are not merely physical, but moral, it would be necessary to know the ruling passions of all men, at least of all men in power, to perfect tion, with all their possible modifications. This is what no man can do; but the deity can; and is consequently omniscient and omnipresent.

Whoever knows perfectly the character of a man, can lead him, with motives: the Deity therefore governs the events of this world, and the transactions of mankind, notwithstanding all appearances to the contrary.

A man cannot therefore accurately foresee the occurrences of a nation, because he cannot thoroughly know all the men who have an influence upon its fortunes. From known data, only very general conclusions can be drawn, and this is now my purpose with respect to the republic of North-America. I am apprehensive that even these few preparatory considerations will be thought too abstracted; I hasten therefore to my proper object.

CHAPTER II.

Europe may be perfectly free, from the fear of being in future conquered by America.

Our descendants are threatened with being conquered by the Americans, and particularly by the republic of North-America. My purpose is, to convince those of my fellow-citizens of this quarter of the world, who may read my book, that they have no need to pass sleepless nights on this account, and that they may go peaceably to bed every night, free from all concern for the future fortunes of their posterity.

"America," says a German author, "is an oak upon a solitary mountain." This is probably a figure, drawn from that forest-bending eloquence, of which another German author tells us. I do not indeed exactly understand what this metaphor of an oak upon a solitary mountain means, probably because I am not well versed in the forest-bending eloquence; but thus much I can perceive; that it is meant to designate something vigorous, energetic, herculean, &c. &c. We hear of nothing else, but of this youthful national vigour, this national bloom, when America is spoken of. In the eyes of these vigorous statesmen, Europe, is in comparison with America decrepid with age, a dotting cripple, &c. I wish that upon this subject some determinate ideas could be formed, and shall take the liberty to discuss the subject a little here; though without forest-bending eloquence. The republic of North-America, exhibits at present, that is, in its youth, no proofs whatever of youthful vigour. It is rather the despicable sport of those European states with which it stands in any political relation. It is, if I may be allowed to use a trivial expression alternately cudgelled both by England and France. Here then is a youth, incompetent to struggle with an old cripple; this youth is indeed very prematurely unnerved.

It will be objected that America is not yet sufficiently peopled to make herself formidable to the most powerful European states, and this observation will be erroneous. If the geographical situation of America be considered, it may very easily be proved, that four millions of men, at such a distance from Europe, might resist the united attack of all the European states together, and become extremely formidable to those which have possessions in America, if other causes of which I have treated in the first part of this work, did not paralyse these four millions of people, in a military, and consequently in a political point of view.

This national weakness is occasioned, by a want of youthful vigour. A youthful vigorous nation, is one whose citizens magnanimously sacrifice in case of need, their own interest, to the public good. In a vigorous nation every arm and every purse is stretched forth for the national honour, if it has been offended. In such cases the Americans submit themselves to the insolent foreigners. Nor is there for them any thing else to do, seeing that their love of ease prevents their forming themselves into a serviceable national militia, and their love of money has always made them refuse to pay an adequate number of soldiers.

A nation, where luxury consumes so many of the elements of power, must always remain weak, so long as no radical reformation of manners is effected. Even the people are in America addicted to luxury; even the lowest classes are accustomed to high living; a circumstance, which weakens yet more the republic, and which occasions the enormous importations. The vain women of the sea ports, with the most impudent extravagance deck themselves out at a cost, which might clothe and pay twenty thousand men; and if this extravagance is not quite equal to that of the European capitals, it is not because the passion for luxury, but merely because the means of gratifying it, are wanting. In all the European countries where luxury prevails, the people at least, live frugally; hence fewer of the elements of national power are wasted, than in America; and the nation is enabled to apply them to its defence.

If the Americans manufactured for themselves their articles of luxury, the nation would not be so much weakened, as the consequence would then be an internal circulation of their productions, and not their exportation to foreign lands.

America produces only articles of the first necessity; such for instance as the materials for bread; and as with these, she purchases articles of luxury, the consequence is great dearth; and where dearth prevails, few operations can be effected, unless there should come in from abroad a proportionable affluence of money; this however cannot be the case, in a nation, where amidst great luxury, the articles of luxury, are purchased of foreigners.

These are the physical causes of the weakness of the American republic. But there are likewise moral causes for it, and it is clear, that without them, the others would not exist. In a community, where in general, the great object of life is made to consist in usury, there is little martial fire to be expected, and legions collected from among shopkeepers, were never considered as formidable. The shop-keeping spirit however in that country extends even to the farmers: they too, think of nothing but purchase and sale, and have debt and credit constantly before their eyes.

The numerous fanatical sects likewise contribute in part, to this un-military spirit. I have never heard the quakers celebrated for their heroic spirit. Nor are the Mennonists distinguished as very warlike people. The characteristic ruling passion of all these fanatics is self-interest. The Presbyterians and Independents, were very brave under the conduct of Cromwell, and they performed the most, in the war of the American revolution. But no magnanimous deeds of martial valour, were ever heard to be performed by the two before mentioned sects, nor by Moravians, Methodists, Anabaptists, Baptists, Syncretists, Dulcinists, Pictists, or Quiestists.

This complete want of all proud, and warlike spirit, would be salutary and laudable, inasmuch as it should prevent attacks upon the rights and security of a neighbour; but it is pernicious, blameable, and mean, as it prevents resistance against the usurpations of foreigners. Hence the Americans are compelled to crouch before the English, to crouch before the French, to crouch before the Algerines, and by continual sacrifices, obtain of foreigners to spare the remainder yet a little longer. The Americans want a great stimulus to valour, the glorious warlike deeds of their forefathers. Every European nation has had its splendid warlike period, the remembrance of which inflames the youth with noble enthusiasm. But what great actions of their ancestors can the Americans relate to their youth? The history of their revolutionary war? But there again, are the official letters of General Washington, a lasting monument, which, if they should dare open the mouth to boast, must instantly condemn them to shame and silence.

No man is better acquainted with his nation, than Washington, and no man ever conducted himself better, according to circumstances. But he was probably tired of appearing at the head of the affairs of a nation corrupted in the grain, and altogether regardless of the general interest; and as in the long run even he might find himself unable to defend the political independence of the nation, he withdraws himself from a career, where nothing useful can be established.

The Greeks and Romans are ridiculed by the Americans, for not having understood, so well as themselves, the art of money making.

To form a warlike people, the youth should be hardened by gymnastic and tactical exercises, to the soldier's life; and their souls should be inflamed by ancient history, with the desire to achieve similar actions. But instead of this they are formed from childhood to usury, and their souls are inflamed with a most ardent desire of money.

Such is the people whom we are told to dread. But the Americans are represented as likely to be terrible to us, only in future times; for no man denies that they are at present weak.

But I do not even concur in this opinion; for their population will continually spread to the westward, and at the end of a thousand years, will be very small in comparison with the surface of the land. Now, in order to carry on war, at a distance, a concentrated population is absolutely necessary.

To execute great military undertakings, a government must possess a considerable coercive power, and the subjects must be content to make great sacrifices to the public. I doubt whether this will ever be the case in America. A people desirous of conquests is generally very numerous in proportion to the surface of its country, and a conquering, is commonly a despotic government. In America there will be after the lapse of centuries, uncleared land remaining in plenty, and the government will never be despotic. Nor will the spirit of the people there, ever be warlike.

The posterity of the present Europeans will therefore never have occasion to fear an attack from the Americans.

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THOMAS PAINE'S EPISTLES, TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

A hoary drunkard, with each vice imbued,
Malignant, without wit, and without passion, lewd.
Country Gaz. U. S. Nov. 30th, 1802.

THE EXAMINER, No. II.

The intimate connection between Author Paine and Manager Jefferson, being uncontroversially proved, by a reference to letters and other documents, no less than, by the well known fact, of present personal intimacy; and as, according to the old proverb, "a man is known by the company he keeps," I shall, in the sequel of this examination, make a liberal use of these data. To express my deep-rooted abhorrence at this connection, between the present chief magistrate of the American States, (United they are not, but in name) and that creeping-thing called Thomas Paine, I have only to "brand it with the unchangeable name of meanness," and quote from Paine himself, the definition of that vice. There are in Paine's writings, all sorts of slanderous and acrimonious epithets, and I wish no better manual than his works, to spell out an exact, I may venture to say, a perfect description of Mr. Jefferson's character.

See what he says to sir William Howe, in his Crisis No. 5—which I have taken the pains to read since the author referred to it, in his third epistle. "Mankind are not universally agreed in their determination of right and wrong; but there are certain actions, which the consent of all nations and individuals, hath branded with the unchangeable name of meanness. In the list of human vices, we find some of such a refined constitution, that they cannot be carried into practice, without seducing some virtue to their assistance; but meanness hath neither alliance nor apology. It is generated in the dust and sweepings of other vices, and is of such a hateful figure that all the rest conspire to disown it." If the people of America will tolerate in their first magistrate, this monstrous alliance with such a hateful "figure," nobody ought to be surprized if all the rest of mankind "conspire to disown them."

But there is in America, I fully believe, a numerous sect, who will not tamely tolerate this alliance; they will make it the constant theme of censure, of complaint and of remonstrance, and whether their frowns produce any effect or not, their solemn protest will be entered of record.

So early as July 1801, I find a record in the Port-Folio of your protest Mr. Oldschool, against the then current rumour, that Thomas Paine had been invited to return in a national ship to America, by the first magistrate of a free people. It is as follows.

"If, during the present season of national abasement, infatuation, folly and vice, any portent could surprise, sober men would be utterly confounded by an article current in all our newspapers, that the loathsome Thomas Paine, a drunken atheist, and the scavenger of faction, is invited to return in a national ship, to America, by the first Magistrate of a free people. A measure so enormously preposterous, we cannot yet believe has been adopted, and it would demand firmer nerves than those possessed by Mr. Jefferson, to hazard such an insult to the moral sense of the nation. If that rebel rascal should come to preach from his bible to our populace, it would be time for every honest and insulted man of dignity to flee to some Zoar as from another Sodom, to 'shake off the very dust of his feet,' and abandon 'America.' Strong as this language may seem, it is by no means too nervous for the occasion, for, of all insults that can be offered, the most flagrant are those, which assault the religious code, and offend the moral sense of a nation: and although 'the first magistrate of a free people,' has dared to commit this outrage against his country—I will be bold to say, there is not a king, a consul nor a despot in Europe, who would have displayed so little delicacy and testified so little regard to the feelings of his enslaved subjects. But we are free, sovereign and independent, and what is more, Thomas Paine, has come, by the invitation of president Thomas Jefferson, 'to preach from his bible, to our populace.'"

It is not my design to remonstrate against this intimate alliance, by the mere application of harsh and general epithets, to the character and conduct of Thomas Paine. I can prove from various sources, that this man stands upon record, as a traitor to his trust; as a busy, officious and pestering meddler, in affairs with which he had no business; and that for these sins, he was publicly reproached and dismissed from office, by the American congress of 1779. I will prove further, that Mr. Jefferson could not be ignorant of this act of treachery, and that from that hour, he knew or ought to have known, that Thomas Paine could only disgrace any body, who cherished his acquaintance, or confided in his principles.

In the Journals of Congress, vol. 3, Folwell's edition, under date 17th, April 1777, is a resolve in these words.

"Resolved, That the stile of the committee of secret correspondence be altered, and that for the future, it be stiled the committee of foreign affairs. That a secretary be appointed to the said committee, with a salary of seventy dollars a month.

"That the said secretary, previous to his entering on his office, take an oath, to be administered by the president;" "well and faithfully to execute the trust reposed in him, according to his best skill and judgment, and to disclose no matter, the knowledge of which shall be acquired in consequence of such, his office, that he shall be directed to keep secret." "Also the oath prescribed for the officers of the army," the latter clause of which is, "I do swear, &c. &c. that I will serve the United States in the office of — which I now hold, and in any other office which I may hereafter hold, by their appointment or under their authority, with fidelity and honour, and according to the best of my skill and understanding."

"Congress proceeded to the election of the said secretary, and the ballots being taken,

Thomas Paine was elected."

Here was an honourable and lucrative office bestowed upon Paine, and I should like to hear from his own confession, who was the member of congress, that put him in nomination....perhaps he does not know, or has forgotten....He has not probably forgotten the fable of the "countryman and the adder." How well he deserved this distinguished mark of confidence and trust, and how sacredly he observed the oaths he took, when sworn into office, a few more references to the journals of Congress will enable us to discover.

Meantime I am,

Your friend,

THE EXAMINER.

Oliver Oldschool, Esq.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

An original work, and greatly superior to the ordinary poetical trifles of the hour, has been put into my eager hands, and caught my roving eye with the dazzling title of "The Meteors." This glittering name is not arrogantly assumed. The following are like "the sparkles of a glancing star." They are bright and beautiful, and thus gild my evening hour.

I bought a horse; the owner swore
He had no fault, was far from vicious:
Thus much was well, I ask'd no more
Not choosing to be thought capricious.

When, lo! to my surprise, I find,
This faultless horse is almost blind.
In haste, I hie me back to meet
My jockey; find him—"sir, this cheat
Will never do; the nag's unsound,
Has not an eye to see the ground!"
Friend, quoth the man, as sharp as salt,
"Tis his misfortune....not his fault."

The subject of Plagiarism has never been more merrily treated, than in the ensuing tale, which not Marot, not La Fontaine, not John Hall Stevenson, could have told with more naivete, than our author. All is easy, all is animated. The versification flows incredibili lenitate, like the river, described by Cæsar.

A Poet being once accus'd
That many of the thoughts he used
Were stolen; with patience heard his friend,
An author likewise, to the end.

"That paragraph, I own, is fine,
But I can show you, line for line,
From whence you every beauty took,
'Tis in a most uncommon book
Where every thought of yours, and better,
I lately found in old black letter."

In vain the other urg'd his plea,
That great wits sometimes might agree:
"Well, well, (he adds) let truth prevail,
It will not spoil the following

TALK.

Young Kitty grew so fair a maid,
That Grandmama was much afraid
To trust the damsel out of view,
Lest any mischief should ensue;
Experience is the test of truth,
The old lady prov'd it in her youth;
So, for good reasons she could bring,
Kept Kitty near her apron string.

Now Kitty's grandsire was of mind,
Restraint, of whatsoever kind,
Was wrong, except when he, in vain,
Besought his dearest to restrain
The gentle warblings of that tongue,
On which most honey'd accents hung,
Sweets; too luxuriantly enjoy'd,
That long ago his taste had cloy'd.
Thus, either party claim'd the art
To guard fair Kitty's tender heart.

The old lady led a tiresome life,
For Kitty long'd to be a wife,
And though full many a suitor came
Not one could please the cautious dame.
Among the rest young Clodio strove,
The fair one listened to his love,
Which fact once known....the youth no more
Dar'd set his foot within the door.

The banish'd lover bore his doom
Like others, humbly, I presume,
That is, he wrote, and brib'd the maid,
Who all his billets doux convey'd.
His mistress, as his zeal deserv'd,
The intercourse of souls preserv'd.

But absence is a cruel state,
'Tis needless to expatiate,
And shew how, during this dread trial,
Love measures time, unlike the dial,
My muse her story ne'er delays
By dwelling on the et ceteras.

A secret meeting was projected,
And very speedily effected;
'Twas just about the break of day,
When most good folks in slumber lay;
And Betty's head, invention rich-in,
Contriv'd the scene should be the kitchen.

When down stairs tripping came the lady
Her faithful swain was there already....
What bliss!....But offered, ah! in vain,
For Tray that moment slips his chain;
He hears a stranger's voice below
And needs must let his master know.
Uncourteous dog! has never heard
Truth should not always be declar'd!

The echoing bark resounds above,
And Prudence flies to succour Love,
Sir Simon rose, his Lady's will,
To know why Tray can not keep still.
Now Kitty, what thy trepidation!
Thy lover....and thy reputation
In equal danger!...." Betty, say,
Have you no plan....no scheme....or way
To let this gentleman escape,
And get us fairly from the scrape?
Your master comes in anger hot,
Oh Clodio! I shall see thee shot!"

But Genius, when demanded most,
Too frequently deserts his post.
So 'twas with Betty, whose desire,
Though simply to conceal the squire,
Could scarce accomplish it before
Sir Simon thunder'd at the door.

"Hey day," said he, "what's here to do!
What Kitty up! has Tray wak'd you?
And Betty too!....'tis very careful,
I thought you women were more fearful!
That noisy mastiff barks for sport,
I've half a mind to hang him for't,
Nad but this pistol ball and powder,
I'd make him yelp a little louder."

But Beelzebub, or proverbs lie,
Must have a finger in each pie.
It came into my lady's head,
That she had better leave her bed;
So down she comes, and in she dashes,
Poor Kitty turns as pale as ashes.

The old lady easily believes
She's not in danger from the thieves;
For, if Sir Simon should have found 'em,
He must, ere this, have ta'en and bound 'em:
That fancy gave her no great fear,
Another did, as you shall hear.

'Tis very odd, thought she, that miss
Should be below so soon as this;
What though we all imagin'd danger,
That only makes the thing the stranger;
Us common thieves, indeed, are those
Which females run the first to oppose.
Sir Simon have you scar'd 'em, dear?....
"My love, no thief have I seen here,
That Tray is an unlucky cur...."
"He is, indeed! (quoth Betty,) sir,
To call my master up so early,
And fright us all for nothing....nearly;
My dear young lady snatch'd her gown,
And made me instantly come down
To hide what most in hazard stood,
And save what valuables we could."

"But, (adds the old lady,) are you sure,
Since things are never too secure,
The villains are not somewhere hid?
Which accident may heaven forbid."

"I've search'd the place, my dear, all over,
The devil a rogue can I discover!"

"Well, well, Sir Simon, be it so,
But I'll search further, ere I go;
Come Betty....bear that light before,
And every corner we'll explore:
Sir Simon does things like a sloven,
Suppose....we peep into that oven."

"La! Madam, may I be so bold,
That oven's full as it can hold;
They can't be there; 'tis vain to seek...."
"Do, Betty, mind me, when I speak."

Poor Betty from experience knew
Prevarication would not do,
And therefore hesitates no more
But, trembling....opes the oven's door:
No time to peep....that very minute
Bounc'd out our Clodio, hid within it.

To paint the general consternation,
Would too much lengthen the narration.
Now, says my lady, love, you see,
Fine works were here, except for me!
Pretty!...."Stop, stop," Sir Simon cries,
"I always grant you very wise;
I own it, to my great disgrace,
I ne'er had thought of such a place.
The oven, it must be confess'd,
Was the last place I should have guess'd,
And yet 'tis odd the thought struck you,
Or any.....WHO'VE NOT BEEN THERE TOO."

Now friend, the bard accus'd, exclaim'd,
You see the point at which I've aim'd:
You would have borrowed from the store
Had I not rummaged it before;
Leave censure to the critic throng,
Brother, we both are in the wrong.

I have the greatest possible respect for the holy institution of matrimony, and, with our modest Milton,

Of the genial bed,
With most mysterious reverence I deem.

How often have I exclaimed with the experienced Solomon, that two are better than one, and how often have I re-echoed the pensive remark of an apocryphal writer, who, with a sigh from his bachelor heart, informs us, that He, who hath no wife, wandereth up and down mourning. It is shameful, the Vicar of Wakefield would say, to continue single, and only talk of population, and none but those, who are hardened sinners, and obstinately impenitent in the ways of celibacy, could approve of the following sarcasm at wedded life. Let witlings joke, and let the gibing Gibbon sneer at the married,
"For my single self," I like to see Benedict and Beatrice in unison. I abominate the allegory of Louisa, in the last stanza, and I copy the poem for its literary merit, without presuming to give my sanction to the satire.

THE HONEY MOON.

Serene and tranquil was the night,
The night that clos'd the summer day,
And brilliant shone the Moon, and bright,
And warm and tender was her ray.

"How like our loves," the husband cried,
As on his arm Louisa hung....
Scarce had Louisa been a bride,
And both were fond, and both were young.

This Moon, how like our love, my dear,
He said, and clasp'd her round the waist;
'Tis pure and perfect, and sincere,
Tender and true, and warm, though chaste.

Time flew....the youthful pair again
Enjoy'd at eve the stilly vale;
The Moon still shone, but in the wane,
Her form less round, her face more pale.

This too is like our love, my queen,
For though less radiant and less bright;
Yet still o'er all this sylvan scene,
She sheds a soft and pleasing light.

Louisa bow'd her beauteous head,
And yet a sigh escap'd her breast;
Perhaps the fair one would have said,
She lik'd the first bright moon the best.

Time linger'd, yet again the pair
The balmy breath of eve imbib'd;
And now less perfect, yet still fair,
The Moon, alas! two horns describ'd.

This too is love, Louisa says,
The love, my dear, that life adorns!
Perfect, at first, it soon decays,
Decays and ends, at last, in quans,

I believe it was Lady Montague, or the author of Lady Montague's letters, for their genuineness has been doubted by recent incredulity, who first shewed us fashionable specimens of Turkish poetry.
Her versions, whether prose or poetical, were not of much value, and are now forgotten. Whatever Sir William Jones has translated from the dialects of the East will continue coeval with his fame, and the following ode will probably be lost only with that elegant English, in which it is rendered.

A TURKISH ODE OF MESIHI.

Translated by Sir William Jones.

Hear how the nightingales, on every spray,
Hail in wild notes the sweet return of May!
The gale, that o'er yon waving almond blows,
The verdant bank with silver blossoms strows:
The smiling season decks each flowery glade.
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

What gales of fragrance scent the vernal air!
Hills, dales, and woods, their loveliest mantles wear.
Who knows what cares await that fatal day,
When ruder guests shall banish gentle May!
Even death, perhaps, our vallies will invade,
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

The tulip now its varied hue displays,
And sheds, like Ahmed's eye, celestial rays.
Ah, nation ever faithful, ever true,
The joys of youth, while May invites, pursue!
Will not these notes your timorous minds persuade?
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

The sparkling dew-drops o'er the lillies play,
Like orient pearls, or like the beams of day.
If love and mirth your wanton thoughts engage,
Attend, ye nymphs (a poet's words are sage.)
While thus you sit beneath the trembling shade,
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

The fresh blown rose like Zeineb's cheek appears,
When pearls, like dew drops, glitter in her ears.
The charms of youth at once are seen and past;
And nature says, 'They are too sweet to last.'
So blooms the rose; and so the blushing maid!
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

See yon anemones their leaves unfold,
With rubies flaming, and with living gold!
While crystal flowers from weeping clouds descend,
Enjoy the presence of the tuneful friend.
Now, while the wines are brought, the sofa's lay'd,
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

The plants no more are dried, the meadows dead,
No more the rose-bud hangs her pensive head:
The shrubs revive in vallies, meads, and bowers,
And every stalk is diadem'd with flowers;
In silken robes each hillock stands array'd,
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

Clear drops each morn impearl the rose's bloom,
And from its leaf the zephyr drinks perfume;
The dew buds expand their lucid store:
Be this our wealth: ye damsels, ask no more.
Though wise men envy, and though fools upbraid,
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

The dew-drops, sprinkled by the musky gale,
Are chang'd to essence, ere they reach the dale.
The mild blue sky a rich pavilion spreads,
Without our labor, o'er our favour'd heads.
Let others toil in war, in arts, or trade,
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

Late, gloomy winter chill'd the sullen air,
Till Soliman arose, and all was fair.
Soft in his reign the notes of love resound,
And Pleasure's rosy cup goes freely round.
Here on the bank, which man ling vines o'er shade,
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

May this rude lay from age to age remain,
A true memorial of this lovely train.
Come, charming maid, and hear thy poet sing,
Thyself the rose, and he the bird of spring:
Love bids him sing, and love will be obey'd.
Be gay: too soon the flowers of spring will fade.

CRITICISM.

REVIEW OF LYCEE, &c.

(Concluded.)

Lycee; ou, Cours de Literature, Ancienne et Moderne
Par J. F. La Harpe. 12 Tom. 8vo. A Paris, chez, H. Agasse, Imprimeur Libraire, Rue des Poitevins, An 7 de la Republique. i. e. The Lyceum; or, a course of Literature, Ancient and Modern. 1800.

His criticism on the history, philosophy, and miscellaneous literature of each of the three periods, into which he divides his history, is much more short and cursory than that on the two other subjects. He treats of the Greek and Roman historians under two classes:—In the first he ranks Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Livy, Sallust, Tacitus, and Quintus Curtius. He gives a detailed account of the merits and defects of each; in which, if he has fallen into any error, it is with regard to Thucydides, to whom he greatly prefers Sallust, and almost every historian in the class. Thucydides, by the ancients, was looked upon as a perfect model of historic wisdom and dignity. We think he has made several very just observations in defence of the speeches in the ancient historians, which he has employed a whole section to vindicate. His account of the historians in the second class, though short, is sufficient to give a very distinct idea of the character of each, and a pretty accurate notion of their merits and defects. In almost every instance his judgment is enlightened, and may be trusted. He professes to give but a superficial review of philosophy, which he could not expect, he says, to render equally interesting to his auditors with his other subjects. He examines the philosophy of Plato; but, we think, he has erred farther from his plan in his case, than in any other part of his book. Instead of examining the writings of Plato as the subject of taste, he gives a detailed account of his abstract notions, and metaphysical conjectures; in which much was certainly not to be found the object of praise. Had he considered Plato, as we think it was the nature of his plan to have done, as a moral and eloquent writer of the first class, he would have been more interesting as well as instructive. It is rather wonderful that it did not occur to so enlightened a writer, that here was a most proper place to deliver a criticism on dialogue writing; a species of composition, the nature of which has been less developed than any other, and of which Plato was the inventor. And it would certainly have been very much to his purpose to have explained that exquisite art with which Plato conducts his argument, and which, not less than the charms of his style, renders him the most bewitching of authors. He next examines at considerable length, the philosophical writings of Plutarch, which he warmly recommends, and the beauties of which he very justly details. Cicero, of all the philosophers of antiquity, is he whose writings he most esteems, and he certainly points out their excellencies with great skill, and shews a very complete acquaintance with their contents, and a strong feeling of their merits. As to Seneca, with whom he closes his account of the ancient philosophy, we rather think he has been led, from opposition to Diderot, who affected to set Seneca above all writers, to undervalue that celebrated author, who, though he has some defects of style, which have been enlarged upon, certainly possesses the most dazzling eloquence, and has a power of warning his reader upon moral subjects beyond any author almost with whom we are acquainted.

Such is the plan of this author's critical review of ancient literature. He shews himself to be very thoroughly acquainted with it. And though he is a warm, he is not a superstitious admirer of the ancients. The three first volumes of this work may be safely recommended as a body of just criticism upon ancient literature, more full and minute than any which has yet been presented to the public.

We shall not be particular in our account of what he has done, respecting the two remaining periods of his review. Indeed it will not be necessary, because his mode of procedure is almost exactly the same in these, which we have seen it to be in the former. In the literature of the age of Louis the fourteenth, there is no epic poem to review; for it is only the literature of France, which our author considers in his two last periods. He proceeds, therefore, immediately to the drama. And, with the same minuteness which we described him to have employed with regard to the ancient dramatic poets, and even still greater, he analyzes and examines each of the plays of Corneille and Racine; describing the circumstances in which they were produced, the success they had, the art of the poet, in such pieces, and all its excellencies and defects. He enumerates and characterises all the inferior writers of tragedy, during the same period; and then proceeds to comedy; when, after a short account of those who preceded Moliere, he dwells at great length upon that author, and then, as he did in tragedy, gives a more cursory review of all the inferior comic writers of the age of Louis the fourteenth. After this he considers the opera of the same period, chiefly that of Quinault; the odes, the satirical and epistolary poetry, fables, tales, pastoral poetry and the different kinds of light poetry.

The next subject is the eloquence of the age of Louis the fourteenth. He mentions first, the eloquence of the bar, and that of the deliberative kind in popular assemblies. But, though he thinks France did produce some specimens in both these kinds at that period, of no little merit, he allows they were but few; and that the circumstances of France were not favourable to produce them. He finds compensation in the eloquence of the pulpit. This he divides into two kinds; the funeral oration, and the sermon. And, after some observations on the earlier productions of both species in France, he enlarges upon Bossuet, as a model almost perfect in the former, and Massillon, in the latter. Several just and uncommon remarks are made on the nature of this species of composition. And every reader of taste will be pleased with the full development which he has given us of the beauties of style and thought in Bossuet and Massillon. He allows that France had not much to boast of her historical compositions in the time of Louis XIV. He is a great admirer of Bossuet's Discourse on Universal History: he praises Fleury's Ecclesiastical History: and speaks with respect of some of the productions of Vertot. He gives a whole section to the consideration of memoirs; in which he mentions, with particular praise, those of Jeannin, of Villeroy, of Torcy, of Turenne, of Sully, the Letters of Cardinal d'Ossat, the Memoirs of Mademoiselle de Montpensier and Molleville. "But for the knowledge of men and of affairs," says he, "nothing can be compared, even at the greatest distance, with the Memoirs of Cardinal de Retz: 'tis the most precious monument, in that kind, which remains to us of the last age."

We can do little more than barely name the different authors in philosophy, whom he has criticised, and declare our opinion that his appreciation both of their doctrines, and of their talent in delivering them, is, for the most part, perfectly correct. The writers in metaphysics, whom he examines, are, Descartes, Pascal, Fenelon, Malebranche, and Bayle. His account of Bayle is really valuable, because it has seldom fallen to the lot of that man to be either praised or blamed, with moderation. Neither the metaphysics of Descartes nor Fenelon, perhaps, deserve all the praise which he bestows upon them. We are better metaphysicians in Britain than they are in France. But it is pleasing to observe this learned and ingenious man, in the situation in which he is placed, so attached to the sentiments of religion and morality, that he cannot help regarding, with veneration, every opinion, which has been employed with success in their defence. As writers in morals, he names Fenelon, Nicole, Duguet, Laroche-foucauld, Labruyere, and St. Evremond. Most of his observations on each of them are just and interesting. But his criticism on Laroche-foucauld is the fullest which we remember to have seen; and, though a little more metaphysical acumen be wanting to the complete refutation of that author's maxims, what he has said is highly valuable. A short criticism on romances and tales concludes this part of his subject.

Of the literature of the last period we have the criticism of the poetry only. He promises some additional volumes on the philosophy of the eighteenth century. Into the poetry of this period he enters with the greatest minuteness of detail. No less than four volumes are employed upon it. He begins with the Henriade of Voltaire, of which he is a great admirer. He is too wise and too candid not to admit its defects, but he contends that it has many, and great beauties; and we think he does prove that it has been, in general, under-rated. He examines the tragedies of Voltaire, in no less than two full volumes: and much fine instruction on that species of composition is to be found in them! It is here, indeed, that we think this author chiefly excels. He omits not the writers of the second class. And when he has thus fully discussed the tragic writing of this period, he passes on to the comedies. He first examines that curious question, whether to write a tragedy or a comedy be most difficult? where the reader will find several ingenious and important observations. And then he appreciates the merits, one after another, of the numerous comic writers of this period. He examines, with great judgment, the nature and merits of that new species of drama, which was introduced into France by La Chaussée, and which they sometimes call Comedie Mixte, sometimes Larmoyante, and criticizes with his usual correctness, the productions in that kind, of Voltaire, Diderot, and others. The last volume contains criticisms on the heroic and comic epics, and the different writers of these two descriptions, which have appeared in France, during the last century.

We cannot close this account of Laharpe's work, without mentioning a very eloquent discourse, prefixed to his review of the literature of the eighteenth century, and delivered in the Lyceum in December 1794; in which he describes, in the most glowing colours of horror and indignation, the persecution which literature had suffered during a few of the preceding years, and the utter abasement into which France had been sunk, with regard to every thing, the object of taste, reason, sentiment or virtue.

"Shall our wretched tyrants," says he, "be compared to the men, who have effected revolutions in other countries; and who, setting morality aside, were great men?" "There is not one of ours," continues he, "and history will prove it, whom Cromwell would have employed as a sergeant in his army, or a messenger to one of his offices." "Methinks I see them yet," cries he, "those ruffians under the name of patriots, those oppressors of the nation, under the name of magistrates of the people, mixing themselves among us in crowds, with their grotesque apparel, which they called exclusively that of patriotism; as if patriotism must of necessity be ridiculous and impure; with their coarse accent and brutal language, which they called republican; as if grossness and indecency were so essentially republican; with their haggard countenance and wild and troubled eyes, the witness of an evil conscience, throwing around them looks at once stupid and threatening, on the instruments of the sciences, of which they did not even know the names; on the monuments of the arts, which were so strange to them; on the busts of those great men, the mention of whom had scarcely ever reached their ears: and one would have said, that the sight of all that literary pomp, of all that innocent luxury of all those riches of taste and genius, roused within them that sullen and ferocious hatred, that internal rage concealed within the darkest doublings of self-love, which stirs up in secret the ignorant and ill-conditioned man against every thing, which is more valuable than himself."

It is certainly an objection to this book, that the part of it which treats of modern literature, should be confined so exclusively to that of France. It cannot be so interesting to Englishmen, as if it had been mixed with criticisms upon the favourite authors of this and the other countries of Europe. And we should think, scarcely so interesting even to Frenchmen themselves. We suspect, too, that it will appear tedious to the readers, who seek only for amusement in books. We are pretty certain, however, that the person, who wants to be inured to habits of accurate investigation, and to have his judgment exercised, in just decision, concerning the objects of taste, will not find fault either with the number of the subjects of judgment, which this author has brought forward, or the minuteness, with which he enters into their merits and defects. Yet, it is, perhaps, to be granted, that there is a diffusion of style in the book, which spins it out to a greater length than is necessary. But this is the character of French composition: and an English writer of tolerable merit generally condenses more thoughts into one page, than the very best of the French put into two. But then this nervous Englishman will not have all the flowing softness in his periods, without which a Frenchman would not be read. And those of our authors who study this delicate accomplishment, have, in general, all the diffusion of a French writer, without his vivacity.

It is certainly no little praise to say of a Frenchman, who has passed through all that has happened in that country, for a few years, before and since the revolution, that though intimately connected with the principal philosophers of the age, and even, at one period, partially infected with their detestable principles, he very soon perceived, and manfully retracted, his error; and has suffered no vestige, either of their fantastical taste, or abominable licentiousness to remain on his mind. And it is surely a pleasing consideration to persons of every country, that a man is now employed to instruct the inhabitants of Paris, with a taste, formed upon the pure models of ancient Greece and Rome, and the best productions of the former days of French literary glory, who has the utmost contempt for the weakness of that pretended philosophy, which has turned every thing upside down, and the greatest abhorrence of its tendency, and who understands and values the solidity and truth, as well as the salutary influence, of those venerable doctrines, which unite the heart of man to the author and to the partners of his nature

THOMAS PAINE.

[The subsequent article is descriptive of one, who, in a bill of indictment, found by a grand jury of the universe, might be described, as THE COMMON DISTURBER OF NATIONS. Thomas Paine is a perpetual rebel; not only a foe to Christianity, but to civil obedience, not only an enemy to subordination, but to society. His favorable reception, among Americans, would foully tarnish our national honour; for it is notorious that men of his own jacobinical complexion, and zealots for the propagation of his own theories, have long since abandoned the degraded man, though they strive to disseminate the opinions of the factious writer.]

Before Paine fled from England to receive the fraternal hug of the regicides of France, he made a house in London called the White Bear, in Picadilly, his usual place of residence. The house, which was a respectable one, became so notorious on account of Paine's visits, that the landlord was not only under the necessity of absolutely forbidding the Infidel to enter his door, but to circulate handbills acquainting the public that Thomas Paine was no longer suffered to visit the White Bear. Paine's character in Paris is well known to have been so despicable, even among those that belonged to the same party, that his company was avoided like the presence of a person infected with the plague. He never associated but with the meanest and lowest of the scribbling tribe; indeed he was suffered to associate with no others. Frequently he was found rolling and tossing in the streets, in a state of intoxication that astonished the Parisians unused to such spectacles of human depravation; they called him the English Ourang Outang. One evening Paine was caught in this disgraceful state, and was conveyed to an exhibition of wild beasts, kept near the Palais Royal, where he was displayed during his state of intoxication, in a cage, along with a bear and a monkey, to the no small amusement of the Sans Culottes. This happened in the year 1797, when a Mr. Benjamin Sword, a respectable merchant of Glasgow, was in Paris, who was present at the spectacle. Mr. Sword afterwards dined in a select company of Scotch gentlemen, where the unfortunate Thomas Muir was present, as also Tom Paine. The author of the Age of Reason in a few hours got so completely besotted, that they were under the necessity of having him dragged out, and conveyed home to his lodgings in a fiacre. It was solely at the request of Mr. Sword, that Paine was invited as even Muir, his fellow sufferer in politics, was too much of a Christian to relish the conversation of such an infidel.

For the last eight years our hero existed in Paris solely on the charity of the booksellers, who employed him a few hours in the morning, the only part of the day during which Paine was sober, in correcting the press. His lodgings were frequently in some cellar, in some remote lane of the city, and frequently he has been known to be so reduced as to be under the necessity of serving the Parisian Poissards to open and clean their shell fish! This description of Paine may appear to some to be exaggerated, but so far from that, it conveys but a very faint idea of the misery, the filth and the contempt, which attended the author of Common Sense during his residence in Paris; indeed scarcely any words can paint the wretched life he usually led. It was not until the arrival of Chancellor Livingston, that Paine was honored with the visit of a single respectable American. The attention which our minister paid to this infidel, not only astonished, but even disgusted the Court of the First Consul. It gave to Bonaparte but a very contemptible idea of the talents of Mr. Livingston. When the chancellor was first introduced to the First Consul, the latter received him with the coldest indifference. Talleyrand observed Bonaparte's behaviour, and took the opportunity of informing him that Mr. Livingston was a character that held the first reputation in the United States. "He may hold what reputation he may," (said Bonaparte) "I know mankind as well as most people, and the conduct of that American certainly does not impress my mind with the most favorable opinion." The public may rely upon the correctness of this observation of Bonaparte respecting Mr. Livingston. It was received directly from a Mr. Lapigare, a French gentleman of the greatest respectability, and an intimate acquaintance of the chancellor's, who resides near Hudson, in the state of New-York. Mr. Lapigare had the perusal of a letter from Paris which contained the observation. Had Mr. Lapigare been a Federalist, the democrats, no doubt, would immediately insist upon the story being a forgery; but as Mr. Lapigare is well known in the state where he resides, to be a warm Jeffersonian, no such conclusion can be drawn, nor will Mr. Lapigare deny his having said so, and he added, at the same time, that the countenance which Mr. Livingston gave Paine, in his opinion, was the cause of it.

How humiliating is it to Americans to be told that the fourth of July was celebrated by their minister and their countrymen in Paris, by giving a public entertainment to the greatest infidel on earth!

STATISTICAL REMARKS.

The number of the inhabitants of a country or city is almost renewed every thirty years; and, in a century, the human race is renewed three times and one third.

If we allow three generations for a century, and suppose the world to be only five thousand seven hundred years old, there appears to have been one hundred and seventy-one generations since the creation of the world to the present time, one hundred and twenty-four since the deluge, and fifty-three since the Christian era; and as there is not a family that can prove its origin even so far back as the emperor Charlemagne, it consequently follows that the most ancient families are unable to trace their origin farther back than thirty generations. Very few indeed can trace so far, without diving into fiction.

Out of one thousand infants, who are nursed by the mother, about three hundred die; of the same number, committed to the care of strange nurses, it is calculated that five hundred perish.

Among the one hundred and fifteen deaths, their may be reckoned one woman in child-bed; but only one of four hundred dies in labour.

The small-pox, in the natural way, usually carries off eight out of one hundred.

By inoculation, one dies out of three hundred.

It is remarked, that more girls than boys die of the small-pox in the natural way.

From the calculations founded on the bills of mortality, only one out of three thousand one hundred and twenty-six reaches the age of one hundred.

More people live to a greater age in elevated situations than in those which are lower.

The probability is, that a new born child will live to the age of thirty-four years and six months.

The proportion of the deaths of women to those of men is, one hundred to one hundred and eight; the probable duration of a man's life is sixty years.

Married women live longer than those who are not married.

By observations made during the space of fifty years it has been found that the greatest number of deaths has been in the month of March; and next to that, the months of August and September. In November, December, and February, there are the fewest deaths.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

SLANDER.

Pearce v. Luckfield.

Mr. Erskine stated the case for the plaintiff; his client was an attorney, who lived in Fitzroy-square; the defendant was a German, a musical instrument maker, connected with the house of Longman and Broderip: the jury, (from their frequent attendance in that court) must be aware, that those attorneys, who were proved to have misconducted themselves in their profession, were always punished with proper severity; it was, therefore, but just, that those who conducted themselves uprightly, should, by the verdict of a jury, protect their characters from malicious slanderers; his client had been, called upon by a Mr. Fountain, to draw the will of Mr. Mason, a publican, who lived in Tottenham Court Road, but who was then in such a bad state of health, that his death was daily expected. He accordingly went to the house, but was obstructed, as much as possible, by Mrs. Mason and the defendant, from seeing the sick man; he, however, insisted on admittance, took Mr. Mason's instructions, and drew his will. In consequence of this, the defendant, who was on the most intimate terms of friendship (if it was nothing more than friendship) with Mrs. Mason, quarrelled with him, abused him, and told him, in the presence of other persons, "that he was no attorney, but a petty-fogging scoundrel, that he had drawn his own will, and not the will of Mr. Mason, and that he came there to help to rob Mrs. Mason of her property." Such words as these, spoken of an attorney, were clearly actionable; and when they were said of an honest man, acting faithfully in the discharge of his trust, it was the duty of his client, who possessed a character and who valued it, to bring a slanderer of this description, before a jury of his country, and give him an opportunity of justifying his expressions, if they are true, under the penalty of being recorded as a slanderer, should they appear to be false.

Mr. Fountain, the first witness for the plaintiff, said, that he was related to the late Mr. Mason, and had been a school-fellow of his; that, hearing he was ill, he called at his house to see him, but was told he had gone to Fulham; not believing this story, he forced his way to his bed-chamber, and found him in a dying state. He was much shocked at this discovery, and after some little conversation with him, he sent for the plaintiff to take Mr. Mason's instructions, and draw his will. When the plaintiff came to the house, he was opposed by the defendant and Mrs. Mason; he, however, drew his will, and an altercation afterwards ensued, in which the defendant used words to the effect of those stated by Mr. Erskine, from the declaration.

A Mr. Spencer, a surgeon and apothecary, (who attended Mason) and a Mr. Thompson, swore positively to the expressions having been made use of by the defendant; but it appeared, that they rather proceeded from passion, and the irritation of the moment, than from any deliberate malicious intention of injuring the character of the plaintiff in his profession.

Mr. Park addressed the jury in mitigation of damages. He thought mere nominal damages would meet the justice of the case.

Lord Ellenborough told the jury, that the words were clearly proved to have been spoken, and that they were actionable. It was the province of the jury, however, to proportion the damages, they should give, to the injury sustained, and to the circumstances of the case. It appeared to him, that those expressions rather proceeded from sudden passion than deliberate malice.... Verdict for the plaintiff; damages 10l.

ANECDOTE FOUNDED ON FACT.

A few days, prior to the late election, while the trade of being be citizenized was driving apace, one of the people, called Irish, having a brother, who had applied for a certificate, took the trouble to wait upon the proper officer, for the purpose of obtaining it. His business being made known.... the officer enquired the reason why, his brother had not come in person for the certificate? "To tell you the truth sir," (says Patrick) "my brother is too drunk to come, and as I did not wish him exposed, I thought best to come myself. Well, but somebody certified t'other day, that your brother was a person of good moral character, and of course, a sober man." By Jasus, said Patrick, if they had known him, as well as I do, they would have been clear of certifying any such thing.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[Amid the difficulties of his public duty, few things cheer the Editor more than such approbation and such advice, as the following]

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM A VENERABLE FRIEND IN PENNSYLVANIA.

I know not what to reply to your invitation to write, occasionally, in your paper. When my mind is warm with old-fashioned sentiments, I am sometimes ready to wish that they were communicated to the public; and, on the other hand, when I reflect on the frequent ignorance, stupidity, and blindness of the sovereign people, and the extent to which they are apt to carry their resentments. I am afraid to have any thing to do with them. For, if I should happen to differ in opinion from any of their favourite demagogues, or if my sentiments should be found to be not perfectly Gallo-republican, I might be calumniated in the Aurora; and though it is sometimes necessary that a chimney sweeper, or a scavenger be knocked down, yet a gentleman is loth to approach such filthy personages, for fear of being soiled by their soot and mud. I am glad that you have never promised to publish an impartial paper. I approve of your general plan, and of that variety of matter, by which you strive to allure squeamish readers, but I am afraid you must depend chiefly on your own stores, as I suppose it would be difficult to find, at present, many assistants. I am sometimes diffident of the propriety of admitting Latin, even though it has the advantage of not being understood, for as to French, it is quite another thing, being the language of republicans. I think all apology for your assumed name of Oldschool, is unnecessary in an age, in which Messidor, and Floreal, duo-di, tre-di, &c. are reckoned elegant compounds; for if it be legal and agreeable to Jacobin principles, to stitch Greek and Latin together, in the clumsy manner of the Taylors, who compiled the new French Calendar, it cannot surely be improper to combine two pure English words, even though they are plain and intelligible. In a country so slow to reward useful labour, and so frequently ungrateful for actual service, it is impossible accurately to predict the future fortune of your work. But, if you can procure active and sincere friends to circulate it in other states, especially to the eastward, it may in time, force itself into public notice. But you will not expect to find many subscribers in this state, which is so deeply immersed in jacobinism. Many disappointments and inconveniencies must be expected, and you must fortify your spirit contemptuously to disregard the insolence of impertinent dictation and the abjectness of timid counsels. You are right to insist on payment in advance, lest to all other inconveniencies, that of bad debtors should be superadded, and such are apt to abound in an age of so much liberty.

I am,

With sincere esteem, yours.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The communication, from a friend, of some loose sheets of the London Magazine, for July 1802, is very acceptable. Our poetical department will be enriched by the supply, from which some choice selections, will speedily be made.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers at Boston, Salem, New-York, Baltimore, Norfolk, Richmond, Charleston and Savannah, are thanked by the Editor, for their prompt and punctual attention to his wishes. If it were not for the liberal subscriptions he receives from many literary characters, in the above indicated places, not a moiety of the ordinary expenses, even of printing the Port Folio, could be discharged from the funds of the establishment. A literary paper, without the gainful aid of advertisements, relies for its support upon distant subscribers, a general circulation, and regular receipts. Gentlemen, who wish to read our Third volume, will please to give the Editor early notice, and he hopes that all who are indebted for past Port Folio's, will have the justice to cancel our claims, and that all, who choose to encourage the future publication, will have the liberality to pay in season.

(FROM THE ANTI-DEMOCRAT.)

[In the Epistola Heroidum of OVID, the classical reader will instantly remember the original of the following, and the mere English reader may find, in some of the miscellanies of the day, a translation, we believe, by the celebrated Mrs. Anna BARN. In the Anti-Democrat, a Baltimore paper, conducted by Mr. PRENTISS, the following ludicrous letter, supposed to be addressed to a philosophic personage, by a jettty mistress, has made us laugh and sneer at republican morality; and our readers, the ANCIENT GENTLEMEN of the country, will find, in the ensuing verses, fresh food to feed and increase their contempt for democratic imposture.]

PHYLLIS TO DEMO-PHOON.

And does DEMO-phoon, he for whom I live,
One thought to his distracted Phyllis give?
Not more the wretch, sad victim of disease,
To night's pain-lengthen'd gloom, rejoicing sees,
The morn succeed, than I thy letter sweet,
Which as I read, my tears fast flowing wet.
Not the wild Arab more delights to hear,
The Nile's hoarse murmur, bursting on his ear,
When, with the desert's sultry blast oppress,
His fainting heart scarce beats within his breast,
Than I thy name; quick starting at the sound,
The children drop their sports, and croud around;
Our youngest hope still asks, with ceaseless bawl,
"Papa send doodies to his little Sal!"
And darling Tom inquires with eager look,
If you had also sent the promis'd book:
Silent I note this early proof so true,
That the lov'd boy in all resembles you.

Why dost thou, cruel memory, bid restore
Those luscious hours, we past on Gallia's shore?
They come too surely at her busy call—
O let me hasten to forget them all.
Enough the fleeting visions of the night
By fancy bred, present thee to my sight
To vex my soul. Thy sleep-imagin'd charms
With joy I view, and stretch my longing arms
In vain to clasp thee; vanishing in air
Thy form dissolves and leaves me to despair;
I wake to anguish and to hopeless love,
And the fierce fires of mad'ning passion prove.

Still wilt thou fearless tempt power's tott'ring height?
How sad preages fill me with affright—
Methinks I see the storm already low'r,
In vain dull Lincoln scribbles by the hour,
His leaden sheet, from truth and reason free—
Alas! no Egis will it prove to thee,
To guard thee from an injur'd people's hate,
Or the low murmurs of the good and great.
Thy ruin's plan'd, and if I'm not mistaken,
"Aurora" lies will hardly save thy bacon.
No more Duane dares cry out "Rats; Rats; Rats;"
The Scotchman's ready with his BAG OF CATS.
All, all conspire to push thee from thy seat;
—Better in time secure a safe retreat.
Then quit the chair, return to M——,
And let the cursed feds at others bellow.
Resume the "Notes," and still philosophise;
Or write a book to prove the mammoth size.

Believe me love, not all who boldly dare,
As soldiers merely, the grim ranks of war,
Are fit for Consuls; the untutor'd hand
Of nerveless science, never could command;
Nor every Wight, whom wild ambition fires,
Is made for that to which his pride aspires.
Remember Phaeton. He kneels forlorn,
And sues to guide the chariot of the morn.
With boding ears, unwilling to his prayer,
The father-god consents; he bids prepare
The fiery steeds and anxious marks the way
Himself. The son, impatient of delay,
Springs to the gorgeous seat and whisks the lash;
Swift up the steeps of air the coursers dash:

Alas! not long they hold their destined course—
To keep the track Phaeton plies his force
In vain, unconscious of resistless might,
The steeds impetuous urge their devious flight;
To curb their fury once again he strains;
Wild with despair he drops the floating reins.
More widely now unmindful of the goal,
They blaze along and steer to either pole.
Now burning downwards to the earth they bend
In circling wheel, and now to heav'n ascend.
Quick running flames the tow'ring forest fires;
Sublime in air they curl their smoky spires.
The hapless wood-nymphs, impotent to save,
Disorder'd, shrieking, seek the sheltering cave:
Far from the shore old Ocean's trembling tide
Receding, leaves a sandy desert wide;
From snow-clad mountains swelling torrents foam,
And frightened nations dread the general doom.
Jove, bending, hears their sadly piteous cries,
Grasps the red bolt and swift to vengeance flies;
High from the glittering car his lightning hurl'd
The wretch whose madness would have fir'd a world.
Taught by experience hadst thou shunned his fate,
Ah me! how much I fear 'tis now too late!

But, grant that thou art all that's truly great,
With strongest arm can wield the helm of state;
Lov'd by the worthy, by the worthless feared—
Does merit always meet its just reward?
How oft has blushing virtue seen withstood
The patriot's efforts for his country's good?
Beheld indignant the unworthy mind
Blast the fair wreath that glory had entwined;
With tears bedew'd the hero's sculptur'd bust,
A shatter'd ruin prostrate in the dust.
Witness great Cincinnatus, once ador'd;
Rome's brightest gem confess'd and honour's lord.
'Twas not enough that all her foes he foil'd;
Still for his much lov'd Rome he watchful toil'd;
First in dread war, and first in smiling peace;
His, every virtue which the man may grace.
Yet envy labours to destroy his fame,
Nay, e'en base Romans live, who curse his name.
Europe's vile outcasts too have spit their gall—
And thy man-mistress, Paine, the first of all.
That name appals me;—at his wondrous birth,
Dogs howl'd, owls screech'd, and horror seiz'd the earth;

Wild from the denizens of murky hell;
Convulsive laughter burst with hideous yell;
The pois'nous dug of base malignity
The squalid bantling fed; with leering eye
Falseness approached to bless her fav'rite son,
And vice exulting mark'd him for her own.

Why do my thoughts to other objects roam—
Let me not think, but how to woo thee home.
For thee I sigh, and thy long absence mourn,
O haste then to my arms; return, return.
Oft do the beauteous pledges of our love
Disconsolate around their mother move,
With whining sob demand their father dear,
Till bread and butter dry the glist'ning tear.
Thy faithful servants frequent ask me when
From the great town thou will come back again;
Old Cudjoe cries, to duty's bidding true,
"Do make the paper peak, do missy, do;
"Tell massa quick come home; now he no here,
"De corn field neber see de overseer;
"Him all day sleepin in de fodder-house
"While neger workin; him no wort a louse.
"Him often wid' abnt Dinah in de barn;
"I peep one day; dey no go dere for corn;
"I no been hab um, but I bet a guinea,
"Fore Christmas next, she hab a pickininy."

Where will Demo-phoon such enjoyments find,
So unalloy'd, as those he left behind?
His calm day, and his the blissful night;
Each hour began and ended with delight.
Bright was my morn and bright my noon of life;
O bless its eve, and make a happy wife;

What still remains, from care, from envy free,
Well pleas'd I'd pass, content with love and thee.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The night is silent and the moon shines clear,
And all the scene is grateful to my soul;
No more the voice of pleasure grates my ear,
No joys for me contains the sparkling bowl.

To this lone spot, by melancholy led,
With heart o'ercharg'd at recollected ills;
Here, where thou liest, my friend, I'll make my bed,
And shield thy grave from night's oppressive chills.

'Twas on a night like this, this same moon beam'd,
Hither we came, our hearts with sadness fraught;
I mark'd my Henry well, his soft eye stream'd,
As on his Emma's form he fondly thought.

The turf, that lightly presses on his breast,
Had not been bath'd with many an evening dew,
Ere Henry's grief had wither'd him to rest,
And here he sleeps, where late the wild rose blew.

PARODY

ON OTHELLO'S ACCOUNT OF HIS COURTSHIP.

Her father lov'd me—oft got drunk with me;
Captain, he'd cry, come tell us your adventures
From year to year; the scrapes, intrigues, and frolics,
That you've been vers'd in.
I ran them through, from the day I first wore scarlet,
To the very hour I tasted his first claret.
Wherein I spoke of most disastrous chances,
In my amours with widow, maid, and wife:
Of hair-breadth scrapes from drunken frays in bagnios,
Of being taken by the insolent foe, and lodg'd in the watch-house,
Of my redemption thence; with all my gallantry
at country quarters.
When of rope ladders, and of garret windows,
Of scaling garden walls, lying hid in closets
It was my bent to speak, for I love bragging,
And of the gamblers that each other cheat
The pawn brokers, that prey on needy soldiers
When sword or waistcoat's dipt. All these to hear
His daughter Prue would from a corner lean
But still to strain the milk, or skim the cream
Was call'd to the dairy—
Which, when she'd done, and cleanly lick'd the spoon,
She'd come again, and sit, with gaping mouth,
And staring eyes, devouring my discourse;
Which I soon smoking,
Once kneel'd by her in church and entertain'd her
With a full history of my adventures;
Of fights in countries, where I ne'er had been,
And of amours with those I never saw,
And often made her stare with stupid wonder
When I did talk of leaping from a window
Or lying hid on tester of a bed.

POPE.

Last night, as I sat musing in my chamber, till my fire was out, and till both my candle and nose looked blue, I could not avoid reflecting, with some complacency, upon the success of these little papers. I had learned, in the course of the past week, that two of my speculations had been bought for the express purpose of curling the hair, four had the honour to wrap up bride cake, six were employed at the bottom of a trunk, to defend Kitty Trans-parent's muslin gown from the attrition of a long journey in the stage coach, and twelve, more or less, were ordered to Washington by a valiant secretary to make cartridges for the French and Spanish wars. Civility so flattering, and patronage so wide animate me some degrees beyond the apathy of a Lounger. I shall now, with a semblance of alacrity, look over my files, and arrange, with more than usual assiduity, the favours of my correspondents. The first letter that I cast my eye on, contains an ORIGINAL POEM, which will form the durable substance of to-day's speculation. The miscellaneous reader, as he pauses to consider the measure of the verse, will recollect SHERIDAN'S verses to Miss Linley,

Uncouth is this moss-covered grotto of stone,
And damp is the shade of this dew dropping tree;

and the poetical reader will be pleased to read one Lounger, which neither creeps in apathy, nor sinks to tameness.

Ye shepherds your ill tim'd amusements forego,
Those flower woven garlands so sprightly unbind,
I'll suit your diversions with tidings of woe,
I'll suit with the fears, that disquiet my mind.

For well must you know, how with sickness and pain
Dorinda has long been severely assail'd,
Each human endeavour prov'd powerless and vain,
And nought the nice efforts of science avail'd.

Yet, alas! they inform me the symptoms increase;
And life from the conflict seems musing to fly;
Then cease, gentle shepherds, your merriment, cease,
And reflect on the dangers, that threaten so nigh.

Ah, rather repair to yon rivulet's side,
And bind your sad brows with the pale willow wreath,
There lonely reclind by the murmuring tide,
The melting effusions of elegy breathe.

For me, I will haste to the midwood recess,
I will haste to the gloom of the woodland profound;
There, pensive reclining, indulge my distress,
And pore on the sorrows, that thicken around.

Erewhile this sequester'd retreat when I sought,
'Twas to pour the soft language of hope and of joys
Bright landscapes luxuriantly rose to my thought,
And the swift footed minutes stole placidly by.

Met thought, all around me partook of my glee,
The stream o'er the pebbles stole playful away,

The breeze whisper'd mirth as it pass'd thro' the tree,
And fancy's enchantment made every thing gay.

But, ah! as the hours of affliction advance,
By degrees they awake to reflection and woe,
While fancy, assiduous our pains to enhance,
Averse to be newer, enlists as a foe.

The shadows of eve'n'ing my grotto obscure,
The stream o'er the pebbles glides wailingly by;
The oak's aged branches wave awfully o'er,
And the breezes, shrill 'plaining, along the clift sigh.

Ah! 'plain not so sadly, thou querulous wind,
Thou stream, with less grieving, thy journey pursue;
Small need your laments should disquiet my mind,
Small need, that my griefs should be heighten'd by you.

In the circles of youth and of beauty admir'd,
How late in the meadows young Phillada shone;
What pleasing emotions her accents inspir'd,
How the shepherds would listen when Phillis begun.

Now cold on her grave hangs the dew drops of morn,
And daisies thick springing the green sods array;
Oft sighs as he passes the shepherd forlorn,
And homewards, dejectedly steals on his way.

Then oft the sweet red-breast mellifluent pours,
At lone hour of dew-fall his tenderest lay;
There oft, with nice industry searches the flow'rs,
And piously bears the rude insect away.

Ah! gent'lest of warblers, continue thy care,
Still guard from aught noxious the favourite soil;
Still warble thy evening roundelays there,
And, oh! that my verse could compensate thy toil.

Ah! think'st thou Dorinda, to leave us behind,
What strains could e'en live, what valleys could cheer;
When should I so constant an advocate find,
How could I the loss of thy friendship repair?

How vain are our hopes of felicity here,
How quickly the prospects of youth are o'ercast!
Then let not fresh prospects fresh beauties ensnare,
Be check'd my fond heart and reflect on the past.

Oh! think ere thou give thine affections the rein,
Oh! think, will those graces so shining endure?
Oh! think thou must shortly relinquish with pain,
The charms which at present, so sweetly allure.

How happy the man who, this changeable scene
With the cursory glance of a traveller eyes,
Nor suffers allurements intruding between,
To divert his pursuit of unchangeable joys.

Who appriz'd that to happiest attachments below,
A sad separation full surely ensues;
A guarded approbance dares only bestow,
And timely the soft growing fondness subdues.

But, alas! tho' each moment fresh warnings impart,
Our visions of happiness here to resign;
Tho' instructed to turn the fond hopes of the heart,
To joys that unfadingly permanent shine.

No sooner the waves of affliction retire,
And hope's bright illusions return to the view;
Than, untaught by experience, again we admire,
And tho' still disappointed, with ardour pursue.

Still, still there are objects, that cling to the breast,
And with pleasing compulsion our wishes confine,
There are seals of affection so deeply impress'd,
What bosom, that feels them, can bear to resign?

And so let it be, thy repinings recal,
'Tis meet we refuse not the favours bestow'd;

'Tis meet that affliction should also befall,
To awake our desires for a happier abode.

How hard were the state of probation below,
Was there nought of affection to soften the road;
No bond'ring attraction to steal us from woe,
No friendship to lighten adversity's load!

And shall friendship be shunn'd to avoid the distress,
Which the loss of that friendship may one day impart,
Is nought unexempt from decay and disease,
Deem'd worthy to share the fond hopes of the heart?

Ah! hapless Dorinda, how well could'st thou prove,
Tho' so fading and fleeting is every thing here;
There are objects deserving of friendship and love,
Tho' fading and fugitive, not the less dear.

Tho' sorrows thrill deep the susceptible mind,
And greatly its portion of pleasure exceed;
The joys and the griefs are so closely combin'd,
What bosom that feels them could wish to be freed?

Yes, still must I love you, ye elegant ties,
Tho' blended with troubles, your troubles are dear;
Ev'n pleasure oft dwells in a pensive disguise,
Nor scorns the soft features of sorrow to wear

Thus pour'd the sad Thyrasis his wild running lay,
But night overtook him as lonely he mourn'd;
When stealing at length from his cavern so gray,
He mournfully slow to the village return'd.

PART THE FOURTH.

FUTURE DESTINY OF NORTH-AMERICA.

CHAPTER III.

America will not increase so rapidly in population and power, as many writers have maintained.

Many writers are in this respect, very sanguine in their hopes, and Brissot is the absurdest of them all. They build cities with the utmost expedition.
It is to them, children's play, to strip millions of acres in a moment, of their trees, and to dam up rivers, and their imagination is peculiarly productive of immense numbers of people in the twinkling of an eye. All these appear to me to be mere dreams. The western regions are indeed very fertile; their climate mild, and healthier than that of the neighbourhood to the sea; but the pernicious land-usurers oppose obstacles to the population, without which they would make incomparably a more rapid progress. It is already known that the lands, even deep in North-America, are raised thereby in price, and that the confusion of the right of property is such, that no man is secure in his possession. This will obstruct the rapid cultivation of the land.

But even independent of these political causes, the settlement of a rough country, covered with wood, advances not so swiftly as those gentlemen imagine, who never extirpated trees, dried up marshes, or dammed in rivers. They reckon beforehand the population at some hundreds of millions, in a few centuries, and saw all America, from sea to sea, over with cities. Brissot, if I recollect right, even maintains that this will be the case at the end of the nineteenth century. All this, is too much.

In respect to this increasing population, too much stress is laid upon the supposed excellence of the laws in the United States. We are too much astonished at what is said to have been in less than two centuries effected in the English colonies, without considering that in Brazil, and in Spanish America, greater progress seems to have been made towards the cultivation of the land, than in the North-American republic. Rio Janeiro, has according to credible testimony, many more inhabitants than the largest sea port town in the United States. Such a public work, as the aqueduct in Rio Janeiro would be sought in vain throughout the United States, and I believe nothing equal to it, could be found in Europe. Mexico, has many hundred thousand inhabitants. Philadelphia, the queen of the cities of the republic, has at most, only seventy thousand. In both the kingdoms of Mexico, there are many cities, which may compare with Philadelphia. Lima, Buenos Ayres, &c. are large cities; and the province of Quito is better cultivated than the county of Lancaster in Pennsylvania. New-Grenada is likewise a large and beautiful kingdom, which has a considerable capital city. Much must indeed be ascribed to the natural advantages of those delightful regions; for even the finest parts of the United States cannot by any means be compared with Chili, New-Grenada, Brazil, Quito, &c.

The progress of the English colonies, in population and culture, is therefore not so astonishing as it has been pretty generally considered, and I think I have already given the causes of it. It consists, according to my judgment in the mercantile system, which is adverse to the interests of agriculture.

It is surprising that the English government, in establishing their American colonies, were not more attentive to the preservation of the Indians, and to the mixture of them by marriages with the colonists. Instead of which, the colonists, by their rum and their small-pox, have ruined and murdered them. It is indeed generally affirmed in America, that the Indians are incapable of living in a civilized state; but in Mexico and Peru, this is not the case. In both these kingdoms there is yet a great number of Indians, who live like the Spaniards. The Choctaws practice farming; so do the six nations, and the Moravians had collected upon the Muskingum several villages of converted Indians, all which the Virginians, however, butchered; and this cruel massacre was never in the slightest degree punished by the government. What an increase of population would the present United States possess, had this measure been adopted from the first; but the taylor and shoe-makers from Scotland, and the gaol-birds from England, deemed themselves too pure and exalted to debase themselves by conscientious marriage with Indian princesses; and thus the only consideration was how to extirpate those Indians. This has been effected by poisoning them with every species of vice. The pretence, that the venereal disease was originally taken from them is hardly to be believed; and if the Indians were infected with it, we may venture the conjecture that the ladies, transported from England, who were by no means rigid in their virtue, were not altogether exempt from the same infection.

The English policy of sending their vilest miscreants to their colonies, or rather of founding them with such miscreants, appears to me to be not over-wise. A colony is thus vitiated in the very grain. On the contrary none but families in good repute, should be allowed to remove to colonies: the establishments should be founded by the flower of a nation, by the best individuals of the least corrupted class of human society, and be afterwards supported and increased by successive emigrations. For the object in settling colonies ought to be, solely to acquire powerful friends and allies in every quarter of the world. But a colony descended from a lawless rabble, will feel no sentiment of gratitude towards the mother country, will upon the slightest occasion declare itself independent of her, and connect itself with her enemies.

A colony founded by vicious characters, will, owing to those vices, not increase in numbers and in cultivation, so rapidly as one settled by sober and industrious families. For every vice is destructive of the human body: they are properly nothing else but the dissolution of the human form. Even those evils which do not immediately impair the human body externally, weaken, however, its internal parts. Envy, hatred, revenge, anger, and even avarice, corrupt the inward parts. But the most dreadful of all, are the consequences of that vice, which poisons and mutilates the human race at its source, and almost annihilates the powers of propagation*.

Wickedness is, furthermore, always connected with error; hence it arises, that a morally corrupt citizen of a state, has always a false system of policy; and a bad system of policy impedes the growth of the state.

For all these reasons, therefore, I do not believe that America will so rapidly rise to such an extraordinary elevation, as authors too partially inclined towards her, suppose. It is still more problematical, whether the United States will ever extend from sea to sea; and this shall be the subject of our inquiries in the next chapter.

(To be continued.)

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THOMAS PAINE'S EPISTLES, TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

A hoary drunkard, with each vice imbued,
Malignant, without wit, and without passion, lew d.
Country Gaz. U. S. Nov. 30th, 1802.

THE EXAMINER, No. III.

In vol. 5, Journals of Congress, under date, January 6th, 1779, about one year and three quarters, after Paine's appointment, it is thus entered.

"A letter, of this day, from Thomas Paine, was read; whereupon, the order of the day, on the memorial of the minister of France, was called for, and the said memorial being read;

"Ordered, that Mr. John Dunlap, printer, and Mr. Thomas Paine, attend immediately at the bar of this house.

"Mr. John Dunlap attending, was called in, and the newspaper of the 2d and 5th January, 1779, intitled 'Pennsylvania Packet or General Advertiser,' being shewn to him, he was asked whether he was the publisher; to which he answered, yes.—He was then asked, who is the author of the pieces in the said papers, under the title Common Sense to the Public, on Mr. Deane's affairs; to which he answered, Mr. Thomas Paine, &c.

"Mr. Thomas Paine attending, was called in, and being asked, if he was the author of the pieces in the Pennsylvania Packet or general advertiser of January 2d and 5th, 1779, under the title Common Sense to the Public, on Mr. Deane's affairs; he answered that he was the author of those pieces; he was then ordered to withdraw."

* The present generation ought to blush for this ignominious punishment of their moral depravity: but they are far from so doing. On the contrary they murmur against the Deity for punishing thus their depravity. But justice must take its course: and how could vice be curbed if it were not connected with the punishment necessarily consequent upon it? The Deity never punishes: punishment is contrary to his essential nature, but vice punishes itself, and such an order of things is in the highest degree salutary.

January 7th, 1779.

"Congress resumed the consideration of the subject, which was under debate yesterday, and the following set of resolutions were moved;

"That all the late publications in the General Advertiser, printed by John Dunlap, relative to American foreign affairs, are ill-judged, premature and indiscreet, and that as they must, in general, be founded on very partial documents, and consequently depend much on conjecture, they ought not, by any means to be considered as justly authenticated. That congress never has given occasion for, or sanction to any of the said publications.

"That congress never has received any species of military stores, as a present, from the court of France, or from any other court or persons in Europe. That Mr. Thomas Paine, for his imprudence, ought immediately to be dismissed from his office of secretary to the committee of foreign affairs, and the said committee are directed to dismiss him accordingly, and to take such further steps relative to his misapplication of public papers, as they shall deem necessary."

In amendment, and as a substitute to the foregoing, the following set of resolutions was moved.

"Whereas Thomas Paine, secretary to the committee of foreign affairs, has acknowledged himself to be the author of a piece in the Pennsylvania Packet of January 2d, 1779, under the title Common Sense to the Public, on Mr. Deane's affairs, in which is the following paragraph, viz. "If Mr. Deane, or any other gentleman, will procure an order from congress, to inspect an account in my office, or any of Mr. Deane's friends in congress, will take the trouble of coming themselves, I will give him or them my attendance, and shew them in hand-writing, which Mr. Deane is well acquainted with, that the supplies he so pompously plumes himself upon, were promised and engaged, and that, as a present, before he even arrived in France; and the part that fell to Mr. Deane was only to see it done, and how he has performed that service, the public are now acquainted with." The last paragraph in the account is, upon Mr. Deane's arrival, in France, the business went into his hands, and the aids were at length embarked in the Amphitrite, Mercury and Seine. And whereas the said Thomas Paine, hath also acknowledged himself to be the author of a piece in the succeeding Packet of January 5, 1779, under the same title, in which is the following paragraph, to wit, "and in the second instance, that those, who are now her allies, prefaced that alliance by an early and generous friendship, yet, that we might not attribute too much to human or auxiliary aid, so unfortunate were these supplies, that only one ship out of three arrived; the Mercury and Seine fell into the hands of the enemy."

"Resolved. That the insinuation contained in the said publications, that the supplies sent to America in the Amphitrite, Seine and Mercury, were a present from France, is untrue.—That the publications above recited tend to impose upon, mislead and deceive the public.

"That the attempt of the said Thomas Paine, to authenticate the said false insinuations, by referring to papers in the office of the committee of foreign affairs, is an abuse of Office.

"That the said Thomas Paine be, and he hereby is, dismissed from his said office."

A third set of resolutions was moved, as an amendment and substitute to the foregoing sets—viz.

"That congress are deeply concerned at the imprudent publication of Mr. Thomas Paine, secretary to the committee of foreign affairs, referred to by the minister of France, in his memorial of the 5th inst. and are ready to adopt any measure, consistent with good policy, and their own honour, for correcting any assertions or insinuations in the said publications, derogatory to the honour of the court of France;

"That a committee be appointed to consider the said memorial and paragraphs referred to, that they confer with the minister of France on the subject, and report as soon as may be."

In lieu of the whole, the following resolution was moved as a substitute, viz.—

"Whereas, exceptionable passages have appeared in Mr. Dunlap's Pennsylvania Packet, of the 2d and 5th inst. under the character of Common Sense; and Thomas Paine, secretary to the committee of foreign affairs, being called before congress, avowed his being the author of those publications;

"Resolved, That Thomas Paine be summoned to appear before congress, at eleven o'clock to-morrow, and be informed what those exceptionable passages are, and called upon to explain and to shew by what authority he made those publications, in order that congress may take proper measures relative thereto.

"On the question to substitute the last resolution, as an amendment to the whole, the yeas and nays being required by Mr. G. Morris; it passed in the negative."

January 8, 1779.

"A letter, of this day, from Thomas Paine, was read, by which he resigns his office of secretary to the committee of foreign affairs, and in which are the following words, 'finding by the journals of this house of yesterday, that I am not to be heard,' &c. The sequel of this day's journal it is not material to transcribe, as it only relates to the order, which was taken in congress, upon Paine's insinuation, that he found by the journals of the preceding day, that he was not to be heard—when it turned out upon inquiry of the secretary, that Paine, nor any one else, had seen the journal; the insinuation therefore was false.

January 16, 1779.

"Congress took into consideration the letters from Thomas Paine, whereupon a motion was made that Mr. Thomas Paine be dismissed from office. To which an amendment was offered as a substitute in the following words. That Thomas Paine be directed to attend at the bar of this house, on Monday next at 11 o'clock, to answer whether he had any direction or permission from the committee of foreign affairs, for the publications of which he confessed himself to be the author, when he was before the house on the 6th day of January last.

"Another amendment was moved, as a substitute to both the foregoing propositions, in the words following; Whereas congress were about to proceed against Thomas Paine, secretary to the committee of foreign affairs, for certain publications and letters, as being inconsistent with his official character and duty, when the said Thomas Paine resigned his office; thereupon resolved: That the said Thomas Paine is dismissed from any further service in the said office, and the committee of foreign affairs, are directed to call upon said Thomas Paine, and receive from him on oath, all public letters, papers and documents, in his possession.

"A fourth amendment was moved as a substitute to the whole, in the words following—Resolved, that the committee of foreign affairs be directed to take out of the possession of Thomas Paine, all the public papers, entrusted to him as secretary to that committee, and then discharge him from that office."

"When the question was about to be put, a division was called for, and the question being put to adopt the first part, passed in the affirmative.

"On the question to adopt the second part, the yeas and nays being required, it was resolved in the affirmative.

"The question being then about to be put on the main question, a division was called for, and the yeas and nays being required on the first part by Mr. McKean—Resolved unanimously in the affirmative.

"On the question to agree to the second clause, namely, 'and then discharge him from that office;' the yeas and nays being required, the states being divided, the clause was lost."

It should be remembered, that under the old confederation, congress voted by states, and it was a permanent rule, that whenever it should happen, that the states were equally divided, the vote passed in the negative. Thus, although a majority of individual votes, were in favour of the latter clause, yet the states were equally divided; it was therefore lost. But Paine had prudently resigned his office, eight days before, and the foregoing resolves, serve to illustrate the manner in which his resignation was accepted.

All this happened while Mr. Jefferson was governor of Virginia, and being a matter of public notoriety, must necessarily have been known to him; indeed he probably knew it sooner than most people, in consequence of "the line of communication, which he was forming, by expresses southward and northward," of which congress approved. By way of digression, it may be remarked, that Mr. Jefferson was one of the earliest to digest and establish a line of communication, by expresses southward and northward, which besides being approved at "the time, which tried men's souls," was found to be eminently useful, when he was intriguing to be elected president of the United States. I have heard it said, that Mr. Jefferson was himself, one of the first express-riders, under his own plan, and that he rode so fast, people were wicked enough to say, it resembled a flight. But to return to Paine. I pledged myself to prove, that Paine was a traitor to his trust; that he was publicly reproached by congress, and dismissed from office, in consequence of his treachery, and that Mr. Jefferson, could not have been ignorant of the fact. For this purpose, the journals of congress were consulted, and found to contain the record of disgrace, which was fastened upon Paine, at an early period of the American war. The above extracts from those journals, incontestibly prove, that Thomas Paine was guilty of a flagrant violation of the oaths he had taken, when sworn into the office of secretary, to the committee of foreign affairs; that he was arraigned at the bar of congress, upon a charge of "disclosing matters, the knowledge of which was acquired in consequence of his office, which he was directed to keep secret;" he was thereupon convicted of a breach of oath, inasmuch as he did not "well and faithfully execute the trust reposed in him; having published certain documents and written letters, inconsistent with his official character and duty."

Supposing the character of Mr. Jefferson to be in any degree better, and more entitled to respect, than that of Thomas Paine, (and in the single article of sobriety, I do believe it is,) taking this for granted, I say, he ought not to consort with that man; and if Paine be not absolutely resolved to ruin his patron, both morally and politically, he will say to him, like Shakespeare's Helena in her soliloquy, of the exiled Rousillon;

"Shall I stay here to do it? No No: although,
The air of Paradise did fan the house,
And angels offic'd all; I will be gone;
That pitiful rumour may report my flight
To console thine ear. Come, night; end, day!
For, with the dark, poor thief, I'll steal away."

THE EXAMINER.

ESSAY III.

CONSENT OF THE PEOPLE.

I am aware, that at a time when the study of all factious men has long been to flatter the people, in order to avail themselves of their authority, to accomplish the objects of their own interest or ambition; it is an ungracious task to speak unpleasant truths that are the reverse of flattery, and that tend to destroy illusions that are soothing to some of the most agreeable feelings of the human mind. If I wished to make use of the people as my tools, I would prostrate myself before them—and, in order to render them my servants, I would hail them as my master.

But true friends are not flatterers—Government is an immense and complicated machine, in which every thing has its place; and if any one of its component parts is deranged, the whole machine is immediately destroyed.

That all power is derived from the people* is an undeniable truth;—and the consequence is as apparent, that all power should be employed for the happiness of the people. But it by no means follows that the people ought to exercise the whole, or any part, of the power that is derived from them, unless it can be proved that such exercise is essential to their happiness.

When I say that all power is derived from the people, I hope I shall not be understood to countenance the curious supposition that men, in a state of brute nature, previous to the institution of society, agreed to meet together in a great plain, and there discussed, with all due solemnity, the comparative excellence of different forms of government, selecting and rejecting such articles as should compose their Constitution in future; giving it a sanction of their united suffrages, and committing it in writing, for the guidance of their posterity, under all possible future emergencies; though the very word Government must be, in that state, unknown to them, and the art of writing an invention to be discovered, centuries after, by future generations.

What I mean is only this: that in whatever manner Governments insensibly grow amongst mankind, the power consists in the aggregate mass of the people, though it is exercised by the few who are trusted with it, and who would cease to have any power at all to exercise, if the people should refuse to obey, and to enforce their authority. Now in that view it is clear, that the governors were made for the governed, and that it is an abuse of the institution whenever the happiness of the governed is made subservient to that of the governors.

As it was impossible for men ever to have existed in a perfect state of nature, so it is absurd to derive any argument from the compact, which is supposed to have been made when they changed it for the state of civil society. Families may be supposed to have united for their common benefit, and population to have increased. Hunters became herdsmen, and herdsmen agricultors. Wandering tribes may have grown stationary, and towns at last may have produced the first principles of manufacture and commerce. Laws and institutions must have grown gradually out of the several situations in which men found themselves, till the Constitution they at first adopted bore no resemblance to that in which their societies were perfected. The patriarchal government of distinct families was certainly not conferred by the people who formed it, and who had grown up under it from infancy, in habits of obedience and deference to their common parent: different families united, and submitted themselves, probably, to the authority of the most venerable of these little sovereigns. Warlike tribes felt too sensibly the necessity of subordination, not to adopt that chief whose valour and experience led them on to conquest—and so of the rest; but in all these suppositions it must have been rather the acquiescence of the pople to the institutions they were born under, and to the gradual changes, which accident or necessity introduced, than any actual consent in their formation.

* All power is derived from God, but the writer subsequently explains himself.—EDITOR.

In the more advanced conditions of civil society, it is evident, at least in great empires, that the more numerous class of the community are necessarily, from their situation, disqualified from not only bearing a share in the administration of the government, but from even forming an opinion of it:—their passions may be easily inflamed by popular appeals to them, but their judgments can never be sufficiently informed to direct them in a discreet decision upon matters beyond their competency. The people of France were called upon to express their opinion no less than three times, in the course of about three years, as to what form and constitution of Government they would wish to live under. In their instructions to their representatives, at the meeting of the Etats Genereaux, they decided almost unanimously, after as much deliberation and as much instruction as could then be laid before them, to claim their old constitution of the three estates—Clergy, Nobility, and Tiers Etat, with the Monarch at the head of them, both as Legislator and sole instrument of the Executive Power.

A constitution differing not very essentially from that of England, but in the separate order of the Clergy. To this form, expressed in writing, as their will, their Representatives solemnly swore to conform themselves, as in duty bound. No sooner had that Assembly, in defiance of their oaths, overthrown that Constitution, and, in its stead, substituted one that, under the name of Monarchy, threw all the power into the people, by confiscating and proscribing Clergy, Nobility, and even the Sovereign himself, who was a prisoner in his palace, than the people were too happy to confirm the usurpation—and, in the persons of their Representatives, in the second Assembly, to acknowledge that order of things which was in direct contradiction to their former instructions. There was then a third Revolution, in the shape of a Republic, which formally dissolved the Monarchy, and most materially changed the Constitution which the first National Constituent Assembly had so lately and solemnly established, and which the people had been so eager to swear the maintenance of, to the peril of their lives and fortunes; and to this also the people, through their Representatives, in a National Convention, summoned for that purpose, gave the willing sanction or consent.

The truth is, they never gave their consent, that is, a rational consent, to any one of these propositions, because they never understood them.

In the first instance they were told, and told truly, that there existed many abuses in the administration of their Government, which might be remedied by reclaiming their ancient Constitution, now grown obsolete, and that they would, in future, be happier.

In the second instance, that by confiscating the possessions of the Clergy, and plundering the Nobility, as well as the ancient domains of the Crown, they would pay off the load of National Debt, and be freed from taxes; and that by destroying the class of the Gentry, every peasant would be a gentleman himself.

In the last instance they were told, that though all their hopes have been deceived, that the abuses of Government have increased ten fold, though their debt has been doubled and tripled, though their miseries are augmented in every way in the same proportion, it is to the existence of Monarchy alone they owe their disappointment. Is it wonderful that their credulity should be duped eternally by artful men, or their passions heated by flatteries?—and that ignorant peasants and mechanics should not be equal to see the effects of political innovations, when the most virtuous and the wisest men in all ages, who have made Government their peculiar study, have scarcely thought themselves equal to so arduous a task as to prescribe a Constitution of Government for their posterity.

One observation more upon the consent of the people.—If they were ever so competent to form an opinion upon great political questions, their actual suffrages could never be collected in a great empire. Recourse is then had to their virtual consent, which is assumed to be the same thing by those who have any use to make of it.—But, in the name of common sense, is not this a mere illusion?—A elects B, who elects C as a Legislator, who is to use his own discretion; can A be said to have given his consent to the acts of C, which he could know nothing of, and which, perhaps, when it comes to his knowledge, is exactly the thing, which hurts his immediate interests, or shocks his prejudice? His Religion may be abrogated, or his Monarch sacrificed by such a proxy, whilst he dreamt of nothing less than becoming a Jacobin and an Atheist.

MISCELLANY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO. TO OLIVER OLDSCHOOL ESQ.

SIR,

As a subscriber to the Port Folio, of which you are the editor, I take the freedom to congratulate you, and to felicitate the public, upon the fortunate approach of a speedy conclusion of those slandrous papers, which have sullied the pages of your weekly miscellany, for a considerable time past, under the title of "Interesting Travels in America, translated from the German of Bulow." It is not my design to give you advice, at this time, for the period is already past, when counsel would have availed, to procure the suppression of a work, which, in point of baseness, has, in my estimation, no parallel. But it may not be amiss to inform you, that you have greatly injured the reputation, and tarnished the fair fame of the Port Folio, by making it the vehicle of such malicious falsehoods against your own country. It is a rule of law, sir, that the publisher is equally culpable with the author of a libel, and when the application of this rule is made to you, how will you defend yourself, before the tribunal of the public? You would not be permitted to give the truth in evidence, nor would it be in your power, if you were. That you pay some deference to public opinion, I have no doubt. Even the morose Dr. Johnson is represented as having been solicitous about what the public thought of him and his writings; I have some reason to hope, therefore, that you will, at least, take the trouble to vindicate yourself from the reproaches, which are lavished upon you, by reason of the publication above-mentioned; by none more than your humble servant,

CENSOR.

Notwithstanding the style of the above address, which the "morose Dr. Johnson" would most certainly have called objurgatory, we will not altogether disappoint the expectation of our subscriber correspondent, who has thus abruptly put us upon our trial before the "tribunal of the public." He shall be answered, though the defence we may set up, should not be drawn with all the technical precision of an attorney's brief.

It was supposed that the readers of the Port Folio were already apprized of the nature and tendency of the work, which has called forth animadversions, so spirited, and epithets, so harsh, from our correspondent. The editor was studiously careful to guard against any unfavourable impression on the public mind, in consequence of the publication of Bulow's Travels, by first presenting a Review of the work, which may be found in numbers 9, 10, 11, of the Port Folio, for the present year, and by a free criticism, prefatory to the publication of the work itself, which commenced in our eighteenth number.

Not deeming a bare reference to former palliatives sufficient to satisfy the mind of our public accuser, we will indulge him with a repetition of two or three sentences, from our prefatory remarks.

"The picture, which this Prussian delineator, or dauber has drawn, is, in many respects, a frightful caricature; but as it is often eminently useful to hear distinctly the reproaches of our enemies, the Editor of the Port Folio was of opinion, that to know even the unfavourable sentiments, which a foreigner entertained of America, might interest some, and instruct others."

"It is proposed to publish a portion, and perhaps the whole of the journal of our Prussian traveller. Amidst much partiality, malignity, and misrepresentation, it contains some wholesome, though perhaps, unpalatable truth, and much interesting description, conveyed in a style, far from phlegmatic."

"Of the opinions of this prejudiced Prussian, it is unnecessary for the Editor to express his frequent disapprobation. By publishing them in his journal, he invites the public attention, in the sure and lively hope, that many a scrutinizing eye will detect and many an ingenious hand describe, the fallacies of an insolent and presumptuous writer."

We regret that our correspondent, who is so profuse of general censure, had not undertaken to detect and refute the fallacies of Bulow, we should most readily have given place to his speculations, nor are we compelled, without reluctance, to apply to him, in vindication of ourselves, one of our author's concluding sentences, "the truth should be told, and those who cannot bear it, should be laughed out of countenance."

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

A serious, yet very elegant writer, presses upon the careless mind the following momentous truth.

Bountiful as is the hand of Providence, its gifts are not so bestowed, as to seduce us into indolence, but to rouse us to exertion; and no one expects to attain to the height of learning, or arts, or power, or wealth, or military glory, without rigorous resolution, and strenuous diligence, and steady perseverance. Yet we expect to be Christians, without labour, study, or inquiry. This is the more preposterous, because we cannot reasonably expect to become proficient, by the accidental intercourses in life, as one might learn insensibly the maxims of worldly policy, or a scheme of mere morals.

The baffled infidel, gnashing his teeth, is reluctantly compelled to acknowledge, with this author, that even if wholly unarmed for the contest, however, Christianity may be forced from her untenable posts, and compelled to disembarass herself from her load of incumbrances, she never can be driven out of the field by puny assailants, with all their cavils, gibes, and sarcasms.

Let the ensuing remark warn the procrastinator, and stimulate the sluggish.

A writer is extremely prone to look forward to some vacant season, in which he may devote his whole time and attention to some work, free from the interruption of other concerns, and he is still farther urged by this fallacious hope, because he hopes, to render his work more worthy. Meanwhile, life is wearing away, and the sorrowing loiterer becomes more and more convinced, that he might wait in vain for this season of complete vacancy. We have every one of us a work to accomplish, a work, to which we are naturally indisposed. We live in a world abounding with objects, which distract our attention and divert our endeavours. Some enemy is always at hand to terrify, or some syren to seduce us. If we persevere, success is certain, but our efforts must know no remission. There is a call on us for vigorous and continual self-denial, resolution, and activity.

The following beautiful portrait, from a moral limner, is painted from the life, and in colours, which glow with brightness, and will last for ages.

The temper of a Christian is not a temper of sordid sensuality, or lazy apathy, or dogmatizing pride, or disappointed ambition. More truly independent of worldly estimation, than philosophy, with all her boasts, it forms a perfect contrast to Epicurean selfishness, and to Stoical pride, and to Cynical brutality. It is a temper, compounded of firmness and complacency and peace and love; and manifesting itself in acts of kindness and of courtesy, a kindness, not pretended, but genuine; a courtesy, not false and superficial, but cordial and sincere. In the hour of popularity, it is not intoxicated or insolent, in the hour of unpopularity, it is not desponding or morose; unshaken in constancy, unwearied in benevolence, firm without roughness, and assiduous without servility.

A self balanced character, full of energy, fertile in resources, of an elastic spirit, and a stout heart, will not droop, though favour be withdrawn, and splendour fade, and wealth take wings, and even health decay. He may then stand, to use the eloquent phrase of the orator, like the glory of the forest, erect and vigorous, stripped, indeed, of his summer foliage, but more than ever discovering to the observing eye, the solid strength of his substantial texture.

Pondere fixa suo est, nudisque per æera ramos
Attollens, trunco non frondibus efficit umbram.

The following comparison is fairly run, and is eternally true.

The seminal principle, which contains within it, as in an embryo state, the rudiments of all true virtue, though feeble, perhaps, and lowly in its beginnings, yet striking deep its roots, silently progressive, and almost insensibly maturing, will shortly, even in the bleak and churlish temperature of this world, lift up its head, and spread abroad its branches, bearing abundant fruit, precious fruit of refreshment and consolation, of which the boasted products of philosophy are but sickly imitations, void of fragrance and flavour.

But

Ignæus est ollis vigor, et cœlestis origo.

This passage is descriptive of a numerous sect in every country.

Many men, forgetting alike the duties they owe to themselves and to their fellow creatures, often act as though their condition were meant to be a state of uniform indulgence, and vacant sloth. To multiply the comforts of affluence, to provide for the gratification of appetite, to be luxurious without diseases, and indolent without lassitude, seems the chief study of their lives.

In Bunyan's Pilgrim, we still admire the allegory of a race and a warfare in the Christian course, of the irksome descent into the vale of Humiliation, of the gloomy transit through the shadow of Death, of the perilous combat with an infernal adversary, and the pernicious blandishments of Enchanted ground. A more modern author has thus eloquently expressed similar ideas.

Conscious of the indispensable necessity and of the arduous nature of the service in which he is engaged, the true Christian sets himself to work with vigour, and prosecutes it with diligence. His motto is that of the painter, "Nihilus dies sine lineâ." Fled, as it were, from a country, in which the plague is raging, he thinks it not enough just to pass the boundary line, but would put out of doubt his escape beyond the limits of infection. Prepared to meet with difficulties, he is not discouraged when they occur; warned of his numerous adversaries, he is not alarmed on their approach, or unprovided for their encounter. Of the state of such an one the expressions of Pilgrim and Stranger are a lively description. There is indeed none by which his state on earth is, in the Scriptures, more frequently imaged, or more happily illustrated than by that of a journey; and it may not be amiss to pause, for a while, in order to survey it under that resemblance. The Christian is travelling on business through a strange country, in which he is commanded to execute his work with diligence, and pursue his course homeward with alacrity. The fruits, which he sees by the wayside, he gathers with caution; he drinks of the streams with moderation; he is thankful when the sun shines and his way is pleasant, but if it be rough and rainy, he cares not much, he is but a traveller. He is prepared for vicissitudes; he knows that he must expect to meet with them in this stormy and uncertain climate of the world. But he is travelling to a better country, a country of unclouded light, and undisturbed serenity. He finds, also, by experience, that when he has had the least of external comforts, he has always been least disposed to loiter, and if, for the time, it be a little disagreeable, he can solace himself with the idea of his being thereby forwarded in his course. In a less unfavourable season, he looks round him with an eye of observation: he admires what is beautiful; he examines what is curious; he receives with complacency the refreshments, which are set before him, and enjoys them with thankfulness. Nor does he churlishly refuse to associate with the inhabitants of the country, through which he is passing, nor so far as he may, to speak their language, and adopt their fashions. But he suffers neither pleasure nor curiosity, nor society, to take up too much of his time, and is still intent on transacting the business which he has to execute, and on prosecuting the journey, which he is ordered to pursue. He knows also, that to the very end of life, his journey will be through a country, where he has many enemies; that his way is beset with snares; that temptations throng around to seduce him from his course; that the very air disposes to drowsiness, and that, therefore, to the very last it will be requisite for him to be circumspect and collected. Often, therefore, he examines where he is, how he has got forward, and whether or not he be travelling in the right direction. Sometimes he seems to himself to make considerable progress, sometimes he advances but slowly, and too often he finds reason to fear that he has fallen backward, in his course. Now, he is cheered with hope, and gladdened by success; now he is disquieted with doubt, and then damped by disappointments.

The style of Dr. Johnson is generally considered as very remote from that of Addison. The regular triplets, the Roman words, the pompous march of the sentences, in the first, vary essentially from the careless frankness of Addison's easy expression. Yet Addison might have written the ensuing passage, which, though found in the Rambler, is neither solemn nor stately, neither formidable with dreadful words, nor sonorous with elaborate declamation.

Though I have, like the rest of mankind, many failings and weaknesses, I have not yet, by either friends or enemies been charged with superstition. I never count the company, which I enter, and I look at the new moon indifferently over either shoulder. I have like most other philosophers, often heard the cuckoo without money in my pocket, and I have sometimes been reproached as fool-hardy, for not turning down my eyes, when a raven flew over my head. I never go home abruptly because a snake crosses my way, nor have any particular dread of a climactrical year; yet I confess that, with all my scorn of old women, and their tales, I consider it as an unhappy day, when I happen to be greeted by Suspirius, the screech owl.

In the "Meteors" I read and relished the following. As the front of my evening was occupied with the grave, let the "rear of night" be brought up by the gay.

Although they write of ardent sighs
The wanton look, the coy surprise,
All envious poets have confest,
My love of rival fair the best.

Around her form so neat, so gay,
Ten thousand rosy Cupids play,
Behold her undulating hair,
Ten thousand flowing charms are there.

How oft her speaking eyes impart
Ten thousand wishes to my heart,
Ten thousand times I long'd to sip
The nectar of her coral lip.

There are, although to those I yield,
Ten thousand other charms conceal'd;
Extatic charms! By love's decree
Destin'd, exclusively, for me.

A wag, attentive to my lays,
Thus resolv'd her boasted praise:
"Friend Tom, my learned head expounds; Thy Sylvia has TEN THOUSAND POUNDS!"

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

I wish you would inform us what this great town is employed about; the middle of December is arrived and nothing brilliant transpires; no clubs to abuse, no tea-parties to ridicule, no scandal to spread, and, what is still more alarming, I hear it is to be the fashion to be profoundly grave and sentimental, all this winter. To procure mirth, we are by no means to venture further than a conundrum. Now, as I make but an awkward figure at this witty invention, I wish you to propose something to the young ladies and gentlemen, in which all our wits will have a chance. What can be more embarrassing to a young lady, like myself, than immediately on her entry into a room to hear half a dozen voices, at once scream out, Oh! I'm glad you're come; I have just made a most excellent conundrum. Tell me why Mr. Jefferson is like this, tell me why Tom Paine is like that. As I have been very unfortunate in many of my replies to such heterogeneous questions, I pass for a stupid dunce, totally unfit for any polite circle. Perhaps, you will think I am only envious of the superior skill and readiness of my companions at conundrums; it may possibly in some measure proceed from the very ridiculous figure I have made in attempting to be prompt in expounding those laughter-moving witticisms. I do not think the amusement, in itself, altogether contemptible; as we have some great examples before us, in the correspondence of Doctor Swift, Sheridan, and others, in which puns, conundrums, rebusses and enigmas are frequently introduced, and make no inconsiderable figure in the lucubrations of those distinguished wits. But, whilst those chieftains in wit and humour were unbending their minds by these indulgencies, even such trifles partook so strongly of the native genius of those great men as to procure for their sportive sallies considerable reputation.

Do, Mr. Oldschool, let us know what your thought likes, on this occasion. Prithce call forth your lieutenant Saunter to your aid, who has been a long time napping. The office of Lounger appeared so well suited to his love of ease, that I expected we should have been more frequently favoured with his reveries. I do not wish to make him, or induce you to employ some ill-natured old matron, to count our petticoats, and expose the scantiness of our wardrobes. No, on that score, our subject has been sufficiently discussed. I wish to see the pages of the Port Folio occupied, once more, with sprightly essays, and judicious criticism, and your "Author's Evenings" should never be sleepy or stupid. But, for heaven's sake, give us no more Interesting Dutch Travels. We have been sufficiently bored with that mass of incongruity; and the translation of so much ill-natured stupidity was unworthy the attention of an American. It was scarcely worth his while to take the trouble of translating falsehoods and misrepresentations, from Germany, when he could by putting the Aurora into English have furnished us with falsehoods at much less expense. What are we to think of the heart, eyes, blood and brains of this Dutchman, who has the impudence to assert that the blooming belles of Philadelphia are "old women, at eighteen," and their flesh universally flabby and unwholesome? He must have had a bad assortment of associates. But the fellow does not deserve a serious reply, to such palpable absurdities. I must now conclude, with requesting you not to pass unheeded the first part of this address, in which I solicit your assistance in our behalf. If we are to have no assemblies, no card parties, &c. &c. to assist us, we shall in killing time be at our wit's end, to know how to dispose of ourselves, and shall absolutely be obliged to have continual recourse to Mr. Harwood's and Mr. Philip's libraries for food for the mind.

BEATRICE.

Philadelphia, Dec. 10th, 1802.

POLITE LITERATURE.

From a correct and chaste compilation, entitled "The Female Mentor," lately republished by Mr. Hoff, of this city, and which we recommend to our Lady readers, as a salutary substitute for the frivolous novels of the circulating library, we extract the subsequent well written article. We have read profounder disquisitions on the amiable character of SHAKESPEARE'S affectionate Imogen, but nothing more pleasing and just. Every good wife, among the numerous married dames, who peruse this paper, will discover a near resemblance to her own character, in this interesting full length of one of the most perfect women we ever read of, at least in fictitious history.]

ON THE CHARACTER OF IMOGEN.

At the last meeting, the conversation turned upon the excellence of Shakespeare; but several ladies asserted that he certainly had no very favourable opinion of women, because most of his female characters were either insipid or wicked. Some persons remarked, that in his days there were no women on the stage; and that men could ill supply the delicacy of female characters. Cleora stood forth the champion of our admired bard, and said, that if he had not many excellent female characters, he had at least delineated one, which could not be surpassed by any author. Imogen, in the tragedy of Cymbeline, was the character to which she alluded; nor could the warmest imagination conceive a more perfect woman; as she would endeavour to shew on the next meeting. Accordingly Cleora read the following remarks:

The first interesting part where Imogen appears, is in the act of taking leave of Posthumus, her husband, who is banished by the king, her father: yet in this distressful moment, separated from the person the dearest to her in the world, she shews no resentment against her father; but only a proper firmness to bear those ills he chooses; to inflict upon her:

My dearest husband,
I something feel my father's wrath; but nothing (Always reserv'd my holy duty) what
His rage can do on me. You must be gone,
And I shall here abide the hourly shot
Of angry eyes; not comforted to live,
But that there is this jewel in the world,
That I may see again.

When she is taking leave, the king, her father, enters, reproaches, drives Posthumus away with the most contumelious language, and extorts from her the following tender expressions of regret for her husband's departure:

There cannot be a pinch in death
More sharp than this is.

And after Cymbeline vents his anger against her,

O disloyal thing!
That should'st repair my youth, thou heapest many
A year's age on me—

She is so wholly absorbed in grief for the loss of Posthumus, that she is insensible to every other circumstance, even to her father's unkindness, which, at another time, she feels most exquisitely.

I beseech you, Sir,
Harm not yourself with your vexation;
I'm senseless of your wrath; a touch more rare
Subdues ail pangs, all fears.

When the king reproaches her for marrying Posthumus—

Thou took'st a beggar; would'st have made my throne
A seat for baseness—

Imogen replies,

No, I rather added
A lustre to it.
King. Oh thou vile one!
Imogen. Sir,
It is your fault that I have lov'd Posthumus;
You bred him as my play-fellow; and he is
A man worth any woman; over-buys me
Almost the sum he pays.

In the next scene, where Pisanio informs her that he had taken leave of Posthumus, and seen him embark, how beautifully is her affection expressed:

Imo. I would thou grew'st unto the shores o' th' haven,
And question'st every sail: if he should write,
And I not have it, 'twere as a paper lost
With offer'd mercy in it. What was the last
That he spake with thee?

Pisa. 'Twas, "His Queen, his Queen!"

Imo. Then wad his handkerchief?

Pisa. And kiss'd it, Madam.

Imo. Senseless linen, happier therein than I!
And that was all?

Pisa. No, Madam; for so long
As he could mark me with his eye, or I Distinguish him from others, he did keep
The deck, with glove, or hat, or handkerchief,
Still waving, as the fits and stirs of's mind
Could best express how slow his soul sail'd on,
How swift his ship.

Imo. Thou should'st have made him even
As little as a crow, or less, ere left
To after-eye him.

Pisa. Madam, so I did.

Imo. I would have broke mine eye-strings; crack't 'em, but
To look upon him; till the diminution,
From space, had pointed him sharp as my needle;
Nay, follow'd him, till he had melted from
The smallness of a gnat, to air; and then
Have turn'd mine eye, and wept.—But, good Pisanio,
When shall we hear from him?

Pisa. Be assur'd, Madam,
With his next vantage.

Imo. I did not take my leave of him, but had
Most pretty things to say: ere I could tell him,
How I would think on him, at certain hours,
Such thoughts, and such; or, I could make him swear,
The She's of Italy should not betray
Mine interest, and his honour; or could charge him,
At the sixth hour of morn, at noon, at midnight,
T'encounter me with orisons; (for then
I am in heaven for him) or ere I could Give him that parting kiss, which I had set
Betwixt two charming words, comes in my father;
And, like the tyrannous breathing of the north,
Shakes all our buds from blowing.

When Iachimo alarms her fears, and raises her jealousy for her husband's conduct, how feelingly she says,

You do seem to know
Something of me, or what concerns me; pray you,

(Since doubting things go ill, often hurts more
Than to be sure they do; for certainties
Or are past remedies, or timely known,
The remedy's then born) discover to me
What's both you spur and stop.

And when he artfully relates pretended tales of her husband's infidelity, to induce her to be unfaithful in return, and praises her beauty, she says,

Away!—I do condemn mine ears, that have
So long attended thee—If thou wer't honourable Thou would'st have told this tale for virtue, not
For such an end thou seek'st; as base as strange—

Her anger increases justly, till Iachimo calms her by saying,

Give me your pardon,
I have spoke this to know if your affiance
Were deeply rooted.

When Imogen receives a letter from Posthumus to desire her to meet him at Milford-Haven, how delightfully animated she appears.

Oh for a horse with wings! hear'st thou Pisanio!
He is at Milford-Haven: read and tell me
How far 'tis thither. If one of mean affairs
May plod it in a week, why may not I
Glide thither in a day? then, true Pisanio,
Who long'st, like me, to see thy Lord; who long'st
(Oh let me bate) but not like me, yet long'st
But in a fainter kind—Oh, not like me;
For mine's beyond, beyond.—

How far is it
To this same blessed Milford: and by th' way
Tell me how Wales was made so happy, as
To inherit such a haven!

Pr'ythee, speak,
How many score of miles may we well ride
'Twixt hour and hour?

Pisa. One score 'twixt sun and sun,
Madam's enough for you; and too much too.

Imo. Why, one that rode to's execution, man,
Could never go so slow: I've heard of wagers,
Where horses have been nimbler than the sands
That run i' th' clock's behalf—but this is foolery.

When Pisanio represents the difficulties of her escape from court, and other embarrassing circumstances, attending her journey, she says,

I see before me, man; nor here, nor here,
Nor what ensues, but have a fog in them,
That I cannot look through. Away, I pr'ythee,
Do as I bid thee; there's no more to say;
Accessible is none but Milford-way.

When she arrives at Milford-Haven, in the full expectation of meeting Posthumus, how admirably is her distress painted upon seeing Pisanio's misery.

Where is Posthumus? What is in thy mind
That makes these stare thus? wherefore breaks that sigh
From th' inward of thee? one, but painted thus,
Would be interpreted a thing perplex'd
Beyond self-explication. Put thyself
Into a 'haviour of less fear, ere wildness
Vanquish thy steadier senses.

When Pisanio gives her the letter, she says,

Speak man; thy tongue
May take off some extremity, which to read
Would be ev'n mortal to me.

When she has read the letter, and finds that Posthumus accuses her of infidelity, how mildly and pathetically she proclaims her innocence, in a manner which no guilty person could do:

False to his bed! what is it to be false?
To lie in watch there, and to think on him?
To weep 'twixt clock and clock? If sleep charge nature,
To break it with a fearful dream of him,
And cry myself awake! that false to his bed!

When she submits to die, how great is her fortitude and composure, and what angelic patience:

When thou seest him,
A little witness my obedience. Look!
I draw the sword myself; take it, and hit
The innocent mansion of my love, my heart;
Fear not, 'tis empty of all things but grief:
Thy master is not there, who was indeed
The riches of it. Do his bidding, strike;
Thou may'st be valiant in a better cause,
But now thou seem'st a coward.

When Pisanio says,

Hence, vile instrument!
Thou shalt not damn my hand—

how greatly she shews her love for her husband, and the impossibility of her wishing for life under his disapprobation: but though she longs for death, her religion forbids self-murder—

Why I must die;
And if I do not by thy hand, thou art
No servant of thy master's. 'Gainst self-slaughter
There is a prohibition so divine
That cravens my weak hand: come, here's my heart—
(Something's afore 't—soft, soft, we'll no defence.)
Obedient as the scabbard! What is here?

In her eagerness to be killed, how affecting it is to see her produce the letters of Posthumus from her bosom; and in the midst of her desire to die, and her misery at being accused, she shews her exquisite love for him, when she says,

"And I grieve myself,
To think, when thou shalt be disedg'd by her,
Whom now thou tir'st on, how thy memory
Will then be pang'd by me. Pr'ythee dispatch,
The lamb entreats the butcher. Where's thy knife?
Thou art too slow to do thy master's bidding,
When I desire it too!

When Pisanio wishes to save her life, with what noble spirit she exclaims,

Talk thy tongue weary, speak.
I've heard I am a strumpet; and mine ear
(Therein false struck) can take no greater wound.

When Pisanio still exhorts her to live, how feelingly she answers,

Why, good fellow,
What shall I do the while? where hide? how live?
Or in my life what comfort, when I am
Dead to my husband?

At last, with the hope that Posthumus has been deceived, she consents to live; resumes her firmness of character, and agrees to disguise herself as a boy, and to seek a retreat in the service of Lucius, the Roman ambassador. Having wandered in the forest for two days without food, she says,

I should be sick,
But that my resolution helps me.—
Two beggars told me;
I could not miss my way. Will poor folks lie.
That have afflictions on them, knowing 'tis
A punishment, or trial? yet no wonder,
When rich ones scarce tell true. To lapse in fulness
Is sorer, than to lie for need; and falsehood
Is worse in kings than beggars. My dear Lord!
Thou art one o' th' false ones; now I think on thee
My hunger's gone; but even before I was
At point to sink for food—but what is this?
(seeing a cave)

Here is a path to it; 'tis some savage hold—
'Twere best not call; I dare not call; yet famine,
Ere it clean o'erthrow nature, makes it valiant.
Plenty and peace breed cowards; hardness ever
Of hardness is mother.—Ho! who's here?
If any thing that's civil, speak; if savage,
Take or lend.—Ho! no answer? then I'll enter.
Best draw my sword; and if mine enemy
But fear the sword like me, he'll scarcely look on't.
Grant such a foe, good heavens!

How interesting does she appear when, having satisfied her hunger, she comes out of the cave, and addresses Bellarius and his companions:

Good masters, harm me not:
Before I enter'd here I call'd, and thought
'T' have begg'd, or bought, what I have took; good troth
I have stol'n nought, nor would not, though I'd found
Gold strew'd o' th' floor. Here's money for my meat,
I would have left it on the board, so soon
As I had made my meal, and parted
With prayers for the provider.

And when she meets with a kind reception, how fine is this sentiment:

Great men,
That had a court no bigger than this cave,
That did attend themselves, and had the virtue

Which their own conscience seal'd them (laying by That nothing-gift of differing multitudes)
Could not out-peer this twain.

Her remarks upon the two brothers are charming:

So man and man should be,
But clay and clay differ in dignity,
Whose dust is both alike. I'm very sick.

Guiderius says to his brother,

Go you to hunting, I'll abide with him.

How pathetic is Imogen's reply:

So sick I'm not, yet I am not well;
But not so citizen a wanton, as
To seem to die ere sick. 'S—lease you, leave me,
Stick to your journal course. The breach of custom
Is breach of all. I'm ill; but your being by me
Cannot amend me. Society is no comfort to one
Not sociable: I am not very sick,
Since I can reason of it. Pray you trust me here,
I'll rob none but myself, and let me die
Stealing so poorly.

When Imogen awakes from her lethargy, which was occasioned by the drug she had taken, she incoherently dwells upon her affection for her husband, and her impatience to meet him.

Yes, sir, to Milford-Haven, which is the way?
I thank you—by yon bush—pray how far thither!—
'Ods pittikins, can it be six miles yet?—
I've gone all night—faith, I'll lie down and sleep.

As she lies down she perceives the body of a man beheaded.

But soft! no bedfellow: oh Gods and Goddesses!
The flowers are like the pleasures of the world;
This bloody man the cares on't—I hope I dream;
For sure I thought I was a cave-keeper,
And cook to honest creatures. 'Tis not so;
'Twas but a blot of nothing, shot at nothing.
Which the brain makes of fumes: our very eyes,
Are sometimes, like our judgment, blind. Good faith
I tremble still with fear; but if there be Yet left in Heaven as small a drop of pity
As a wren's eye, oh! Gods! a part of it!

How forcible is the following passage,

The dream's here still: even when I wake, it is Without me, as within me; not imagin'd, felt.
A headless man!—the garments of Posthumus.

Then follows her incoherent expressions, on supposing the headless body to be that of Posthumus murdered by Pisanio. When she is discovered by Lucius, lamenting over the supposed Posthumus, and he demands who she is, she answers most affectingly,

I am nothing; or if not,
Nothing to be were better. This was my master,
A very valiant Briton, and a good,
That here by mountaineers lies slain: alas!
There are no more such masters: I may Wander from east to occident, cry out for service,
Try many, all good, serve them truly, never Find such another master.

When she is hired by Lucius, she says,

I'll follow, sir. But first, an't please the Gods,
I'll hide my master from the skies, as deep
As these poor pickaxes can dig: and when,
With wild wood-leaves and weeds, I've strew'd his grave,
And on it said a century of prayers,
Such as I can, twice o'er, I'll weep and sigh;
And, leaving so his service, follow you,
So please you entertain me.

When Imogen finds Posthumus alive, and that he is convinced of her innocence, the only reproach she makes him for his cruel suspicions is,

Why did you throw your wedded lady from you?

Before the conclusion she proves her unambitious character and true disinterestedness. When Cymbeline discovers his two sons, he says to her,

O Imogen,
Thou hast lost by this a kingdom.
She replies,

No, my Lord,
I've got two worlds by it. O my gentle brothers,
Have we thus met?

These passages, which are selected from the speeches of Imogen, may be esteemed the most striking and beautiful parts; but scarcely any line can be read where some sublime sentiment is not expressed, or some indication of a firm and virtuous mind is not displayed. To detail all the beauties of this character, would be to detail all the speeches of Imogen, and cannot fail of pleasing every reader of delicacy and discernment, because she is feminine and natural. She appears to be almost a perfect character. Her only error was that of marriage without parental authority; for which she apologizes when she says, "Sir, it is your fault that I have lov'd Posthumus; you bred him as my play-fellow, and he is a man worth any woman." But the poet has justly made this only reprehensible part of her conduct as the cause of her misfortunes.

Imogen is placed in a variety of distressing situations; and most persons will agree, that were she to act differently in any one particular from what she does, she would not act so well. She displays the strongest conjugal affection, contained within the bounds of delicacy; duty and submission to her father, as far as is consistent with her superior duty to her husband; she is steady in her chastity, though artfully led to believe that her husband was unfaithful, and even abandoned to every thing that was dissolute. She is not outrageous when she is accused of incontinency, though the accusation is worse to her than death. She shews no ill-will to Posthumus, though he orders her to be murdered; and anticipates his misery when he will find that she was innocent. She bears sickness and fatigue with patience and fortitude; and lastly what to most persons would be a severe trial, she relinquishes a crown without feeling any mortification.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Great preparations are making at Washington for war. The president is scouring a rusty helmet, found on Carter's mountain, after Tarleton had left this country. The attorney general is forging and hammering many heavy weapons of defence. The secretary of war, has actually contracted for two or three extra bundles of matches, more or less. The dry docks have been swept, but not garnished; and we learn that a rusty nail, rescued by democratic parsimony from federal squanderers, has been recently whetted into a pike, to pierce Spanish aggression to the very core.

A letter from a friend, contains the following paragraph. The Editor can only add in the words of Ovid—Pudet hæc opprobria nobis et dici potest, et non potuisse refelli.—In other governments, a private man may be known and respected, without the adjuncts of wealth or public office, but in a republic, a private citizen, unless he is a demagogue, is like a drop in the ocean, and bears no proportion to the irresistible might, and impenetrable wisdom of the sovereign people.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The lampoons are numerous and caustic, which we receive, at the proper cost of a great man, the proprietor of a charming mansion, and the lover of ink charmers. Heroes and statesmen, in every age, have solaced their cares with love.

Atrides with his captive play'd
Who always shar'd the bed she made,
Each hero kiss'd his maid, and why
Though I'm no hero, may not I?

"RAINBOW" must be a descendant of a noted changeable character, in this city, who has tried all parties, and been trusted by none.

For all must own his worth completely tried,
By turns experienced, upon every side.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE BOSTON GAZETTE.

MR. PAINE, of Boston, a gentleman of classical education, and brilliant fancy, has been greatly celebrated for his felicity in the lyric stile. His Ode entitled "Adams and Liberty," has been reprinted in England, and commended even by the austerity of British criticism. The ensuing pathetic lines it is our pleasure to preserve in the Port Folio. They are equally honorable to the heart and the head of the author. The scriptural allusion in the close of the third stanza is finely introduced; the office of Charity is very nervously described; and the apostrophe and the picture in the last stanza, are eminently poetical and pious.

ODE.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS PAINE, ESQ. AND SUNG AT THE ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION OF THE "BOSTON FEMALE ASYLUM."

Shall man, stern man, 'gainst heav'n's behest,
His cold, unfeeling pride oppose;
To thankless wealth unlock his breast,
Yet freeze his heart to Orphan's woes?

Weak casuist! where yon thunder broke,
Seest how the livid light'ning glares!
Behold it rives the knotted oak,
But still the humble myrtle spares.*

Let stoic valour boldly brave
The wars and elements of life;
But more like heaven, who stoops to save
A being, sinking in the strife;
Poor exiles! wandering o'er this sphere,
Through scenes, of which yon form no part;
Lov'd Orphan Girls! come welcome, here,
Th' Asylum of the human heart.

Sweet CHARITY! thou sprite benign,
Who oft art seen in angel form,
To point the sun-beam where to shine,
Or rein the coursers of the storm!
Oh! through yon dark and dripping cell,
Where sorrow's outcast offspring weep,
Flash, as when Peter's fetters fell,
And bid the woe, that guard them, SLEEP!

Warm'd by thy beams, the frost unkind,
Which blasts sweet woman's vernal years,
In dew exhal'd, shall leave behind
Pure Gratitude's unsullied tears!
So shall our Orphan Girls no more
Lament the untimely blight of woe;
But rear'd to Virtue, thrice restore
To generous Man, the debt they owe.

BLEST PROVIDENCE! whose parent power
All being gives....for all provides;
Co-equal, when it paints the flower,
As when it curbs old Ocean's tides!
See, lorn and piteous, at thy throne,
Love, Mercy, Hope and Homage sue;....
They weep for sorrows not their own,
They bend, dear Orphan Girls, for you!

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[Every mail now brings us, not only irrefragable arguments, but specimens of brilliant wit and humour, levelled against our feeble administration. The following lampoon is from the Wasp, whose sting is sharp, and who is justly angry. The officer, in our "Mumbo Jumbo" government, whom Waspish wit derides, is a prominent object of political ridicule. He is charged with being more assiduous in the toils of a Politician "Farmer," than in those of official duty. He acclaims and writes to his folios of metaphysics against the clergy, and the late administration. In a barbarous and involved style, he labours to diffuse the exploded theories of democracy, while his own political skill and experience are so limited and so manacled by the blindest prejudice, that like those infant legislators in the French Tiers Etat, described by BURKE, "he has not seen the state; no not so much as in a picture."]

FARMER LINCOLN IN FURIOUS FRET.

THE FARMER SPEAKETH:

Upon my word, I do declare,
The deuce is in our nation:
In vain I rant, and curse, and swear,
And bawl for moderation.

CHORUS.

For moderation all do know
I am a spanking fellow;
To moderation I will hold,
As long as I can bellow.

When to affright the fed'ral crew
I threat extermination,
And with loud bawlings try to shew
My zeal for moderation.

* Merciful Heaven!
Thou rather, with thy sharp and sulphurous bolt,
Split'st the unweadable and gnarled oak,
Than the soft Myrtle
SHAKESPEARE'S Measure for Measure.

The stubborn rascals little heed
My noisy declamation;
But laugh, and say Lincoln's indeed
Red-hot for moderation.

Whene'er I stammer out a lie,
Somewhat like boys at school, sir,
They strait set up a hoot and cry
Fierce Levi's turn'd a fool, sir,

And when my master to obey,
'Bout priests I make a racket,
The dirty scoundrels dare to say,
He needs the bedlam jacket.

And then, to crown this vile abuse,
Some saucy wags have said, sir,
The President's bull-dog let loose,
Is running raving mad, sir.

Shan't I, who hold the people dear,
Who hate prevarication,
Who get some hundred pounds a year,
Roar out for moderation.

In honour's temple I've a seat;
But scarce have touch'd a dollar;
And will feds try me thence to beat—
By Jove it stirs my choler.

These feds are worse than Nick of hell
I'm bold enough to say, sir;
He'd let me fill my pockets well.
They'd drive me poor away, sir.

My salary to me is dear,
I love it to a penny;
For pay I'll rant, and howl, and swear,
And he who won't's a ninny.

To Washington I strait will go,
And then I do assure ye,
When I come back I'll lay feds low,
And make them feel my fury.

And now beware, each fed'ral lad,
Nor vent on me your spite, sir,
If Farmer Lincoln has grown mad,
Take care he doth not bite, sir.

CHORUS.

For moderation all do know
I am a spanking fellow;
To moderation I will hold,
As long as I can bellow.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXXVII.

MR. SAUNTER,

I beg leave, through the medium of your excellent paper, to offer to the perusal of my fair countrywomen, the following letter from Madame de Maintenon, addressed to the duchess of Burgogne. There are some parts of the original omitted, in this translation, which I did not think could at all apply to the conduct or condition of American women. The prefixed encomium of the Abbé Levizac, I trust is a sufficient sanction for my obtruding it on your attention.

Yours, respectfully,

o

The following letter, from Madame de Maintenon, cannot be too frequently perused, or too much admired. Every young woman, destined for the great world, should attentively read it, and it ought to be engraven, in letters of gold, in every seminary of female education.

LEVIZAC.

You must not, my young friend, hope for perfect happiness; on our globe, it is not to be found, and if it existed at all, in a court, be assured it could never dwell. This life is replete with cares, but those attendant on grandeur, are more insupportable than any, connected with other conditions; for in a private station, we make our own troubles; in a court we must contend with the vexations of other people. When I persuade you to believe that our sex is most particularly exposed to suffering, because we are always in a state of dependence, do not imagine that I would wish to make you displeased at, or ashamed of, what was wisely ordained by a just Providence. When a woman marries, if from proper motives, she will always regard her husband as her best friend, her wisest counsellor, and her only confidant. It has now become your duty to listen to his advice always; and when required, freely to give him yours. Your husband and yourself should have but one mind, one heart, and one soul; that is, your sentiments, your feelings, should be always in unison. Human bliss, however, cannot be perfect, and I believe those to be the most happy marriages where each suffers in turn with mildness and patience. There is naturally, in every connection, some little contradiction, arising from constitutional humour, from difference of education and opinion. Under such an evil be tranquil and submissive, for by submission, impossible as it may seem, we can only reign. Make obedience your steadfast principle, require none from your husband, in whom you must not expect to find as much disinterested friendship as in one of your own sex. It is peculiar to our bosoms, and men are less susceptible of it than women. You will be unhappy if you are too nice in this particular.

Offer up your prayers to heaven that you may never be jealous. If unfortunately you have real cause, do not, as you value your own peace, for a moment, think you can recal your husband's affection, either by the sourness of complaint, or the bitterness of reproach; your only resource is patience and religion. Impatience aggravates the worst misfortunes, and believe me, if you once descend to reproaches, you will alienate your husband's tenderness. On the other hand, if you suffer in silence you will take the only effectual means of awakening it.

In sacrificing your own will, do not hope to influence that of your husband, for men are by nature more obstinate, and in their education, less accustomed to restraint than women. They are naturally tyrannical, attached to pleasure and liberty, and no reasonable woman will expect them to renounce this inclination. We must not examine if their rights are all just, it is sufficient that custom has so long established them. They are the masters, there is nothing left for us but to obey, and to suffer (if so ordained) with a good grace.

Never confide any thing to a friend which can injure you, if repeated: speak, write, act, as if you had ten thousand witnesses: reflect that sooner or later all will be known: and before you venture to have a secret correspondent, recollect that the most confidential persons are not always to be trusted, and that there is no situation in life where you will meet with more indiscretion of this kind than at a court, where all is dissimulation and intrigue.

If you are blest with children, love them with tenderness, be with them often: this is the noblest occupation of a princess or a peasant. Be diligent in cultivating their minds, and reflect that on their education their future virtue and happiness depend. Support, with becoming dignity, the greatness of your condition. Worldly honours should not make you haughty, or they will not make you beloved. In your behaviour, we must neither see vanity nor immodesty. In your conversation, no calumny, exaggeration, offensive railery, nor anything which is inconsistent with perfect charity. Select, as your friends, those persons who are mild and forgetful of injury, but fear and despise those who would wish to excite you against others, under an appearance of zeal for you, by which they conceal their own resentment or serve their own interest. Avoid all interested, vain, ambitious, vindictive people, their society will always injure you. Never do intentional wrong, and you will never dread discovery. Always give good advice, when you presume to give any. Vindicate the absent, and accuse no one.

Sanctify all your virtues, in allowing their motive to be a desire of pleasing God. In protecting and assisting any one that you know, think if it be not possible that in so doing you may injure some one of greater merit whom you do not know. Do not attach your mind to giddy pleasures; you should learn to abstain, most particularly in your present condition, which should be that of restraint and self-denial.

Be on your guard with respect to your relish for wit. Much wit humiliates those who have but little: it will surely make you many enemies, and perhaps make men of sense undervalue your understanding.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

IN AMERICA,

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BULOW,

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

PART THE FOURTH.

FUTURE DESTINY OF NORTH-AMERICA.

CHAPTER IV.

The republic of North-America, will probably never extend from the Atlantic Ocean to the South-Sea.

It is not even ascertained as yet, whether the eastern maritime states, and those to the westward, such as Kentucky, Tennessee, &c. will not separate; nor is it yet sure that the northern and southern states which are divided by the Potomack, will always remain united in one political body; and certain writers have already wrested from the crown of Spain, all the lands westward of the Mississippi, and given them to the Republic.

That these territories properly belong to the Indians, might easily be proved, and it appears, clear from some accounts, that certain Indian nations exist there, who may perhaps be found capable of defending their country.—It is maintained that there are in the internal parts, nations which are in the practice of agriculture, and live in a tolerable civilized condition.

A settlement made by violent means, upon land belonging to a people, who live upon hunting or the breeding of cattle, may in some measure be excused. The new-comers might allege for their justification, the following argument: "The earth exists for the purpose of cultivation. Man can consider as his property only the spot, which he has cultivated. By this he introduces into it a part of his own existence; he imparts to the earth a portion of his own strength. What have you done; you, who live by hunting, or upon your flocks? Did you create the wild beast, upon which you singly and exclusively subsist? By no means.—Did you, by your labour bring forth the grass, which feeds your flocks? not at all. You have too much land; and it is land upon which you have acquired no just claim by your labour. All the world must live.—And so therefore must we. But if we have no land to till, we must perish.—Here is land upon which no man has yet laboured; we shall consequently take it, for farming..... Follow our example, and we shall leave you in peace, in your narrower bounds, so that we may all live in a quiet neighbourhood, together"..... I know not what the shepherd and the hunter could answer to this.

But even if the Indians should prove incapable of maintaining the possession of their land, and Spain should lose the extensive territories westward of the Mississippi, they would nevertheless not become parts of the United States..... The European powers will settle and determine concerning them, among themselves, and the American Republic will be allowed no voice in the case, for she has no military force to give her weight, and the well known un-military spirit of her citizens would render less formidable any force that she could raise. The Europeans will therefore most probably decide who shall possess that country, and they will not give it to the Americans.

In this case, all depends upon the peace, which will put an end to the present war. As the Americans, by their treaty, and by their unfriendly conduct towards the French, have lost their favour, it may very well happen that France should sacrifice America to England, provided England in return should grant advantages to France; for instance, France might have Canada restored to her, to which Louisiana might be added, for an indemnity to Spain.—In such a case the Americans would be reduced to a strait from which their own powers could never extricate them.—England would not indeed surrender to France all the territories westward of the Allegany mountain; but France must have a part of it to connect Canada with Louisiana. The rivers Illinois and Thuahibi and Fox river might be the boundaries.

Perhaps however England might cede likewise the Western Territory to France, for the two Floridas. She would then govern America upon the same footing she does Ireland! which she might do without difficulty.—The worst of the speculators would then be made lords, which they ardently desire, and the greatest part of the people are dependent upon the speculators and merchants—civil liberty must only be left in its present condition, and all would remain quiet.

These extensive territories in the internal part of North America, would be very useful to France in providing for the large armies from which she will probably be glad to be relieved at the peace. She might establish military colonies there.

I do not assert that things will so happen, for that depends upon too many circumstances which cannot be foreseen, and in particular upon the events which may happen in England. I only meant to shew that the Americans by their own fault have brought themselves into a critical situation. Here I see my antagonists in high glee; believing they have detected me in a contradiction, because in the first volume I have applauded the diplomatic conduct of Washington.—But if they will indulge me with an hearing their joy will be of short duration. I applauded Washington's conduct with respect to the British Treaty, because it was adapted to the circumstances, because in the defenceless condition of the American Republic, there was no other expedient than to yield, and because it was absolutely necessary to choose between the enmity of England, and that of France; for England, owing to her superiority at sea, and the facility which she has of carrying on war at a distance, was by far the most formidable; it was therefore indispensable to endeavour rather to pacify her; and she was pacified by the smallest possible sacrifices.

Should America be brought again under the English sceptre, her Independence will have been merely a transitory dream, and the American Republic only an ephemeral appearance, like that of England, in the last century—Republics cannot at this day at all succeed; and the fault of this lies in the moral depravity of the present generation. If mankind would be better, and more rational, their political constitutions might become more republican, and with a progressive increase of goodness, there would finally be no need of any government at all.

The territory westward of the Mississippi, will it is said, be peopled by emigrations from the United States, and these new colonies will connect themselves in union with the elder States. But this depends altogether upon what the European powers shall determine concerning that territory. If France should have it, she will people it with Frenchmen. If it should be retained by Spain, it may perhaps be peopled by the Anglo-Americans.—Perhaps Spain will not in that quarter be in a condition to prevent them; but I believe these new colonies would rather form an independent state, than connect themselves with the United States.—But the Anglo-Americans, will never extend themselves to the South Sea, because the most western parts of America are already peopled by the Spaniards, as for instance, in New Mexico.

CHAPTER V.

The emigration from Europe to America, will probably not be so great in future, as it has been hitherto.

This emigration will perhaps not be so much diminished by the disadvantageous accounts which may be published of America, to contradict the excessive panegyric of certain writers, and represent things more conformable to truth; for most of the emigrants never have a chance to see a book, and nobody has dissuaded the oppressed poor in Europe from emigrating to America. But the causes of this emigration may perhaps diminish, in consequence of the French Revolution.—For it is to be supposed that the French Revolution, whatever turn it may take in other respects will have two consequences; namely the destruction of the popedom, and the abolition of feodality. These effects must soon or late discover themselves, even though they should not immediately take place.

The love of country, is an innate passion of man, and the country people especially are chained by a strong affection to their huts; nothing but oppression and the impossibility, of preserving a wretched subsistence, compel them to emigrate. Let the burdens of the lower class of country people be then alleviated, and the emigrations will diminish. I believe the French Revolution will produce such an alleviation. There are in my opinion many circumstances which make this probable.

But should emigration continue to prevail, there are nearer and happier countries, which present themselves to the European emigrant, and to the lap of which he can fly, from poverty and oppression, than America, which will gradually go out of fashion. The attention which is now paid to Africa, is the commencement of an entire new order of things, and prepares the world for a complete commercial revolution; the colonies which England and Denmark are settling on the fertile shores of that beautiful quarter of the world, from principles of pure humanity, to put an end to the slave-trade are undertakings which reconcile the philosophical observer, with our age again. The interior of Africa, where according to authentic accounts, there exists a great cultivated nation, wise enough to separate itself from all others, will very soon be discovered by these colonies.

It is astonishing that this most fertile of all the quarters of the earth, has been hitherto neglected.

I mistake not a pickpocket—I am not of opinion that the history of our times, furnishes like the annals of Tacitus, melancholy pictures. It is disgusting, and ridiculous.—To butcher men, to eat human flesh, and to drink blood, is disgusting. To pilfer, and to steal from the public treasury, &c. is contemptible; and to play the Cato and the Brutus, is ridiculous. Such is my confession of faith.—Even the present instances of suicide are an affected, and ridiculous imitation of the Romans.

It is incomparably nearer, and would yield all the tropical productions in infinitely greater abundance than America, and yet the Europeans have transported men from Africa to America, to cultivate the latter. The idea has at last occurred, which should have been adopted from the first, of cultivating Africa itself. The simplest measures are commonly the last devised.

By this colonization, however so late commenced, this advantage has been gained, that the African colonies are founded upon more correct principles than those in America. To this the enlightened character of the age has contributed. No vile malefactors are sent there; none but persons of good fame are allowed to go. Connections by marriage with the natives are thought of; the preservation and civilization of these natives, and not their extirpation, are contemplated; and care will be taken that agriculture shall not be made subordinate to the trading interest. For the plan of a new form of government, which enriches with new discoveries the domain of politics, and is the most perfect of all the political systems hitherto known, we are indebted to the zeal and genius of a philanthropic Swede, by the name of Nordanshiöld.

The Europeans therefore will in future emigrate in multitudes to these new colonies on the western coast of Africa, and America will be left to its own population. Every thing invites to give the preference to Africa; unexampled fertility; the tropical productions, a climate which after the wood shall be cleared away, may be called healthy, and is at no time unhealthier than Carolina, Georgia, Surinam, &c. If the cape of Good Hope should remain in the hands of the English, many Europeans will be attracted thither.

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THOMAS PAINE'S EPISTLES, TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

A hoary drunkard, with each vice imbued,
Malignant, without wit, and without passion, lewd.
Country Gaz. U. S. Nov. 30th, 1802.

THE EXAMINER, No. IV.

Should any body tell me, that writing about Thomas Paine, and exposing his intimacy with Thomas Jefferson, will be of no avail, since the public mind is already made up, on that subject; and, what is a still greater discouragement against scribbling, that nobody will read what I may write; I answer, that, although a large portion of the community, may have formed a correct opinion of this intimacy, that opinion has not yet been fully expressed; and as to my writings, I am not so vain, that the neglect of them by the public, should occasion much chagrin. I am not yet able to boast, that "I have an established fame in the literary world," nor do I think much of the "profits I could make as an author." These are speculations worthy of author Paine and his bashfulness.

In the preceding papers of the Examiner, no reason has been assigned, why the intimacy, between Paine and Jefferson, ought not to exist. If the fact of his having been ignominiously discharged from a confidential office, by the American congress of 1779, for a flagitious breach of oath, and a treacherous disclosure of secrets, the knowledge of which was obtained in consequence of his office, be not alone sufficient to brand any future connection with Thomas Paine, with infamy, let his subsequent life and writings be adduced to corroborate the appellation.

Whatever opinion "the world" may have formerly entertained of the "stature" of Paine's mind, it would be difficult, by any scale of admeasurement, to ascertain its present size. To "see what is not to be seen," may be among the number of those "living contradictions, to the mortified federalists," of which Paine boasts in his fourth epistle. A man, in his own cause, is no witness; otherwise

* A French republic has never yet existed. The French have already often decreed that the revolution was now ended, and nothing was left but peaceably to enjoy the fruits of liberty, &c. and immediately after these decrees, the confusion begins again.—Their behaviour as Republicans is truly wonderful.—Their catonising shop-keepers, candle-snuffers and taylorers are especially diverting. Not that I despise these useful classes of society, but I only would wish them not to attempt playing the Cato or the Brutus.—Antiquity produced one Cato, and one Brutus. But among the great soap-boilers, taylorers and shop-keepers at this day, they shoot up by hundreds.—The Parisian Socrates, was if

Paine might be permitted to testify as to his own character; but whether any body would believe him, is quite another question.

It was a spark from the altar of 1779, that burnt Paine's fingers, and another spark from the altar of 1802, will, in all probability, either consume his body by a slow-fire, or light him to bed with the blaze. But Paine's flint is worn out, and his steel is turned to brass.

The blasphemer of God, the libeller of Jesus Christ, and the habitual reviler of the rites, ceremonies, and doctrines of the Christian Religion, is thought to be a fit companion for Thomas Jefferson, the president of the United States.—Why?—Do these men keep company with each other in opinion, as well as in person? The presumption is natural. Christian! of whatever sect, thou mayest be, "think on these things." If Paine be "a living contradiction" of any thing, it surely must be of his being a good christian. Yet, how soberly he talks of "the continued protection of providence," which "through a thousand dangers has left him almost alone, of those who began the French revolution," to tell the tale of woe; when the fact is notorious, that his own personal and mental insignificance, was the only providence that presided over his destiny. His life was spared it is true, "but whether in mercy or in wrath," "time will shape."

It would be inexcusable to quote Paine's writings so often, if any other mode of expression, would answer equally well to refute him. "Out of thine own mouth, will I condemn thee." That he should write jargon and nonsense, when a superintending providence is the subject, is no wonder; the miracle would appear, if a professed infidel, should seem to know any thing of the attributes and perfections of a Deity. Take as a specimen, the following passage, in his third epistle. "But there is one dish, and that the choicest of all, they, (the federalists) have not yet presented on the table, and, it is time they should. They have not yet accused providence of infidelity, yet according to their outrageous piety, SHE must be as bad as Thomas Paine. SHE has protected him in all his dangers, patronized him in all his undertakings, encouraged him in all his ways, and rewarded him at last, by bringing him in safety and in health, to the promised land. This is more than SHE did by the Jews, the chosen people, that they tell us she brought out of the land of Egypt, and out of the house of bondage."

This stuff is so perfectly of French revolution manufactures, that it can be made to suit nobody, but a French philosopher. These culinary metaphors are exactly in the style of Paine's thoughts.—He is a low bred fellow, and had he been confined to the menial employment of a kitchen scullion, all his life, he might have served God better, and proved less a curse to his fellow men.—But who is this SHE being of whom he speaks? Verily, one of the "gods of the heathen, who are a vanity and a lie;" SHE is the goddess of Reason, one of Fortune's younger daughters; the same that presides in the Parisian temples, which are or were dedicated to her, and once resorted to, "more or less" on Dédaci, by Paine and such as worship her. She left her votaries in the lurch, all of a sudden, upon the appearance of a competitor, and no vestige now remains of her, save a vacant niche in the pantheon, with this inscription, underneath, "I am reserved for the goddess of Reason." She was worshipped by her true and faithful prophet, Thomas Paine, known among his fellows as the author and compiler of the bible of our sect, denominated, the Age of Reason; as a reward for which, SHE has protected him in all his dangers, patronized him in all his undertakings, encouraged him in all his ways, and to crown all, SHE has, at last, restored him to the delightful converse, and bosom friendship of her great high priest and faithful follower,

Thomas Jefferson, president of the promised land. We cannot conclude this paper, without a quotation from that scourge of hypocrites and impostors—

CHURCHILL.

Who will, for him, may cant and whine,
And let weak conscience with her line
Chalk out their ways: such starving rules
Are only fit for coward fools;
Fellows, who credit what priests tell,
And tremble at the thoughts of hell;
His spirit dares contend with grace,
And meets damnation, face to face.

THE EXAMINER.

ESSAY IV.

EQUALITY.

It would not have been easy to have imagined what sense the French intended by the word Equality, if their subsequent conduct had not gradually unfolded their intention of equalizing the ruin of all those who had property to bring them upon the level of all those who had none.

When this word stood at first qualified with one that limited the application of it, egal en droits, equal in rights, it seemed to mean no more than could be fairly justified; it implied only an equal protection to every subject in all the rights he possessed under the law. In this sense it is not only true, but contains perhaps the best and only definition of a free government. If the smallest property an individual can hold—if the slightest privilege he is legally entitled to, is not in the same degree of security to him with the highest privileges and the most noble possessions of the proudest, there is no longer that Equality that constitutes the essence of justice. The ewe-lamb is as dear to the man who has no more, as the numerous herds and flocks can be to the rich proprietor; it is his all; and it is precisely for the purpose of securing this Equality between the rich and the poor, between the great and the little, between the strong and the weak, that societies are formed, that, in this sense, all men may be equal.

But this is not the sense to which the French have thought fit to confine their pretended Equality. All order and gradation in the community is disclaimed by them, and they have the merit, at least, of being the first legislators from the beginning of the world, whoever conceived so extravagant an idea, as, that man could exist in a great empire without those shades of rank and dependence upon each other which, to use one of their favourite expressions, have hitherto been thought to constitute the organization of civil society.

The whole plan of nature is in direct contradiction to such an idea; and it would be as reasonable, and, perhaps, little more cruel, to reduce men to the same stature, by stretching or shortening them in height, to a given standard, as to deprive them at this time of all the advantages that give one man pre-eminence over another.

I will suppose that the violence of this strange system shall annihilate property, as well as rank, in the hands of all those who were entitled to them; the power of violence will extend no farther; Equality will not then be established among mankind; their different talents, their good and bad qualities, will give to some the superiority over others; power, and the abuse of power, will grow out of influence and authority; nay, the very pre-eminence of wealth that they are now labouring to destroy, must be continually springing up as long as thrift and industry tend to procure riches, and riches to produce the means of rendering others dependent upon us, which is a consequence that no power of human legislation can prevent. Thus, when all this scene of blood and rapine shall be closed, which is to procure the ideal blessing of Equality; when the name of every family in France that had intitled itself to veneration, by the services of a long line of ancestors, shall have been exterminated to the most distant branches of them; and their fair possessions wasted and dissipated, what will it lead to, but to the future aristocracy of mean upstarts; and the sons of a Jourdan or a Santerre shall stand in the places of a Montmorency, a Sully, or a Crillon.

But were it possible that men could be brought to the same Equality in rank, in riches, in consideration, in power, and in talent—with the feelings that animate the human breast, what would be the consequence of this perfect independence, but brutality and insolence, and every unsocial repulsive quality, that it has been the study of civil life, through a course of ages, to soften by all the nameless dependencies that bind us to each other with hopes and fears, and the means of conferring and receiving obligations: in a word, that distinguish man from the brutes, that know no such connections nor endearments. In such a state, no objects of emulation could bring forward the genius or faculties of the mind; fair science would be without object, and the arts would lie in eternal oblivion; the narrow circle of selfish enjoyment would limit every desire, and every sentiment would be confined to the unsocial individual.

In the sad history of that devoted country, we may trace, from the beginning, a plan to reduce mankind, if possible, to the state of savages. What share fanaticism, and what share interested ambition, have had in the undertaking, it is not easy to determine—it is evident that both motives have been exerted with too much success. The destruction of monarchy, and of Religion seem to have been only the preparatives to the invasion of all other property: and, in truth, when the laws of property are daringly violated in one instance, there is no security for it in any other. We used to say, if the meanest subject was oppressed, the proudest might tremble; judge whether the poor man can now expect protection, where the first properties in the kingdom have been confiscated?

Before the meeting of the Etats Generaux, the cry was already raised against the privileges of the nobility. In vain had they made a voluntary sacrifice of their pecuniary exemptions, which, to say the truth, was a trifling loss or gain on either side. Their chateaus had been burnt, and their lives destroyed in the defence of them, in more instances than one. In the states of Burgundy their Order had been besieged by the populace, and all succour refused to them by the minister. By degrees the plan opened itself more plainly to complete their ruin, when it was seen how much the influence of government was exerted, first, to procure a return at the election of the Etats Generaux, in favour of such as had no property, and then having, contrary to ancient usage, doubled the number of the commons, by the pains taken, and the authority exercised, to force the order of the nobility, as well as the clergy (who were chiefly composed also of those of inferior property) to be lost in the general union of the estates voting in common. Little was the immediate consequence of this union to be wondered at, in an assembly so constituted, as to have a decided majority of those who had no property for the express purpose, that the interests of those who had property should be at their mercy. The confiscation of the estates of the clergy, that of all the feudal rights, quit-rents, and services attached to landed estates, followed—the abrogation of titles of honour, and distinction of ranks, completed the levelling system; and monarchy, deprived of its support, fell as a thing of course, till the republic has been finally established in all the scenes of horror we have seen.

What a situation have these unfortunate nobles been reduced to! Deprived of their honours, and abridged in their fortunes by laws which had their virtual assent in that assembly, where their suffrages were implied in a preponderating majority of their enemies. Thus spoiled and degraded, they were delivered over without protection, they and their families, to the insults of hired banditti all over the provinces, their papers, and the records by which they held their property, universally destroyed, their houses pillaged and given to the flames, their wives and children exposed to the barbarous fury of a rabble—and when these unprotected families, persecuted with the connivance of the legislature, and but too evidently by the subordination of the leaders in that assembly, sought security to their persons by flight into other countries, a right which is one of those peculiarly specified among the rights of men, that very flight becomes a crime. They were summoned to return, under pain of confiscation of all they had; though no security was holden out to them that the persecution should cease upon their return. What could be intended by all this, but to drive them to despair, that they might furnish new pretexts for their entire ruin, which the late unfortunate events have furnished?

Thus is the system of Equality fatally accomplished, and its melancholy victims are sent to wander over the earth—a proof that the tyranny of the many is by far a more execrable injustice than the most odious despot ever yet exerted.

MISCELLANY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Is it possible for any circumstances of human misery to justify the commission of suicide? A question discussed, in the forensic manner, before a literary society in England.

The subject now before us is of the most serious import to every individual, who bears the name of man. Though rejoicing this moment in the bosom of prosperity and plenty, the next may behold us sinking fast into the lowest abyss of wretchedness and woe. The power of the highest is unable to resist the shock of adversity, nor can the weakness of the lowest by any means form a shelter against its force. Surely, then, it becomes highly interesting to every soldier in the battle of human life, to know whether he may, at any peculiarly pressing conjuncture, withdraw from the ranks, and bid adieu to the scenes of misery and desolation, without incurring the imputation of cowardice or of crime.

The question, however, is of a very delicate nature. There are many, too many, whose affections are deeply interested in it.

There are too many, who can recollect some valued acquaintance, some respected friend, some beloved relation, some kindred spirit, whose fate is involved in the decision. Can it then be expected, that we should enter upon the investigation, unprejudiced by passion, and prepared to discriminate with coolness and precision? Can it be expected, that we should look with indifference upon those circumstances, the recollection of which has so often stung our souls with unutterable anguish? * Ye, who have been wounded in the tenderest part, to you I appeal. Are not the best feelings of our nature combined to influence the discussion? Do we not feel an almost unconquerable reluctance to acquiesce in a sentence, which may affect our most endeared connexions, even while reason assures us that it must be just. How consoling is the idea, could we be but rationally persuaded of its truth, that the mercy of the Almighty will be extended even to that crime, which excludes the possibility of repentance, when it proceeds not from the dreadful despair of a vicious mind, looking back on the horrors of a mis-spent life, and flying to this last dire refuge from itself, but from the accumulating pressure of misfortune, against which, even the fortitude of virtue is unable to contend? How horrible is the consideration, that the object of our tenderest regard, the friend, with whom we have been accustomed to converse, the man of sense and of virtue, whose life has been one continued, one uniform endeavour to fulfil his duty, as a valuable member of the community, should, by one unadvised act, one rash deed, cancel the labours of a whole life, and forfeit forever the favour of that Being, in whose hands are the issues of life and death, and who will assuredly judge with the most steady and undeviating justice.

Deeply impressed with these solemn considerations, I approach the subject with a sacred awe! Would that my abilities were equal to the task of sketching the great outlines of the question before us, with delicacy and precision...with sufficient tenderness to avoid wounding the feelings of sensibility, on the one hand, and sufficient strength to shew a marked and decided disapprobation on the other.

The view, hitherto exhibited, only relates to those amiable propensities, which lead us to claim acquaintance with misery, to step forward, as the advocates of misfortune, and to feel for the distresses of our fellow-creatures, without suffering the recollection of their vices to damp the sympathetic glow. To these generous emotions no bounds can be set; sympathy and compassion ought always to be cherished, and it is incumbent upon us, while we are endeavouring to establish just maxims and sound principles, to be ever ready, from a conviction of the weakness of human nature, to prefer condolence to censure, mercy to justice. With these sentiments, we may pity, though we cannot approve. But as there are many, who undertake to reason coolly in favour of suicide, to the arguments of these the following discourse will be principally directed. Before we enter fully into the subject, however, it may not be amiss to premise, that where the scale of evidence hangs doubtful, much is to be allowed for the peculiar situation in which we are placed. Our island is remarkable for furnishing numberless instances of suicide, and this circumstance alone, considering the detriment which society suffers therefrom, would be sufficient, even if there was not otherwise a preponderancy of arguments, to induce us to take the negative side of the question. But if we silence, for a moment, the partial voice of affection, and listen alone to the unprejudiced dictates of reason, surely we cannot hesitate to conclude that it is entirely impossible for any circumstances of human misery to justify the commission of suicide.

It is frequently taken for granted, that the principle of self preservation is so deeply implanted in the human mind, that no man can lift his hand against his own life, except his reasoning faculties be suspended or deranged. This indeed is dismissing the argument in a compendious manner. Upon this supposition no guilt can possibly attach to the self-murderer. For how is it consistent with the justice of a beneficent Creator, first to deprive his creatures of reason, and afterwards to punish them for an action, committed in consequence of its loss? But this hypothesis is untenable, and may easily be refuted, by observing the numerous instances of men, who this moment reason with the greatest precision and accuracy, and the next fall by their own hands...nay, who have brooded for weeks, months, and even years over the melancholy resolution, and have, during the whole of that time, been found capable of the soundest argumentation, except upon that particular point; and it is generally admitted as a fundamental and incontrovertible truth, that an error of the judgment, or the perversion of reason, in one instance only, is by no means sufficient to substantiate the charge of Lunacy or Madness.

But it is not on these principles, that we are called upon to decide. Experience, evidently, proves, that a person, in the full possession of his mental powers, may, by the pressure of misfortune, become a self-murderer; and the question is, can any circumstances of human misery justify the deed?

When we behold a libertine ardently pursuing the shadow of pleasure, while he mistakes the substance, neglecting the pure, uncontaminated source of real enjoyment, and greedily quaffing the turbid and polluted torrent of licentious indulgence... when we behold him wallowing in luxury and wanton riot, and hazarding, for the gratification of a moment, the peace and prosperity of his whole future life, and the comfort and happiness of all his dearest connections, we cannot but feel a solicitous anxiety for the event. If this anxiety induces us to take a nearer view of such a character, what is the distressing picture, which frequently arrests our attention? We behold him, in every instance, yielding to the impetuous impulses of his passions, till, by long custom, they confirm themselves into habits, and lord it over his soul with uncontrollable sway. The effects of this subjugation of his reason, are soon dreadfully apparent. If his inhuman revenge prompts him to seek the life of his neighbour, he stops at no enormity to satisfy his thirst of blood. If his insatiable avarice hurries him to the gaming-table, he stakes on the fate of one desperate throw, the ruin of himself and his competitor.

If his inordinate lust kindle, in his soul, an illicit desire for the daughter or the wife of his friend, he stoops to any meanness, rather than relinquish his nefarious purpose. Should his conduct be resented, he makes no scruple of stepping into the field of false honour, to meet, or perhaps to murder the father, the brother, or the husband, of that woman, whom he has seduced from the paths of virtue, and robbed of her innocence, under the most solemn protestations of unalterable affection. In short, after a life passed in all the wild delirium of passion, stained with every vice, and scarce exhibiting one solitary virtue, to cast a transient gleam over the dark and dreary wilderness of his crimes, ruined in his health and fortune, disgusted with the world, and convinced that all its enjoyments can never restore that peace of mind, which his multiplied enormities seem to have banished forever, and distracted with the heart-rending thoughts, which continually crowd upon his soul, and rob him of all repose, he madly puts a period to his wretched existence, by the pistol, or the poisoned bowl. Here indeed there is no room for doubt.

The horror and detestation, which we feel at this vicious course of life, and the dreadful catastrophe, which terminates it, are equal and unlimited. There are, however, many suicides, who can neither fairly be accused of insanity nor licentiousness of moral character. The sons and daughters of affliction are but too ready to fly to this desperate remedy, as a final antidote for the evils of life, and the only certain cure of all their calamities. Reduced by an unforeseen and accumulating series of misfortunes, to misery and want, or racked by a thousand imaginary ills, crowding on their distempered minds, they abandon themselves to all the gloomy horrors of despair, and hopeless of any redress in this world, they desperately rush for refuge on the next. Nay, even while convinced of its atrocity, they frequently implore the mercy of the Almighty, for the crime they are about to commit, and then direct a trembling and irresolute hand to the purposes of self-destruction. But they think that their happiness is gone, and all the avenues of hope closed upon them forever; and under this persuasion, they force themselves upon an action, which their better judgment, in the cool moments of reflection, would lead them to abhor.

To these it may be observed, that in the hour of difficulty and danger, a firm and steady reliance on Divine Providence, is absolutely necessary, and that it is also fully adequate to our support, in the most trying circumstances. There is not a doubt, but it was the intention of the benevolent Creator of

* How must the gentle and sympathetic mind revolt at the idea of tearing away the last faint hope, whereon, however delusive and ill-founded, the weary bosom has been accustomed to repose?

the universe, that, in the whole existence of man, there should be a preponderance of happiness; and we are too weak and too short-sighted to determine what is best for ourselves, or most likely to produce this end. Know we not the vicissitudes of human life? Cannot the same Almighty Hand, which, with salutary correction, has reduced us to a low estate, raise us again, in a moment, to a greater height of prosperity and joy? And will it be no satisfaction to look back on our past sufferings with a recollection that we have borne them firmly, and as became men? We know not for what we are reserved; and shall we, by a rash impatience, counteract the purposes of eternal wisdom? Or can it rationally be expected, that we shall be entitled to the mercy and forgiveness of the Almighty, even while we are committing an act of rebellion against his holy will? But it is much to be doubted, whether these principles have ever become deeply rooted in the minds of those, who withdraw from life, under the sudden pressure of misfortune. Having never been sufficiently accustomed to look up for support in adversity, to the great Father of mankind, they are easily discouraged, their minds are weak and languid, and offer an easy access to the approaches of despair....of despair, that pest of the human race! That blackest of the demons of darkness! Where shall I find words, tinged with sufficient horror, to convey the detestation I feel of thy indescribable deformity? Thou stalkest forwards like a malignant fiend, scattering destruction in thy course, blasting the vale of beauty with thy breath, and tearing up every blooming floweret, planted by the hand of hope, to cheer the rugged path of life, and beguile the wanderer of his woe....'Tis thou, who howlest in the storm of affliction, 'tis thou, who conjurest up that midnight of the mind, which blinds the hapless wretch to every sense of danger....and after conducting him to the edge of a dreadful precipice, beyond which he cannot stretch his view, nor see his desperate situation, in the full extent of its horrors, pushest him at once down the unfathomable and unknown abyss. Oh! may we never feel the benumbing grasp of thy cold icy hand, leading us on to certain ruin! May we ever be on our guard against thy first approaches, and while we are free from thy tyranny, let us resist with all our might, the spells of thy too powerful magic. Let us never, for a moment, lose sight of the sweet visions of hope.

.....While your hearts are yet sincere,
Th' assaults of discontent and doubt repel;
Dark even at noon tide is our mortal sphere:
But let us hope....to doubt is to rebel...
Let us exult in hope, that all shall yet be well.

Proceed we now to the arguments of those who boast of having conquered the prejudices of human nature, and discarded

All that the nurse and all the priest have taught.

It is urged, that to die voluntarily, and by one's own hand, shews much more courage than to drag on a listless life of ignominy and mental, as well as bodily pain. But this is easily answered, by observing, that though the immediate act may, in some degree, partake of a phrenzied courage, yet it certainly shews a dastardly spirit meanly bending under present evils, and unable to bear up against the pressure of misfortune, thus to shrink from their approach.

But, as this argument cannot greatly affect the question either way, let us hear, what further is adduced on the affirmative side:

If life, it is objected, be a gift, where is the crime of disposing of it as we choose, or of resigning it when it becomes a burden? If it be bestowed as a blessing, is it not absurd to suppose, that we may not lawfully rid ourselves of it when it ceases to be so? No one, who sincerely believes that God is the Governor of the Universe, can lay any stress upon this argument. This belief naturally leads us to conclude, that there must be some certain conditions, some set of duties connected with our present state of existence; and how can the suicide, who flies from the part assigned him, in the great drama of human life, be said to fulfil those duties, or those conditions? Obedience and submission to the decrees of providence are in a particular degree incumbent on all, but the suicide arrogantly throws back the gift of life into the hands of the bountiful giver, and tacitly charges him with injustice for having bestowed it. The absurdity and weakness of the reasoning which overlooks these circumstances need not be pointed out.—The latter part of this objection has already been fully noticed. It may not be amiss, however, to repeat, that where misery is so often attendant upon success, and blessings are so frequently the companions of disappointment, we should be very cautious how we judge of any circumstance till our opinion be justified by the event. If this consideration were suffered to have its due weight, it would form no inconsiderable check to the progress of suicide.

It is further urged, that there is no express prohibition of suicide in the scriptures. Neither is there any express command respecting self-preservation. But an horror of suicide, and a wish for the preservation of life are both equally implanted in the human breast, and neither of them can be removed but by some violent concussion of the mental and corporeal system. The precepts of the Gospel, however, invariably inculcate a resignation to the divine will, and a submission to every dispensation of his providence. This is diametrically opposite to the principles of the self-murderer. Again, is it probable that in commanding mankind to do no murder, the silence of the scriptures respecting suicide should be considered as an exception in favor of the most desperate and horrid of all murders? Those who are best acquainted with the spirit of the sacred writings, will scarcely be persuaded to think so. But, as the question before us is put in the most general terms, whether any circumstances whatever of human misery, can possibly justify the act of self-slaughter, let us consider the argument which apparently carries the greatest weight in the opinion of the favourers of suicide, just observing that if this be completely answered, the subject seems to admit of no further debate.

When all the ties of sentiment and affection, which attach the heart to this world, are, by a variety of circumstances, dissolved or torn asunder; when I am a forlorn and solitary being, whom wretchedness alone accompanies, and to whom life is become a burden; why should I not deliver myself from so much misery, by putting an immediate end to my existence?

It will readily be granted, that where any position is calculated to infringe materially upon the best interests of society, we should be exceedingly cautious how we admit its truth. That this is the case in the instance before us is manifest. Should the opinion become predominant, every person who feels a tedium of life, and wishes to resign it, would avail himself of the excuse. The fatal consequences likely to follow such a general laxity of principle, form, in my opinion, a strong presumptive proof of its fallacy. But, it is evident, that there are few, very few, indeed, who are really reduced to this extremity of wretchedness, and how unfair, to say no worse of it, is that argument which makes a very uncommon occurrence the groundwork of a general principle—shew me the man who is destitute of friends, who is torn from every connection in life, which he once held dear, are there yet no duties for him to perform? No wretchedness which his assistance could ameliorate? Will not acts of humanity and benevolence again connect him with life? Again raise around the tender and affectionate sympathies of our nature. Is there nothing valuable, nothing consolatory in the recollection of a virtuous action? Are not the praises of those we love grateful and soothing to the ear of friendship, and is not a remembrance of their worth an encouragement to bear a little longer the load of earthly existence, under the idea that by an imitation of their virtues we may be eventually united forever? But I appeal to the experience of every one present, (and to experience, in cases of this nature, we must ever have recourse) whether it does not more frequently happen that the suicide is surrounded with friends the most dear, with relations the most affectionate, who are ever ready to condole with him in his afflictions, and to administer every consolation in their power. How then must his sorrowful exit affect those? Does it, indeed, leave no stigma behind it? Have all the world freed themselves from prejudices, as he supposes he himself has done? Ought we not even to respect the prejudices of virtue? But above all, and what most essentially affects the present argument, are the persons he holds most dear, free from those supposed prejudices, and will not a death by his own hand awaken in their bosoms the most poignant anguish? Let the man of real sensibility consider the distracted situation of a mother, a wife, or a daughter, entering the fatal apartment, and beholding the son of her love, the husband of her choice, the father on whom her fond hopes ever leaned for support, weltering in his blood, or expiring in the fatal noose. Surely this melancholy, this moving consideration would be sufficient to arrest the fatal stroke ere it fell, charm away the wildness of despair, and reduce any person, not entirely insensible, to right reason. But supposing it possible for a man to be entirely insulated from the world, and void of every interest therein, that no duty remains which it was not in his power to perform, that no one would lament his loss nor shed the tears of pity on his tomb, still the duty he owes the great author of his being remains unimpaired, and in its full force. No circumstance can invalidate this; it is eternal and immutable, founded on the everlasting basis of justice, gratitude, and truth.

Who then art thou, vain man, who settest thyself up as a judge between the almighty and his creatures? Canst thou suppose that he is ignorant of the proper time of calling thee from a state of probation to the rewards of virtue or the punishments of vice? Has he, indeed, confided to thee the privilege of rushing into his presence, when even thy outrageous passions have so far blinded thy reason as to make thee weary of life? Tremble at the just indignation which awaits thy presumption. Thou art but a child of the dust; be humble and be wise. If it be asked, how then am I to bear such a complication of misery? The answer is obvious, and may be delivered in a few words: fly to the consolation of religion—repose thy troubles and thy sorrows in the bosom of a benevolent Deity, and never think of suicide till his promises of comfort and support are found to be fallacious.

But, before we dismiss the subject, it may be well to observe, that though much has been said against the principle of suicide, yet it was never meant to be asserted that there are no gradations of guilt in this, as well as in other crimes, or that every act of self-murder is equally offensive and enormous. Doubtless, there are frequently mitigating circumstances, which greatly lessen its criminality. But it is not for man to judge his fellow-man; it rests with the almighty alone to determine and to punish, or to pardon, as is most consistent with the dictates of his justice and mercy.

Upon the whole, however, it appears that no circumstances of human misery can justify the crime of suicide, whether we consider it as an outrage against every principle of self-preservation in the individual, as an injury to society in general, or as an act of rebellion against the divine majesty of God, the great ruler of the universe.

TURKISH MANNER OF DRINKING COFFEE.

Coffee to be good, must either be ground into powder, or it must be pounded as the Turks do, in an iron mortar, with a heavy pestle.

The Turks first put the coffee, dry into the coffee pot, and set it over a very slow fire, or embers, till it is warm, and sends forth a fragrant smell, shaking it often: then from another pot, they pour on it boiling water. They then hold it a little longer over the fire, till there is on its top a white froth, like cream, but it must not boil, but only gently rise; it is then poured backward and forward, two or three times, from one pot into another and it soon becomes clear. Some put in a spoonful of fresh water, to make it clear sooner; or lay a cloth dipt in cold water on the top of the pot. Coffee should be roasted in an earthen, or iron pan, and the slower it is roasted the better. As often as it crackles, it must be taken off the fire. The Turks often roast it in a baker's oven, while it is heating.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In the conducting of this paper, in such factious times, as the present, the Editor, far from dreaming of general approbation, constantly anticipates, and is stedfastly prepared to hear much Jacobinical censure; and many a timid doubt, and lukewarm suggestion. He proceeds fearlessly on his way, and uniformly publishes his opinions with the freedom of one, who is "no man's heir, or slave." Uncontrouled by the vulgar, uninfluenced by foreign or domestic dictation, unconnected with any political club, he is his own counsellor, and trusts to Time to test the utility of the political speculations in the Port Folio. Meanwhile the subsequent extract of a letter, from a venerable friend, will more than counterbalance a load of jacobinical obloquy, and vulgar disapprobation.

"The extreme rarity of men of letters in this country, has led you to suppose that I might be capable of assisting you in your literary labours. But although none can be more sincere in wishing you success, I can only assist you in a subordinate way, as I do not belong to the class of authors, and am, by no means, a favourite with the sovereign people.

"But, that I may not abase too far the order to which I belong, I give you notice that I belong to the class of readers, without whom the class of authors could not exist; and I am an old member of this society, for I have been a reader since the year 1739. It would be needless for me to say, that I approve of the doctrines of the Oldschool, as contained in your writings. My reading, my habits, my conviction, the company I have kept, and the connections I have formed, all tend to confirm me in the belief of these doctrines, and the longer I consider them, the more I am convinced of their truth and usefulness to society. I approve of your design, as announced in your prospectus, and hope that, even in these days of jacobin fury, your speculations are useful to keep some people in their senses, who are in danger of being infected with the madness of the times. You will not expect any jacobin subscribers, as that sect have been taught by their demagogues to wink hard against the clearest light, and to believe nothing, except what is recommended by their leaders. I have long waited in vain in the hope that they might be enlightened by events; but there is nothing that seems to have any effect on them, for, although what they called the French republic, by a figure of speech, very common in Ireland, was nothing but a succession of different despots; and although Buonaparte, by the assistance of forty grenadiers, has annihilated the very appearance of republicanism in France; yet our infatuated Jacobins are still eager to introduce among us the infernal doctrines of the French revolution."

It is a fact that within two years a Philadelphia publisher offered to print for the Devil, if he would be graciously pleased to favor him with his speculations. We have not yet heard that Beelzebub has accepted this flattering offer, though the works of the Devil would probably prove quite agreeable to the sovereign people, as he is known to be a perfect republican character, and has had the honour of founding the Pandemonium, a republic, more ancient than the world.

STANZAS TO THOMAS JEFFERSON,

President of the United States.

National Ægis, 8th December.

The lover of exquisite versification, and the votary of refined genius, are invited to seek the sonnet of the Sutton songstress, under the signature of Rosanna Maria, agreeably to the above reference.

The perusal of it has brought to mind the first lines of other stanzas addressed, by a Virginia bard, to Mr. Jefferson, on his return from Europe,

"Great patron of Virginia state,
We hail thee equal with the great."

We recommend to these laureate rhymsters, "if this fall into their hands to revolve," that "some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them."

Most lamentably indigent must be that fame, which can be enriched by such contributions.

The following stanza is selected as a specimen of pure and perspicuous versification, from the pen of Rosanna.

Here can no poet's mercenary song,
Echo the praises of a courtly throng,
Nor the poor wealth of many a powerful state
Buy a new humor for the truly great.

Mr. Blake, the Editor of the Attorney General's newspaper, called the National Ægis, criticised with no little severity, last summer, an occasional ode styled, "Rule New-England," written by Mr. Paine, of Boston.

We recommend to the Editor of the Ægis, to exercise his "acute and penetrating" talent at criticism upon the stanzas of his Rosanna.

CERTIFICATE OF GOOD CHARACTER.

The House of Delegates in the State of Virginia; have passed certain resolutions, about the "extreme licentiousness of the Federal Editors, in the abuse of the President," and in order to express their "entire disapprobation of the attacks" made on his character, they subjoin a kind of certificate of their belief in "the purity and uprightness of his motives." If the President should ever get out of place, this certificate may possibly be of some use in recommending him, to a new one, in the State of Virginia, though we are far from thinking, that in any other State, it would avail him, even as a passport, whatever "pleasurable duty" the Delegates might have felt "in declaring, that there is no man in America, who deserves more of the confidence and support of these United States, than the enlightened, philosophic, benevolent and patriotic REPUBLICAN—Thomas Jefferson." In this climate, we are surprised to find so pretty a title as "Serene," omitted; more especially as the Democratic members of the Vermont Legislature, lately inserted it in their Certificate. It would not surprise us to see a regular series of these Certificates, made out and filed, during the winter, as "expressions of the public will," and what is still more of a peep into futurity, we venture to predict Legislative shackles upon the liberty of the press. The party now in power will not be satisfied to wait the slow operation, of "the detestation and discountenance of good men, manifested in private life," which, in the language (perhaps in the opinion) of Governor McKean, "will prove more efficacious to purify and reform the press, than legislative acts, or judicial animadversion." Their vices and their follies, their hypocrisy and their incapacity for Government, must and will be blazoned to the Country, and they will infallibly be driven to take shelter under "legal restraint" or the consequences to them will be ruin and desolation.

The following article, from an English journal, has not found its way into any of our newspapers. We copy it, because it is well written, and of much interest.

"The immense armies, which Buonaparte formerly carried into the field, are scarcely more wonderful than the vast bodies of workmen he now employs all over the republic. The capital does not engage more of his attention than the departments; and here, I am certain, there must be several thousands in his pay. He is building three new bridges over the Seine, and he is repairing and beautifying all the public buildings. If you go to the Library, to the Pantheon, to the Louvre, to the Monuments, to the Invalids....you find them all crowded with masons and carpenters. The churches are not overlooked. A good many had been sold, and are now converted into shops and warehouses; but the marks of devastation are rapidly disappearing from all the rest. Great improvements are making in various parts of the town, at the public expense. Near the Place de Carousel, whole streets have been lately pulled down, and there are others marked out, which are to be removed immediately. If one considers, at the same time, the works that are carrying on at Boulogne, at Havre, at Lyons, and on the Rhine, one is lost in astonishment. It is easy to conceive, that Buonaparte should wish to do all this from the well known magnificence of his views; but how he is able to supply the expense appears altogether unaccountable. Every salary is in arrear, and there is no doubt that he is often extremely embarrassed to find money for the most necessary purposes.

"But as he has rivalled Julius Cæsar, in military achievements, it seems now to be the grand object of his ambition, that his reign should resemble that of Augustus, in the prosperity of the arts. I fear he has little moderation, and that it is himself alone that enters into all his calculations. Yet, from a regard to his own glory, he must have laid aside all thoughts of extending his conquests. Though his attitude must remain formidable and commanding he would enter upon a new war with infinite disadvantages. The enthusiasm, produced by the revolution is gone. He would only have the means of a regular government, while he would have to struggle with all the dangers of usurped power. Would he venture to put Lasnes, Massena, or Angereau at the head of a hundred thousand men? Would he himself now venture into Italy, when Paris is filled with malecontents? At any rate, his crown would be at stake. The least turn of ill-success would be the signal for his enemies to conspire against him. The discontent, which he now dams up, is gathering in secret, and will be ready every moment to burst forth, and overwhelm him. From his wonderful talents, he might perhaps reasonably hope for uninterrupted triumph; but fortune still is fickle, and, when her frowns would be so fatal, it is not very probable that he will put himself in her power.

"I do not at all envy Paris the splendid monuments which the chief consul is raising of his greatness; nor do I think, that we incur any disgrace, from being, in this respect, so much outdone. A despotic government is not an unmixed evil. When the whole resources of a great country are in the irresponsible hands of one man, he may confer great benefits on the community. But bridges and picture galleries are but a poor compensation for the loss of freedom. If the English government could appropriate the revenue according to its caprice, and could arbitrarily seize private property,* upon giving the owner a little stock, upon the valuation of one of its own agents, I have not the smallest doubt, that the vanity of our kings and ministers would prompt them to adorn the metropolis, and to raise edifices, not inferior to those, which constitute the boast of the enslaved Parisians."

The following is a thorough paced Jacobin dream, quite in the sans culotte costume. It will be worth the reading. If the reader do not find in it more wit, than to Jacobin belongs, he may burn the article, and let it be a profound secret. For the Jacobin from whom we had it, told us, that though he considered it in point of argument, as an unanswerable defence of his favourite statesman, yet it would not do for the weak brethren, and, therefore, it must be a secret. We do not say it is unanswerable. But we will say that it is in point of argument against a certain charge the very strongest defence of the great man, which has yet appeared.

THE METAMORPHOSIS.

BY A JACOBIN.

In days of yore, as poets tell,
When Jove in love with mortals fell,
He stripp'd off dignity and pride,
Laid all his thunder-bolts aside;
From high Olympus made escape
To beastly deeds, in beastly shape....
By turns, as lewdness spurr'd him on,
A bull, a serpent or a swan....
Yet, when the lustful fit was o'er,
He rose, resplendent, as before:
Ascend'd heav'n's bright throne again,
Majestic king of gods and men!
Again the blasting thunder hurl'd,
And snuff'd the incense of a world.
Say, then, ye scoundrel tory crew,
Who make of morals such ado:
Since Jove could make himself a beast,
On Grecian beauty's charms to feast;
If he, whom Jacobins adore,
Should lust to kennel with a whore,
If, scorning all his country's dames,†
No tint, but jet, his blood inflames,
Why should our demi-god forbear
A transient veil of soot to wear,
Why not his godship put away,
Invest himself in Afric's clay,
Smear with lamp-black his pallid wax,
And look and smell like other blacks,
To charm the lovely Sally's eye,
And wallow in a negro-sty:
Then take his proper form again,
The pride of virtue...first of men.
In vain you prate of moral rites,
The net of priests...the bait of fools:

* The proprietors of the houses, pulled down near the Place de Carrousel, one morning were presented with an arrete, informing them that their names had been put upon the national books for an annuity, and that they must immediately remove....No petitioning....no hearing by counsel....no appeal to a jury.

† This is a mistake....He did not scorn all his country's dames....But thereby hangs another tale.

He shall not lose beneath your rod,
The ancient birth-right of a god....
Lo, while his wond'ring form I seek,
The rosy hue forsakes his cheek,
And straight, by transformation strange,
From white to black his features change!
His tresses fall, and in their stead,
A fleece shoots curling from his head,
Flat sinks the bridge, that prop'd his nose,
Which round his nostril plumper grows:
His jaw protrudes, his lip expands,
Pah! he secretes by all the glands:
His legs infect: his stature shrinks,
And from his skin all Congo stinks:
Behold him now, by Cupid sped,
In darkness sneak to Sally's bed:
With philosophic nose inquire,
How rank the sable race perspire.
In foul pollution steep his life,
Insult the ashes of his wife:
All the paternal duties smother,
Give his white girls a yellow brother:
Mid loud hosannas of his knaves,
From his own loins raise herds of slaves.
With numbers to outvote the free,
And smoke the yankies, five for three.
Yet shall he not be long confin'd
To the base mould of Afric's kind:
But with the morrow's dawning light
Resume his native red and white....
Then pure to jacobinic eyes,
Claim the full tribute of their lies.
Still under Smith's and Jones's pen,
Appear the first of mortal men.
Still in the praise of Dallas shine,
Still seem to Lincoln all divine.
Still worshipp'd as a god remain,
By Cheetham, Grainger and Duane:
And, spite of all you Tories can,
Still wield the state...THE PEOPLE'S MAN.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM A GENTLEMAN AT CINCINNATI, DATED NOV. 30.

Our Territory, or perhaps I now ought to say State, long secluded from the political bustle of the members of the union, is now convulsed with party rage. That hideous monster, Jacobinism, under the specious name of Republicanism, which has so radically destroyed the liberties, the happiness, and the prosperity of the French Nation, and has made such dangerous innovations in the United States, is now stalking through our country, with rapid strides. Ruin and disorder are in the train; where the fatal infatuation of the people will stop I am not able to foresee. It will not stop, indeed, until great mischief be effected. A Convention, to frame a Constitution is now sitting at Chillicothe, completely under Jacobinical influence. What sort of a thing this written Constitution will be I cannot anticipate. One act of this Convention I have seen, and I flatter myself it will have a good effect. The Washington party made a proposal to submit the Constitution proposed to the People for their acceptance, or rejection; and, in the resolution, pointed out the method of taking the popular sense on the question. This proposal was immediately rejected by the self-styled republicans, who compose three fourths of the house. The Sovereign People I think will take this in high dudgeon. So great an evidence of want of confidence in their wisdom will never be submitted to with impunity. The mushrooms of the day who are now clothed with a little brief authority, will soon, I persuade myself, be obliged to sink to that obscurity, from which they never should have been drawn; and the disciples of the Old-school, who certainly possess the talents of the country, be again found necessary to the correct administration of our Government.

A nobleman lately advising his son to keep inferior people at a distance, a tradesman, who overheard the admonition, replied, "I am very sorry, my lord, you did not give the young gentleman this advice before he got deeply in my books,"

The ensuing sketch of a French Cataline, may suggest to some that there is a close resemblance of Cardinal de Retz, in this country. "Cardinal de Retz was proud to be called the Little Cataline. Ambitious without measure, he knew no restraint, and was fearless of danger. To gain his point, he made use, alternately, of gallantry and politics, vice and virtue, religion and the passions. Quick, subtle, and of an unruly imagination; his schemes, though he had great penetration, and a vast extent of capacity, always bordered on the chimerical. He was fond of all extraordinary projects, and endeavoured to put them in execution, by methods the least common, and the fullest of artifice.

The talents of M. Jekyll for wit and pleasantry are well known. Being at Covent Garden, the other evening, to hear Mrs. Billington, in Love in a Village, a friend sitting with him in a box, asked him on her appearance, whether that was Rossetta, to which the wit, replied in the negative by observing it was Grand Cairo. The allusion was at the embonpoint of the Syren, and the comparison between the little village of Rosetta, and the overgrown size of the Egyptian Capital.

The wits of London have playfully sported the subsequent list of plays to be represented during the winter for the benefit of certain well known characters.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The imitation of Integer vixit is very elegantly and wittily accomplished, by an ingenious friend, who, we hope, will frequently exercise his pen, in the service of the gracious muse. Such sprightly turns from the Roman poets, are very delightful to the editor. He remembers a whimsical version of "Persicos Odi, puer, apparatus," which is supposed to be addressed to his chambermaid, by an old bachelor.

The neatness of Batavian trousers,
Their mops and pails in endless rows
I hate, and suffer in my room
A duster, only and a broom.
Each Saturday, upon your knees
Scour, scrub your kitchen, as you please,
But where I sit, and where I lie,
The floor, Rebecca, shall be dry.

"The Metamorphosis, by a Jacobin," which is inserted among our paragraphs, is one of the most poetical, severe, and well deserved satires, of American origin, we have ever perused.

We are bewitched with "Beatrice."

We rejoice to hear from "Asmodeo."

The letter from Verbal and Trochee will soon appear.

Numerous favours are under consideration. Correspondents, impatient for an early attention, must write early in the week.

SELECTED POETRY.

[Imitations of Spenser are generally uncouth, or languid. The 'Castle of Indolence,' and the 'Schoolmistress,' are most honourable exceptions to this general remark. We may add the following stanzas, from the pen of some ingenious, but unknown writer,

"Lost in the dreary shades of dull obscurity."

They were snatched from the perishable pages of a fugitive publication, and preserved by the care of the editors of an annual repository of poetical pieces. Seldom has a mere bantling of poetry exhibited a form more finished. The initial lines of the second stanza are very tersely expressed. The description of our bachelor's room in the ninth, of his precise habits in the tenth, and of the topics of a club, in the eleventh stanzas, is well imagined, and happily given. Single lines too, are not without brilliancy,

But when the Sabbath-day might challenge more,
Or feast, or birth-day, should it chance to be,

A glossy suit, devoid of stain, he wore,
And gold his buttons glanc'd, so fair to see.

and—his social moments own'd,
The generous signet of the purple wine.
are striking examples.]

THE OLD BACHELOR.

AFTER THE MANNER OF SPENSER.

This poem is re-printed from the Town and Country Magazine for 1777.—The Editor has never seen it elsewhere, though its excellence ought to have rescued it from obscurity.

In Phœbus' region while some bards there be
That sing of battles, and the trumpet's roar;
Yet these, I ween, more powerful bards than me,
Above my ken, on equal pinions soar!
Haply a scene of meaner view to scan,
Beneath their laurel'd praise my verse may give,
To trace the features of unnoticed man:
Deeds, else forgotten, in my verse may live!
Her lore, mayhap, instructive sense may teach,
From weeds of humbler growth within my fowly reach.

A wight there was, who, single and alone,
Had crept from vigorous youth to waning age,
Nor e'er was worth, nor e'er was beauty known
His heart to captive, or his thought engage:
Some feeble joyaunce, though his conscious mind
Might female worth or beauty give to wear,
Yet to the nobler sex he held confin'd
The genuine graces of the soul sincere,
And well could show, with saw or proverb quaint,
All semblance woman's soul, and all her beauty paint.

In plain attire this wight apparel'd was,
(For much he conn'd of frugal lore and knew)
Nor, till some day of larger note might cause,
From iron-bound chest his better garb he drew:
But when the Sabbath-day might challenge more,
Or feast, or birth-day should it chance to be,
A glossy suit, devoid of stain he wore,
And gold his buttons glanced so fair to see,
Gold clasp'd his shoon, by maiden brush'd so sheen,
And his rough beard he shav'd, and donn'd his linen clean.

But in his common garb a coat he wore,
A faithful coat that long its lord had known,
That once was black, but now was black no more,
Atting'd by various colours not its own.
All from his nostrils was the front imbrown'd,
And down the back ran many a greasy line,
While, here and there, his social moments own'd,
The generous signet of the purple wine.
Brown o'er the bent of eld his wig appear'd,
Like fox's trailing tail by hunters sore assair'd.

One only maid he had, like turtle true,
But not like turtle gentle, soft, and kind;
For many a time her tongue bewray'd the shrew,
And in meet words unpack'd her peevish mind:
Ne form'd was she to raise the soft desire
That stirs the tingling blood in youthful vein,
Ne form'd was she to light the tender fire,
By many a bard is sung in many a strain:

Hook'd was her nose, and countless wrinkles, told,
What no man durst to her, I ween, that she was old.

When the clock told the wonted hour was come
When from his nightly cups the wight withdrew,
Right patient would she watch his wending home,
His feet she heard, and soon the bolt she drew.
If long his time was past, and leaden sleep
O'er her tir'd eye lids 'gan his reign to stretch,
Oft would she curse that men such hours should keep,

And many a saw 'gainst drunkenness would preach;

Haply if potent gin had arm'd her tongue,
All on the reeling wight a thund'ring peal she rung.

For though the blooming queen of Cyprus' isle,
O'er her cold bosom long had ceas'd to reign,
On that cold bosom still could Bacchus smile,
Such beverage to own if Bacchus deign:

For wine she priz'd not much, for stronger drink
Its medicine, oft a cholic-pain will call,
And for the medicine's sake, might envy think,
Oft would a cholic-pain her bowels enthrall;
Yet much the proffer did she loath and say
No dram might maiden taste, and often answer'd nay.

So, as in single animals he joy'd
One cat, and eke one dog, his bounty fed:
The first the cate-devouring mice destroy'd,
Thieves heard the last, and from his threshold fled:
All in the sun-beams basked the lazy cat,
Her mottled length in couchant posture laid;
On one accustomed chair while Pompey sat,
And loud he bark'd should Puss his right invade.
The human pair oft mark'd them as they lay,
And haply sometimes thought like cat and dog were they.

A room he had that fac'd the southern ray,
Where oft he walk'd to set his thoughts in tune,
Pensive he passed its length an hour or twa,
All to the music of his creaking shoon.
And at the end a darkling closet stood,
Where books he kept of old research and new,
In seemly order rang'd on shelves of wood,
And rusty nails, and phials not a few:
Thilk place a wooden box besemeth well,
And papers squar'd and trimm'd for use unmeet
to tell.

For still in form he plac'd his chief delight,
Nor lightly broke his old accusom'd rule,
And such uncourteous would he hold the wight
That e'er displaced a table, chair or stool;
And oft in meet array their ranks review'd;
For novel forms, though much those forms had graced,

Himself and maiden-minister eschew'd.
One path he trod, nor ever would decline
A hair's unmeasur'd breadth from off the ev'n line.
A Club select there was, where various talk
On various chapters pass'd the ling'ring hour,
And thither oft he bent his evening walk,
And warm'd to mirth by wine's enlivening pow'r.
And oft on politics the preachments ran,
If a pipe lent its thought-begetting fume,
And oft important matters would they scan,
And deep in council fix a nation's doom,
And oft they chuckled loud at jest or jeer,
Or bawdy tale the most, thilk much they lov'd to hear.

For men like him they were, of like consort,
Thilk much the honest muse must needs condemn,

Who made of women's wiles their wanton sport,
And bless'd their stars that kept their curse from them!

No honest love they knew, no melting smile
That shoots the transports to the throbbing heart!
Thilk knew they not but in a harlot's guile
Lascivious smiling through the mask of art:
And so of women deem'd they as they knew,
And from a Demon's traits an Angel's picture drew.

But most abhorr'd they Hymeneal rites,
And boasted oft the freedom of their fate;
Nor vail'd, as they opin'd, its best delytes,
Those ills to balance that on wedlock wait;
And often would they tell of hen-peck'd fool
Snubb'd by the hard behest of sour-ey'd dame,
And vow'd no tongue-arm'd woman's freakish rule
Their mirth should quail, or damp their generous flame:—
Then pledged their hands, and toss'd their bumpers o'er.

If e'er a doubt of softer kind arose
Within some breast of less obdurate frame,
Lo! where its hideous form a Phantom shows
Full in his view, and Cuckold is its name.
Him Scorn attended with a glance askew,
And Scorpion Shame for delicts not his own,
Her painted bubbles, while Suspicion blew,
And vex'd the region round the Cupid's throne:
"Far be from us, they cry'd, the treach'rous bane, Far be the dimply guile, and far the flow'ry chain!"

A NOSEGAY.

The violet is modesty,
For it conceals itself;
The rose is likewise modesty,
Though it reveals itself;
For it a blush betrays.

The jes'min shews us innocence,
So chaste, and pure its hue;
The hyacinth, sweet diffidence,
Which bends to shun our view,
'Tis fancy thus pourtrays.

The honeysuckle, sympathy,
Distilling dewy tears;
The passion-flower, brevity;
Scarce blown, it disappears.

The tulip is variety,
That changes with the hour;
The primrose is simplicity,
And Flora's favorite flower.

Thus in each plant, some lesson we may find
Which serves t'improve, while it corrects the mind;
And flowers and weeds are an exhaustless store
Of pleasure, profit, and intrinsic—lore.
In short, each object, to a grateful heart,
However humble, must delight impart.

That he had been to see a play,
A Christian penitent one day
Confess'd, with accusations sore,
And promis'd he'd do so no more.
Let's see, the sage confessor cries,
The guilt within the pleasure lies;
What was the play?—the wretch replied
'Twas the Deserter, rev'rend guide—
Since seeing it is your offence,
Read it—to shew your penitence.

JUNIUS.

To the incubations of this evening, this is a title, which will attract the attention of every student, and even detain the vagrant mind of the literary loiterer. JUNIUS, however he may disgust some by his democracy, astonish others by his audaciousness, irritate many by his prejudices, and grieve more by his total contempt of charity and candour, is still diligently and frequently perused by all, who can be arranged in any of the ranks of literature. This is the glorious triumph, this the high prerogative and imperial power of GENIUS, consummated by ART, that reluctant mortals are compelled to assent to its authority, and to admire, and to glorify, at the very instant they disapprove. This position is wonderfully exemplified by the transcendent success of these fugitive letters. Seditious, inflammatory, rancorous, exaggerating; without charity, that is kind, without candour, which is catholic, without truth, which is eternal, these factious epistles, sacred from the usual oblivion of party writings, still perpetuate the lofty fame of their author.* The most rigid criticism has saluted him with the title of a legitimate English classic. The parliamentary orator models his style after the pattern of JUNIUS. The lawyer quotes him in his pleading; his elegant irony, and his venomous sarcasms are repeated both in the senate house and before the tribunal. Authors strive to turn periods with his exquisite polish, and, like him, to point their satire, and to animate their page. Declaimers are emulous of his indignant tone, and poets learn new lessons of melody

* In speaking of the elegant invectives of this malicious writer, the Editor employs the plausible style, in behalf merely of their literary merit. Of their political truth or usefulness, he is more than sceptical. Indeed he abominates most of the doctrines of this demagogue. His insubordination, and his flattery of the people he hates, with a perfect hatred. They are false, malignant, libellous and enormously subversive of the best interests of society. The author was a cowardly fomentor of the passions of the populace; and when he strove to shake allegiance to the sovereign, and to destroy respect for the judge and the noble, he gave the best proof of the wickedness and sophistry of his cause, by not daring to advance, and to defend it in the face of day. His calumny of the King; of Lord Mansfield, of the earl of Bute, of the duke of Grafton, and of Welbore Ellis, was equally atrocious and execrable. Time, an unerring test, has proved him a liar. The eroded robe of Mansfield's justice is not even sullied with a stain; and the fair fame of the EARL OF BUTE, an honest minister, a most sagacious statesman, a learned scholar, and a munificent patron of genius, is not tarnished by the foulest arts of the lurking libeller. His virulent abuse of the Scotch, that gallant and high-spirited nation, they read, only to despise, and the memory of the hapless STUARTS will always be cherished by many a cavalier, execrating both the cruelty and the theories of JUNIUS.

I cannot, in this place, refrain from recommending very earnestly to the reader DR. JOHNSON'S famous strictures upon the pernicious sentiments of JUNIUS. See a Political Tract respecting Falkland's Island. In a vein of the sharpest satire, and with all the potency of argument and truth, that venerable champion of law and loyalty completely overthrows his adversary. JUNIUS could not reply. His vaunted powers seemed at once to wither, as if blasted by the necromancy of a magician.

from his harmonious periods. Though all his topics are transitory, though most of the personages, the objects of his reproach, are no more, though obnoxious men and measures have passed away, yet his ingenuity has contrived that his satire should be perennial. An ordinary demagogue may rail loudly, but is forgotten soon. His virulence fades away, with the occasion, which gave it birth. But JUNIUS does not "light, as one who beateeth the air." He makes desperate passes, and their effects are lasting. His vindictiveness, like that everlasting animosity, described by the Roman, is,

"IMMORTALE odium, et nunquam sanabile vulnus."

In America, perhaps, no book, with the exception of the Bible and Blackstone's Commentaries, is more generally perused, among men of letters, than JUNIUS. Almost every lawyer and politician has much of him by heart. Our admiration of this splendid writer is fully commensurate with that of his own nation. In the speeches of our legislators, and in the writings of our authors, may be discerned many an imitation of his manner. Whatever, therefore, relates to this popular writer, will be read with uncommon eagerness, and with peculiar interest. Like Butler, Oldham, Churchill, and many more, who describe evanescent objects, and whose topics are both local and fleeting, even the lucid JUNIUS is not, without a commentary, always clear. Many a note is desirable, and much explanation is necessary. A new edition, with these advantages, was wanted, and the more so, because many splendid impressions of this work, though they might captivate the eye, by the pageantry of plates, and the glitter of a hot press, yet offended the judgment of the student, by the most palpable violation of correctness. To explain the meaning, and to regulate the text of JUNIUS, has been this year undertaken, in England, by ROBERT HERON ESQUIRE, a Scottish author of distinguished reputation, and who has long been conspicuous both for his learning and his loyalty. He has published an edition of these celebrated letters, with notes and illustrations, historical, political, biographical and critical. The following Review, from a literary journal, contains so much interesting information, and so much skillful criticism, I am persuaded, my readers will read it, notwithstanding its minuteness and length, with an attention, as continued as my own. The conjecture, that this long concealed author was the celebrated DUNNING,† afterwards LORD ASHBURTON, is highly plausible. Mr. Heron has rendered essential service to the republic of letters, by his laborious researches into the history of his author, that this new edition of JUNIUS, will, without doubt, supersede every other extant. It is ardently hoped, that it may be promptly imported here, and that our countrymen may have fresh reason to study a pure English writer, whose classical style will incite to emulation, and whom to imitate, in any degree, is sufficient to purify our expressions, to rescue our tongue from barbarism, and to render our conversation and composition both nervous and elegant.

† The curious reader will find, in the works of Sir William Jones, a very spirited sketch of the character of this nobleman. Perhaps a recurrence to this article of biography and to the speeches and law arguments of Mr. Dunning, during a memorable epoch in British history, will reflect some light upon one of the most mysterious occurrences in the annals of literature.

The object of this edition of JUNIUS, appears to be, to present to the world such a commentary, as will unfold the state and circumstances of political affairs, parties, and characters, in which JUNIUS wrote; thereby to account for the scope, constituents, and effect of the letters.

In a preface, our author introduces an essay on the eloquence of JUNIUS. Explaining the nature and purposes of eloquence; and tracing its progress, from its first rude essays, to its highest perfection, he observes, that the most exalted species of our oratorical excellence, is its complete adaptation of the best means to the best ends; that he is the most consummate orator, whose discourse, oral or written, most powerfully and effectually promotes wisdom, virtue, religion, private and public happiness. This species of eloquence comprehends purity of affection, and of motive, as well as force of genius, and impressiveness of communication.

A subordinate excellence of eloquence, is that, which rests much less on purity of design, than felicity of execution, which less regards the absolute goodness of the end, than the appositeness of the means.

The highest of these two characters he ascribes to DEMOSTHENES.

'In this quality, I am inclined to think, that every other orator, of every age, must yield to DEMOSTHENES. DEMOSTHENES alone discerned, and steadily pursued the true interests of his country, in his opposition to the artifices and the arms of Philip. To preserve to Athens the ascendancy among the Grecian states, to save the republics from sinking into subjection to a barbarous monarch, to maintain, in the most civilized country of the world, that political arrangement of the people, under which alone its arts, its science, its virtues, had been known to flourish, to revive the energy of their ancient virtue, in the hearts of the Greeks;... these were the express objects, to accomplish which, the great Grecian author exercised his eloquence. He discerned the true interests of Greece; he pursued them steadily, to the care of promoting them, he sacrificed all the sordid cares of private interest and base-minded ambition.'

For this highest excellence of eloquence, CICERO he justly deems inferior to DEMOSTHENES.

'When he probes the soul, and detects the guilt of a Cataline, the prejudices and arts of the devoted member of a party are not less conspicuous, amid the thunder of his harangues, than the sublime beneficence and integrity of the patriot. In the speeches of the prosecution against VERRES, you see chiefly the young man, striving to raise himself, to political and oratorical importance, as the advocate of a splendid and popular cause. In the invectives against ANTHONY, personal resentment, and party zeal are much more apparent, than the generous spirit and the sublime views of pure enlightened patriotism, discerning and preferring nothing but the public good.'

Unblinded purity of design the author is far from claiming for JUNIUS.

'To overthrow (he says) a ministry; to gratify and sway the minds of a populace; to oppose a system for the abolition of national distinctions, and party prejudices, to indulge secret disgust, jealousies or resentments, rankling at his heart; to obtain the praise of unrivalled excellence in literary composition, were probably the leading purposes, with which this author wrote. He co-operated, but without true patriot design, for the redress of wrongs, which the long reign of aristocratical whiggism, and lately, the inexperienced zeal of toryism had inflicted on the constitution. In his invectives against particular persons, he descended into a malignity of attack, which, however effectual towards the ends he had in view, was utterly incompatible with exalted rectitude of design. He disdained not to mingle in the miserable bustle of ochlocracy, with as much readiness for wild mischief, as if he had been, in truth, a man of weak understanding. But in that design, which adapts all the means, as happily as possible, to the end in view, Junius is inferior to no other orator of any age. Junius uses no metaphors, except such as enter essentially and directly into the accomplishment of his design: he employs no figures, but such as perfectly amalgamate with his arguments. Whenever the shew of ornament, and the burst of passion have not a tendency to enforce conviction, he haughtily disdains them, and writes with the very plainness of a merchant's ledger. In his invectives, he had in view to confound and terrify the persons, against whom they were employed; to dignify, by repeating, in the language of eloquence, the malicious jealousies, prejudices, and clamours of the vulgar; and to assert the authority of a leader, by furnishing arguments and topics of complaint, infinitely more powerful than any which the rest of his party could find for themselves. Junius never, for a moment, sacrifices his primary object to any matter of subordinate importance. Even when outrageous in abuse, to a degree, that could not but offend the delicate and virtuous, he is not so, as being hurried away by his own feelings, but because the tone of the prejudices and feelings of the English multitude was not to be otherwise moved to his purpose.'

Having thus stated the objects and means of Junius, in a general view, Mr. Heron enters upon the state of affairs, at the time when Junius wrote. He takes a survey of the British constitution, in itself, and as conceived by Junius. In this part of his work, he gives an historical view of parties; especially the parties, which subsisted, from the accession of the house of Hanover. The whigs had predominated, during the two first reigns. Mr. Heron, justly and highly impressed, both with the character of his present majesty, and the beneficial objects, which he has constantly pursued; very clearly unfolds the policy of our sovereign.

'From the commencement of his government, our king had uniformly sought to choose his servants, according to their talents and integrity, without any regard to their party connections. This liberal system of policy greatly displeased the whig combination. The exercise of his majesty's prerogative, in appointing his political servants, was imputed to the influence of a secret junto; which, according to the received hypothesis, really guided every exertion of the kingly power. To this junto was imputed, both the general policy and every particular act, which the whig party, with the assistance or coincidence, of popular demagogues, reprehended. The whig aristocracy, in pursuing their specific objects of opposing a government, which did not choose to admit their combination, exclusively, to offices of state, experienced the co-operation of the turbulent and seditious, whose general purpose and character it is, to oppose all kind of government. Thus democratical licentiousness concurred with the disappointment of an aristocratical confederacy, in enmity to the court and ministers. These concurring causes aggravated discon-

tents. The incident of the Middlesex election, which, though really the act of the house of commons, was imputed to the court, inflamed the general dissatisfaction; and the energetic and skilful oratory of Junius was steadily employed to fan the flame. To this purpose are the whole and every part of his letters subservient.'

This unity of design our author keeps very closely in view; and in his notes on the several letters, illustrating particular passages and topics, he clearly shews how well they are adapted to Junius's purpose. As prefatory to the work, he exhibits the whole view of political affairs and contentions, prefixed to each letter there is a sketch of the precise situation of things, on which that letter is written.

The author discovers very considerable acuteness, in developing Junius's design illustrated through his successive letters. His sketches of political parties, both historical and biographical, taken together, and in series, constitute outlines which, if filled up, might make a very valuable work, as a history of the British parties in the eighteenth century.

Considered in its main and professed object, as a commentary upon Junius, the present work very fully explains the meaning and purposes of the text. In this author's appreciation of Junius, though he very clearly discerns his moral and political merits; and, being himself the champion of virtue, loyalty, and constitutional subordination, he reprobates efforts, so conducive to disloyalty, disorder, and licentiousness; yet he rather over-rates the intellectual force, employed in these malignant efforts. If we judge from results, compare exertions with effect, and, in estimating effect, consider difficulty, what Junius performed, was, by chiming in unison with the prevalent tone of sentiment and opinion, to rouse and inflame the multitude. To effect such a purpose, dexterous skill is generally sufficient, without either extraordinary depth of understanding, or energy of genius. In analyzing the constituents of Junius's intellectual excellence, our author is extremely accurate in the enumeration of items, but rather magnifying the value of each article, over-rates the whole.

We admit with the author, that Junius is well acquainted with human nature, but that he thinks with the depth of a Johnson or a Tacitus, having very accurately studied both his works and theirs, respectively, we cannot admit.

Our author justly considers Junius as abounding in abstract truths; but, we think, overvalues their amount, when he says "on account, solely, of the great original truths which these letters contain, they would deserve to be studied, with unwearied diligence, by readers of every class, from the school-boy of the highest form, to the statesman and the philosopher."

In logic our author justly ascribes to Junius consummate skill. If his positions be admitted, his poignant deductions would be incontrovertible. Our author observes, "his logic was evidently not learned in the Scottish school, which, extending too far the principles of Bacon, would, in every instance, reject the powerful, luminous, and comprehensive method of synthesis, for the feeble details of analysis and subsequent induction." Junius certainly forbears these details of analysis in professing to exhibit both general systems of policy and individual characters, instead of establishing by investigation the principles from which he proceeds in his synthetic course of reasoning; he does not establish them at all. He has neither, by the Baconic mode, nor any other, proved the folly and iniquity of the systems and characters which with such skill and ability, he holds up to reprobation. His logic, therefore, though dexterous, is chiefly employed (as indeed our author admits) in sophistical misrepresentation. We think it requires stronger logical powers to convey important truths in spite of the obstacles of prejudice and passion, so forcibly to the understanding, thereby to influence and direct the affections, than to impress falsehood, gratifying prejudices and passions already influenced in the highest exercise of logic. In the impression of truth on unwilling minds, we have no data for estimating the powers of Junius. Our author compares his force to the force of Demosthenes; let us examine their respective exercise and effects.

Junius stirred up the people, already incensed against the ministerial system, and against the Dukes of Grafton and Bedford, Lords Bute and Mansfield, already hated, to hate them much more; he moved the citizens of London, already disrespectful, to the most insolent irreverence towards our sovereign. Demosthenes roused and invigorated the torpid and luxurious Athenians to active and patriotic efforts. He called them from the pleasurable dissipation and indolence of the city, of which they were so generally and deeply enamoured, to the toils and sufferance of warfare, of the field which they detested and dreaded. Junius sailed with the current of popular opinion; he drove vessels down a rapid stream; Demosthenes, seeing the current leading to destruction, faced it, and, by the most arduous efforts, pulled and guided his countrymen to a salutary direction."

Our author will perceive, that here, perfectly agreeing with him as to the respective designs of Junius and Demosthenes, we are only differing as to their comparative force. We agree with the author, that whatever strength Junius possessed was constantly exercised; that there are no instances in his writings of intellectual oscillancy; and, in that view, he is superior to most eloquent writers or speakers. Considering Junius as equal in force to Demosthenes, our author, by just reasoning from this assumed principle, esteems him superior, in force, to most other orators and writers. In compression, we admit, he resembles Thucydides and Tacitus, but we cannot agree with him that he equals either in strength. Here we must observe, that compression or compactness of parts, though an indication of strength relatively to the size of those parts, justifies no assimilation between the whole strength of unequal bulks, though similar in acuteness of adhesion. A compact grenadier is not equal in strength to a compact giant. Pursuing his comparison of his hero with other distinguished men, besides those whom his manner, if not his substance, might resemble; our author gives him the preference to Cicero, and, in one point, the power of bringing knowledge by the nearest way to the uses of business, he is probably right. Whatever powers or attainments Junius possessed, he employed them with the directest efficacy to the objects which they were competent to acquire; however strongly he could run, he ran directly to the goal.

Our author, in comparing Junius with Mr. Burke, will, by most readers, be deemed to over-rate Junius, and to under-rate Burke, when he affirms he was not at all equal to the composition of these letters. That they are not like the compositions of Mr. Burke will be readily conceded. And he who, in its nascent pulings, perceived, comprehended, and expounded, the objects which the revolutionary monster was, in the progressive stages of childhood and youth, to pursue to the absorption of the world in its tremendous maw; who, with wisdom accurately prophetic, marking its influence and puerile strides, called on mankind to combine in crushing its rapidly increasing strength, before, mature and adult, it should become irresistible; who planned and inculcated means and efforts by which, if uniformly adopted, and vigorously employed, it must have certainly been destroyed; who, by transcendent genius, efficaciously patriotic, saved his own country from its fell gripe; who, extensively and actively benevolent, endeavoured to preserve the rest of mankind; and would have preserved them if they had not been wanting to themselves; Is he not equal to the letters of Junius?

Our author, in one of his notes, styles Mr. Fox the political descendant of the illustrious Chatham. That Mr. Fox, in point of intellectual talents, equalled him, or any other man, except Burke, who has adorned the political stage during the eighteenth century, much as we disapprove of many parts of his conduct, we most readily admit. But in their political cast and character there is a total diversity. Fox has been uniformly the associate, and, very often, the tool of men infinitely inferior to himself. First, he was the implicit coadjutor of a ministerial junto; and, in that capacity, under the administration of Grafton and of North, the ardent impugner of the licence of the press, the austere censor of popular violence. Such was the tone of his party. From promoting the power of the crown, he turned to promote the influence of an aristocratical combination for reprobating all its counsels, and paralysing its efforts; adopting their measures, he was the spokesman of their opinions, and the promoter of their views. Coalescing with his recent adversaries, he still pursued the same end of overbearing regal power by aristocratic confederacy. Subservient to this object, he renounced popularity, because not favourable to the projects of his party. Successively the instrument of the Court and of the aristocracy, and having pursued the schemes of each much farther than either the ingenuous candour of his own disposition, or the acuteness of his judgment could justify; he next ranged himself on the side of democracy, became the ardent champion of innovation, did homage to the mob, adopted the new opinions of puny politicians, and still was the spokesman of a party junto.—Chatham, on the contrary, set out with one great and general principle, to bring ability of every kind into beneficial action; to disregard all party distinctions, to promote the good of his country, by placing every man in the situation in which, from talents and disposition, he was most likely to act with patriotic and advantageous efficacy. As political men, Fox has generally spoken and acted from a party, whereas Chatham spoke and acted from himself.

Dissenting from our author in several of his positions, we think that his views of the several political characters are generally just and discriminating, and frequently profound. Junius he skilfully characterizes, as to the species of his excellence, although we think he magnifies the degree. We might select many favourable specimens of his knowledge and ability, but shall confine ourselves to two. Having traced party history to the close of George II.'s reign, he ably marks the character and effects of Mr. Pitt's administration.

As Mr. Pitt was raised to power by his own abilities and character, and not through whig influence, the monopoly of the Cabinet was no longer possessed by a faction. He had set at nought all the wonted distinctions of party, all but the nobler distinctions of talents, activity, and public virtue.

The Tories (continues our author) began to be more than ever reconciled to the revolution government; since it seemed, that they themselves were no more to be malignantly excluded from the confidence of the government of their country. Jacobitism had before received its death wound. France, though it had been recovering new strength, ever since the peace at Utrecht, though lately triumphant on almost every side, in the war with Britain and her allies, was now, on every side, disgracefully vanquished. The days of Elizabeth, of Cromwell, of the Edwards, and the Henrys, seemed to be, on a sudden, renewed. Within the space of two or three years, the national character was completely retrieved from disgrace. In these circumstances of the empire, and in these neutral dispositions of parties, our present Sovereign ascended the throne. The Whigs were still the masters in the aristocracy. Yet the Tories were no longer thrust to a distance from all public employment, and contemptuously oppressed. Parliamentary interest had been, for a time, compelled to truckle to superior virtue and talents. The Crown was not, at this time, absolutely so much, as it had some time before been, the mere property of an overbearing aristocratical faction; while the young Monarch had not yet, very decisively, declared to what party his confidence was to be particularly given, his person and the first measures of his reign were, among all, unboundedly popular. Had he continued to leave the principal authority in the hands of the Whigs, yet without proscribing the Tories, that popularity might have known even no transient diminution. But the ascendancy of some excellent men, from among the Tories, at the Court of his father, had recommended them to the most confidential influence in the education of this young Monarch. That influence had not been abused; and he was therefore disposed, upon his accession to the throne, to employ them, rather than the Whigs, of whom he had less personal knowledge, as his chief Ministers. The Earl of Bute had, in the confidence of his young Sovereign, a pre-eminence over every other counsellor. Bute, certainly a good man, of no mean talents, of a pleasing personal appearance, and of the most elegant accomplishments, was, however, not free from prejudices and imperfections of character, as well as relations of party, and connexions of friendship, which could not but render his best administration little acceptable to the predominant party among the English. He was a Scotsman; and English prejudices could scarcely, as yet, induce men to see a native of Scotland, even in a subordinate ministerial situation. He was a Tory; and could it be suffered by the Whigs, that, after a sort of proscription, for more than five and forty years, the Tories should, at last, vigorously grasp the reins of Government? He was allied to the exiled family of the Stuarts; and should one, related to them, become the Minister of a Prince of the House of Hanover? No sooner had he begun to dispute the propositions of Mr. Pitt, in the Cabinet Council, to promote some changes, in which his private affections and enmities seemed to be interested, to call forth into official employment, or at least under the patronage of the Royal favor, both Tory merit and Scotch talents, than all the prejudices of the English Whigs, from the highest to the lowest, from one end of the kingdom to the other, rose in arms against him. Popular opinion, never stronger than at this particular moment, deserted Bute, when Pitt deserted the Cabinet. In vain did the Scotch Minister strive to procure the support of the Newcastle Whigs to a Ministry that should be effectively Tory, and guided, at least secretly, by himself, in all its measures. Those Whigs were sufficiently willing to exclude Pitt from office, and to reinstate themselves, by means of Bute and the Tories. But they would not be tools in the hands of Bute, till he should have established himself in the Ministerial authority too firmly to be driven from it by their opposition. They would not resign to the Tories the first part in the government of their country. They soon attempted to make it impossible for Bute to continue Minister. The peace negotiated under his auspices, but by the secondary co-operation, as well of Whigs as of Tories, was, in comparison even with that of Utrecht, far from being very advantageous in a due proportion to the advantages Britain had gained in the war. It was arraigned, by the outrageous cry of popular opinion, from the press, and, after a short time, also in Parliament. The Earl of Bute would not embarrass his young Sovereign by fruitless attempts to serve him. He retired from ostensible power.

Another specimen we shall quote, as it contains a new and very plausible opinion concerning the much agitated question, who was the author of Junius.

'I believe myself to have nearly discovered who was the author of these letters; but I have, without entirely satisfying myself, protracted my inquiries and renewed my doubts, till the necessity of publication calls upon me to interpret them, with an imperiousness that is no longer to be resisted. I cannot now lay before the reader all the detail of facts and circumstances, on which my judgment is founded. The result I shall briefly state:—The author of these letters was no other than the celebrated Dunning, afterwards Lord Ashburton. He alone had the motives for personal attack against Lord Mansfield and the Duke of Grafton, which certainly inflamed the mind of Junius, in writing these letters. He alone possessed that knowledge of the constitutional law of England, which Junius has so eminently displayed. The nervous epigrammatic cast of his speeches and pleadings had no mean resemblance to the style and manner of Junius. His style was formed, like that of Junius, by taste, and genius operating upon the phraseology of law and business, as well as upon the sentiments and images of the classics. He had those connexions with the Ministerial, the Parliamentary, and the City parties, with Wilkes, and with Horne, which the letters imply. He possessed that fervid mind and that maturity of experience from which alone such effusions could proceed. He had reasons to conceal, to the last, that he was the author: for, if he had been known as such, when the letters were written—his hopes of professional preferment, or of any favours from the Crown, must have been, forever, at an end. At the time of his death, he, and his family, had received from the Crown, such emoluments and honours, that nothing could then impress his mind more strongly, than the necessity for his continuing to hide, that he had addressed his Sovereign, the Earl of Mansfield, and others of the first persons in these kingdoms, in a strain of such fierce invective. He alone had reasons of personal interest to resolve, from the very first, that his secret should die with him, and, to the last, to adhere to that resolution.'

As the author here only mentions a result, without detailing the facts and circumstances on which his conclusion is founded, we shall not enter into the discussion, but should be glad to have the evidence before the public, which might tend to throw light on a point which has remained so long in darkness.

But without adopting the peculiar opinions of this author, we have to acknowledge ourselves indebted to him for much entertainment from the perusal of his edition of Junius. We are particularly pleased with his exhibition of political measures and characters both in the preceding and the present reigns. One of the ablest portions of his work is his view of the Walpole administration. On Mr. George Grenville, and the Marquis of Rockingham, he is rather too cursory in proportion to his other sketches. He is extremely accurate in making the origin, process, and turns of the Duke of Grafton's administration. In his annotations on the Middlesex election, Mr. Heron exhibits a very masterly sketch and comparison of the opposite arguments of Johnson and Junius on that celebrated subject.

On the whole, we think, the author displays very considerable sagacity; and has ably and usefully employed it in his illustrations of Junius; and that his literary composition agreeably sets off important and instructive materials.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXXVIII.

MR. SAUNTER,

If you will listen to a brother-lounger, rocking in his chair, he will mutter, between each puff of his Segar, a few half-formed sentences on friendship, the boast of man and idol of female sensibility.

Friendship, my dear Mr. Saunter, as a genus, has been scanned and applauded—The harp of the Bard has sounded its praise, and the goose-quill of each modern Juliet has shed rivulets of sable tears over its ephemeral existence. But it has numerous species, and each one is amply important to be distinctly noticed; for although they all end in the same manner, yet each owns a different source, and is marked in its progress by different traits—If my sketches be brief as "Woman's love," yet it must be remembered, that the Lounger is "lengthy" in nothing but a yawn; except indeed it be in spelling one of "The Rambler's" seequipedalia verba—He also, courts variety with the ardour of a lover, and therefore must be pardoned if he but skim over his subject, and dip no deeper than the swallow's wing on a May-morn, in the slumb'ring wave.

I shall notice, at present but three species of friendship, and while I am recruiting my exhausted energies to enable me to resume my pen, I shall, peradventure, lounge to a tea-party, where lolling at ease in my chair in the corner, I may witness the candid dissection of this essay by female critics, and be pierced by the satire of airy fops, who flutter round the room from Miss to Miss.

One species of friendship is found in its luxuriance among youthful bucks, who have just crossed the threshold of fashion's temple—I am so charmed with it, when it appears in these, that I never inquire whether it be seated in their hearts, or merely play on the end of the tongue—I know that it has been denied to exist among persons of this class, but certainly the assertion has been hazarded without due consideration—What but the seducing voice of friendship could seat them in the club-room, where instead of mountain air, and varied landscape, the fumes of Tobacco envelope them round, and decanters and spotted pasteboard alone relieve the wearied eye?—What but that voice could detain them at the club-room till the morning hour, when the damp dews have chilled the air, and the wily agents of pleurisies and consumptions "go about, seeking whom they may devour"—What but the cement of friendship locks them arm in arm in a high-street sabbath morning lounge, when each one perspires and creeps beneath the dozen capes of a coachman's wrapp-ras-eal?—Could any thing but friendship induce them to assist each other in a box-lobby quarrel, or, when separated, enable them to correspond? Ye, then, who have denied to these the strong impulses of friendship, respect the authority of the observant Lounger, and "give to Cæsar, what is Cæsar's due."

The second species of friendship exists among the sacred sisterhood of antiquated damsels—It binds old maids together, as the Joiner's glue the wooden ornaments of a Clock—It creates in them the charitable desire of washing away the foul stains that blot each others reputation;—and when their hearts are mellowed by its influence, they skip from house to house, good-natured friends, to amuse and cheer with the first report of some charming tale, which tends to dignify and adorn the female character—On this species of friendship, however, I shall not dwell, for I have not yet heard it denied, that it exists between them—It is clear to my mind, that no man, I presume will be audacious enough to tell them; that their hearts do not yearn toward each other.

The third species is found among romantic Misses between the ages of 16 and 20—It shews itself in anxious morning inquiries after each other's health, and in multitudes of manuscript messages which fly between them, by the aid of a servant, with the rapidity, and the versatility, and the lightness of a shuttlecock from battledore to battledore—When either is nervous, it makes the heart sigh, and the eye stream—If separated from each other, it increases the coffers of the post-office department, and swells the mail to the size, of one of Æolus's wind-bags—It furnishes a constant theme of incessant and flippant and fluent dialogue, and on each other's virtues, and schemes and gallants and ball-room partners, each can out-last a winter's evening in amusing a circle of strangers or friends—It is always of a Phoenix-nature, for "a friendship as warm as ours my dear girl, is no where to be found."

My dear Mr. Saunter, my yawns now are grown too frequent and too long for me to continue my sketches.

PART THE FOURTH.

FUTURE DESTINY OF NORTH-AMERICA.

CHAPTER VI.

The commerce between Europe and America will decline.

The commerce between the new world and Europe will diminish, in proportion as that between Africa and Europe, will by the colonization of Africa increase. But this diminution will especially affect the United States, which are properly the subject of these considerations. What returns will the United States then be able to send to Europe, which the Europeans cannot procure nearer at hand, from Africa, of better quality, and in greater quantities, and, of course, at cheaper prices? Tobacco grows, in the tropical climates, in perfection; indigo the same, for that from Carolina is not to be compared, for goodness, with that from Spanish America. Rice of various sorts, and in immense quantities, is produced, to the utmost perfection in Africa. In some parts, they are believed to have five or six crops every year. Africa produces a peculiar kind of mountain rice, which is better than the others, as well as the most precious kinds of wood. It raises spices, and can yield all the tropical productions, such as coffee, sugar, cotton, &c. in greater quantity, and of better quality* than the West-Indies, where the crops are much more uncertain. To this must further be added, the reduced distance of transportation, and the increased quickness of returns.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that after commerce has attained its greatest eccentricity, as at present it embraces the whole globe, it will again concentrate itself, and that each of the two worlds, the old and the new, will labour more within itself, and the colonization of Africa, will produce this salutary revolution. I call it salutary upon the following grounds.

There will be a greater abundance of goods, which will, therefore, be cheaper. The quicker

* The astonishing fertility of Africa, exceeding every thing of the kind, known upon the globe, is proved by the fact, that grass, after having been burnt away, shoots up again in a single night.—See Zimmermann's translation of Wadstrom's Essay upon the colonization of America.

returns, will, at the same time, produce cheaper prices, because the merchant will gain, by an increased frequency of exchanges, what he may perhaps lose by the reduction in the price of sales. By the diminished distance of the countries, from which the goods come, the prices of things, at their source, will be better known, and of course, the rapacity of merchants will not be able to raise them to such enormous prices. The expense of living will consequently be reduced. But even then, to enjoy these advantages, adequate establishments must be made, to provide against the monopolizing associations of merchants. I am likewise convinced, that soon or late, the commerce of a nation, with its colonies, must become a national concern, which the state must carry on itself, unless all property should be suffered to concentrate itself in the hands of the richest merchants, and we should all submit to their despotism; from which, may heaven in mercy defend us.

North America will then be principally confined to its trade with the West Indies: which will always truly be the most advantageous, or rather the only advantageous trade to her. The ports of Spanish America, will, by some revolution or other, be opened to foreigners, and of course to the Anglo-Americans. This will be the principal trade of the republic in future. For what can she send to Europe, when Africa shall yield rice, indigo, and tobacco? Will it be corn and meal? But with improved agriculture, and less frequent wars, all the countries of Europe will produce more corn than they need; agriculture will be improved, and wars more seldom; for we must at length grow more rational, or be totally ruined. Will it be wood? But America, when more cultivated, will no longer be able to supply this article, at least not in such quantities, or so cheap. Will it be iron? But Sweden furnishes this. Some pitch and tar she may perhaps dispose of—and possibly silk and wine. But although the climate in the United States will probably grow continually more favourable for these productions, and although many promising experiments have already been made, with regard to silk, yet Europe, producing both wine and silk herself, will have both those articles cheaper than America can furnish her with them.

Some commerce will doubtless continue to be carried on between America and the old world, sufficient, indeed, to aid the continual advancement by progressive culture, towards perfection, of the various nations of the globe; by a mutual intercourse, and a reciprocal communication of their respective attainments in knowledge. This commercial revolution will, I believe, be accomplished in the course of fifty years, for in that period, the colonization of Africa will be probably very far advanced.

For, immediately after the peace, which, after all, must come at last, the English will certainly busy themselves very seriously with the establishment of these colonies; especially, as I consider myself authorised to assume, as a full certainty, that the virtuous part of the English nation, in which there are, perhaps, more remains of virtue, than among any other European nation, must soon or late obtain a predominant influence over the public affairs, which will enable them to realize their favourite project, the abolition of the slave trade, which can best be effected by the civilization and culture of the African coast.

In proportion as the trade with Europe shall decline, the commercial influence must lose its overbearing prevalence in the American republic. For commerce, in general, will then employ fewer heads and hands, seeing that no manufactured goods can be sent thither from Europe, when no returns of other goods can be expected; and if America should pay for her importations in cash, she would very soon be drained of that. She will, therefore, certainly be compelled to attempt to manufacture herself, these articles which she received from Europe. The merchants, who previously traded to Europe, will be obliged to turn manufacturers and farmers. Consequently the manufacturing and producing capital will be increased, while that employed in trade will be diminished, and thereby the commercial interest itself will be weakened.

But there are yet other circumstances, of which I shall treat in the next chapter, and which will contribute to deprive the commercial interest of its present overbearing influence.

CHAPTER VII.

The trading interest will lose its present predominance, by the population of the western territory.

Many States will arise, westward of the Alleghany mountain; and according to the Federal Constitution every state has two members in the Senate; so that the majority of the states decides, and not that of the people. At this day there are scarcely any, but commercial sea-port towns, and very few inland cities. The trading interest prevails therefore in the Senate, especially as the Senators are chosen from among the merchants and land-jobbers. By new inland States, a majority of the Senate in Congress, will turn in favour of the farming and manufacturing interests.

The election of President, is made by electors, chosen by the Legislature of each State, and equal in number to all the representatives of the State, in Congress; both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. When there shall be more anti-mercantile, inland states, the choice will not fall upon persons who favour the trading interest. In the house of representatives every state has a number of members in proportion to its population. For every 33000 persons there is one representative. When the western territory shall be more populous, it will in proportion to its numbers send to this lower house of Congress more representatives, who will all be adverse to the commercial interest; and thus the party against the speculators, which in this branch of Congress is already considerable, will obtain a complete ascendancy.

But the question arises here, which I must answer... Why should the western states be anti-commercially inclined?

They can procure manufactured goods, and objects of luxury only from the sea-ports of the Atlantic States. For, as I have already observed, the navigation of the Mississippi from New-Orleans upwards, is, owing to the rapidity of the stream, excessively tedious. It takes several months to go from New-Orleans to the mouth of the Ohio. Hence the merchants from Kentucky, sell at New-Orleans the vessels, in which they brought corn, meal and other provisions, down the river to that city. They then embark for one of the sea-ports of the Atlantic states, on, as there are not always at New-Orleans, vessels belonging to those ports, they go first to the West-Indies, and thence to the eastern coast of North America. In one of these ports, commonly Baltimore or Philadelphia, they purchase articles of manufactures and of luxury, for Kentucky, which they are obliged to transport by land, over hill and valley, many hundred miles, to Pittsburg. At Pittsburg, they are again embarked upon the Ohio, and thus forwarded to the place of their destination.

Such a journey and voyage always takes a year. Consider how much it must raise the price of foreign goods in this western territory. The enormous price of these goods will therefore necessarily bring the inhabitants to the thought of establishing manufactures in their own country, and the fertility of the land, which is competent to produce the finest materials, together with a great abundance of provisions, which, owing to the little exportation, must always remain proportionably cheap, will encourage such undertakings. As soon as manufactures shall once get a going there, the importation must, of itself, fall off, even without prohibition, because foreign goods will bear no competition, in price, with those manufactured in the country. Consequently the foreign trade, in those countries, will be next to nothing; and they will not be, on that account, more unhappy than those, where, as the phrase is, it flourishes.

I need not here set down the necessary consequence of all this. Where scarcely any body carries on foreign commerce, there will no laws be made for its encouragement, and where the advantage of the richest persons, who, in elective aristocracies, always hold the power in their hands, requires that it should not exist, laws against it will be made. In a farming and manufacturing state, the richest persons are the manufacturers, as well because manufactures commonly bring riches, as because the rich are best able to undertake such establishments. The western states will, therefore, work against the trading interest, and when, as must sooner or later happen, they shall obtain a majority in congress, the whole system of legislation will be pointed against speculation.

The population and culture of the western territory, will likewise essentially affect the export trade of the Atlantic states. These western countries can supply the West-Indies with corn, meal, and other provisions, cheaper, owing to the great fertility of their soil, and to the facility of conveyance down the river, than the Atlantic states. New-Orleans is much nearer to the Antilles, than any harbour of the eastern coast. This competition of the western country must depreciate the productions of the eastern states, and consequently the value of lands, their inhabitants, therefore, will be obliged to have recourse to raising silk and wine, as the cultivation of the vine will be less profitable.

The western states must, therefore, be the richest in money as well as in productions. At New-Orleans, which must in time become one of the greatest marts for goods, in the world, they will receive dollars for the goods, which they have brought down, and the merchants finding nothing there to purchase in return, will go home laden with silver, which will again contribute to the animation of industry there.

The population of the western country will also put an end to land speculations. For as from the concurrence of all the above-mentioned causes, the produce will keep at a more permanent and settled price; that of land will not rise and fall with such rapid alternatives, and nothing but improved cultivation will give rise to advanced prices.

This alteration of things will have the most beneficial influence upon the manners.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THOMAS PAINE'S EPISTLES, TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

A hoary drunkard, with each vice imbued,
Malignant, without wit, and without passion, lewd.
Country Gaz. U. S. Nov. 30th, 1802.

THE EXAMINER, No. V.

The patronage which the President of the United States, has at different times extended to such parasites as J. P. Callender and Thomas Paine, has been variously accounted for, by his political adherents. Christian charity, that dove-eyed virgin, "which hopeth all things, and endureth all things," has been invoked as the patroness of these base and abject acts of bounty, which afforded a temporary relief to "suffering humanity." When generosity is prostituted to succour the unworthy, and when public morals are insulted, by an open, or covert avowal of deeds like these, the sane and sober of the community will exclaim, when speaking of Mr. Jefferson, "his charity is outrage; life his shame."

Were Mr. Jefferson a believer in the Christian religion, his motives might be ascribed to the practice of the cardinal virtues, and as charity is chiefest among the number, even the brining of Callender, to vilify virtuous characters, might pass with some, as a venial error, arising from a mistaken notion of the essence of charity. Though in the broad language of scriptural phraseology, charity is said to hope all things, and endure all things, it would be the excess of candour, to construe Mr. Jefferson's munificence to Callender, into a laudable zeal to rescue a reprobate "from the error of his ways." This indeed would, in one sense, be "hoping all things," and in another sense, the toleration of such a being, as Thomas Paine, may justly be styled the "enduring of all things."

With respect to Paine, we hear much said of gratitude, and the rights of hospitality. I know not, for my part, under what obligations of gratitude Mr. Jefferson may lie, to Thomas Paine, nor do I know what inducement he may have, to accord him the rights of hospitality, so far, as first to give him a cordial invitation to leave France, and return to America, and then, to entertain him, as a guest, at his own table. These are probably private considerations of the President, with which I have no concern; but the public marks of personal esteem, which he has lavished upon Paine, constitute the offence, of which every true friend to the dignity and honour of his native country, has a right to complain. By the official defenders of these acts of the President, we are called upon to admire the gratitude and philanthropy of which they are evidence, and an invidious contrast, between the conduct of General Washington, and that of Mr. Jefferson, in their treatment of Paine, has been attempted, for the purpose of commending the latter, at the expense of the former.

When Paine, from a jail in Paris, wrote to General Washington, begging for the personal and official interference of that gentleman, to rescue him from the fangs of citizen Robespierre, little or no attention was paid to his petition. Why? Because Paine as a prisoner of state in France, and a naturalized French citizen, could have no right or pretence to be claimed by the American government, as a citizen of the United States. He was considered by the French government as an expatriated Englishman, and having been elected a deputy to the National Convention, was completely amenable to the government of his darling French republic. On the same grounds, and for the same reasons, the Envoy of the United States, then at Paris, refrained from claiming Paine as an American, though it is no secret, that Paine was very urgent in his solicitations for the interference of that minister. It was very convenient for Paine to have France, England and America, alike interested in his fate and fortunes, especially at the critical times of the French revolution, and in this proneness to change his condition, or to vary his climate, it is not easy to say, which he most resembles, a camelion or a cosmopolite. But according to modern philosophy-jargon, we are "all camelions, we are all cosmopolites."

Paine was seized and imprisoned, as he says, by order of citizen Robespierre, for belonging to the Gironde, or federal party, in the Convention; there was also, at one period, another party or faction in France, to which Paine belonged; that was the Egotist or I by myself I party, and as he confesses or rather arrogates to himself the honour "to stand first on the list of federalists," so he is pre-eminently entitled to stand first on the list of Egotists. Since his return to America, he has found it convenient to disclaim federalism, but for Paine to renounce the Egotist party would be as impossible, as that the "Ethiopian should change his skin, or the Leopard his spots."

Paine plumes himself much upon his humanity, and as a striking example of it, he cites his state in the Convention, for saving the life of the king of France. He might have valued himself more upon his antipathy to the punishment of death, had he recollected, the "Reasons for preserving the life of Louis Capet, as delivered to the National Convention," by some-body in his name, in which we find the following eulogium upon the proposition of his then dear friend, citizen Robespierre, to "abolish that punishment."

"It has already been proposed, says Paine, to abolish the punishment of death; and it is with infinite satisfaction, that I recollect the humane and excellent oration, pronounced by Robespierre, on that subject, in the constituent Assembly."

This constitutional dread of death, which has so long afflicted Paine, is easily accounted for, and his inveteracy against General Washington, discovered itself with uncommon rancor, because that gentleman left him to get out of a French prison, as he got into it;—by the exercise of his own wits, and because he did not exert his personal influence to make Paine's life, in his own estimation, "worth twenty-four hours." I incline to think, that, for these last fifteen years, the life Paine has led, has made his existence so precarious, that any attempt to effect insurance upon it, by way of annuity, would have failed.

But why was not citizen Robespierre charged with ingratitude, for incarcerating citizen Paine and jeopardising his life? Paine had in the warmest terms, commended his project for abolishing the punishment of death, in which there was about as much sincerity, and far less impiety, in the festival he instituted in honour of the supreme Being; but as Paine did not "come forward in defence" of this latter project, he probably thought it one of Robespierre's "blunders," of which nothing could be made, and it is presumed, by his silence, on that occasion, he provoked the resentment of his former patron, who notwithstanding his "humane and excellent oration," was not over-scrupulous about "abolishing the punishment of death," in favour of citizen Thomas Paine.

"There must have been, (says Paine in his third epistle) a coalition in sentiment, if not in fact, between the terrorists of America and the terrorists of France, and Robespierre must have known it, or he could not have had the idea of putting America into the bill of accusation against me."

Now, it strikes me, that the coalition in sentiment, respecting Paine, is strongly exemplified, in the conduct of Robespierre and Mr. Jefferson towards him; the former would have brought Paine to the tribunal, which, he says, was like sending him at once to the scaffold, "for the interest of America as well as of France," and the latter invited him to return to this country, for the interest of France as well as America. Here is perfect reciprocity of good will towards Paine, for France is, at this time, quite as much interested in getting rid of him, as Mr. Jefferson thinks America is interested in receiving him.

The revolutionary wheel has turned round so often, that all such blanks as Thomas Paine, have been drawn out of the French lottery; he has come back to try his luck, once more, in the American lottery, and it is with no common sensations of shame and indignation, that I am constrained to believe, that his chance for a prize, in this country, is greater than it would be, in any other region of the habitable globe. Spirit of Jacobinism and Infidelity where wilt thou lead us!

ESSAY V.

RELIGIOUS ESTABLISHMENTS.

It has been the labour of modern philosophy to attribute to religion itself all the abuses which pride, ambition, and avarice have grafted upon it; and by calling the attention to the many mischiefs which have been brought upon mankind through the pretence of religious zeal to disgust us; and to make us draw this inference, "that it is safer to trust to an instinctive love for our fellow-creatures, which can never be perverted to their annoyance, than to religious opinions, which have too frequently produced the seeds of hatred, intolerance, and persecution."

We have now seen the experiment fairly tried; religious opinions utterly discarded, and modern philosophy substituted in their stead; and we may now judge from our own experience, whether irreligion is less liable to fanaticism, and less capable of the extremes of violence, intolerance, and persecution. Let the massacre of so many thousand priests in cold blood; the expulsion of the rest of their body, sent into foreign lands to seek their subsistence with the fowls of the air—let the insults and cruel outrages offered to unoffending women, whose lives were destined to the offices of piety, and many of them devoted to the relief of their fellow-creatures in the most unwearied attention to the sick, speak the indulgence of philosophical toleration. Whilst every refinement of cruelty, every breach of trust and gratitude, every prostitution of morals in all possible shapes, proclaim the spirit of philanthropy, that has been so much insisted upon as a surer guide for our conduct, than the precepts of a religion that inculcates to its disciples "Peace on earth, and good-will towards men."

In order to accomplish the ruin of religion, these philosophers were too wise to alarm the consciences of the people, by proclaiming their intention; they prudently trusted to two expedients, which have proved effectual. The first was to strip the established church of all those appointments, which the piety of past times had provided for its external dignity; the other was, to avail themselves of the specious plea of liberty of conscience and intolerance; that all religious opinions might be put upon an equal footing with that established, which was, in effect, to destroy the establishment itself. It is true, that salaries to those who officiated in the church, which was still called the established one, were substituted instead of the tithes and estates, which, under the former laws of the country, were its independent property; but, it was well known, that this precarious endowment might, as the plan advanced, be diminished or suspended at pleasure, till the hours should come, when, as a public burden, they may venture totally to withdraw it.

There are evidently two lights in which religion may be considered: the one is as a matter of conscience to each individual, for which he is answerable to God only; in which nobody has a right to interfere with him, be his tenets ever so absurd and erroneous, farther than by persuasion, and the affording him better lights, if he chooses to avail himself of them. In this light, religion affects none but the individual; it is his own affair, and his own affair only; every man must go to Heaven in his own way—and if he has the misfortune to mistake the road, so much the worse for him.

But there is another light in which religion is to be considered as affecting the peace and happiness of the community we live in; and in this light we have certainly a right to give a decided preference in behalf of one set of religious opinions over another, in as much as the political authority, to which the safety of the people is committed, conceives the interest of the public to be more or less engaged. This preference I conceive to be perfectly compatible with such a toleration of the rejected doctrines, as shall leave that liberty of conscience, which enables every man to work out his own salvation.

When an established church, endowed with emoluments, has long taken root in the country, it is incorporated with the government itself; and any attempt to overthrow it must be attended not only with acts of crying injustice to individuals, who hold their benefices under the sanction of the laws, but must produce such convulsions to the state, as must shake the tranquillity of the nation to its foundations. A government is therefore bound to protect its church-establishment, not only from the motives upon which it was at first instituted, as having a preference over others, but as being so interwoven with the government itself as to endanger the whole fabric, if torn away from it by violence.

It is a natural consequence in this view of church establishments, that the power of the government, whether in the hands of the Legislators, or Administrators of it, should be trusted only to those who are attached to the established church. A King, a Parliament, or an Army, of a different Religion from that which the Government professes, would be as absurd as to trust the dearest concerns of a minor in the hands of the person who had the most immediate interest to betray them; in vain would you plead in favour of such a trust, that the guardian would be above taking advantage of his situation; nobody, in his senses, would think of putting his virtues to so severe a trial.

Government, in all its branches, from the highest to the lowest instrument of which it is composed, is an object of trust, and not of right; and nobody ought, in common sense, to complain that he is deprived of an advantage he has a just claim to, because he is not trusted, when he has placed himself voluntarily in a situation that ought to inspire diffidence.

Persecution is the depriving a man of those enjoyments he holds under the laws of his country, or which are inseparable from his nature. The liberty of conscience is certainly in the latter description, since no human power can controul the freedom of the mind; and the interest every man has in his future hopes, is a concern of so much greater importance than any temporary benefit, that it would be the extremest tyranny, if we were able to exact a sacrifice, that nothing can compensate.

But the participation in the government of a country, in any degree whatsoever, is no more a right inherent in our nature, and inseparable from it, than it is a right derived from laws which are eternal and immutable. The Legislature alone is competent to extend, or to restrict, the limits, within which men shall be deemed capable of the trust to be exercised by them; and the Executive Power of every government is alone capable of selecting such persons, within those limits, who are to be preferred in that appointment. In these appointments, it is evident, that, though the consciences of men might be embarrassed, by being compelled to accept them, nobody's conscience can be hurt from being excluded from them.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 8, 1802.

SIR,

We are now making preparations for, and shall publish early in the spring, a very neat edition of "Johnson's Dictionary in Miniature; by the Rev. J. Hamilton," on a very fine wove paper, and a pearl type (casting for the purpose) to equal the last London edition; with which we will supply the trade, upon liberal terms, for cash, or in exchange for books of equal value.

We give this early information of our intentions to prevent gentlemen from entering upon the same work, as it will be attended with considerable expense, and we intend to have an extensive edition, so as to be able to supply the booksellers with such numbers as they may want.

We are, Sir,

Your humble servants,

Wm. P. & Lem. Blake.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN RUTLEDGE.

Of all the barefaced impositions, which Jacobinic malice ever suggested, and which a still more daring effrontery is striving to carry through, we notice peculiarly the scandalous and nefarious attempt, made by a gang of ruffians, to injure the reputation of the Hon. John Rutledge, a distinguished delegate from the state of South Carolina, to the national legislature.

The public have long possessed the facts, on which the accusers of Mr. Rutledge rely to prove against him a charge of forgery, in having written, in another person's name, certain letters to the President of the United States, during the course of the last summer. A general verdict of acquittal has already been given in favour of this gentleman, by the public; and yet, for some unaccountable reason, the original lie is revived, and fills the prostituted columns of Denniston and Cheetham's newspaper, with, by far, the greater portion of its original matter. New-York has, indeed, been the theatre, on which this controversial drama has been principally acted, and, though hitherto we have been silent, we have not been disinterested spectators of the passing scenes. Denniston and Cheetham are but "puppets to some chief juggler behind the curtain," and it would be some satisfaction to know, from whom these lying valets receive their lessons. Mr. Blake, the Editor of the National Aegis, though a strong political foe to Mr. Rutledge, has had the justice to declare his mature opinion, "that the evidence is far from being sufficient to criminate that gentleman," and for this simple, though honest concession, Mr. Blake is himself assailed, by these scavengers of faction, with as much filth as they would, on other occasions, shower down upon a Federalist. But Mr. Blake is a man of education, and, by birth, an American. Denniston and Cheetham are neither one nor the other; they are consequently his natural foes, though they may be, as politicians, on the same side with Mr. Blake.

No parallel to this LIE, fabricated against Mr. Rutledge, is remembered, so closely resembling it in many of its features, as the far-famed fable of Jonathan Robbins. That story was persisted in by the Jacobin writers, till refutation was tired of its office, and the same spirit, which perpetuated that atrocious falsehood, is now busy in its efforts to fasten reproach upon the character of Mr. Rutledge.

To a native of New-England it is a humiliating reflection that, of both these plots, the scene was laid in that region, and though we have long regarded the little state of Rhode-Island as a troublesome excrescence upon the fair face of Federalism, we little expected that even Rhode-Island would have harboured reptiles, sufficiently venomous to poison the good name of an unoffending stranger.—From this general reproach against that state, which a flagrant outrage upon the laws of hospitality, committed by some of its inhabitants, has exported from us, we feel a pride in making an honorable exception in favor of those individuals, who, from a laudable anxiety to wipe off so foul a stain upon the character of the state, eagerly volunteered a flattering address to Mr. Rutledge, upon the eve of his departure from Newport, wherein they disclaim, with just abhorrence, all countenance or credit, to the tale of slander, which had been so mischievously propagated, at his expense. We aim the shafts of censor and reproof at knaves; honesty is a target which we shall never intentionally assail; we court the approbation of the latter with the same assiduity, as we covet the hatred of the former.

CONTRAST BETWEEN LONDON AND PARIS.

It cannot be denied, that these two cities, and their inhabitants, have manners, taste, and turn of mind, quite opposite. In France, they raise houses. In England, they dig them up. An Englishman does not believe he is conveniently lodged, when he has not a whole story under ground. This under-ground story contains not only remarkably well ordered, clean and elegant kitchens, but well furnished apartments for chamber-maids, chief cooks, &c.

In warm countries, they may raise up pillars, they only want a roof. In cold countries, good thick walls, that can preserve from the inclemencies of the weather. In more northern countries, walls are insufficient....people have to inhabit under ground.

What is fine in Paris, is ugly in London; and what is fine in London, is ugly in Paris. You must come to Paris, to see fine houses, and to London, to see fine streets. Out of two Englishmen, that arrive at Paris, one commonly admires its magnificence, the other its ugliness. Two Frenchmen, going to London, may receive the like impression. London is the city of a sad, clean, and reasonable people. Paris, the city of an heedless, elegant people: In Paris, they love all that is fine: they set too high a value upon life, not to employ it in useful and convenient pursuits. An Englishman endeavours, above all things, to put himself in good circumstances, but with an awkwardness, peculiar to himself, he takes so much pains that, provided he has gained his object, he is too weak to go beyond it.

It is not more than forty years, that the city of London has been paved; or at least, it was so badly paved before, that it was difficult to walk in it. They could not ride in carriages, with less difficulty, on account of the joltings. Pavements were not invented, in London, through luxury, but through necessity. On the contrary, Paris has been this long time well paved, and for this very reason, they have not thought of pavements.

The people of Paris get up, at least, an hour sooner than those of London. In London, in winter time, the shops are scarcely open at nine o'clock in the morning.

It is a fact, worth being remarked, that the several tradesmen, and all people of the lower class, are much more respectable, in London, than in Paris. In Paris, a servant will speak to his master, without his being asked to speak; the same, in London, would be looked upon as insulting.

They may count handsome women, in London, in the following manner; out of ten common, one is pretty enough; out of ten pretty enough, one is pretty; out of ten pretty, one is handsome:..... Beauty there is in proportion of one thousand to one. In France, pretty women are, perhaps, in as great a number as in England; but the handsome ones are much more scarce. It is true to say, that, what is fine in France, is much more so, than in any country in the world.

The outskirts of the cities are as different as the interior. You are no sooner out of Paris, than you meet with beautiful roads, bordered with trees. In England, plantations of trees are to be seen only in the country seats of the inhabitants; the roads are narrow and naked. The northern part of London, by Hamstead, has a striking resemblance with Crimea or Tartaria: there are seen numberless meadows, stretching out in Hertfordshire: hills, valleys, mountains, are covered with meadows: these meadows are without trees, separated here and there by some little hedges. On these meadows, close by the city, there is a nightly guard of four or five thousand cows, in five or six separate camps. The noise of coaches, the bellowing of flocks, the labours of rural and pastoral life, the show of luxury and opulence of the city,....no,....no other country presents so curious and strange an assemblage.

MR. INCLEDON.

This gentleman has compiled and composed a musical collection, intitled Variety, consisting of all his favourite songs, and many beautiful new airs. With this he proposes to make a tour through all the principal cities and towns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, upon the Dibdinian plan, and with well founded hopes of reaping a rich harvest. His company consists of Mr. Incledon, Davis, his violin, and his man servant. He fills the whole vocal department himself—Davis constitutes the band, and the servant is to be door keeper and treasurer. [Lon. pap.]

TO REMOTE SUBSCRIBERS.

Gentlemen, who are studious to cherish a literary journal, but who, distant from Philadelphia, and occupied with higher cares, forget, or procrastinate our trifling claims, are respectfully reminded, that the increasing expense of the establishment requires a strict punctuality of payment. Remote subscribers are requested to correspond with the Editor, and let the topics be cash, and increasing patronage.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Z. has a most "gentleman-like contempt for the pedantry of grammar, and a poetical abhorrence of dull matter of fact."

The EXAMINER probes Paine to the very core. This miserable pamphleteer appears, however, to be unworthy of a disquisition, so elaborate. In 1776 and 1777, he threw about his squibs and crackers, with some éclat; and though he has fired nothing but a pop-gun against religion and government, yet, in the opinion of the tickled mob, he made something like an explosion. But now, alas! "Pistol's flash is out." Paine's recent compositions are as remote from correctness or neatness of style, as they are from logical precision, and the laws of truth and decency.

The Author of "Alliteration," a poem, is requested to write more. The Editor is pleased with such poetry.

The Editor most fervently wishes, that a scholar, so elegant, and a poet, so harmonious, as HARLEY, would furnish something for every Port Folio.

"JAQUES" has the exquisite sensibility, the "humorous sadness," and the moral perceptions of his namesake, without his libertinism.

The Editor is honoured and delighted with many elegant essays, from the ingenuity of the ladies.

We shall be glad to hear from "EDWARD."

"FERDINANDO" merits our constant attention.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ADDRESS TO A LADY, LEAVING EDINBURGH.

When to the Highland hills you go
Will you remember me?
Nor bid the thoughts, that then must flow,
Unwish'd intruders be?

For though ere long across the tide
I must my course pursue;
Beyond the ocean, rolling wide,
I will remember you.

You soon shall trace each mountain scene,
And every breezy vale,
That frequent in your thoughts has been,
And frequent in your tale.

Each well known mountain scene again
With rapture you shall see;
Yet, 'midst the pleasures of Bovain,*
Bestow one thought on me.

The rising morn shall soon reveal
Each friend's long absent face,
And soon shall you enraptur'd feel
A parent's warm embrace.

With answering joy the transports greet
Of friends sincere and free;
With joy a tender parent greet,
But, Oh! forget not me.

And soon, perhaps, your long lost charms,
Shall greet a lover's eyes,
Who quick shall clasp you to his arms
With pleasure and surprise.

When then there be some favour'd youth,
Who oft has urg'd his plea,
Oh love him, and reward his truth,
But sometimes think of me!

ITHACUS.

THE BARD TO HIS CANDLE.

BY A FRIEND.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Hail bright companion of my lonely hours!
My midnight sun, with faintly glimm'ring ray,
To thee thy master now a sonnet pours,
Accept the verse—'tis all the bard can pay.

When solemn darkness veils the gloom spread
earth,

And Night, with sable sceptre, rules the plain,
What time pale Fear gives fancied spectres birth,
And imag'd terrors fill the vulgar brain.

Then to my silent chamber I retire,
Where books and musing solitude invite,
With secret pleasure trim my cheerful fire,
And from its flame my frugal taper light.

More dear to me thy little quivering rays
Which scarce illumine my silent study round,
Than the proud glare where thousand torches blaze,
And Mirth and Folly pour their mingled sound.

These spread their light, with glitt'ring radiance fraught,
To chase reflection from the heedless throng;
Thy sober beam assists the poet's thought,
Inspires the lay, and tunes his soul to song.

By thy lone light, full oft the muse has wove,
Or tale, or song in Fancy's flowing loom;
Oft has she breath'd in plaintive notes of love,
And mourn'd her fate, a hapless lover's doom.

* The seat of ——— Esq. Perthshire.

Thou sole companion of each anxious care,
Did'st yield sweet solace in this pensive hour,
My bosom's various thought did'st seem to share,
And rise or fall with sympathetic power.

When transient joy beam'd rapture to my breast,
In Fancy's eye I saw thee brighter shine;
And when my heart some hov'ring fear confest,
With gloom congenial did thy flame decline.

To thee the poet's grateful song is due,
To thee, my friend, (for social is thy kind,)
More than companion, thou'rt a teacher too,
And much of moral shew'st the observant mind.

Thy gradual waste, in unperceiv'd decay,
May well, to man, a moral lesson teach,
Thus glide his years in silent course away
Towards that bourne we all are doom'd to reach.

Be thou my friend—and as thy lustre mine;
And when life's lamp but gleams with feeble power,
Clear as thy flame may parting reason shine,
Warm in decay, and bright in life's last hour.

A SKETCH OF LEMON-HILL, THE SUMMER RESIDENCE

OF H..... P....., ESQ.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Here varied beauties charm the ravis'd sight,
And animate the breast with pure delight.
Gay flowers, and trees, from tropic regions bloom
In vernal pride, and shed a rich perfume;
The aromatic plant, and curling vine,
And glowing fruit and blossoms sweet combine!
Rich without ostentation, simply grand,
See on an eminence the mansion stand,
No gaudy ornaments, no glitter there,
No empty show to catch the vulgar stare;
It speaks a transcript of the owner's mind,
Conceptions just, and sentiments refin'd!
Fit residence for her, as good as fair,
The partner of his love and fondest care.
Meand'ring near, the Schuylkill gently flows
Inspiring tranquil joy, or bland repose.
Romantic scream! though still unknown in song,
Thy name shall yet inspire the poet's tongue.
The votive lay, by some enraptur'd bard,
In sweetly flowing accents shall be heard;
Not lov'd Scamander's fairer fame shall crown,
Or Ganges, boast a more diffus'd renown.
Near scenes that show the cultur'd hand of art,
Nature, with plastic power, displays her part.
In rude magnificence each rising hill,
And pendant rock, the busy fancy fill.
See craggy cliffs in various forms appear,
And such deep shades as anchorites revere.
Below these scenes the Schuylkill gently glides,
Rising and falling with alternate tides.

SONG.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TRANSLATED IMPROMPTU FROM THE FRENCH, AT THE REQUEST OF A YOUNG LADY.

Ah! Thyrsis return, and my torments remove;
How painful the moments when absent from thee!
Upbraid me no more for concealing my love,
But read this torn heart and my punishment see.

Thy image, through these silent groves as I stray,
Diffuses its balm o'er the wounds of my breast,
With delight I recall thy soft languishing lay,
—Where all thy emotions in rapture were drest.

Ah! how could my reason deny my fond choice,
When in thee she beheld all my soul could approve;

That look too expressive, that eloquent voice,
First spoke to my bosom and taught it to love

Without fear, unresisting, I yielded to fate,
No doubt racks the heart which love deigns to sublime;
Should I dare against virtue suspicion create?
Ah! no—when could happiness spring from a crime!

SELECTED POETRY.

PIC NIC.

[Our curiosity has long been in search of an accurate definition of the fashionable watch-words Pic Nic, under the protection of which many a splendid, and many a convivial circle has been convened. In the following interpretation, we are gratified with vivacity and humour, if we still remain in the dark, as to the true meaning of these eccentric terms.]

EPILOGUE.

Spoken by Colonel Greville.

What is Pic Nic? I hear you all exclaim,
What does it mean, and whence the odious name?
It means no mischief, thus far may I tell,
Nor is it, as some think, an imp of Hell!
Though, if believ'd, like talismans of old,
It gives to its possessor wealth untold.
Some think 'tis certainly Pandora's box,
While others think it simply means the stocks!
Miss Magnet blushing lips—it means the straw,
But's comforted when told, we act by law.
Some say none better can define the word
Than Billy Townshend and sir Richard Ford;
While others, though in Johnson they can't find it,
Still somehow think that Sheridan's defin'd it.
For me, though 'gainst my will, I frankly own,
Its mystic qualities must soon be known;
For saunt'ring up St. James's street to-day,
I heard a friend explain it in this way:
A Pic Nic is a devilish clever plan,
Invented when the scarcity began;
By which a supper by the guests is given,
That feeds the host at least six days in seven;
And while it promises to make them merry,
Replenishes his bins with Port and Sherry.
A general laugh announced the approbation
With which Pic Nic receiv'd interpretation,
While sneaking off, quite vex'd, I plainly saw,
Our Pic Nic damn'd by satire, not by law.
To you, more lib'ral, I commit my fate,
Oh! save my fame, by emptying ev'ry plate;
Leave no nice pickings for your needy host,
And grant some respite to the Morning Post.
But e'er with modest look I make my bow,
One word to proper manly pride allow.
Under whatever name this meeting goes,
'T has rais'd a host of mean malignant foes;
Not such as gen'ral blame should summon forth,
But foes alike to candour as to worth.
If then th' amusements of ten social nights,
Raise Virtue's blush, or trench on patent rights,
Like Birnam's wood that walk'd to Dunsinane,
Make poor St. Giles take root in Drury-Lane—
If this be prov'd, why then one hour endure
A trifling pleasure, neither just nor pure?
But if your reason owns no better cause
For tamely yielding, than newspaper laws—
Or what, perhaps, you'll deem more gallant still,
The lordly mandates of the Green-Room will;
Then let that reason spurn a mimic throne,
And others rights respecting—Guard your own.

My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord, nor faint, when thou art rebuked of him; for whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you, as with sons; but if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons.

ADDISON'S CATO.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

We trust you comprehend the allegory, the mention of our Toy-Shop is intended to carry with it; and, as there are, among the many vain and fanciful children of this world, some few serious and candid ones, you will not think it altogether inconsistent with our profession, if, in aiming to please all our customers, we occasionally exhibit, in our assortment of fancy-pieces, others of a more substantial and solid texture. In taking an account of stock, last week, we found the following epistolary article, sent us by a worthy philosophic friend, who, among his acquaintances reckons many, to whom he has frequent occasion to say, as the friar said to Romeo,

Affliction is enamour'd of thy parts,
And thou art wedded to calamity.

Similar to our friend's moral sentiments was the doctrine we lately heard advanced in the pulpit, by an orthodox divine. He maintained that we were sent here to combat troubles and dangers; and that to leave our posts, and absent ourselves from the world, because of the asperities of the way, would be like deserting in the day of battle.

But, setting aside all metaphor, similes, &c. we are persuaded, that if every one would adopt our friend's theory of a resigned and confidential acquiescence in every dispensation, we should hear less of the enormous vexations of this life, and witness fewer instances of despair and suicide. If you deem this letter worth your attention, and have nothing else on hand to furnish materials for a Lounger, it is at your disposal.

Yours, &c.

VERBAL AND TROCHEE.

DEAR FRIENDS,

When we look around us, and consider the numerous perplexities, with which man is encompassed, what shall we say of his situation? Notwithstanding all that may be said of the evils of this life, by those who view every thing on the "sombre side" I cannot but think that, if there were less affliction, there would be less happiness; or, in other words, that every particular circumstance, in our affairs, is as it should be.*

If we were self-created, we might well complain of our misfortunes, or repine at every thing which obstructs the rapid career of our pleasures. But, happily for man, he is a dependent on an allwise, and all-powerful Being, who never created any thing but to answer some valuable purpose.

Almost innumerable are the difficulties we have to encounter in the tumultuous scenes of the "busy world;" but they are most necessary monitors† to warn us of our weakness, and to admonish us to resist them to the utmost of our faculties, and to submit patiently to those, that remain irresistible.

At one time, I seem gliding along the zenith of prosperity; at another, smitten by adversity, I am groveling on the confines of despair. In the first situation, what is there to prevent my esteeming myself a celestial being, equally exalted with the heavenly choir; or, in the last, to hinder my being plunged into a continual despondency? One serious reflection, on the instability and fickleness of human nature, will forever banish, from my mind, every triumphant thought, every haughty exultation. A confidential reliance on, a Just, Benevolent, and Almighty Power; and an assurance that nothing will be permitted, by that Power, but what will finally prove his wisdom and goodness; together with the recollection, that I may have something more to perform, will enable me to rise superior to the frowns of fortune, and the contempt of the world; will dispel the clouds of melancholy, which gather over my head, and leave me resigned, and contented, in the light of reason and philosophy.

As for myself, I have, hitherto, been highly favored among mortals; and, therefore, may not be considered capable of conceiving how greatly I might be affected in extreme adversity. But, I can the better paint to myself its horrid form, by considering how deserving I am of it; can lighten its burden, by supposing it just at hand; and, when it arrives, can bid it welcome, in hopes that it will convince me of some error, cure me of some folly, or rid me of some vice.

* Not that the misconduct of one man to another is as it should be, with regard to himself and neighbour; but as it respects God's universal administration, which ultimately proves, that no circumstance is from chance, or blind casualties.

† Sweet are the uses of adversity.

SHAKESPEARE—As you like it.

To live in the world, suffer its unavoidable difficulties, and bear our misfortunes with fortitude, is to answer one purpose of our existence. But to live, as happily as possible, and contribute, all in our power, to the happiness of our fellow-creatures, is to perform the most important part of our duty on earth.

Thus, through the different scenes of life 'tis my delight to pass, despising wealth, acquired by base means, and esteeming poverty a most welcome inheritance.

Friends, faithful and true, are the sure assuagers of grief; and when deprived of them, the thought of doing something beneficial to mankind, even while neglected and despised, will amply compensate a philanthropic breast, for the greatest exertions. What! endeavour to assist those, who refuse your assistance, and strive to live in the world, when almost pressed to the ground, by the rigor of fate, and the burden of woe? Yes, this is a case, in which we can exercise our perseverance in doing good; for, to live, when prosperity is poured upon us in profusion, requires but trifling efforts.

Let me then be contented with whatever of good or ill fortune may fall to my share. Yes, be it my task to pass my life agreeably to myself, and useful to others, as far as my slender abilities, and situation in life, will permit. Let storms of adversity beat on, and threaten to plunge me into the gulf of desperation—rage with the impetuosity of a roaring torrent—and spread gloom and despair around; though, at first, it seem to shock me, and baffle my utmost resistance, yet, I will try to collect my fluctuating thoughts, summon resolution, and, casting off the shackles of consternation, stand firm and unmoved amidst the dismal calamity, which many would pronounce insupportable, and sufficient to authorise the declaration, that the world is a miserable place, and a life here is not worth possessing!

Thus, I think, while Reason remain, I will listen to her voice, and, believe, that to live in the world, without knowing its incidental calamities, and without experiencing want and disasters, would be not to live at all.

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL.

Some persons are apt to suppose that the older the world grows, the more enlightened it becomes; and consequently that doctrines contrary to the sentiments of the wisest ancients, may be maintained with peculiar propriety and merit praise. Whether those innovations, in science in cases where the merits of both sides of the question are nearly balanced are or are not proper, I shall not determine—but when the arguments against a change are stronger than those in favour of it, common sense tells us in what manner we are to decide. Those doctrines which are sanctioned with the approbation and support of the most learned men—which for ages have been regarded as genuine, and upon which, have been effected revolutions, and governments established, are entitled to some degree of veneration. We should not reject them as spurious, without very forcible reasons. We should impartially and attentively investigate the subject—consider the established doctrine—view the intended change, examine authors on the subject and submit to be guided by reason. The result of this enquiry must doubtless be right—or one at least, with which we may rest satisfied.

The state of nature and natural rights has latterly been treated by a writer in your paper as mere chimeras—as things that never had any existence but in the brains of philosophers. Such a thing as a right in a state of nature appears to him contrary to reason—what, in fact, never existed.

To establish his doctrine, so inconsistent with the received opinion of philosophers for centuries past—philosophers celebrated for correctness of sentiment and depth of reason—a few arguments are produced—arguments of such a nature as will not perhaps carry conviction to every mind. But as these new assertions are deemed self-evident, it is not surprising he is so frugal with his reasons. The only argument, indeed, produced, to shew the non-existence of natural rights, is the invalidity of a person, pleading those rights against his fellow-brutes (as the author expresses himself) when they attempt to offer him violence. This surely, is strange reasoning, that men in a state of nature, have no rights, because when unjustly attacked—pleading them, would be useless. It would be a very fortunate circumstance, in civil society if by pleading our rights, when attacked by a robber, or murderer, we could escape unhurt—murders and robberies would if this were the case, exist only in name. Happy, indeed, would be our lot. Universal experience, proves however the inefficacy of such a plea, and few if any ever make use of it. But does it follow from this, we have no right to our lives and property. You might with as much propriety answer in the negative, in this case as in the other. Though asserting those rights when assailed is ineffectual—yet this does not lessen the wrong, which the killing, or restraining a man without a legal cause, in a state of nature certainly is—there could be no wrong committed, unless a right existed—a right must exist somewhere, and that must be in the injured party.

In what state of society are the savage inhabitants of many parts of the world? have they any positive laws to regulate their intercourse—does any political government exist among them? if not they clearly do not come under the denomination of civilized. But does it follow that because they are not civilized—they are in no state whatever—most certainly not—That state, which in the history of man is previous to his entering into civil government, is termed by philosophers natural—a state of nature—the lot of all mankind till the introduction of positive law. This is the name it has received, and which expresses clearly the idea it represents. Such a state does not exclude the idea of imperfect union and mutual dependency—the Indians of North America are a proof of this, still they are in a state of nature in the same manner as flocks of birds, and herds of wild cattle. That men in this state have no rights, appears a very strange proposition. One would have thought that Mr. Locke had long since proved the absurdity of the idea, and that from his time none would attempt to maintain it—but mirabile dictu the attempt has again been made—and a system produced in which the non-existence of natural rights forms a main pillar. Rights acquired by entering into society, are talked of but not a word said of the rights, resigned or those, previously possessed—What do the constitutions of every state in the union declare? Whether has not man in a state of nature as good and indubitable a right to his life as under a form of civil government—and would not a person depriving him of it, commit in the eye of God, a sin as highly heinous as if it had been perpetrated in civil society? an answer to these questions will decide the point. By what kind of right does a man enjoy his limbs—his liberty—the elements, air, water, and light—surely not by an adventitious one—it must be then by a natural right—or in other words by the gift of God.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

It is related of Henry Fielding, that when he was martyr'd with the gout, or depressed by poverty, he used to read Seneca, and Cicero de Consolatione. These are admirable authors, to be sure, for the use of men who repose calmly in the elbow chair, and like Shakespear's Dogberry, have "two coats, and every thing comfortable about them." But when we are rendered more than usually grave, by the "dull realities" of this miserable life, it seems absurd to read grave authors, to make us still graver. If we wish to divert the humour of black melancholy, we should apply to some merry mountebank, instead of the lawful physicians of the schools.

The gay Monsieur St. Evremond recommends authors, who can excite us to laughter; and imagines Don Quixote a better assuager of care, than Plutarch, because it is easier to dissipate than to vanquish grief. I like this theory of the cheerful Frenchman; and, when I fall into a fit of Welsh choler and profound melancholy, as I reflect upon the degradation of my country, the misfortunes of my family, and the most venerable of my friends, plundered by all the factions of a revolution; when I meditate upon health, assailed by every sullen gale, in the most capricious of climes, and honour and fortune, like young eaglets, hindered from rising, and held down to the earth, by every republican boor, I run to the merriest authors in my library. I laugh with Rabelais, who satirizes, and Swift, who scorns, with Sterne, who sneers, and with Addison, who smiles at the awkward follies, or the portentous crimes of man. I giggle with Gil Blas and Monsieur Scarron, and, I chuckle, as I see my chambermaid brush into the fire, from the tired shelves, tomes of French philosophy, and all the free and equal consolations to be found among republican rubbish.

Voltaire, in his letters from Amabed, makes his hero declare, that he had been lately studying the elements of the Italian tongue, with his mistress by his side. "The first day, we conjugated together very easily, the verb I love. It employed us several days," the author archly adds, "to conjugate the rest of the verbs."

I have read a multitude of literal and faithful versions of that ode of HORACE, in which he praises Licinia, the betrothed bride of his patron, Mæcenas. None has, in my opinion, so exquisitely described the airs and graces of a Roman charmer, as the following paraphrase, for which I am indebted to the genius of Miss Seward, who without copying servilely from the ancient canvass, has given us the felicity of the original outline, and the vivid glow of the colours.

Enraptur'd by Licinia's grace,
My muse would all high themes decline,
Charm'd that the heart, the form, the face
Of matchless excellence is thine.

Ah, happy friend, for whom an eye,
Of splendid, and resistless fire,
Lays all its pointed arrows by,
For the mild gleams of soft desire!

With what gay spirit does she foil
The Pedant's meditated hit!
What happy archness in her smile!
What pointed meaning in her wit!

Her cheek how pure a crimson warms,
When with the nymphs, in circling line,
Bending she twines her snowy arms,
And dances round Diana's shrine.

Mæcenas, thou wouldst not exchange
The treasures gorgeous Persia pours,
The wealth of Phrygia's fertile range,
Or warm Arabia's spicy shores,

For one light ringlet of the hair,
Which shades thy sweet Licinia's face,
In that dear moment when the fair
Is flying from thy fond embrace,

Relenting turns her snowy neck,
To meet thy kisses half the way,
Or, when her feign'd resentments check
The ardours thy warm lips convey.

While in her eyes the languid light
Betrays a yielding wish to prove,
Amid her coy, yet playful fight,
The pleasing force of fervent love,

Or when in gaily frolic guise,
She snatches her fair self the kiss,
E'en at the instant she denies
Her lover the requested bliss.

The following serious sonnet, though somewhat harsh in its construction, will be perused with pleasure, by the few, who have learned the value of solitary hours, and who are skilled in other modes of enjoying the winter eve, than amid the malignant gossiping of prudish parties, or the humdrum remarks of insipid citizens, more flat and mawkish, than their stupefying beer.

WINTER EVENING.

When mourn the dark winds o'er the lonely plain,
And from pale noon sinks, ere the fifth cold hour,
The transient light, IMAGINATION'S power,
With knowledge and with science in her train,
Not unpropitious Hyems' icy train
Perceives;—since, in the deep and silent hour
High themes the rap: concentrating thoughts explore,
Freed from external pleasure's glittering chain.
Then most the understanding's culture pays
Luxuriant harvest, nor shall folly bring
Her aids obtrusive—Then, with ardent gaze,
The ingenious to their rich resources spring,
While sullen winter's dull imprisoning days,
Hang on the vacant mind, with flitting wing.

Miss Anna SEWARD, a very elegant poetess, and whose "Llangollen Vale" will transmit her genius to future ages, has paraphrased certain of the odes of Horace, sometimes in a very diffuse, but oftener in a very spirited manner. The Roman poet, on a festal day, commemorating the elevation of L. Murena to the dignity of an augur, composed an ode at table, in which he exhorts Telephus to dissolve his care. The ensuing extracts from Miss Seward's version, I read, and all the social tribe will read with glee.

Fill a bright bumper—to the moon!
She's new!—auspicious be her birth!
One to the midnight!—'tis our noon
Of jocund thought and festal mirth!

Arrange the cups of various size,
The least containing bumpers three,
And nine the rest.—Come, no disguise!
Nor yet constraint, the choice is free,

All but the barrels—the bowl of nine,
He is in duty, bound to fill;
The musics number to decline,
Were treason at Aonia's hill.

For here the sisters shall preside,
So they allow us leave to laugh;
Unzon'd the graces round us glide,
While we the liquid ruby quaff.

Yet they, in kind and guardian care,
Dreading lest wild inebriate glee
With broils disturb our light career,
Would stint us to their number, three.

Away, ye prudes—the caution wise
Becomes not this convivial hour,
That every dull restraint defies,
And laughs at all their frigid power.

Thou sayst I rove;—and true thou sayst.
Nor must thou check the flowing vein,
For sprightly nonsense suits him best,
Whom grave reflection leads to pain.

Why mute the pipe's enlivening note?
Why sleeps the charming lyre so long?
O, let their strains around us float,
Mix'd with the sweet and jocund song:

And lavish be the roses strewn!
Ye flutes, ye lyres, exulting breathe!
The fatal hour disdains to own,
The mournful note, the niggard wreath.

From themes, that wake the powers of mind,
The wounded spirit sick'ning turns;
To those be then this hour consign'd,
That mirth approves, though wisdom spurns.

Dr. GRAINGER's Tibullus is rather a heavy translation, and I find my opinion of its poetical imbecility confirmed, by Mr. Pye, the present Laureat. The Sugar Cane, a poem of some celebrity, I never could read through; though a few passages engaged my attention, and merited praise. But the following invocation to solitude is wonderfully sublime, and Dr. Johnson once repeated it with the enthusiasm of applause.

O Solitude, romantic maid,
Whether by nodding towers you tread;
Or haunt the desert's trackless gloom,
Or hover o'er the yawning tomb;
Or climb the Andes' clifted side,
Or by the Nile's coy source abide;
Or, starting from your half year's sleep,
From Hecla view the thawing deep;
Or, at the purple dawn of day,
Tadmer's marble waste survey.

Nothing can be more picturesque, than the images of this lonely Power contemplating, from the height of Hecla, the dissolution of polar ice, and, amid the brightness of the morning, expatiating over the desolate ruins of ancient grandeur. The various stations, which Solitude may be supposed to assume, are described by the poet, with the most admirable propriety, whether he directs his imagination to the source of the Nile, or the side of the Andes.

Many of the odes of Anacreon, Catullus, and Horace, are often incentive, not only to the raptures, but to the madness of Love and Wine. But the ensuing lines, translated from the merriest of the Greeks, by the accomplished Moore, contain a wholesome law of drinking, which Prudence and Temperance may sign, and which old Experience may approve.

Fill me, boy, as deep a draught,
As e'er was fill'd, as e'er was quaff'd;
But let the water amply flow,
To cool the grape's imperate glow;
Let not the fiery God be single,
But with the nymphs in union mingle.
For, though the bowl's the grave of sadness,
Oh! be it ne'er the birth of madness.

Pierius Valerianus, says Mr. Moore, has founded the ensuing epigram, on the mythological allegory of commemorating by altars to Bacchus and the nymphs, the temperate union of water with wine.

Ardentem ex utero Semeles lavere Lyæum
Naiades; extincto fulminis igne sacri;
Cum nymphis igitur tractabilis, at sine nymphis
Candenti rursus fulmine corripitur.

While Heavenly fire consum'd his Theban dame,
A Naiad caught young Bacchus from the flame,
And dipp'd him, burning, in her purest lymph.
Still, still, he leaves the sea maid's chrysal urn,
And, when his native fires infuriate burn,
He bathes him in the fountain of the nymph.

The poet, SMART, who has translated PHÆDRUS, in a manner that the Thracian Freedman himself might read with complacency in the court of Tiberius, has written a few ORIGINAL fables, which I think very little inferior to those of La Fontaine. One of the most liberal critics among my literary friends, has recently expressed to me his pleasure, in perusing the easy verses, which a few evenings since, I copied from that brilliant book, "The Meteors," on the subject of imputed plagiarism. I hope he will agree with me, that the ensuing fable rivals the tale of Clodio in the Oven.

The poker lost, poor Susan storm'd,
And all the rights of rage perform'd;
As scolding, crying, swearing, sweating,
Abusing, fidgetting, and fretting.
"Nothing but villainy and thieving;
Good heavens, what a world we live in!
If I don't find it in the morning,
I'll surely give my master warning.
He'd better far shut up his doors,
Than keep such good for nothing —s.
For, whereso'er their trade they drive,
We virtuous bodies cannot thrive."
Well may poor Susan grieve and groan,
Misfortunes never come alone,
But tread each others heels in throngs,
For the next day she lost the tongs,
The salt box, cullender and pot
Soon shar'd the same untimely lot.
In vain she wails and wages spent,
On new ones—for the new ones went.
There'd been, she swore, some devil, or witch in
To rob and plunder all her kitchen.
One night she to her chamber crept,
Where, for a month, she had not slept,
Her master being, to her seeming,
A better playfellow, than dreaming.
Curse on the author of these wrongs,
In her own bed she found the tongs,
Hang Thomas for an idle joker,
In her own bed she found—the poker;
Her salt box, pepper box, and kettle,
With all the culinary metal.—
Be warn'd, ye fair, by Susan's crosses,
Keep chaste, and guard yourselves from losses,
For if young girls delight in kissing,
No wonder that the poker's missing.

I think I could pretty accurately estimate the quantum of sensibility in a man's bosom, by knowing with what kind of emotions he rose from the perusal of the following lines, faithful to nature; so descriptive of the heart, and so honourable to the muse of the sensitive author. He, who does not enter into the spirit of the fourth, and, above all, of the last stanza, has yet to perform his noviciate of the passions, and it will be long, before he can exclaim with Virgil's shepherd "Nunc scio quid sit AMOR."

Near yonder cot upon the moor,
Whose grey smoke winds in many a curl;
I met this morn a lovely girl,
Knitting beside the cottage door.

With many a modish damsel oft,
I've squander'd foolishly my time,
Play'd with their hands and cheeks so soft,
Or hitch'd them into many a rhyme.

But when I turn'd to go away,
My bosom felt no tickling pain,
And scarcely did I hear them say,
I'd thank you, sir, to call again.

But when I saw this lass so fair,
Her floating eye so blue and round,
Its lustre I could no more bear,
But bashful look'd upon the ground.

My jealous pride then took alarm,
Face her, it whisper'd o'er and o'er,
Look up, she cannot do thee harm,
Did'st thou ne'er see a girl before.

Rous'd from the dream, I rais'd my hat
And tho't some civil thing to say;
I look'd, my heart went pit a pat,
And glad was I to get away.

Yet tho' I hurried from her sight,
Roam whereso'er my footsteps will,
That full blue eye, that face so bright,
Will HAUNT ME, LIKE A SPECTRE, STILL.

Monsieur Menage has composed a Greek Anacreontic, which I will not terrify my fair or my superficial readers by publishing in the original. But I will preserve an enchanting translation of it by T. Moore, Esq.

As dancing o'er the enamell'd plain,
The flowret of the virgin train,
My soul's Corinna lightly play'd,
Young Cupid saw the graceful maid;
He saw, and in a moment flew,
And round her neck his arms he threw;
And said, with smiles of infant joy,
"Oh! kiss me, mother, kiss thy boy."
Unconscious of a mother's name,
The modest virgin blush'd with shame!
And angry Cupid, scarce believing
That vision could be so deceiving,
Thus to mistake his Cyprian dame,
The little infant blush'd with shame.
"Be not asham'd, my boy," I cried,
For I was lingering by his side,
"Corinna and thy lovely mother,
"Believe me, are so like each other,
"That clearest eyes are oft betray'd,
"And take thy Venus for my maid!"

In many editions of the works of GRAY, the following song, gallantly written by him, at the request of Miss Speed, does not appear. The thought is so ingenious, the expression so delicate, and the passion so natural, I shall be thanked by many a sentimental reader for copying it during my Evenings.

Thyrsis, when we parted, swore
Ere the Spring he would return!
Ah, what means yon violet flower,
What the buds, that deck the thorn?
'Twas the lark, that upwards sprung,
'Twas the nightingale, that sung.

Idle notes, untimely green!
Why this unavailing haste?
Western gales, and skies serene,
Speak not always winter past
Cease my doubts, my tears to move,
Spare the HONOUR of MY LOVE!

I know not whether the following passage, from Addison's works, has ever been quoted as an example of his inimitable style. When I am engaged in the composition of an essay, and reflect how hard it is to approach even a faint resemblance of the manner of the SPECTATOR, and how exquisitely elegant that manner is, I record such a paragraph as the following with a mixed sensation of delight and despair.

"The head has the most beautiful appearance, as well as the highest station in a human figure. Nature has laid out all her art in beautifying the face. She has touched it with vermillion, planted in it a double row of ivory, made it the seat of smiles and blushes, lighted it up and enlivened it with the brightness of the eyes, hung it on each side with curious organs of sense, given it airs and graces that cannot be described, and surrounded it with such a flowing shade of hair as sets all its beauties in the most agreeable light. In short, she seems to have designed the head as the cupola to the most glorious of her works; and when we load it with a pile of super-numerary ornaments, we destroy the symmetry of the human figure, and foolishly contrive to call off the eye from great and real beauties to childish gew gaws, ribbons, and bone lace."

In the "Meteors" the following amorous remonstrance, is addressed to a jealous mistress, and it is both pathetic and poetical.

Oh! spare those sighs, that softly speak
The fond repinings of thy breast,
On which from storms and north winds bleak,
Secure I often sought to rest.

While her love's true, my sweet one's fears
Should all be banish'd to the wind;
A slight affliction, bath'd with tears,
Respeaks a weakness in the mind.

I would not have the girl I love,
Wrap in suspicion all her soul,
Because sometimes I devious rove,
Neglecting her, to drain the bowl.

Bacchus, the god of nectar'd treasure,
Ranges in Venus' myrtle grove,
And if his grapes invite to pleasure,
Where shall I fly, but to my love?

Can I then leave thy dear controul,
Or deign on false ones to repose?
Thinkest thou, I would mid nettles roll,
And slight the fragrance of the rose?

MATTHEW GREEN, one of the most original poets in our language, prescribes no less pleasantly, than judiciously against the attacks of hypochondria. In very desperate cases, he describes his own regimen.

Sometimes I dress, with women sit,
And chat away the gloomy fit;
Quit the stiff garb of serious sense,
And wear a gay impertinence,
Nor think nor speak with any pains,
But lay on fancy's neck the reins;
Talk of unusual swell of waist,
In maid of honour loosely lac'd,
And beauty borrowing Spanish red,
And loving pair with separate bed:
And jewels, pawned for loss of game,
And then redeem'd by loss of fame;
Of Kitty, aunt left in the lurch,
By grave pretence to go to church,
Perceiv'd in hack with lover fine,
Like Will and Mary on the coin,
And thus, in modish manner, we,
In aid of sugar, sweeten tea.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

KING'S BENCH.

THE KING V. HARRIS.

Mr. Gibbs stated, on the part of the prosecution, that the defendant is, by profession, a money broker and money lender.

Mr. Taylor, manager of the Opera-house, having got into great difficulties, persuaded Federici, a musician at that theatre, to accept a bill of exchange for 245*l.* at three months after date, which Federici consented to, merely to accommodate Mr. Taylor. This bill was given to a Mr. Galleni (also connected with the Opera-house) to get discounted. Galleni carried it to this money broker, who, like most of his profession, had not sho much money by him, but if he would take the greatest part in goods, he would accommodate him. Mr. Taylor's necessities were so urgent, that Galleni, who acted in this case as his agent, was obliged to accept of any terms: 50*l.* accordingly was given in money; the goods were, a grand piano-forte, valued at 75*l.* and worth nothing at all, except for the mahogany frame; in addition to this, there were different parcels of Irish linens, Welch flannels, and sea charts; when the bill became due, the defendant sued Federici, and obtained a verdict. As Galleni (whom Federici had relied upon as a witness) could not speak English, or give an intelligible account of the transaction. Federici then filed a bill in chancery against the defendant, calling upon him to set forth, upon oath, what value he had given for this bill. The defendant then called upon Galleni, and asked him, had he the bill of parcels which he had sent with the goods. Galleni replied, he had lost it; well then, says the money lender, I will not say a word of the pianoforte. Accordingly in his answer he did not mention this pianoforte. Mr. Gibbs then said, he intended to submit to the jury, whether it was possible for the defendant to have forgot this pianoforte, which was by much the principal item of those goods, which he professed to give in payment of this bill? If he had not forgot it, and yet omitted when accounting upon oath to mention it, in such case he was guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury.

Mr. Garrow, on the part of the defendant, pointed out several variations in the record, from the statement in the original bill.

Lord Ellenborough said, that he was obliged to pronounce those variations fatal; but at the same time he was sorry to see the justice of the country disappointed by the carelessness of practitioners; he did not mean particularly to allude to this defendant, for every man was to be presumed innocent till he should be proved guilty; but it was of great public importance, that those who swore answers to bills in equity, should have the fear of an indictment before them, if they were inclined to swear falsely.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

It is pleasing to see such a writer as Cumberland, speak in praise of the Leonidas of Mr. Glover, for notwithstanding the abrupt and laconic structure of his periods, which, like Cowper's translation of Homer, in some places, is ill suited to the melody of verse, and his rejection of the use of machinery, yet, for the happiness of choice in the subject, the artful conduct of the principal design, and adapting the episodes to the carrying on, and serving that design, for variety and discrimination of character, both in conduct and sentiment, and for variety of beautiful and new comparisons and similes, the Leonidas may rank with Lucan's Pharsalia, Statius' Thebaid, with Camoen's Lusiad, and Voltaire's Henriade, and may be considered as a legitimate descendant of the great Milton himself.

It is surprising that this poem is so little known; some who have read it attentively, think that even Lord Lyttleton did not over-rate its merits, though he was so partial to the author and the work. And it is peculiarly pleasing to the friends of Glover's memory, to read his character, as given by the eminent Dr. Brocklesby, on the occasion of his death—to be found in the Gentleman's Magazine, for 1785.

The specimen which Mr. Cumberland has given of a blank verse translation of the Iliad is, by some, considered as peculiarly excellent;—in melody of verse, and harmony of cadence, it is supposed to excel that of the illustrious Cowper, even in his happy talent: witness the following:

—To the stationed fleet of Greece,
With costly ransom, offering to redeem
His captive daughter, came the holy seer:
The laurel garland, ensign of his God,
And golden sceptre in his hand he bore;
And thus to all—but chief the kingly sons
Of Atreus, suppliant he address'd his suit.

"Kings, and ye well appointed warriors, all!
So may the gods, who on Olympus' heights
Hold their celestial mansions, and your arms
To level yon proud towers, and to your homes
Restore you, as to me you shall restore
My captive daughter, and her ransom take,
In awful reverence of the God I serve."

He ceas'd: the assembled warriors all assent,
All but Atreides—he the general voice
Opposing, with determined pride rejects
The proffer'd ransom, and insul's the suit—
"Let me not find thee, priest!—if thou presum'st,
Or here to loiter, or henceforth to come,
'Tis not thy sceptre, no, nor laurel crown,
Shall be thy safeguard; hence!—I'll not restore
The captive thou demand'st; deem'd for her life
In distant Argos, where I reign, to ply
The house-wife's loom, and spread my nightly couch—
Fly, whilst thy flight can save thee, and begone!

No more!—obedient to the stern decree,
The aged suitor turns his trembling steps
To the surf-beaten shore; there calls his God,
And, in the bitterness of anguish, prays—

"Hear me thou God who draw'st the silver bow,
Hear, thou, whom Chrysa worships, hear thou king
Of Tenedos, of Cella:—Smintheus hear!
And if thy priest hath ever deck'd thy shrine,
Or on thy flaming altars offer'd up
Grateful oblations,—send thine arrows forth,
Strike, strike these tyrants, and avenge my tears."

Thus Chryses pray'd, nor was the prayer unheard;
Quick, at his call, the vengeful God uprear'd
His tow'ring stature on Olympus' top,
Behind him hung his bow; onward he strode,
Terrible, black as night, and as he shook
The quiver'd arrows, the affrighted air
Echo'd the dreadful knell:—Now from aloft
Wide o'er the subject fleet he glanc'd his eye,
And from his silver bow, with sounding string,
Launch'd the unerring shaft, &c.

It will not be denied but that Cowper has, in many respects, given an excellent translation of Homer; especially in the endeavour to preserve the energy of the original, and in the compound epithets, which so much abound in the Iliad, which was supposed would not be well translated.

The act of Apollo in smiting the Greeks, with the plague, is also happily translated.

....."Clang'd the cord,
Dread-sounding, bounding on the silver bow."

Observations on the above, from some learned readers, may be acceptable. It will, at least, be admitted, that had not the task been undertaken by Cowper, we should have been very solicitous for Mr. Cumberland to have proceeded. For the tags of rhyme, even in the hands of Pope, could not permit us to discover even as well as the English language could exhibit, the spirit of the Greek poems—On this much might be said.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The speculative opinions of a writer, whose travels in the United States have lately been published, may deserve some attention, when they are expressed upon a topic so universally interesting as "the future destiny" of our country. The question whether that important region of territory, upon the continent of America, which, for a series of years, has been in the peaceable possession of Spain, shall now, all of a sudden, be transferred to new hands, and in the interim of its being occupied by its new masters, whether the commerce of the citizens of the United States, shall be totally excluded from the only port of entry in the river Mississippi, is discussed, at this moment, with singular zeal, by all ranks of the community. On subjects of such momentous concern to the people of the United States, even the remarks of a foreigner should be listened to, and if they contain useful hints, they ought to be advantageously improved.

The traveller referred to, in considering the "future destinies of North America," has made the observation, that, "it is not even ascertained as yet, whether the eastern maritime states, and those to the westward, such as Kentucky, Tennessee, &c. will not separate; nor is it yet sure, that the northern and southern states, which are divided by the Potomack, will always remain united in one political body; and certain writers have already wrested from the crown of Spain, all the lands westward of the Mississippi, and given them to the Republic."

In the preceding remarks, there is evidence of foresight and penetration in the writer, which is singularly striking, at this moment, when the attention of our countrymen is roused at the idea of a dismemberment of our territory, as a consequence of the cession of Louisiana by Spain to France.

He proceeds; "But if the Indians should prove incapable of maintaining the possession of their land, and Spain should lose the extensive territories westward of the Mississippi, they would nevertheless not become parts of the United States. The European powers will settle and determine concerning them, among themselves, and the American Republic will be allowed no voice in the case, for she has no military force to give her weight; the Europeans will therefore most probably decide, who shall possess that country, and they will not give it to the Americans."

When the president of the United States announced, in his late message to congress, "the cession of the Spanish province of Louisiana to France," as having taken place, "in the course of the late war," the predictions of this writer, were literally verified; two European powers, undertook "to settle and determine concerning the extensive territories, westward of the Mississippi," without allowing "the American Republic any voice in the case." It is true, that the United States had no claim to the territory in question, but they had an undoubted right to make a treaty with Spain, and to stipulate for the free navigation of a river, which is a source and a flood of wealth to the people of our western country, dwelling near its borders. Nor did Spain the right of ceding to France, a territory in which the United States possessed, by compact, certain valuable privileges, without first obtaining their consent, or charging the transfer of possession to other hands, with all existing incumbrances.

The principle, which has just been advanced, is fully recognized by the law of nations, and during the debate in the national legislature, on Mr. Griswold's motion to go into a committee of the whole, on the state of the union, for the purpose of calling up the resolution, asking, from the executive, information respecting the cession of Louisiana to France, Mr. Lowndes, (of South Carolina) insisted, with emphasis, upon its application to the relative situations of the United States, Spain and France, in the present contest respecting Louisiana. The remarks of this gentleman were as follows: "It has been observed, Mr. Speaker, that if Spain has ceded the province of Louisiana to France, it is merely a transaction between two foreign powers, into which we have no right to enquire. It is said, she had a right to make the cession without consulting us. This, sir, I deny. She has not a right to vary our situation without our consent; she has not a right, without consulting us, to give us what neighbours she may think proper."

"If, by the conditions of the transfer, France is to be allowed, upon taking possession, to consult her own convenience, without regard to our rights, there has been a violation of good faith on the part of Spain. The essential interests of this country, interests secured to us by treaty, have been abandoned."

In this great question, respecting the right of Spain to cede to France the province of Louisiana, several important points of the law of nature and nations, are incidentally involved. The navigation of the river Mississippi may possibly give rise to contentions, as serious in their consequences to the United States, as ever flowed from the disputes between the maritime states of Europe, respecting the free navigation of the river Scheld. This is an occasion, when it would be justifiable to cite and discuss the doctrine of mare liberum and mare clausum, and when we wish to consult authorities on this subject, we shall much sooner refer to Grotius, than to governor M'Kean and governor Mercer.*

We think very well of Hugh Grotius's treatise "De Mare libero," and have heard the knowing ones express high approbation of Paul Merula's "Dissertatio de Maribus," and as Thomas M'Kean pretends to know something of the controversies which have prevailed respecting Mare liberum, and Mare clausum, and James Monroe, the President's Envoy, is entirely ignorant of these subjects, we should have been disposed to acquiesce in the mission to Spain, had the first named person been selected to fill the station. The character of Mr. M'Kean is that of a proud Castilian, and a grandee of Spain. The motto to his coat of arms would seem to indicate, "homo antiqua virtute ac fide," for to what higher praise can man aspire than the title of the "Mens sana in corpore sano." Mr. Monroe, on the contrary, is one of your canting, meek, lowly, republican puritans—the motto to whose coat of arms is, "Dread God." When the Roman people, once on a time, sent an impotent Embassy, it was said, by some of their satirists, "Misset populus Romanus, legationem, qui nec pedes, nec caput habet."

The impartial statement of the affray which took place, not far from Port-Tobacco, on the 28th of December last, which was published in the National Intelligencer, so completely nailed Mr. Rutledge to the wall, that we apprehend some difficulty will be found in extracting him, with the aid of Messrs. Simmes and Clagget's portable patent pincers.

Of what avail are affidavits on oath, in establishing the truth of facts, when opposed by the word of "a Senator of the United States," from the state of Rhode-Island?

The honourable Mr. E——— has proved himself so clever at detecting forgeries, that we expect to hear very soon, that the depositions of Messrs. Simmes and Clagget are documents, falsified by Mr. R——— and in his hand writing.

Messieurs Bayard, Griswold, and Rutledge, enjoy, it is said, the distinguished honor of the cordial hatred and abhorrence of the President of the United States. Their masculine intrepidity, seconded by unrivalled talents, have enabled them to "speak daggers" to the soul of every jacobin in the country. Hence the extraordinary efforts of the government party to defeat the reelection of these gentlemen as Representatives to the national legislature.

* To understand this allusion the reader is reminded of a certain consequential letter from governor M'Kean to governor Mercer, on the important subject of "a toll on the passage of vessels from this state, down the bed of the Susquehanna river, through part of the state of Maryland, into the Chesapeake bay, and towards the Atlantic Ocean," in which governor M'Kean, with abundant solemnity, expresses a well grounded confidence, that, "The controversies respecting the mare liberum and mare clausum, the Baltic, the Scheldt, and the Rhine, in Europe, and the Mississippi, in America, will not, as they need not, be revived in this case."

Monsieur Gallatin makes fearful work with the English language, as well as with American finances. We are at a loss to determine what sentiment he means to convey, in his rumbling and jolting vehicle of expression. We recommend Dilworth and Ashe's portable little grammar to this gabbling Genevieve, and we admonish him to learn something of English construction, before he presumes to appear again in print.

In most of our print-shops, there is a most outrageous likeness of a gawky figure, to which the artist has appended the far-famed name of T. Jefferson. As we stopped, the other day, to gaze at this portentous figure, we could not help remembering a passage in the Rolliad—

Behold the Engraver's mimic labours trace,
The sober image of that sapient face;
See him, in each peculiar charm exact,
Below dilate it, and above contract;
For Nature thus, inverting her design,
From vulgar ovals hath distinguish'd thine:
See him each nicer character supply,
The pert, no meaning puckering round the eye;
The mouth, in plaits precise, demurely clos'd,
Each ordered feature, and each line composed;
There wisdom sits a-squat, in starch disguise,
Like dulness couch'd, to catch us by surprise.

The specious hypocrisy of the revolutionary disciples of Rousseau, their tender mercies towards Grubs, and their latent animosity to grandeur and virtue, are all finely described by Burke, who well understood the depraved nature of the traitors to the French monarchy. He knew the weakness as well as the wickedness of their accursed theory. He cherished a moral antipathy towards these political highwaymen, or rather footpads, because he was sure that with all their republican babble, their whole system was rottenness.

From within Their shallow centre to their utmost skin."

"These savages seemed tame and even caressing. They had nothing but douce humanité in their mouths. They could not bear the punishment of the mildest laws on the greatest criminals. The slightest severity of justice made their flesh creep. The very idea that war existed in the world disturbed their repose. Military glory was no more with them, than a splendid infamy. Hardly would they hear of self defence, which they reduced within such bounds, as to leave it no defence at all. All this while, they meditated confiscation and massacres."

In a paper in the Idler, by Dr. Johnson, there occurs a suggestion of an historical subject, for the pencil, which we find has been actually taken up by our countryman, Sir Benjamin West, who, to the great scandal of a republic, has accepted a title from a king, and chooses to live in London, rather than in the Liberties of Philadelphia.

If the design were not too multifarious and extensive, I should wish that our painters would attempt the dissolution of the parliament, by Cromwell. The point of time may be chosen, when Cromwell, looking round the Pandemonium with contempt, ordered the bauble to be taken away; and Harrison laid hands on the speaker to drag him from the chair.

The various appearances, which rage and terror, and astonishment and guilt might exhibit in the faces of that hateful assembly; the irresolute repugnance of some, the hypocritical submission of others, the ferocious insolence of Cromwell, the rugged brutality of Harrison, and the general trepidation of fear and wickedness, would make a picture of irresistible instruction.

A youth of a luxuriant imagination and vivid parts, at a college in a certain democratic state, anxious to convince his father of his rapid improvement, as well as his talent at imitating, and even excelling, a certain great character in the sublimity of his language, concludes a very flourishing letter to him in these words—"I tender you the homage of a fumigation, with the odoriferous incense, which evaporates from the profound respects of

Your most obsequious Son,

In a late Providence paper, a blacksmith advertises a VICE, which has been stolen from him. He must be a vicious thief that can steal vices.

The following is strict truth, respecting Charles Fox, the noted profligate patriot, who visits Buonaparte and La Fayette. "Nothing is more certain than that the party leader of the English jacobins, though he thinks it suits his interest to sacrifice at the shrine of Democracy, is, in reality, actuated by a proud Aristocratic spirit. But it is, indeed, impossible for men of sense and education to relish the coarse tyranny of republican usurpers, though they may be induced, by selfish motives, to abet so gross and odious a system.

The ensuing extract, from the letter of an elegant remarker, contains so many ingenious remarks, neatly expressed, that it is well worthy a memorial.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM PARIS, SEPTEMBER 12.

"The residence of an Englishman in Paris powerfully tends to render him contented with his own country. On a fair comparison, we have the advantage in almost every thing that contributes to the happiness of a man of an enlightened and independent mind. But in our capital source of pleasure and improvement we are infinitely excelled. I reflect with disgust on almost all the theatrical representations I ever saw in England. I attach no consequence to the number of theatres; but I reflect with mortification and envy upon the admirable manner in which they are conducted. It would be more desirable to have a box in the fourth or fifth house here, than in the second in London. One would witness more judgment in the managers, more talent in the actors, and more taste in the audience. Constant habit renders us insensible to the low state of our drama; but, on coming over to this side of the water, it strikes one with extraordinary force. This degeneracy is altogether unaccountable. Where have the audience spoilt the actors; or the actors the audience? unquestionably they are very bad. Here the theatres are filled with real amateurs, and they seldom find occasion but to approve. What order prevails? what expectation is excited? what devotion is shewn to the business of the stage? what rapture is displayed on every countenance at any particular happy trait of humour or burst of passion? In London few seem to go for the sake of the play, and the greatest part would probably be as well pleased if the curtain were never drawn up. Judging by the public places, London must be reckoned infinitely the most profligate. I will by no means vouch for the virtue of all the female part of a French audience; but women are never seen in the theatres insulting decency, and openly bartering their charms. Venal beauty constitutes no part of the attraction. The theatres are under very severe regulations, framed by the police. These, however, have little influence. There is no occasion for positive law, as no one shews the least propensity to offend. While the curtain is up, a whisper among the audience is never heard; to cough even is reckoned unmannerly, and if an Englishman moves from one box to another the performance is suspended. What must a Frenchman think when he sees the stage of the opera house crowded with cocombs, and when at all the theatres the grand object of most people seems to be to disturb their neighbours. While the actors excuse themselves by the inattention of the audience, the audience perhaps may urge as their plea the badness of the actors. There is no doubt that the stage here is much better worth attending to. We have artists, I am proud to think, superior to any that Paris can boast of. I admire Talma enthusiastically. In clearness, strength, and flexibility of voice, in variety of tone, in dignity of exclamation, in ease of deportment, in elegance of attitude, I think him much superior to Mr. Kemble. Perhaps he falls short of him in portraying the passions, less from want of ability than from the limited range allowed him by French tragedy—which, whatever its merits, in simplicity and correctness, in richness of imagery, and smoothness of versification, in its power over the heart, must at once yield to the irregular effusions of Shakespeare, Otway, and Rowe. But I have never seen Talma so great as Mr. Kemble in Hamlet, Piercy, or the Stranger. Mrs. Siddons appeared to me to be still more superior to the principal female tragic performers here.... Still our spectacles are miserable. We have parts well performed, but never a whole. Here the second rate artists, whether tragedians, comedians, or dancers, are almost equal to the first, and there are but two divisions. After you have descended one degree the scale stops. The attendants on queens, the bearers of messages, and the figurants in the ballet are all admirable performers, and could take almost any part in the piece. At this moment there are many at Paris who would be almost at the top of the profession in England, and who cannot get an engagement of any kind. Why among us there should be so few tolerable actors I am altogether at a loss to explain. Except Cooke no one has appeared in London for many years; while at the Comedie Francaise, I give you my word, within a few weeks back, there have been several debutants and deputantes of the most superior talents, and there are many, of whom report speaks favourably, that cannot get a hearing. Where is the actor so well paid as with us? Where is he held in higher estimation? In provincial theatricals we are left further behind. Although the performers of the metropolis are never permitted to go into the country, there is in every town a company, superior to that of Bristol, Manchester, or Edinburg, during the summer months. I went to the theatre as I passed through Calais. The admission to the boxes was but 30 sols, or 1s. 3d. There were an opera and a farce. The opera was but so so, though far better than I expected; but I protest that I never saw a farce better acted at Drury Lane or Covent Garden. I have great hopes that an intercourse with the French nation, while it strengthens our love of liberty and our attachment to the constitution, will lead us to emulate them in what they excel, and that their example will teach us both what we are to aspire after, and what we are to shun."

HALIFAX, (N. S.)

KING'S COLLEGE, WINDSOR, N. S.

On Tuesday, the 14th of September, was held the first meeting of all the governors of the new university of king's college, at Windsor, incorporated by his majesty's royal charter, bearing date the 12th of May, 1802. They consist of his excellency Sir John Wentworth, bart. L. L. D.

lieutenant-governor of the province; the right reverend the bishop of Nova-Scotia; S. S. Blowers, esq. the chief justice; Alexander Croke, L. L. D. judge of the vice admiralty court; R. J. Uniacke, esq. speaker of the house of assembly and attorney-general; S. Stewart, esq. solicitor-general; and Benning Wentworth, esq. secretary of the province. Upon this occasion the charter was publicly read in the college hall. It establishes "at Windsor, in the province of Nova-Scotia, one college, the mother of an university, for the education and instruction of youth and students, in arts and faculties, to continue for ever, and to be called KING'S COLLEGE, by the name and style of the governors, president, and fellows of king's college, at Windsor, in the province of Nova-Scotia; the college to consist of one president, three or more fellows and professors, and twelve or more scholars; the governors named in the charter, and their successors, to have power to frame statutes, rules and ordinances, for the good government of the said college, subject to the approbation of the lord archbishop of Canterbury, who is constituted patron, as the bishop of Nova-Scotia, is appointed visitor of the college." The charter further ordains, "That the said college shall be deemed and taken to be an university, and shall have and enjoy all such and the like privileges as are enjoyed by the universities in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland: and that the students in the said college shall have liberty and faculty of taking the degrees of bachelor, master, and doctor, in the several arts and faculties, at the appointed times."

The governors have appointed a committee to frame and digest a body of statutes, and also to procure, from the British universities, men of learning, religion, and abilities, to fill the different stations. It is hoped that the whole will be accomplished, and the establishment completed for the admission of students, in one year, or less from the present time.

The following sketch of the meat sold in the market of Halifax, for the September quarter, affords a pleasing proof of the agricultural improvements which have, in a few years taken place in this country, and furnishes a happy presage of its increasing prosperity.

3158 sheep; 502 calves, 614 oxen; 21 hogs.

The apostolic rite of confirmation was lately conferred on several hundred persons in Christ Church, by Benjamin Moore, D. D. bishop of the Protestant episcopal church in the state of New-York. The bishop, on this occasion, was received, at his entrance into the church, by the congregation singing those appropriate lines from the 118th psalm,

"Him that approaches in God's name
"Let all the assembly bless;" &c.

The discourse he delivered was impressive, and well adapted to the occasion, and was suitably received by the congregation, whose satisfaction was greatly enhanced by this seal of their union with their sister societies in the state.

[New-York paper.]

The new and beautiful church at Danbury, was lately consecrated, by the right reverend Doctor Jarvis—a sermon preached by the bishop from Exodus 25. 8. to a crowded audience, which manifested their approbation by their very attentive and decent behaviour. The elegance of the house evinced to all present that the members gratefully received and religiously improved the grant of a lottery which enabled them to build it, and dedicate to the worship of Almighty God,

Dr. Aiken's Beggar's Petition has produced many a parody. The following will amuse the Aumane hunter.

Pity the sorrows of a poor old MARE,
Whose trembling limbs scarce keep her from th' ground;
Whose wearied days are lengthened to despair,
For I am lame, and wretchedly unsound.

This pierced skin my poverty betides,
Oh, once, alas! the sleekest of the stud;
And many a furrow in my spur-worn sides,
Has been the channel of a tide of blood.

Yon tavern sign, erected near the wood,
With tempting aspect, drew me from the road;
To shelter there—for "entertainment good,
For man and horse," was painted on the board.

Hard is the fate of the infirm and poor—
Here, as I crav'd a handful of their hay,
An ostler drove me from the stable door,
To seek again my solitary way.

Oh, take me to yon hovel's straw-built shed,
Keen blows the wind, and piercing is the cold;
Oh, spare some litter for a scanty bed,
For I am lame, and miserably cold.

Should I reveal the sources of my pain,
How long I've borne oppressions direful sways
Your hand would not withhold a little grain,
And I, in humble gratitude, would neigh.

Myself descended from the noblest race,
Of from Newmarket's course the palm have borne;
Or ran the foremost in the jovial chase,
When rous'd to mettle by the sprightly horn.

Hard riding makes the stoutest horse decline;
Hard riding brought me to the state you see;
May your own horse's fate be ne'er like mine,
The foal of famine and of misery.

Doom'd to draw sand, I labour'd through the day,
With toil oppress'd, to earn my master's bread;
Then turn'd adrift, this dreary waste to stray,
Unheeded, and unhoused, and worst of all, unfed.

Blind Dobbin, late companion of my age,
Of did the cruel whip his carcass flay;
Fell, stumbling fell, sad victim to blind rage,
And left the cart to cruelty, and me.

Pity the sorrows of a poor old MARE,
Whose trembling limbs scarce keep her from th' ground;
Whose wearied days are lengthened to despair,
For I am lame, and wretchedly unsound.

The songs of Dibdin are sung not only in the fore-castle, but in the saloon. All admire the merit of his maritime muse, and all testify the utility of thus animating the seaman to his duty. In one of the newest operas, the following sea ballad is sung, and Dibdin need not be ashamed of the style, or the sentiments.

A sailor I was born and bred,
My father's name was Midship Ned,
I doesn't tell a story;
And when he died, says Mam, says she,
Suppose, my lad, you goes to sea,
Says I, that there's all one to me,
If 'tis for Britain's glory.

I learnt to splice, and reef, and clue,
To drink my grog, till all was blue,
And tell a merry story;
And though I was'n't very big,
Aloft I'd climb, nor care a fig,
Or load a gun, and dance a jig,
And all for Britain's glory.

When I came home again, I found
My mother she was left aground,
I doesn't tell a story;
For she was cheated by an elf,
Who married her for father's pelf,
Then spent the cash, and hang'd himself,
And all for Britain's glory.

I fought the Spanish, French, and Dutch,
You know it doesn't matter much,
To tell a tedious story;
While mother liv'd, why I kept she,
And, now I cannot go to sea,
The King, God bless him, he keeps me,
And all for Britain's glory.

The perfections of the grey hound, are thus described in certain old couplets.

Head like a snake,
Neck'd like a drake,
Back'd like a beam,
Sided like a beam,
Tail'd like a rat,
And footed like a cat.

The general reader may remember the gross scurility, employed by the jacobin Junius, against Welbore Ellis, Esq. as a ministerial partizan in 1770. Time, which on all things lays his lenient hand, has redeemed the character of this virtuous nobleman, and a recent mourner for his loss has thus given the lie to Junius, that great patriot.

The right honourable Welbore Ellis, Lord Mendep, was respected and honoured by all who knew him while living, and his loss will long be sincerely regretted. His mind was stored with extensive learning, which his extraordinary memory retained to the last. No man possessed more strict integrity and honesty; his charities were extensive; there never was a man who, through so long a political life, made so few enemies; his country has lost an able and honest STATESMAN; his king a most loyal subject.

The following remarks, from a very respectable London print, merit regard, and will suggest topics of curious speculation to wise politicians, of old fashioned principles, who do not repair for perfect theories of government to the shallow presumption of jacobin cuckows.

A short time ago the three petty cantons of Switzerland, which refuse to acknowledge the new constitution of the Helvetic Republic, applied to the chief consul for his sanction in resuming their ancient government. The Moniteur notices certain publications in the Publiciste on this subject, and says, "the French government recognizes only one government in the Helvetic Republic. A portion, therefore, of this people could not have written to him without placing themselves in a state of rebellion against their own government." The sentiment here expressed forms an important part of the history of the French revolution. It is a censure of those persons who went from England in 1792, and presented addresses at the bar of the convention; it is a revocation of the doctrine of assistance and fraternity, which is said to have given so much alarm at the commencement of the war. Buonaparte has discovered that principles of insubordination existing in the breasts of surrounding nations will not promote his schemes of aggrandizement. He trusts to force alone, and is desirous of appealing only to his sword. He has nothing to hope from the affection of any people, and relies for the success of all his projects on his soldiers. He now, too, feels the inconvenience of allowing a people to have too great a share in the management of the affairs of state, and daily throws out hints to assure them that, if they will but support his authority, they shall have nothing to fear from the practice of any of the principles of the French revolution. Now that he is seated on the throne, he thinks, as every one thought before him, that all goes well, that all are incendiary jacobins, who attempt to thwart his projects or restrain his power. Let him proceed....He will run himself down at last. Opposition to his views would at present be wholly ineffectual.

We have the greatest satisfaction in assuring the public that Mr. Pitt's health has been perfectly re-established by even the short use which he has made of the Bath waters. That great man never was in better health than at the present moment, and we have no doubt of soon seeing his unrivalled talents exerted in parliament, in support of the cause and the interests of his country.

We hope that the following literary plan of an ingenious and correct Editor, will receive ample encouragement, and that though he labours amid the rigours of the north, he may feel the genial influence of the south. "Proposals are issued, at Quebec, by John Neilson, for publishing every Saturday, a periodical work, in the French and English language, embracing a variety of useful information, entitled "The British American Register," each number to contain sixteen pages royal octavo, at one guinea per annum.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Two years have elapsed since the establishment of the Port Folio; and, amid adverse fortune, and vexing cares, in despite of the menaces of some, the timidity of others, and the languor of all, the Editor has struggled to support the spirit of the undertaking.

But, from various causes, unpleasant and unforeseen, his literary labours have been so desultory, so languid, and so imperfect, that, as he sternly surveys his own compositions, in this Journal, no Zoilus can criticise more austere, than their author.

Yet, though he is depressed, by reflecting on the past, he still looks forward, confidently, to the future; such is the bounding elasticity of mind, and the flattery of Hope is so beguiling.

His friends will not, therefore, be surprised, though another volume of this paper be projected. The Editor cordially thanks them for assisting him, a way-farer towards public utility, and partial approbation. He begs leave to add, after the compliments of a festal season, that, with the alacrity of the shepherd swain, in Milton's Lycidas, he will rise from the couch of lassitude, and commence his intellectual tour,

"To-morrow to fresh fields, and pastures new."

It is expedient to add, that the public encouragement of this Journal is so moderate, that the Editor, far from receiving the labourer's hire, has gained nothing, but the kindness of a few of the most partial of his friends. Since the autumn of 1795, at all times zealously, and oftentimes laboriously, he has attempted, by literary and political essays, to amuse a few, and to warn many. His sketches, sufficiently imperfect, have scarcely been lucrative enough to pay for the oil, consumed in their composition. This is a retrospect of regret, and a cause of just alarm for the morrow. In the third year of his Journal, great efforts will be made to deserve a liberal retribution. If the Editor still fail to receive the fairly earned recompence, for literary toil, he will then think with the poet, that this is, indeed, an idle trade; and, in the words of Johnson "finding, with all his industry, that he cannot deserve regard, or cannot attain it, he may let his design fall at once, and, without injury to others, or himself, retire to amusements of greater pleasure, and to studies of better prospect."

The Copartnership, in the Port Folio establishment, which has hitherto subsisted, between the Editor, Asbury Dickins, and Elizabeth Dickins—is this day dissolved.

31st December, 1802.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO THE MEMORY OF A FRIEND.

Friend of my heart! and must we bid farewell?
Has death, unfeeling, pierc'd thy noble breast?
Could nought, the rage of dire disease, repel,
Nor no kind aid the fatal stroke arrest?

Then have I cause to grieve, for I had thought
With thee to journey through the world's sad wild,

Thy truth my guide, by thine example taught;
In thee I trusted and was ne'er beguil'd.

Thy soul was honor's self, ingenuous, true,
No vicious action stain'd thy bright career;
Fair virtue's precepts did thy mind imbue,
And made thee what I mourn, a friend sincere.

As o'er thy early grave I bend in tears,
And heave for thee the sorrow-freighted sigh,
Thy vision rising to my sight appears,
And mournful whispers, that I too must die.

EDWARD.

DIONYSIUS, THE TYRANT, AND PHILOXENUS, THE BARD, OR, THE POET NO FLATTERER.

A TALE OF OTHER TIMES.

Sated with conquests, and with crimes,
A Robespierre of other times,
To warm his former courtiers freezing praise,
Attempted to usurp the Bays;
But how to make his title good,
Whilst Genius dreads the man of blood!
The better to secure his Jury,
He mask'd in smiles his innate fury.
Were poets hungry, poor, or cold,
He gave them dinners, furs, and gold;
Ask'd men of genius to his table,
Who, 'midst such blandishments, unable
Their Io-Peans to refuse,
Flatter'd the monster, and his muse.
But Philoxenus, who alone,
To all the rest superior shone,
Join'd not the adulating strain,
And fawning greatness fawn'd in vain.
Such conduct could a tyrant bear,
Anxious a laurel crown to wear?
"Your sullen silence, sir, give o'er,
"Speak out—what say you?"—"Write no more!"

How!—write no more!—'twas envy spoke,
I'll crush her, with a single stroke,
At genius, royalty, to scoff!
"Guards, to the mines, the wretch bear off."
Th' obsequious guards the nod obey,
And bear him to the mines away.

Aw'd with the fate of such a guest,
A thrilling terror chill'd each breast;
Each felt, with sympathetic sorrow,
That such might be his fate to-morrow.
The sword o'er Damocles suspended,
Might fall, before the feast was ended.
The tyrant reads his works in vain,
Give Philoxenus back again,
He read in ev'ry downcast eye,
And found it prudent to comply;
So seal'd a pardon to the sinner,
By asking him again to dinner.
Choice were the wines, the viands rare,
But the desert of coarser fare;
Some palling, namby-pamby sweets,
Such as in birth-day odes, one meets,
All of the tyrant's own composing,
Soon, set our honest bard a dosing.
"Why, Philoxenus! rub your eyes,
"Hath not experience made you wise?

"My last, best efforts, I've recited,
"My guests, you see, are all delighted;
"Envy ne'er taints a generous spirit,
"Give your opinion on their merit.
"What, Philoxenus, do you say?"
—"Guards, bear me to the mines away!"

But whilst the guards around him rally,
Charm'd with the humour of this sally,
The tyrant chose a wiser plan,
And for his wit forgave the man.

SELECTED POETRY.

[When the propagation of French and infamous principles had arisen to an alarming height in England, the friends of government, to counteract and expose the baleful effects of democracy, established in London a most masterly paper, called "The Anti-Jacobin," conducted in a very superior style, by some of the brightest wits in the kingdom. Some of the most excellent arguments against revolutionary and irreligious principles have appeared in this paper, and it is frequently the vehicle of poetry, serious and ludicrous of which Juvenal, and the author of the Pursuits of Literature need not have been ashamed. Among their most elegant effusions, we find the following sarcasm upon the French, which in a strain of poetry and parody, nearly unrivalled, ridicules the directory, and most aptly alludes to the Morning Hymn of Milton.]

Ere long perhaps, to this astonished isle,
Fresh from the shores of subjugated Nile,
Shall Buonaparte's victor fleet protect
The genuine Theo Philanthropic sect?—
The sect of Marat, Mirabeau, Voltaire,
Led by their pontiff, good La Revelliere.
Rejoic'd our clubs shall greet him, and instal
The holy hunch back in thy dome, St. Paul,
While countless votaries thronging in his train
Wave their red caps, and hymn this jocund strain;
"Couriers and Stars, sedition's evening host,
Thou Morning Chronicle, and Morning Post,
Whether you make the Rights of Man your theme,
Your country libel and your God blaspheme,
Or dirt on private worth and virtue throw,
Still, blasphemous or blackguard, praise Lepaux.
And ye five other wandering bards that move
In sweet accords of harmony and love,
Coleridge and Southey, Loyd and Lambe and Co.
Tune all your mystic harps to praise Lepaux!
Priestly and Wakefield, humble, holy men,
Give praises to his name with tongue and pen!
Thalwell, and ye that lecture as ye go,
And for your pains get pelted, praise Lepaux!
Praise him each jacobin, or fool, or knave,
And your crop'd heads in sign of worship wave!
All creeping creatures, venomous and low,
Paine, Williams, Godwin, Holcroft—praise Lepaux!

And thou leviathan! on ocean's brim
Hugest of living things that sleep and swim;
Thou in whose nose by Burke's gigantic hand
The hook was fixed to drag thee to the land,
With Tierney, Fox, and Nicholls in thy train,
And Whitebread wallowing in the yeastly main,
Still as you snort, and puff, and spout, and blow,
In puffing, and in spouting, praise Lepaux!"

Britain beware; nor let the insidious foe,
Offorce despairing, aim a deadly blow.
Thy peace, thy strength, with dev'lish wiles assail,

And when her arms are vain, by arts prevail.
True thou art rich, art powerful—through thine isle,
Industrious skill, contented labour, smile—
For seas are studded with thy countless sails—
What wind but wafes them, and what shore but hails?

True, thou art brave—throughout thy busy land
In patriot ranks embattled myriads stand!
Thy foes behold with impotent amaze,
And drop the lifted weapon as they gaze.

But what avails to guard each outward part,
If subtle poison circling at her heart,
Spice of thy courage, of thy pow'r, and wealth,
Mime the sound fabric of thy vital health?

So thine own oak, by some fair streamlet's side,
Waves its broad arms, and spreads its leafy pride,
Shades the green earth, and tow'ring to the skies,
In conscious strength, the tempest's wrath defies.

The fowls of heav'n its ample branches share,
To its cool shade the panting herds repair;
The limpid current works its noiseless way;
The fibres loosen, and the roots decay.
Prostrate the mighty ruin lies; and all
That shared its shelter, perish in its fall.

O thou, lamented sage, whose prescient scan
Laid bare foul anarchy's gigantic plan;
Prompt to incredulous hearers to disclose
The guilt of France, and Europe's world of woes:
Thou, on whose name far distant time shall gaze,
The mighty sea mark of those troubled days,
O large of soul, of genius unconfin'd,
Born to delight, instruct, and mend mankind:
Burke! in whose breast a Roman ardour glow'd,
Whose copious tongue with Grecian richness
flow'd,
Well hast thou found (if such thy country's doom)

A timely refuge in the shelt'ring tomb.

As in far realms beneath the cypress shade,
Where eastern kings in pomp of death are laid,
The perfum'd lamp with unextinguished light Flames thro' the vault, and cheers the gloom of night;

So mighty Burke! in thy sepulchral urn
To fancy's view the lamp of truth shall burn.
Thither late times shall turn their rev'rent eyes,
Led by that light, and by thy wisdom wise.

FROM MAURICE'S POEMS.

TO SIR WILLIAM JONES.

Whither does fancy stretch her rapid wing?
Through what new regions of serener spring?
My ravish'd sense an opening Eden greets,
A waste of treasures, and a wild of sweets—
Entranc'd I seem through fairy bowers to stray,
Where scatter'd rubies pave the spangled way;
Transparent walks, with polish'd sapphires bright,
And fountains* sparkling with ambrosian light.
A sweeter lyre no eastern swain had strung,
More softly warbled or more boldly sung;
Whether, great bard, thy vigorous muse rehearse
Solima's deathless praise, in deathless verse;
Or, tuned to grief, thy melting numbers move,
Breathing the softest tales of plaintive love;
Tender as Petrarch's flows the impassion'd line,
Nor Vida boasts a chaster page than thine.
Yet not that Britain's laurels round thy head,
And Arab's palms with rival lustre spread,
For this I sing—but that, with fix'd disdain,
Thy Roman soul refus'd the flatterer's strain;
And dar'd prefer (unvers'd in courtly guile)
Virtue's just praise beyond a monarch's smile.†

EPIGRAM.

Cries Doctor Slop, elated with his skill,
My patient, Tom, observe I never kill;
In twice ten hours, so quick'd I cur'd his gout,
The Alderman was able to go out.
That's true, quoth Tom, let our opponents rave,
I myself met him—going—to his grave.
